The voice from the shadows was only a whisper, but each word thundered in my brain.

"I am a vampire," said the stranger. Madness. I turned to flee, but the voice pursued me.

"Yes, I am a vampire," he said. "And . . . so are you!"

II

I MUST have fainted, then. I must have fainted, and he must have carried me out of the cemetery, for when I opened my eyes once more I lay on a sofa in his house.

The panelled walls loomed high, and shadows crawled across the ceiling beyond the candlelight. I sat up, blinked, and stared at the stranger who bent over me.

I could see him now, and I wondered. He was of medium height, gray-haired, cleanshaven, and clad discreetly in a dark business suit. At first glance he appeared normal enough.

As his face glided towards me, I stared closer, trying to pierce the veil of his seeming sanity, striving to see the madness beneath the prosaic exterior of dress and flesh.

I stared and saw that which was worse than any madness.

At close glance his countenance was cruelly illumined by the light. I saw the waxen pallor of his skin, and what was worse than that, the peculiar corrugation. For his entire face and throat was covered by a web of tiny wrinkles, and when he smiled it was with a mummy's grin.

Yes, his face was white and wrinkled; white, wrinkled, and long dead. Only his lips and eyes were alive, and they were red . . . too red. A face as white as corpse-flesh, holding lips and eyes as red as blood.

He smelled musty.

All these impressions came to me before he spoke. His voice was like the rustle of the wind through a mortuary wreath.

"You are awake? It is well."

"Where am I? And who are you?" I asked the questions but dreaded an answer. The answer came.

“You are in my house. You will be safe here, I think. As for me, I am your guardian.”

“Guardian?”

He smiled. I saw his teeth. Such teeth I had never seen, save in the maw of a carnivorous beast. And yet—wasn’t that the answer?

“You are bewildered, my friend. Understandably so. And that is why you need a guardian. Until you learn the ways of your new life, I shall protect you.” He nodded. “Yes, Graham Keene, I shall protect you.”

“Graham Keene.”

It was my name. I knew it now. But how did he know it?

“In the name of mercy,” I groaned, “tell me what has happened to me!”

He patted my shoulder. Even through the cloth I could feel the icy weight of his pallid fingers. They crawled across my neck like worms, like wriggling white worms—

“You must be calm,” he told me. “This is a great shock, I know. Your confusion is understandable. If you will just relax a bit and listen, I think I can explain everything.”

I listened.

“To begin with, you must accept certain obvious facts. The first being—that you are a vampire.”

“But—”

He pursed his lips, his too red lips, and nodded.

“There is no doubt about it, unfortunately. Can you tell me how you happened to be emerging from a grave?”

“No. I don’t remember. I must have suffered a cataleptic seizure. The shock gave me partial amnesia. But it will come back to me. I’m all right, I must be.”

The words rang hollowly even as they gushed from my throat.

“Perhaps. But I think not.” He sighed and pointed.

“I can prove your condition to you easily enough. Would you be so good as to tell me what you see behind you, Graham Keene?”

“Behind me?”

“Yes, on the wall.”

I stared.

“I don’t see anything.”

“Exactly.”

“Where is your shadow?”

I LOOKED again. There was no shadow, no silhouette. For a moment my sanity wavered. Then I stared at him. “You have no shadow either,” I exclaimed, triumphantly. “What does that prove?”

“That I am a vampire,” he said, easily. “And so are you.”

“Nonsense. It’s just a trick of the light,” I scoffed.

“Still skeptical? Then explain this optical illusion.” A bony hand proffered a shining object.

I took it, held it. It was a simple pocket mirror.

“Look.”

I looked.

The mirror dropped from my fingers and splintered on the floor.

“There’s no reflection!” I murmured. “Vampires have no reflections.” His voice was soft. He might have been reasoning with a child.

“If you still doubt,” he persisted, “I advise you to feel your pulse. Try to detect a heartbeat.”

Have you ever listened for the faint voice of hope to sound within you . . . knowing that it alone can save you? Have you ever listened and heard nothing? Nothing but the silence of death?

I knew it then, past all doubt. I was of the Undead . . . the Undead who cast no shadows, whose images do not reflect in mirrors, whose hearts are forever stilled, but whose bodies live on—live, and walk abroad, and take nourishment.

Nourishment!

I thought of my companion’s red lips and his pointed teeth. I thought of the light blazing in his eyes. A light of hunger. Hunger for what?

How soon must I share that hunger? He must have sensed the question, for he began to speak once more.

“You are satisfied that I speak the truth, I see. That is well. You must accept your condition and then prepare to make the necessary adjustments. For there is much you have to learn in order to face the centuries to come.

“To begin with, I will tell you that many of the common superstitions about—people like us—are false.”

He might have been discussing the weather, for all the emotion his face betrayed. But I could not restrain a shudder of revulsion at his words.

“They say we cannot abide garlic. That is a lie. They say we cannot cross running water. Another lie. They say that we must lie by day in the earth of our own graves. That’s picturesque nonsense.

“These things, and these alone, are true. Remember them, for they are important to your future. We must sleep by day and rise only at sunset. At dawn an overpowering lethargy bedrugs our senses, and we fall into a coma until dusk. We need not sleep in coffins—that is sheer melodrama, I assure you!—but it is best to sleep in darkness, and away from any chance of discovery by men.

“I do not know why this is so, any more than I can account for other phenomena relative to the disease. For vampirism is a disease, you know.”

HE SMILED when he said it. I didn’t smile. I groaned.

“Yes, it is a disease. Contagious, of course, and transmissible in the classic manner, through a bite. Like rabies. What reanimates the body after death no one can say. And why it is necessary to take certain forms of nourishment to sustain existence, I do not know. The daylight coma is a more easily classified medical phenomenon. Perhaps an allergy to the direct actinic rays of the sun.

“I am interested in these matters, and I have studied them.

"In the centuries to come I shall endeavor to do some intensive research on the problem. It will prove valuable in perpetuating my existence, and yours."

The voice was harsher now. The slim fingers clawed the air in excitement.

"Think of that, for a moment, Graham Keene," he whispered. "Forget your morbid superstitious dread of this condition and look at the reality.

"Picture yourself as you were before you awoke at sunset. Suppose you had remained there, inside that coffin, nevermore to awaken! Dead—dead for all eternity!"

He shook his head. "You can thank your condition for an escape. It gives you a new life, not just for a few paltry years, but for centuries. Perhaps—forever!

"Yes, think and give thanks! You need never die, now. Weapons cannot harm you, nor disease, nor the workings of age. You are immortal—and I shall show you how to live like a god!"

He sobered. "But that can wait. First we must attend to our needs. I want you to listen carefully now. Put aside your silly prejudices and hear me out. I will tell you that which needs be told regarding our nourishment.

"It isn't easy, you know.

"There aren't any schools you can attend to learn what to do. There are no correspondence courses or books of helpful information. You must learn everything through your own efforts. Everything.

"Even so simple and vital a matter as biting the neck—using the incisors properly—is entirely a matter of personal judgment.

"Take that little detail, just as an example. You must choose the classic trinity to begin with—the time, the place, and the girl.

"When you are ready, you must pretend that you are about to kiss her. Both hands go under her ears. That is important, to hold her neck steady, and at the proper angle.

"You must keep smiling all the while, without allowing a betjrayal of intent to creep into your features or your eyes. Then you bend your head.

You kiss her throat. If she relaxes, you turn your mouth to the base of her neck, open it swiftly and place the incisors in position.

"Simultaneously—it must be simultaneously—you bring your left hand up to cover her mouth. The right hand must find, seize, and pinion her hands behind her back. No need to hold her throat now. The teeth are doing that. Then, and only then, will instinct come to your aid. It must come then, because once you begin, all else is swept away in the red, swirling blur of fulfillment."

I cannot describe his intonation as he spoke, or the unconscious pantomime which accompanied the incredible instructions. But it is simple to name the look that came into his eyes.

Hunger.

"Come, Graham Keene," he whispered. "We must go now."

"Go? Where?"

"To dine," he told me. "To dine!"

III

HE LED me from the house, and down a garden pathway through a hedge.

The moon was high, and as we walked along a windswept bluff, flying figures spun a moving web across the moon's bright face. My companion shrugged.

"Bats," he said. And smiled.

"They say that—we—have the power of changing shape. That we become bats, or wolves. Alas, it's only another superstition. Would that it were true? For then our life would be easy. As it is, the search for sustenance in mortal form is hard. But you will soon understand."

I drew back. His hand rested on my shoulder in cold command.

"Where are you taking me?" I asked.

"To food."

Irresolution left me. I emerged from nightmare, shook myself into sanity.

"No—I won't!" I murmured. "I can't—"

"You must," he told me. "Do you want to go back to the grave?"

"I'd rather," I whispered. "Yes, I'd rather die."

His teeth gleamed in the moonlight. "That's the pity of it," he said. "You can't die. You'll weaken without sustenance, yes. And you will appear to be dead. Then, whoever finds you will put you in the grave.

"But you'll be alive down there. How would you like to lie there undying in the darkness . . . writhing as you decay . . . suffering the torments of red hunger as you suffer the pangs of dissolution?

"How long do you think that goes on? How long before the brain itself is rotted away? How long must one endure the charnal consciousness of the devouring worm? Does the very dust still billow in agony?" His voice held horror.

"That is the fate you escaped. But it is still the fate that awaits you unless you dine with me.

"Besides, it isn't something to avoid, believe me. And I am sure, my friend, that you already feel the pangs of—appetite."

I could not, dared not answer.

For it was true. Even as he spoke, I felt hunger. A hunger greater than any I had ever known. Call it a craving, call it a desire—call it lust. I felt it, gnawing deep within me. Repugnance was nibbled away by the terrible teeth of growing need.

"Follow me," he said, and I followed. Followed along the bluff and down a lonely country road.

We halted abruptly on the highway. A blazing neon sign winked incongruously ahead.

I read the absurd legend.

"DANNY'S DRIVE-IN."

Even as I watched, the sign blinked out. "Right," whispered my guardian. "It's closing time. They will be leaving now."

"Who?"

"Mr. Danny and his waitress. She serves customers in their cars. They always leave together, I know. They are locking up for the night now. Come along and do as you are told."

I followed him down the road. His feet crunched gravel as he stalked towards the now darkened drive-in stand. My stride quickened in excitement. I moved forward as though pushed by a gigantic hand. The hand of hunger—

He reached the side door of the shack. His fingers rasped the screen.

An irritable voice sounded.

"What do you want? We're closing."

"Can't you serve any more customers?"

"Nah. Too late. Go away."

"But we're very hungry."

I almost grinned. Yes, we were very hungry.

"Beat it!" Danny was in no mood for hospitality.

"Can't we get any tiling?"

Danny was silent for a moment. He was evidently debating the point. Then he called to someone inside the stand.

"Marie! Couple customers outside. Think we can fix 'em up in a hurry?"

"Oh, I guess so." The girl's voice was soft, complaisant. Would she be soft and complaisant, too?

"Open up. You guys mind eating outside?"

"Not at all."

"Open the door, Marie."

Marie's high heels clattered across the wooden floor. She opened the screen door, blinked out into the darkness.

My companion stepped inside the doorway. Abruptly, he pushed the girl forward.

"Now!" he rasped.

I lunged at her in darkness. I didn't remember his instructions about smiling at her, or placing my hands beneath her ears. All I knew was that her throat was white, and smooth, except where a tiny vein throbbed in her neck.

I wanted to touch her neck there with my fingers—with my mouth—with my teeth.

So I dragged her into the darkness, and my hands were over her mouth, and I could hear her heels scraping through the gravel as I pulled her along. From inside the shack I heard a single long moan, and then nothing.

Nothing . . . except the rushing white blur of her neck, as my face swooped towards the throbbing vein. . . .

IV

IT WAS cold in the cellar—cold, and dark.

I stirred uneasily on my couch and my eyes blinked open on blackness. I strained to see, raising myself to a sitting position as the chill slowly faded from my bones.

I felt sluggish, heavy with reptilian contentment. I yawned, trying to grasp a thread of memory from the red haze cloaking my thoughts.

Where was I? How had I come here? What had I been doing?

I yawned. One hand went to my mouth. My lips were caked with a dry, flaking substance.

I felt it—and then remembrance flooded me.

Last night, at the drive-in, I had feasted. And then—

“No!” I gasped.

“You have slept? Good.”

My host stood before me. I arose hastily and confronted him.

“Tell me it isn’t true,” I pleaded. “Tell me I was dreaming.”

“You were,” he answered. “When I came out of the shack you lay under the trees, unconscious. I carried you home before dawn and placed you here to rest. You have been dreaming from sunrise to sunset, Graham Keene.”

“But last night—?”

"Was real."

"You mean I took that girl and—?"

"Exactly." He nodded. "But come, we must go upstairs and talk. There are certain questions I must ask."

We climbed the stairs slowly and emerged on ground level. Now I could observe my surrounding with a more objective eye. This house was large, and old. Although completely furnished, it looked somehow untenanted. It was as though nobody had lived here for a long time.

Then I remembered who my host was, and what he was. I smiled grimly. It was true. Nobody was living in this house now.

Dust lay thickly everywhere, and the spiders had spun patterns of decay in the corners. Shades were drawn against the darkness, but still it crept in through the cracked walls. For darkness and decay belonged here.

We entered the study where I had awakened last night, and as I was seated, my guardian cocked his head towards me in an attitude of inquiry.

"Let us speak frankly," he began. "I want you to answer an important question."

"Yes?"

"What did you do with her?"

"Her?"

"That girl—last night. What did you do with her body?"

I put my hands to my temples. "It was all a blur. I can't seem to remember."

His head darted towards me, eyes blazing. "I'll tell you what you did with her," he rasped. "You threw her body down the well. I saw it floating there."

"Yes," I groaned. "I remember now."

"You fool—why did you do that?"

"I wanted to hide it. . . . I thought they'd never know—"

"You thought!" Scorn weighted his voice. "You didn't think for an instant. Don't you see, now she will never rise?"

"Rise?"

"Yes, as you rose. Rise to become one of us."

"But I don't understand."

"That is painfully evident." He paced the floor, then wheeled towards me.

"I see that I shall have to explain certain things to you. Perhaps you are not to blame, because you don't realize the situation. Come with me."

He beckoned. I followed. We walked down the hall, entered a large, shelf-lined room. It was obviously a library. He lit a lamp, halted.

"Take a look around," he invited. "See what you make of it, my friend."

I SCANNED the titles on the shelves—titles stamped in gold on thick, handsome bindings; titles worn to illegibility on ancient, raddled leather. The latest in scientific and medical treatises stood on these shelves, flanked by age-encrusted incunabula.

Modern volumes dealt with psycopathology. The ancient lore was frankly concerned with black magic.

"Here is the collection," he whispered. "Here is gathered together all that is known, all that has ever been written about—us."

"A library on vampirism?"

"Yes. It took me decades to assemble it completely."

"But why?"

"Because knowledge is power. And it is power I seek."

Suddenly a resurgent sanity impelled me. I shook off the nightmare enveloping me and sought an objective viewpoint. A question crept into my mind, and I did not try to hold it back.

"Just who are you, anyway?" I demanded. "What is your name?"

My host smiled.

"I have no name," he answered.

"No name?"

"Unfortunate, is it not? When I was buried, there were no loving friends, apparently, to erect a tombstone. And when I arose from the grave, I had no mentor to guide me back to a memory of the past. Those were barbaric times in the East Prussia of 1777."

"You died in 1777?" I muttered.

"To the best of my knowledge," he retorted, bowing slightly in mock deprecation. "And so it is that my real name is unknown. Apparently I perished far from my native heath, for diligent research on my part has failed to uncover my paternity, or any contemporaries who recognized me at the time of my—er—resurrection.

"And so it is that I have no name; or rather, I have many pseudonyms. During the past sixteen decades I have traveled far, and have been all things to all men. I shall not endeavor to recite my history.

"It is enough to say that slowly, gradually, I have grown wise in the ways of the world. And I have evolved a plan. To this end I have amassed wealth, and brought together a library as a basis for my operations.

"Those operations I propose will interest you. And they will explain my anger when I think of you throwing the girl's body into the well."

He sat down. I followed suit. I felt anticipation crawling along my spine. He was about to reveal something—something I wanted to hear, yet dreaded. The revelation came, slyly, slowly.

"Have you ever wondered," he began, "why there are not more vampires in the world?"

"What do you mean?"

"Consider. It is said, and it is true, that every victim of a vampire becomes a vampire in turn. The new vampire finds other victims. Isn't it reasonable to suppose, therefore, that in a short time—through sheer mathematical progression—the virus of vampirism would run epidemic throughout the world? In other words, have you ever wondered why the world is not filled with vampires by this time?"

"Well, yes—I never thought of it that way. What is the reason?" I asked.

He glared and raised a white finger. It stabbed forward at my chest—a rapier of accusation.

“Because of fools like you. Fools who cast their victims into wells; fools whose victims are buried in sealed coffins, who hide the bodies or dismember them so no one would suspect their work.

“As a result, few new recruits join the ranks. And the old ones—myself included—are constantly subject to the ravages of the centuries. We eventually disintegrate, you know. To my knowledge, there are only a few hundred vampires today. And yet, if new victims all were given the opportunity to rise—we would have a vampire army within a year. Within three years there would be millions of vampires! Within ten years we could rule earth!

“Can’t you see that? If there was no cremation, no careless disposal of bodies, no bungling, we could end our hunted existence as creatures of the night—brothers of the bat! No longer would we be a legendary, cowering minority, living each a law unto himself!

“All that is needed is a plan. And I—I have evolved that plan!”

His voice rose. So did the hairs upon my neck. I was beginning to comprehend, now—

“Suppose we started with the humble instruments of destiny,” he suggested. “Those forlorn, unnoticed, ignorant little old men—night watchmen of graveyards and cemeteries.”

A SMILE creased his corpse-like countenance. “Suppose we eliminated them? Took over their jobs? Put vampires in their places—men who would go to the fresh graves and dig up the bodies of each victim they had bitten while those bodies were still warm and pulsing and undecayed?

“We could save the lives of most of the recruits we make. Reasonable, is it not?” To me it was madness, but I nodded. “Suppose that we made victims of those attendants? Then carried them off, nursed them back to reanimation, and allowed them to resume their posts as our allies? They work only at night—no one would know.

“Just a little suggestion, but so obvious! And it would mean so much!”

His smile broadened.

“All that it takes is organization on our part. I know many of my brethren. It is my desire soon to call them together and present this plan. Never before have we worked cooperatively, but when I show them the possibilities, they cannot fail to respond.

“Can you imagine it? An earth which we could control and terrorize—a world in which human beings become our property, our cattle?

“It is so simple, really. Sweep aside your foolish concepts of Dracula and the other superstitious confectionery that masquerades in the public mind as an authentic picture. I admit that we are—unearthly. But there is no reason for us to be stupid, impractical figures of fantasy. There is more for us than crawling around in black cloaks and recoiling at the sight of crucifixes!

“After all, we are a life-form, a race of our own. Biology has not yet recognized us, but we exist. Our morphology and metabolism has not been evaluated or charted; our actions and reactions never studied. But we exist. And we are superior to ordinary mortals. Let us assert this superiority! Plain human cunning, coupled with our super-normal powers, can create for us a mastery over all living things. For we are greater than Life—we are Life-in-Death!”

I half-rose. He waved me back, breathlessly.

“Suppose we band together and make plans? Suppose we go about, first of all, selecting our victims on the basis of value to our ranks? Instead of regarding them as sources of easy nourishment, let’s think in terms of an army seeking recruits. Let us select keen brains, youthfully strong bodies. Let us prey upon the best earth has to offer. Then we shall wax strong and no man shall stay our hand—or teeth.”

He crouched like a black spider, spinning his web of words to enmesh my sanity. His eyes glittered. It was absurd somehow to see this creature of superstitious terror calmly creating a super-dictatorship of the dead.

And yet, I was one of them. It was real. The nameless one would do it, too.

"Have you ever stopped to wonder why I tell you this? Have you ever stopped to wonder why you are my confidant in this venture?" he purred.

I shook my head.

"It is because you are young. I am old. For years I have labored only to this end. Now that my plans are perfected, I need assistance. Youth, a modern viewpoint. I know of you, Graham Keene. I watched you before . . . you became one of us. You were selected for this purpose."

"Selected?" Suddenly it hit home. I fought down a stranglehold gasp as I asked the question. "Then you know who—did this to me? You know who bit me?" Rotting fangs gaped in a smile. He nodded slowly.

"Of course," he whispered. "Why—I did!"

V

HE WAS probably prepared for anything except the calmness with which I accepted this revelation.

Certainly he was pleased. And the rest of that night, and all the next night, were spent in going over the plans, in detail. I learned that he had not yet communicated with—others—in regard to his ideas.

A meeting would be arranged soon. Then we would begin the campaign. As he said, the times were ripe. War, a world in unrest—we would be able to move unchallenged and find unusual opportunities.

I agreed. I was even able to add certain suggestions as to detail. He was pleased with my cooperation.

Then, on the third night, came hunger. He offered to serve as my guide, but I brushed him aside.

"Let me try my own wings," I smiled. "After all, I must learn sooner or later. And I promise you, I shall be very careful. This time I will see to it that the body remains intact. Then I shall discover the place of burial and we can perform an experiment. I will select a likely recruit, we shall go forth to open the grave, and thus will we test our plan in miniature."

He fairly beamed at that. And I went forth that night, alone.

I returned only as dawn welled out of the eastern sky—returned to slumber through the day.

That night we spoke, and I confided my success to his eager ears.

“Sidney J. Garrat is the name,” I said. “A college professor, about 45. I found him wandering along a path near the campus. The trees form a dark, deserted avenue. He offered no resistance. I left him there. I don’t think they’ll bother with an autopsy—for the marks on his throat are invisible and he is known to have a weak heart.

“He lived alone without relatives. He had no money. That means a wooden coffin and quick burial at Everest tomorrow. Tomorrow night we can go there.”

My companion nodded.

“You have done well,” he said.

We spent the remainder of the night in perfecting our plans. We would go to Everest, locate the night watchman and put him out of the way, then seek the new grave of Professor Garrat.

And so it was that we re-entered the cemetery on the following evening.

Once again a midnight moon glared from the Cyclopean socket of the sky. Once more the wind whispered to us on our way, and the trees bowed in black obeisance along the path.

We crept up to the shanty of the graveyard watchman and peered through the window at his stooping figure.

“I’ll knock,” I suggested. “Then when he comes to the door—”

My companion shook his gray head. “No teeth,” he whispered. “The man is old, useless to us. I shall resort to more mundane weapons.”

I shrugged. Then I knocked. The old man opened the door, blinked out at me with rheumy eyes.

“What is it?” he wheezed, querulously. “Ain’t nobuddy suppose tuh be in uh cemetery this time uh night—”

Lean fingers closed around his windpipe. My companion dragged him forth towards nearby shrubbery. His free arm rose and fell, and a silver arc stabbed down. He had used a knife.

Then we made haste along the path, before the scent of blood could divert us from our mission—and far head, on the hillside dedicated to the last slumbers of Poverty, I saw the raw, gaping edges of a new-made grave.

He ran back to the hut, then, and procured the spades we had neglected in our haste. The moon was our lantern and the grisly work began amidst a whistling wind.

No one saw us, no one heard us, for only empty eyes and shattered ears lay far beneath the earth.

We toiled, and then we stooped and tugged. The grave was deep, very deep. At the bottom the coffin lay, and we dragged forth the pine box.

“Terrible job,” confided my companion.

“Not a professionally dug grave at all, in my opinion. Wasn’t filled in right. And this coffin is pine, but very thick. He’d never claw his own way out. Couldn’t break through the boards. And the earth was packed too tightly. Why would they waste so much time on a pauper’s grave?”

“Doesn’t matter,” I whispered. “Let’s open it up. If he’s revived, we must hurry.” We’d brought a hammer from the caretaker’s shanty, too, and he went down into the pit itself to pry the nails free. I heard the board covering move, and peered down over the edge of the grave.

He bent forward, stooping to peer into the coffin, his face a mask of livid death in the moonlight. I heard him hiss.

“Why—the coffin is empty!” he gasped. “Not for long!”

I drew the wrench from my pocket, raised it, brought it down with every ounce of strength I possessed until it shattered through his skull.

AND then I leaped down into the pit and pressed the writhing, mewing shape down into the coffin, slammed the lid on, and drove the heavy nails into place.

I could hear his whimperings rise to muffled screams, but the screams grew faint as I began to heap the clods of earth upon the coffin-lid.

I worked and panted there until no sound came from the coffin below. I packed the earth down hard—harder than I had last night when I dug the grave in the first place.

And then, at last, the task was over.

He lay there, the nameless one, the deathless one; lay six feet underground in a stout wooden coffin.

He could not claw his way free, I knew. And even if he did, I'd pressed him into his wooden prison face down. He'd claw his way to hell, not to earth.

But he was past escape. Let him lie there, as he had described it to me—not dead, not alive. Let him be conscious as he decayed, and as the wood decayed and the worms crawled in to feast. Let him suffer until the maggots at last reached his corrupt brain and ate away his evil consciousness.

I could have driven a stake through his heart. But his ghastly desire deserved defeat in this harsher fate.

Thus it was ended, and I could return now before discovery and the coming of dawn—return to his great house which was the only home I knew on the face of the earth.

Return I did, and for the past hours I have been writing this that all might know the truth.

I am not skilled with words, and what I read here smacks of mawkish melodrama. For the world is superstitious and yet cynical—and this account will be deemed the ravings of a fool or madman; worse still, as a practical joke.

So I must implore you; if you seek to test the truth of what I've set down, go to Everest tomorrow and search out the newly-dug grave on the hillside. Talk to the police when they find the dead watchman, make them go to the well near Danny's roadside stand.

Then, if you must, dig up the grave and find that which must still writhe and crawl within. When you see it, you'll believe—and in justice, you will not relieve the torment of that monstrous being by driving a stake through his heart.

For that stake represents release and peace.
I wish you’d come here, after that—and bring a stake for me. . . .

Son of Rasputin

He claimed to be the son of Rasputin, and he proved it in a very horrible way—with a werewolf pack!

"ISN'T it romantic?" sighed Olivia Winthrop. She surveyed the Christmas-card panorama of snow through which she walked.

The short young man at her side nodded. His eyes, peering behind steelrimmed spectacles, rested absently on the scenery but very attentively on Olivia.

"Very romantic," he declared. "When you stop to consider that each one of these trillions of snowflakes has a distinct, individual pattern, not duplicated by any other, and—"

Olivia's lips parted in a scarlet pout.

"Oh, that!" she sighed. "Harry Crane—can't you stop being scientific about things for just a moment and merely appreciate the snow because it's pretty?"

"It gets on my glasses," Harry Crane complained. "Then I can't see you so well."

"I'm glad," Olivia declared. "Sometimes I think that even when you look at me, you're being scientific. Studying me as if I were some kind of guinea-pig."

The young man did not reply. Rounding a corner, he led the girl up the snow-covered steps of an imposing stone structure.

His eyes did sparkle now, as brightly as the girl's. She caught his glance.

"Glad to get back to the museum?" she almost mocked. "I guess that's where you really belong, Harry. In a museum, with a lot of old fossils from the past—not out here in the real world."

"Let's not quarrel, Olivia." Crane's voice was soft.

But the blonde girl was not to be denied. "If you lift your nose out of a book once in a while you might breathe a little fresh air or even perfume. There are such things in the world, you know. But you prefer this old, musty museum smell."

"Now, dear—your father wouldn't approve of that sort of talk."

"Oh, Harry Crane, you make me sick!"

Olivia tapped briskly down the hall in the direction of a large brown door, inscribed Wesley Winthrop, Curator. Crane followed swiftly.

They entered together.

Wesley Winthrop turned his bald head inquiringly.

"Hello, daughter," he greeted the girl. "And Harry." He cleared his throat. "Ah—would you two excuse me for a few moments longer? As you see, I am—ah—busy with a—visitor."

Both Crane and Olivia saw all too plainly. Indeed, they could stare at nothing else.

Seated opposite the table was a huge figure of a man. His black-clad bulk alone might easily dominate the room, but even his extraordinary hugeness paled in consideration with the strength of his features.

A bullet-shaped head, covered with long, curling black hair matting over sloping brows—and beneath it a face. Hawk nose, high cheekbones; the rest of the features were buried beneath a bushy black beard. Incongruous amidst the hairy mass, two full red lips parted voluptuously to reveal wide yellow teeth.

But bulk and head and beard and features all were dwarfed by the giants eyes.

Deep and black, they seemed rooted not in socket, but in the man's very skull. Their stare was serpent-like, and like a snake, the gaze seemed to wriggle into the very brain of the beholder. Here was a power beside which that of the great body itself paled.

FOR the first time. Crane noticed that Mr. Winthrop was badly shaken. And well he might be, for if he had been forced to look at this mam for any length of time.

“You will excuse us. I’m sure?” Winthrop repeated, jerkily. “Just a few moments more—”

“Let them stay.”

The voice was as deep as the eyes, as big as the body.

“They might as well hear what I have told you, and hearing, bear witness.” One huge white hand waved Crane and Olivia to the couch.

“Ah very well.” Winthrop blinked unsteadily. This is my daughter, Olivia, and her fiance, Mr. Crane. He is my assistant and secretary here at the museum. Olivia, this is Mr.”

“So.” Again the white paw waved, brushing aside Winthrop’s introduction. “I take it that I am to be introduced, nyet? Allow me to perform that service myself.

“I,” boomed the great voice, “am Nicolai Gregorovitch, son of Rasputin.”

“Rasputin?” Crane blurted.

The bearded man smiled. “Da. The name is familiar to you, I see, and well it might be.” There was a touch of bitterness in the smile; a stain of rust on iron.

“Oh, I wasn’t thinking of it historically. exactly. I was thinking of the Icon of St. Basil we have here at the museum,” Crane hastened.

Black eyebrows arched. “Exactly. Then you too know that this holy relic was once the property of my father. That is exactly what I was telling Mr. Winthrop, here.”

Winthrop turned troubled eyes to the bespectacled young man.

“Mr. Mr. Gregorovitch, as he calls himself, claims that the Icon belongs to him by right of descent, and he is—ah requesting that I give it up to him.”

“Requesting?” The booming voice cut in. “I am not requesting. I am demanding my property. Now. immediately, at once, do you hear?”

“Wait a minute,” said Harry Crane. “That Icon was purchased by the mu scum from the Soviet Government. It belongs here.”

“There is no Soviet Government,” the black-bearded man snapped. “There is only Holy Russia.” His pale hands made the sign of the cross, but with a curious reversal. “It was given my father by the Little White Father himself, in Petersburg And I have come here to claim it as is my right.”

“Well, Mr. Winthrop.” Crane said mildly turning to the bald headed curator. “If this man can show credentials. I’m afraid he has us there. Of course. I was under the impression that the monk who called himself Rasputin had no son. but if he has proof, then the Icon is his.”

“PROOF?” The giant Russian rose to his feet. “I show no proof to thieving dogs.” His voice lowered, as he turned his livid stare on the three in the room.

“But there is another kind of evidence I can furnish you to show that I am truly the son of Rasputin, master of wonders, and Little Grey Brother.

“They laughed at my father once, and scorned him as you scorn me when he came to Moscow and claimed his right to holy relics. They said he was a kulak. a peasant boor who had set himself up as a priest. They said he was a fanatical monk, and a madman. And they shut him up for years in Siberia, prisoned him in the deep white forests where only wolves and madmen howl across the Arctic steppes.

“But he came back! Ah, he came back! He had grown wise in the northland, where he had talked to the wizards and the shamans, the mystic hermits of the snows. He learned strange powers in the long nights, and he used them.

"Da, it is history. For he wrote history, in blood! He went to the Czar, when the little Czarevitch was dying of haemophilia, and he cured the boy with his arts. After that the Czar and the Czarina and all Russia was at his feet.

"They flocked to him for cures, for advice, for prophecy. He was famous as a wonder-worker. He, a peasant with mystic powers, was the real ruler of Russia. Behind the throne he played his game; using Czar, Czarina, grand dukes and duchesses, generals and prim es as Iris chessmen and pawns.

"Finally they had to betray and kill him, scoundrels that they were. But it was suicide they committed, not murder—for when Rasputin died, so died Russia!"

"Bunk!" Surprisingly, it was Harry Crane who spoke. Olivia gazed at him in astonishment as the short young man rose to his feet, polishing his glasses with nervous fingers.

"Rasputin was an ignorant peasant, an epileptic with a diseased mind. His mowings and gibberings while in a fit. were looked on as evidences of an oracle inspired by a trance. The stupid, thrillseeking nobility made it the rage to bow down to the savage clod whose wanderings while exiled to Siberia had deranged him. He was a hypnotist and a schemer, too, but he was no more a mystic or a holy man than you are. If, indeed, you are his son."

"So, you are very wise, young man. Perhaps too wise," mocked the deep voice. "I see that you will have to be shown, as I have told you.

"I was born in Siberia, during Rasputin's exile. My mother died, and when my father returned to Moscow he left me in the care of the shamans from whom he had learned his powers.

"They reared me, and for many years I have studied their secrets until I am a greater adept than even my father. I too am a Little Grey Brother."

The eyes were quite bright now, too bright for sanity.

"They called him that, you know. Little Grey Brother. But they never knew what it meant. They never knew that it meant Little Grey Brother of the Wolves."

"PLEASE—" Winthrop was on his feet. "Can't you see that you're upsetting my daughter? If we could talk alone—"

"Talk? I do not talk now. I command. Give me the Icon of Holy St. Basil, or I shall call down upon your heads my curse and the curse of my father. The curse of the Wolf!"

The black-bearded giant was grim. "They taught me, the wizards of the north, how to command the grey brothers of the forest. The wolves that are not wolves—the wolves that once were men—the shadows of the night. You know them as werewolves."

"See here." Winthrop regained some dignity. "If you think you can frighten us with silly superstitious stories, you're badly mistaken. This isn't Russia, this is America, and you are talking to educated men. not children."

"Exactly!" Catlike, the Russian moved towards the window. "I will not frighten you with superstitions. I will show you!"

One hand raised the window. A blast of wintry air poured in. bringing the chill of snowy dusk from outside. The great figure turned, hands framing his lips as he called into the gathering darkness beyond.

"Ho! My Brothers—come!" The great voice boomed. Then silence as the Russian turned. Silence, save for the rustling wind—and another rustling. A padding. A crunching of feet on snow.

Not feet, wearing shoes. Not normal steps. East, padding paws!

"I will show you," repeated the Russian. "Here!"

Rising above the window ledge, rising suddenly so that the head was framed squarely in the light, rising like a black bulk from the depths of nightmare, came the gigantic canine head.

Red eyes glared, red tongue lolled, white teeth bared in panting breath.

Peering into the room was a gigantic wolf!

Its little wicked eyes ravened as they rested on the figures of the two men. Then it saw the girl. From the shaggy throat came a howl of savage delight, and the head jerked forward. Two paws rose to the window-sill, the body poised—

And the son of Rasputin slammed the window down, in frantic haste.

"Wait, Oh Brother!" he snapped.

Slowly the dark head was withdrawn from the pane outside. It disappeared. But the shuddering three heard, faint and faraway, the keening howl that rose in the night.

"Now," said the Russian. "Do I get it?"

FOR a moment there was silence.

Again it was Harry Crane who spoke.

"No," he answered. "You don't."

Winthrop and the girl looked up in astonishment. The bearded man glowered.

"Very well. You've had your warning. Now you shall have your curse." The voice droned. "May the curse of the Wolf be upon thee all! May the Little Grey Brothers tear thy throats, may they rend and destroy thy bodies until ye howl like the wolves thou shalt become!"

His mocking eyes rested upon the girl. "Yea, verily," he smirked, and his Biblical speech was horribly shocking to hear from those full red lips. "Even thee, my sister. Thy white flesh shall be given over to yellow fangs to tear, and thy full body shall shrink and shrivel until thou runnest upon all fours and bay the moon like the very wolf thou shalt become."

"Harry!" The girl stood close to the short young man. her eyes brimming with hysteria He gulped, but smiled boldly.

"Nonsense! "he maintained.

Once more the Russian smiled. "Of course. Du, you would say that, just as Winthrop says it. You are educated men. not superstitious children. And so are your police, and your friends. They too will laugh at the story of the Wolf curse, and so they will do nothing.

"They will not believe when you come running to them with stories of wolves peering in windows at you at night. 'Not in America' they will say, and chuckle knowingly. And they will not believe when wolves lurk and attack you in the snow.

"They wall not believe even when your mangled bodies are found.

"They will not believe when, as wolves, you come whining and yelping to their doors, trying vainly to speak and tell the tale.

"And because they will not believe, I am safe. Your police will not lock me up because I have put a silly curse on you. What is the charge? Disorderly conduct? Your so wise legislators have no laws against witchcraft any more. So I boast openly. You have defied me—therefore, I curse you with the Wolf curse!"

He backed from the room.

THE three looked at one another in something bordering very close to dismay.

Then, "The Icon—is it safe?" Crane whispered.

Winthrop nodded. "I put two men on it this afternoon when this Gregorovitch came. You see, he's written me letters demanding it before."

"Ooooh—Daddy—" It was Olivia, her calm broken at last. "That wolf —"

"There was no wolf," Crane snapped.

"No wolf?"

"Of course not," said the young man, glibly. "Mental suggestion. Hypnotism. Did you notice his eyes?"

"But I saw it—heard it—" the girl, whispered.

"Afraid to take a look?" Crane challenged.

"Of course not. If a timid soul like you will, then I certainly can."

Together the two left the room, retracing their steps to the door.

Opening it, Crane stared out into darkness.

The Russian had gone. There were no prowling figures in the snow.

"You see?"

"Yes," the girl whispered faintly. "I see."

Crane followed her downward stare to the snow on the steps.

There were footprints on the steps Footprints leading down and away from the door.

One gigantic set was unmistakably the Russian's. The other at his very side, and leading away with his own—was made up of pawprints. The huge pawprints of a giant wolf!

CHAPTER II

The Werewolves Strike

THE mummy's face leered up in darkness. Madly the great ape crouched, poising to spring. A coiling snake lashed its head upwards, poison-soaked fangs adrip with venom. And Harry Crane tensed in the black museum, waiting.

King and Fletcher, the two guards, were at his side. The three men patrolled the nighted halls in silence.

"Wish Winthrop had let me call the police," Crane muttered. "Even if they would laugh at it."

"Huh," snorted Fletcher, a short stocky man with a phlegmatic face. "Some guys are afraid of their own shadows."

"You saw the footprints, didn't you?"

"Aw, he must of had a dog with him.

Crane, you make me tired. If it wasn't for you I could be settin' home with the missus, smokin' my pipe in peace, instead of walking up and down this morgue at night."

"Yeah," chimed in King. "Mean to say we got to stand guard here until morning just so some crackpot doesn't break in and steal that Icon?"

Crane smiled through the darkness.

"I'm sorry, boys; you know that. Still, I think it best to—what was that?"

"Oh, quit jumping." Fletcher was openly scornful.

"I heard it outside, I tell you. A howling."

"Nonsense. Storm coming up again. We're liable to be snowbound."

There it is again. Listen!”

This time all three men halted their pacing. And now, distinctly, though from afar, came the moaning cry from outside the locked building.

It was answered, and from a closer spot.

Crane didn’t hesitate.

“Come on, boys.” He drew a revolver from his pocket. “Down the hall. We’ll stand guard around the Icon case.”

They wheeled, quickened as the howling rose. Seemingly it came from the very side of the museum itself. As they walked, a new sound took its place.

The sharp brittle clatter of breaking glass!

“Hurry!” Breaking into a run, the three men raced down the hall and into the chamber where the Icon of St. Basil rested in its case.

Or had rested. For as they entered, Crane snapped on his flashlight and shot the beam towards the center of the room.

“Gawd!” breathed Fletcher.

Bounding over the sill, through the shattered windowpane, three great furry forms hurled themselves into the room.

Three sets of fangs were bared in bestial fury, red eyes glared, and a howl echoed and reechoed down the sable corridors.

“There!” Crane levelled his revolver at the first of the charging forms and fired. The shot blazed through darkness but the wolves came on.

Not for the men, but for the glass case!

STUNNED, the three stood momentarily staring at an unbelievable sight. Even as they watched, the foremost of the wolves reached the case and rose erect on hind paws.

Rose—and walked!

Walked on shaggy paws too thin to conceal legs. Walked on wolf-feet, wolfarms raised as it shattered the glass and grasped the Icon with a single gesture.

For a moment the glaring head turned in a hideously human fashion, to stare over its shoulder. The contorted wolfish features grinned in glee, and a wild howl of triumph rose.

Crane's weapon spoke again, and the two guards rushed forward.

The wolves turned. The one with the Icon ran on hind feet only to the window. And then its companions wheeled. Fletcher and King were in the lead, guns in hand, when the sudden move occurred.

Two shaggy forms hurtled through the air and leapt for the guards' throats. King threw up one hand, dodging, and the beast landed beyond him, directly in Crane's path.

The other went down in a thrashing heap with Fletcher. Crane heard the man's screams, heard shots and growls intermingled.

And then he faced the snarling monster in his path. He whirled his revolver, but too late.

Grey horror sprang, howling for the kill.

Harry Crane felt the impact of the hairy body as it launched itself against his chest, felt the rasp of acrid breath in his face, as the yellow fangs gaped for his neck. He went down, arms clawing vainly as the giant wolf worried for his jugular. The teeth grazed his shoulder. In the background he heard howls, screams, a thunderous crash, and shots. But that was but the setting for nightmare—nightmare ravening for his blood.

He squirmed free, arms fumbling loose, fumbling for the revolver. Again the beast sprang as he rose, and he smashed the blunt butt of his weapon against the dripping snout.

With a yelp of pain the wolf bounded away. Crane's shot seared darkness as the beast turned tail and launched itself back through the window.

Shakily, Harry Crane tottered erect. King stumbled to his side, eyes wide in the flashlight's beam.

"They got the Icon," he whispered. "I—I think I got one of them as it went out the window. But look, Harry—look what it did to Fletcher."

He pointed to the body that lay crumpled on the museum floor. The two men looked into each other's faces for a long moment. But they did not look into the face of the dead guard, for Fletcher's face was gone. There was only a red mask, grinning madly up at the museum ceiling.

"Call the police," Crane whispered. King nodded and ran down the hall.

"Don't say a word about this until I get back," Crane shouted.

"Are you leaving?"

"Of course. I don't want to be held for questioning just now. I must get to Olivia and her father. If," and for a moment Crane's voice faltered, and his eyes paled behind his spectacles, "if I get there—in time."

CHAPTER III

Hell at Their Heels

"I NEVER would have dreamed it," Wesley Winthrop kept murmuring. His thin fingers dug into his bald scalp. "Of course I didn't want the police—all that publicity would be bad for the museum. So undignified. But even so, I meant to call on the Soviet consul tomorrow and find out about this man Gregorovitch."

"Perhaps that's why he struck so soon," Crane suggested. "He couldn't stand investigation."

"Struck!" Winthrop shuddered at the word. "What you tell me is—incredible." He sighed. "And he has the Icon."

Crane opened his mouth, but Olivia put a finger to her lips.

"Don't say any more," she whispered. "He's too upset." Rut it was Olivia herself who trembled, whose blue eyes fluttered like the wings of frightened doves.

She led Crane into the hall.

"Harry," she murmured. "I—I want to tell you something. For about ten minutes before you came I had the funniest feeling that something was watching me through the window. And I heard—those noises again."

"Absurd!" Crane smiled tensely. He patted the girl's shoulders, and his hands rose to caress her hair. "There's a pretty bad storm raging outside, and the wind is howling a lot. I scarcely made it through to your place here."

"Wolves—run fast," the girl whispered. "And the Curse is still on us—"

Thunder flooded the hall.

"Someone's at the door!" Olivia trembled. "Oooh—don't open it—"

Crane stepped forward. One hand reached for the doorknob, the other for his revolver.

Door opened and revolver flashed.

Badge flashed, as Patrolman Dever entered the hall.

"You Crane?" demanded the big cop, abruptly.

"I am."

"Come with me."

"What's the matter, officer?"

"Plenty's the matter. I've got orders to bring you and Winthrop and Miss Winthrop back to the museum for questioning. So get a move on, before we're all snowbound. We had a hell—beggin' your pardon, Miss—of a time making it here in the first place."

"You—you didn't see anything lurking around outside, did you, officer?" Olivia blurted. "Any—wolves?"

PATROLMAN DEYER shot her a long glance.

"Then you know?" he said. His fingers mechanically made the sign of the cross.

"Know what?" Crane demanded.

"Why, about the body—the one they found in the snow outside the museum window. One of you plugged him when he was getting away."

"Go on."

"Well, sir—" Dever's voice rose to a curious break. "Malone, he's the Coroner, you know', got there right away with us. And he took a quick look at the body.

"I don't get all he said, but he was pretty excited."

Again Dever's voice broke. Then it sank to a whisper before continuing.

"He told the sergeant that it wasn't rightly a wolf at all. Said it was like nothing he'd ever seen before. When he heard that stuff about one of them walking on its hind legs, he let out a yap, and then he said—he said—"

"What, man?"

"He said this wolf was a wolf all right, but it had human bones and a human skull!"

A flash of fire glanced from behind Crane's spectacles. Again Dever crossed himself. "It's a black night." he sighed. "Best to come along, all of you. The squad car's waiting outside."

"What's the trouble?" Winthrop appeared.

"We're going back to the museum," Crane answered. "All of us. We'll be safer there. And we can get to the bottom of this."

The three donned their garments in the hallway. Dever flung open the door and the storm's fury beat at their bodies as they walked the dark pathway to the snow-covered squadcar.

Olivia's eyes searched the darkness.

"Something's moving out there!" she declared. "I can see it against the snow."

"Get in." Crane pushed her forward, curtly cutting her off.

much difficulty, Dever managed to start his motor. The car teetered slowly out of its rut.

"Terrific weather," he grunted.

Winthrop turned to Crane.

"My boy, you haven't told me everything. I can feel it," he declared. "Surely you must have some explanation for it all. There are no such things as werewolves—"

The ghastly answer came, not from Crane, but from outside the slowly-moving car.

"Oh!" Olivia gasped. Her wide eyes peered through the blurred windows. The others turned.

There, in the swirling snow that whipped the country road, there, limned against the deserted white hills, stood the wolf-pack.

Stood? Raced!

As if by signal, the threatening shapes broke into a lope. Crane counted one—two—three—four. Four grey nightmares, pursuing their car down the road!

Again the howl.

"Holy Mother!" Dever shouted. "I can't get any speed on this road!" The car floundered forward.

And the wolves came on. Racing, gleaming eyes bobbing closer, the howling horde descended.

Crane thought of the snowy steppes, of sleighs filled with travellers that were attacked by wolves.

Now the shaggy forms—the incredibly huge forms—loomed alongside the car. Crane drew his revolver. "Your gun, man!" fie shouted to Dever. Dever stopped the car, drew swiftly. The wolf-pack ringed the squadcar on all sides. Dever opened the door and thrust his weapon forward. Without hesitation the pack charged.

A shot thundered, and another. With a snarl of pain one wolf dropped back, but the other three came in in a grey wave—a grey wave that flooded the front seat as Dever went down under the fangs.

"Quick!" Crane shouted. "Duck!" He flung the robe over Olivia's head and forced her and Winthrop below the seat level. His revolver spat death as the wolf-heads turned to him, jaws adrip with red.

A grey snarler lunged forward and went down with a bullet between its horridly human eyes. A second, manlike, attempted to crawl over the seat. Again Crane shot, again scored a hit. The third wolf growled low. Crouching over Dever's body, its eyes moved warily.

"Yaa—uuuur," it growled. Then—"fggg—fool!"

The human word crashed against Crane's consciousness as the beast sprang. He pressed the trigger, felt the snarling face meet his own, and then from behind came the hoarse laugh and the shattering blow on the skull that plunged him into darkness.

CHAPTER IV

Little Grey Brother

CRASH of waves against seashore. Crash of columns into dust. Crash of light against eyes groping in blackness. . . . Complete and cold.

Then, light.

Harry Crane blinked into consciousness, hands searching for glasses that were no longer there. His hands confined to press his features, reassured to feel no gaping wounds in neck or cheek. Rising upwards to his scalp, his fingers encountered a livid welt that explained his descent into oblivion. Knocked on the head he assuredly had been. But by whom?

And where was he? Where was Winthrop—and above all—where was Olivia?

Crane's slightly blurry gaze provided no definite answer as to his exact whereabouts. His eyes met walls of solid stone on three sides of his body, and a row of bars on the fourth. He was penned in a cell. And the chill dampness hinted at subterranea. A basement of some sort.

Stepping to the bars, he peered down an expanse of dimly-lighted corridor. His hands automatically grasped the cold steel of the barred doorway, rattled the solid iron. It did not give. He was securely penned, and in the power of the werewolves, in the power of their master.

And so was Olivia.

The thought quickened his pulses to a frenzy. What were they doing to her? A fantastic curse—but its truth had been furnished with ghastly proofs. Crane's eyes searched the cellar twilight. Bitt other organs brought response. To his ears came suddenly the faroff cry he had grown to know and dred. A faint howling, as though from an adjoining room. A wolfish howling, and above it a shriek of laughter that might have been animal, might have been human. Or might have been—neither.

He muttered an oath, then ceased abruptly. For the howling had been succeeded by another sound.

From a distance, the creak of a door slowly opening. And then, a crawling noise.

Something was rustling, creeping into the corridor beyond. Something was moving down towards him, moving slowly and slyly. Crawling, crawling, as a wolf crawls on its belly when it inches forward to spring.

Scraping through the darkness, crawling through the night. Crane saw the black bulk moving through the shadows. And he heard it—heard now the painful breath, the panting.

What was crawling towards him, and why? Was it—hungry? The thought gripped him, but he held close to the bars.

SLOWLY, it crept into his line of vision. Now he saw the foremost limb reach the bars outside his cell. He saw the limb in the dim light, and recognized the whiteness with a gasp of suppressed relief.

It was a human hand!

Above the wrist, a flash of blue cloth. Crane knew who it must be.

"Dever!" he whispered, elated. "Is that you?"

No answer. But the crawling came again, with another gasp, and the body slid forward along the floor. Now the bulk was visible. The torn blue uniform. It was Dever, all right.

Or—was it?

The thing grasped the bars and pulled itself up to its knees, and then Harry Crane covered his eyes to shield away the sight of what gasped and wheezed upon its knees in that dark corridor.

The hands were white and human, and the face was whiter still in its mask of pain. But in between—across the chest and the shoulders, where wolf fangs had ripped the blue uniform to rags—in between, humanity ended.

Torn, bleeding image of nightmare, the mangled chest of Patrolman Dever was covered with a thick grey growth of wolf fur!

Blood dabbled the lupine shagginess, and agony shone from his tortured eyes as he slumped against the bars, staring mute and exhausted up at Harry Crane.

And Crane could only whisper, “What did they do?” over and over, knowing all the while what the answer must be.

“I—don’t know—” wheezed the thing in the corridor. “I remember those things biting me—taking the car. A big man with a black beard climbed in after them—guess he hit you. The things went out again—he drove us to this place—house in the hills—passed out.”

The white hands nearly lost their grip on the bars. Crane bent lower, held the wounded man close.

“Go on.”

“When I came to I was on a table. The man with the black beard was standing over me—guess he tried to doctor me up—heard him say—no use.

“Then I looked down and saw—this!”

A SOB broke from the horrid furry chest. But Dever’s tortured face set as he struggled to continue.

“That’s where wolves—bit me, you know. When wolves like they bite you, you—change. “That’s the legend. But it’s true! Getting—hairy like wolf.

“He said no use and dragged me to one side. Carried me into another room.” Dever’s words came interspersed with jerks of pain.

“What about Olivia and Winthrop?” Crane prompted.

“He sent for them next—the wolf things brought them in. They walk, you know—like men. Like I might walk, if I lived. Change has started—but guess I'm too badly done up to keep going. Just as well this way—don't want to be one of them."

The dying man bent closer.

"He carried me into side room—I wasn't all the way out—got my hand in his pocket and took—keys. One of them must fit lock here. Crawled down—while they're busy.

"Get out. Get out and do something before they get too busy. Because the old man and the girl are in there!"

The white hands fumbled to the side, pulled out a silver key chain. Glazing eyes turned to Crane as he snatched the keys. Then, with a sob, the great grey chest heaved up, a wolfish snarl coughed into the throat, and Patrolman Dever pitched forward against the floor of the corridor. One white hand made a feeble gesture. The sign of the cross.

Crane's hands made frantic gestures. Two keys failed in the huge lock which held the barred doorway. The third clicked.

But Harry Crane didn't hear the clicking. He heard only the howl from the shut-off room down the corridor. Heard only the howl—and the answering scream.

CRANE'S hands wrenched the open lock free, and then he ran swiftly down the corridor—ran towards the sounds of Olivia's frantic cries.

Rounding the passageway, he faced the half-ajar doorway to another chamber. Light streamed out, and he shrank back into the shadows as he stared at the revelation within.

The huge cellar chamber blazed in the glare of surgical lamps. The livid light streamed down upon the figures of the room's inmates, as the flames of Hell reveal the forms of demons in the Pit.

Ringed in a half-circle about a white table, three great hairy forms squatted on furry haunches, as though they were appreciative spectators of the scene before them.

Bound to a pillar at their side, Crane recognized the frail form of Wesley Winthrop. His eyes were as bright as the wolves', but bright only with fear.

Wolves and Winthrop alike stared at the white table. Standing over it was the huge bulk Crane recognized only too well. The black-bearded son of Rasputin loomed against his gaze.

His face held madness, and his great paw held a knife. But he also stared down at the white table—the surgical table.

Crane stared, too. Stared at the bared, blonde body of Olivia, arms pinioned behind her head, the smooth contours of her flesh exposed to the piercing gaze—and the still more piercing knife.

It was a scene born in the dreams of a demon. A Witch's Sabbath. The naked sacrifice, the knife, and a modern surgical table as the altar. The black- bearded servant of Satan, and the attendant forms of beasts and familiars.

Werewolves and their Master—the son of Rasputin about the work of the Devil!

Fantastic—yes, fantastic as the curse, fantastic as the wolves that walked on their hind paws, fantastic as the wolf that had uttered a human word, fantastic as the furry chest of Dever.

But the truth. Yes, the incarnate truth behind all ancient whispers—whispers of beasts become men, and men become beasts. Whispers of teeth that were fangs, and fingers that were claws. Whispers of a dreadful linkage between animal and humanity—a linkage made possible by worship of Evil.

And the son of Rasputin knew Evil, as he had boasted. He had learned the secrets in the northland.

THE fragmentary thoughts flooded Crane's brain, but over them came the sharp realization of the immediate horror of what he saw.

For the bearded giant was turning his face to the bound Wesley Winthrop.

"Now," he boomed. "Once more, I shall ask it. Do I get it, or does your thirst for forbidden secrets urge me to go on?"

Winthrop's lips worked.

"I tell you," he whispered, "I know nothing about it."

The Russian thrust his face forward.

"Very well. Then I will proceed."

He turned again to the girl. Crane saw that Olivia's face was but a pallid background for the bright dread shining from her eyes.

The Russian's smile was like an obscene caress as he gazed at her slim body under the searing lights. "You remember," he almost whispered, "how I placed upon thee the curse of the Wolf, O my sister?"

The girl nodded, striving for words that would not come.

"Thy white, full body shall shrink and shrivel until thou runnest upon all fours and bay the moon like the very wolf thou shalt become." He quoted with sadistic relish, and all the while Olivia stared upwards at the knife that hung in his hand, hung and did not waver its point from her breasts.

The Russian's other hand reached under the table and drew forth a limp form. Dragging out the bulk by the scruff of the neck, he revealed the carcass of one of the dead wolf-things.

"Here is a Grey Brother that shall not run again," he declared. "Is it not so?" And he flung the question to the three wolves.

A growl of hellish assent arose. They understood!

"But I shall give you a Grey Sister, instead!" Gregorovitch chuckled.

"Ah yes, Winthrop, assuredly I shall do it. Woman she is, but wolf she shall be unless you confess."

"I have—nothing to confess," Winthrop choked.

"Then, behold! You shall see the secret of my werewolves, yes—see the creation of one. And your daughter is chosen!"

The knife flashed down, into the body of the wolf. It lay on the table at the girl's shuddering white side, and as the knife struck home, the dark carcass was stained with red.

With swift, practiced strokes, Gregorovitch flayed a strip of furry skin from the dead hide.

He stepped back, to a cabinet beside the table. His huge hands fumbled for gauze, for antiseptic, for a long needle threaded with catgut.

And then he grasped the knife again, eyes bright as a priest preparing for infernal sacrifice, and the knife flashed down—into the body of the girl!

CHAPTER V

Beauty and the Beast

"DEVIL!" The word came as a gasp from Harry Crane's chest—a gasp flung from a moving body. Crane hurled himself into the cellar chamber in a single movement that caused the son of Rasputin to raise eyes and knife from the white form before him.

The bearded face snarled in surprise. Crane drew back his arm, grasping the lock removed from his cell door, and let fly. The iron missile caught the giant Russian squarely in the center of the forehead, and he went down with a crash.

Crane leaped to the side of the fallen madman, grasped the knife from inert fingers, and slashed Olivia free.

"All right," murmured the girl, in answer to his frantic gaze. "He—stopped in time."

Turning, Harry Crane repeated the office for Mr. Winthrop. Freed of their bonds, the two stepped to his side. They turned for the door, only to recoil in sudden realization.

Silently, crouched to spring, the three grey wolves leered up from the doorway.

Crane raised the knife.

"Back!" he commanded. "Get back." The largest wolf grinned, grinned in almost human mockery. Then it rose in nightmare fashion to its hind paws and stood manlike.

“Mmm—uuuh—Mas-ter—urr—hurt,” it growled. “Kill!”

And two more shaggy forms rose, in a single movement, and launched themselves for Crane’s throat.

“Duck!” panted the short young man, pulling the others down. The first wolf landed in a growling heap on the floor behind them. The second hurtling body was deflected by Crane’s arm.

Then he had raced around the surgical table, pulling the others with him.

“Take knives,” he ordered, pointing to the cabinet. The girl and her father armed themselves.

The three wolves came on slowly across the floor, led by the largest. As they neared, Crane hurled a scalpel. It missed its mark, but the beasts retreated, if beasts they were.

If beasts they were—

Even in peril, Harry Crane’s eyes noted the horror of these creatures. The hideously familiar quality of those skulls. Manlike contours under the fur. Ad the almost human expressions of the snouted faces. And the way the paws bent, like elbows and knees; on limbs too thin to be human. Paws that were almost hands!

Once again fangs came on—fangs whose bite meant death, or the worse fate Dever had hinted at. The bite of a werewolf. Crane tensed, waiting for the spring.

Abruptly the large wolf halted, turned. “Guuu—guu—get uuu-uuuh-thers,” it croaked. In a flash, the three raced from the chamber, their padding paws thudding back out the corridor.

“Come on,” Crane whispered. “Let’s get ourselves out of here while the way is clear.”

“They’re getting others,” Olivia faltered. Then her eyes took on resolution. “All right. I’m—with you.” Stepping cautiously, they made for the opened door. And then, from behind them boomed the voice that spelled doom.

“Stand where you are!”

RISING shakily to his feet, blood streaming from the gash at his hairy temple, Gregorovitch stood facing them behind the muzzle of a pistol.

"You will wait," he hissed. "I foresee that my Grey Brothers have prepared a welcome for you."

Padding feet announced the return. But there was a greater volume in the approaching clatter. And the deep growls of the wolves held overtones. Faltering whines, whimpers, fresh cries. The door opened, and into the room flooded a horde of grey terror before which the two men and the girl recoiled in utter loathing.

The shocking vision of this atrocity was too much for sane eyes to see.

There were more wolves in this pack now—but not completely.

There was a thing that was wolf from head to waist—fur above, and naked human flesh beneath. It whimpered as it stumbled into the room, and fresh half-healed scars in the grey wolf-trunk attested to its pain. There was another monstrosity with furry legs and a human torso, and a final, unbelievable ghastliness that was human but for a wolf's head. This creature crawled, upon arms and legs unbelievably thin; bent and twisted beyond the point of emaciation.

But the horde never hesitated. Led by the three monsters in the van, the roaring things born of blackest myth surged upwards about the trapped three.

Furry forms hurled themselves against Crane's body. He turned, grappling, and went under. Teeth tore at his arm, but he broke free, lurching to his feet. His sudden rise caught the bearded Russian behind him unwares, and he staggered for a moment. Crane wrestled for the pistol, but great arms were around him, pinning his wrists. And then, with a roar of rage, the Russian lifted Crane over his head in a burst of mania strength, and hurled him forward into the racing wolf-pack.

Crane's slight body fell, but the forms leaping up to reach him did not reach their goal.

WITH the crack of revolvers thundering through the cellar's walls, the blue-coated figures charged into the room. Shots streaked into the furry- mass, and wolves died screaming in madly human voices. Gregorovitch, son of Rasputin, raced catlike towards the door. His arms rose and fell amidst the swarm of officers, but the strength of his fury made them give way. Crane rose to his knees, hand clutching the Russian's discarded pistol. He shot once, and the huge body toppled forever.

Gunfire, howling, panic died away.

Silence settled on the cellar—the silence of grey death.

Winthrop and Olivia faced their rescuers.

"Had a hard time finding your trail in this storm," the officer in charge panted. "When Dever didn't bring you back, we came on out in another squad.

Picked up your trail, and saw the fresh trail when the Russian took over. Slow following you here in the storm. But now," and the officer's eyes strayed with a flicker of genuine fear towards the grotesque forms on the floor, "Now, what's all this about?"

Crane stepped forward.

"I think perhaps I can tell you," he said.

"Our Russian friend here has been trying to threaten Mr. Winthrop into handing over the Icon of St. Basil from the museum. Knowing it had once been the property of the monk Rasputin, he claimed to be Rasputin's son. When Mr. Winthrop refused to give it to him, he planned to rob the museum and make his story of having power over werewolves explain the theft."

"Story?" Olivia turned pale. "But these are werewolves!"

Crane shook his head with a tired smile. "No," he declared. "They aren't. They're men."

"Men? But how would they be? Look at those fangs, those faces and paws, those thin arms—"

"Let me explain. Our Russian friend, whoever he really was, did spend some time in Siberia, evidently. And he did learn some very terrible things.

It is the custom there, as in some parts of China and Tibet, to produce artificial monsters from human children by altering their bodies.

“By means of surgery, the hide of a wolf or a wild dog is grafted on to human flesh after the human skin is removed. Piece by piece, until the body is completely furred. Then comes a period of torture, when the creatures are placed in casts and confining devices which stretch the bones of arms and legs, deforming the limbs. Children are usually taken, for the process takes several years.

“The cruel monsters who perpetrate such abominations usually alter the vocal chords of the unfortunate child, train it to walk upon all fours, and allow the natural horror of the treatment and transformation to derange their creation. After years, the being itself no longer realizes its humanity. It is mad. It lives and thinks like a wolf or wild dog. And it can be trained in its madness to kill.

“Thence spring the legends of werewolves. The Siberians and the Chinese sometimes worship such creatures as gods, or use them to frighten the ignorant peasantry.

GREGOROVITCH mastered this art, and put it to use. Knowing that a story of werewolf robbery would be laughed at by police, if Mr. Winthrop allowed them to find out about it at all, he felt safe in deluding us with a curse and stealing the Icon.

“Then he sent his creatures out again to track our car and pick us up to bring us here. He was ready to force Mr. Winthrop to watch his daughter tortured, her skin removed and wolf-fur put in its place, unless he got what he wanted.”

“But what did he want?” Winthrop interrupted. “He stole the Icon. Why did he capture us and take such a risk?” Again Crane grinned. “He never got the Icon. After he made his threat, I took it out of the case on my own hunch and put in a fake. That’s why we were captured; that’s what he wanted you to tell to save Olivia.

"I got my hunch about the fake werewolves when Dever crawled in to release me. The wolves had bitten him, and he thought his furry chest was the result of a werewolf's bite. I could see at once that it was simple skin-grafting. Gregorovitch did it, not to change him into a wolf, but in an attempt to save his life by substituting wolf-skin for his own lacerated flesh."

Crane indicated the ugly monstrosities. "These other creatures were wolf- men still undergoing the 'change' and not completely transformed. I am sure that you'll find cages and apparatus somewhere in this house where the things were kept during these experiments."

"It beats me," Winthrop declared. "But why should he go to all this fuss just to steal an Icon?"

"We'll probably never know the full story," Crane told him. "Perhaps he was the son of Rasputin, though I have my doubts. It is certain he was unbalanced. But I know why he wanted the Icon so badly as to take fantastic risks.

"When I removed it from its case, I examined it. The Icon has a false top, and in the cylindrical hollow there is a map, showing the location of Rasputin's secret treasure-hoard. He must have stolen millions in gold and jewels from the Imperial Government, and hidden it away. This map gives the location. That's why Gregorovitch wanted the Icon. With such information he could return to Russia and become rich."

"I'd like to return to bed and become rested," Winthrop said, beaming. He turned to Olivia. Her arms, around Crane's neck, told that she personally was right where she wanted to be.

Suddenly Crane broke away and stooped to the floor.

"What's wrong?" asked Olivia. "Trouble, darling?"

"I'm looking for my glasses," the young man answered. "Uh—what did you call me?"

He rose and took her in his arms again. It was a full minute before he spoke.

“Never mind the glasses,” said Harry Crane. “At this rate it looks like I won’t get much chance to wear them from now on. Perhaps it was Gregorovitch’s influence—but you know, I’m beginning to feel a little bit like a wolf myself!”

THE END

Lefty Feep Gets Henpecked

Lefty got himself lit on Rooster Booster, and woke up with a splitting chicken headache—and identity!

"QUIT pickin' at that chicken!" Lefty Feep's voice rattled the crockery in the restaurant. The tall, thin man stood glaring at me, and I looked up in astonishment. His voice was almost as loud as his clothes.

"Do not pull anything with that pullet!" said Mr. Feep, snatching a chicken-leg from my plate and hiding it under a napkin.

"What's the matter?" I asked. "Sit down and explain yourself. Why are you objecting to my chicken dinner?"

Feep sighed and sat down at the table next to me.

"The sight of fowl makes me howl," he muttered. "After the experience I have, even a pheasant is unpleasant, and a sparrow chills my marrow. But a hen is worse again!"

"You don't like chickens, eh, Lefty?" Mr. Feep began to tremble violently. "Please do not even mention the name of same," he implored. "Don't I ever tell you about the time somebody gives me the bird?"

I began to feel uneasy. "Now don't tell me it reminds you of another story," I snapped.

"How do you guess?" beamed Lefty Feep. "Did you ever hear the one about the traveling salesman and the farmer's daughter?"

"Now listen, Lefty—"

"No. You listen to me. It is not the kind of a story you are thinking of. Because the traveling salesman happens to be me, and the farmer's daughter is—but wait, I'll give you the lowdown."

"Not now," I said, getting up hastily. "I've got to duck off."

"Ducks!" moaned Lefty Feep. "There you go again! More poultry! Just for that, I insist on telling you the fowl story."

"I'll bet that's just what it is," I mumbled.

But Lefty Feep didn't hear me. He had already opened his mouth and started to tell his tale. . . .

I AM walking down the street the other day, reading a time-table and trying to find out if I can make reservations on the next freight-train out of town.

You see, I really need a little vacation right now, and if I do not arrange to take it myself, then my creditors will arrange a vacation for me—probably at Alcatraz.

To be frank but rank, I am stuck over money—I cannot haul it from my wallet. Right now I am down at the heels, and the sheriff is on them.

So I scan the fable in this time-table and move my feet down the street.

Suddenly a hand reaches out and yanks me by the shoulder.

"Oh, oh!" I think. "The sheriff catches up to me!" I am all set to yammer and stammer when, I turn around and see that it is not the sheriff who puts his fingerprints on my clavicle.

"Why, it's Lefty Feep!" pipes a voice.

I find myself inspecting the spectacles of Sylvester Skeetch.

"What happens to you?" I gasp.

Little Sylvester Skeetch stares up at me with a broad grin.

"Nothing happens," he shrugs.

"Oh yes it does," I insist. "You suffer a severe amputation, don't you?"

"What do you mean?" Skeetch asks.

"Why—you are practically cut in half," I reply. "That is, I never see you alone before. You are always with your partner, Mordecai Meetch!"

This is an exact fact. Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch go together always, and they are never farther apart than twenty beers are from a hangover. Skeetch and Meetch are inventors, and very terrific with things scientific. In the past I always find them working their Laboratories, which they call the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE.

So now I am astonished to see little inventor Skeetch walking down the street without his partner.

"What gives?" I inquire.

"Oh, I just leave Meetch back at the laboratories, working on a patriotic assignment."

"Patriotic?"

"With all this meat rationing," says Skeetch, "we decide to perfect an elixir that will stimulate growth and fecundity in poultry. Something that will increase the size and habits of chickens, then we will sell it to chicken-raisers and help provide more poultry and eggs."

"Good idea," I remark. "Are you successful?"

"Absolutely," says Sylvester Skeetch. "That is why I leave just now. I am going down to the newspaper office now and insert an advertisement, offering our elixir for sale.

"Listen to this," Skeetch commands. He hauls out a piece of paper and recites his ad.

"WHY BE A DUMB CLUCK? DON'T SCRATCH FOR DOUGH WHEN YOU CAN MAKE BIG MONEY RAISING CHICKENS!

"Why does a chicken cross the road? To get to a chicken farm operating in this new, revolutionary way. Do you want to rule the roost? Then send for a sample bottle of this new elixir—WOOSTER'S ROOSTER BOOSTER."

I LISTEN with growing suspicion.

"Who is this guy Wooster?" I ask.

“Oh that’s just a trade name we think up,” Skeetch explains.

“What does this elixir do for chickens?” I persist. “The ad doesn’t tell.”

“Very simple,” says the inventor. “The elixir is a glandular extract which has an effect on the hormones of the gallus species, modifying the endocrinological functions so that increased metabolic rate is resultant in excessive growth of fowl and—”

“You don’t say!” I exclaim. “In other words, chickens get bigger and better. So why don’t you say so in the ad?”

Skeetch’s face falls, but he picks it up from his collar. “Don’t you think this ad is any good?” he sighs.

“I will not say it is no good,” I console him. “I merely say that it is lousy. No, you cannot explain all this in an ad. Besides, city people read this, and you want to reach farmers.”

“But how can we?” wails Skeetch. “We can’t talk to the farmers. We can’t leave town and—”

I get a mental commotion that results in a notion.

“Hey! I say. “Why not forget this ad and send me out on the road to peddle this elixir of yours? I can sell it to farmers direct. I will do the vocals to a bunch of local yokels.”

“You mean, you’ll become a sort of traveling salesman?” Skeetch asks.

“Why not? I can hand out the guff to sell this stuff.” I begin to boil him the old oil, figuring that this is a chance to get out of town and make a little of what ain’t hay, at the same time.

In a few minutes, Skeetch begins to listen to my proposition. “Come on up and we’ll talk to Meetch,” he says.

So I go up to the HORSECRACKER INSTITUTE, where Meetch is toiling and boiling up a batch of this Rooster Booster.

It’s hot in the pot, and I notice that the elixir is dark brown, odorless, and full of bubbles.

“This is the incubator bait you are going to peddle?” I inquire.

“Right,” says Mordecai Meetch. Mordecai Meetch, by the way, looks just like Sylvester Skeetch, only more so.

I tell the man my plan, and in a little while he sees and agrees.

"By the way," I mention. "Can't you tell me a little more about this chicken-juice? Does it make the hens and roosters bigger? Does it mean they lay more eggs?"

"Eggzactly," says Skeetch. "According to our formulae it removes the inhibitory reflexes and causes exhydration to occur—"

"Never mind that," I snap. "What I mean is, do you try this out on any chicken to see if it makes it thicken or merely sicken?"

"Where would we get a chicken?" asks Meetch, shrugging. "No, strictly speaking, we never actually experiment. Or should I say, egg-speriment?"

"You should not."

"You can test it on the road," Meetch tells me. "Now what you must do is take our car and load it up with bottles of the elixir. I have labels made up and you can peddle the stuff at one dollar a bottle. When can you leave for your trip to the country.

"How about right now?" I come back.

And so it is arranged.

THAT night I am already wending my way over hill and dale, driving upstate at a great rate in a car filled with ample samples of Wooster's Rooster Booster.

It is my intention to peddle this invention up north and gradually work my way back downstate again. So I drive the car but far, and when it gets dark I do not park.

But along about seven a seven rolls out of heaven. I blunder into some thunder that makes me wonder. In half an hour begins a shower.

I see a light in a farmhouse off the road, and being a wandering boy, I wonder if it is for me. Perhaps I can dash helter-skelter for shelter.

So I drive into the yard, and climb out, wetting my brain in the rain. I buckle a knuckle against the door.

Then the door opens and I am staring at a ginch.

Now according to me, a pretty girl is my favorite form of femininity. And speaking of favorite forms, this ginch certainly has one. There is an air of beauty about this cutie; she has the right eyes and size, cute lips and hips, fair hair and a smile with style. Just the type of blonde of which I am fond.

So I stand there in the drizzle and smile at her.

"Pardon me," I say, "but it is raining outside."

She grins. "Is that so? Are you from the Weather Bureau?"

"No, honey," I answer, very courteous. "I am strictly speaking only from hunger. My name is Lefty Feep and I am a traveling salesman."

She giggles. "Well, that a coincidence! My name is Daisy Falfa and I'm a farmer's daughter."

"Good day, Daisy," I greet her. "Is there any chance of me coming in out of this storm or must I learn to swim here on your doorstep?"

"Come on in, by all means," says Daisy. So I enter the farmhouse.

"Who's this?" grunts a voice. The voice belongs to a tall, red-faced old whisker sitting at the kitchen table. He is obviously the farmer himself.

Daisy leads me up to him. "This is my father, Al Falfa," she tells me. Al Falfa sticks out a horny hand and I am stuck with it.

"We chicken farmers don't see many salesmen these days," Al Falfa tells me. "Sit down and have some supper, Mr. Feep. Daisy will fix you up a plate."

I brighten up when he mentions supper. Also I am happy to learn he is a chicken farmer. Sure enough, staring out of the window I notice the yard is full of hen pens and cackle cottages.

Maybe I can make a sale, to say nothing of a hit with Daisy. So I sit down and put on a nice smile, and Daisy puts on a nice hot supper, and we begin to chatter of this and that matter.

Everything is going swell, just as it always does in the stories about traveling salesmen. Daisy is looking at me over the cooking and Al Falfa is laughing at the gags I pull and then—

There is a score at the door.

Comes a knock that rattles the lock, and Daisy gets up and opens the door.

INTO the room comes a country boy wearing a city slicker. A big overgrown goat in a raincoat—he stands over six feet tall until he sits down. This towheaded lout wears a mean grin on his chin as he nods to Al Falfa and puts his arm around Daisy. She breaks loose but he doesn't seem to notice.

"Hiya, Pop!" he greets Al Falfa. "How's my future father-in-law?"

"Huh!" grunts Al Falfa. I can see this idea does not please him. As for Daisy, she sniffs. "I never say I'll marry you," she tells the bumpkin. "Don't count your chickens before they hatch."

"Ha, that's a good one!" laughs the bumpkin. "You should talk about hatching chickens! That's just the trouble, isn't it?—your chickens don't hatch. And they get stolen. So you have no money. So I hold the mortgage on the farm here. So you can't pay. So, I'm willing to call off foreclosure if you marry me, Daisy."

I wink and blink. I never believe such things actually happen—villains foreclosing mortgages unless farmers' daughters will marry them. Unless I get my directions mixed, this is EAST LYNNE.

"Uh—pardon me," says Al Falfa, interrupting the lout. "This is Mr. Lefty Feep, Luke. Mr. Feep, meet our neighbor Luke."

The bumpkin gets up and slaps me on the back, not quite hard enough to break it. "Yep, that's me," he says. "Luke the Duke they call me in these parts. On account of I'm such a snappy dresser. Look," he says, pulling his raincoat open. "I got zoot overalls!" I nod politely—politely, that is, for a guy with a back-ache—and Luke the Duke laughs again. "Yep," he chuckles. "I'm the richest farmer in these parts.

Got more acres of corn than anybody in the county."

"I believe you," I mutter. "I can tell the minute I see you just how corny you are."

Luke the Duke ignores this penetrating remark and leers at Daisy.

"Come on, gal," he says. "Let's you and me go set in the parlor." Daisy shakes her head.

"Well, how about a movie in town?" asks Luke the Duke. "You won't get caught in the rain. I got the hog truck outside. Real class, huh?"

Al Falfa tips his daughter a wink. She frowns but gives in. "All right, Luke," she sighs. "Let's go."

Daisy leaves to get her coat and purse.

Luke the Duke stares at Al Falfa. He is not smiling now. "How about it?" he grunts. "Have you got the money for the interest payments? Installment's due day after tomorrow."

"I'm sorry, Luke. If you can give me just a little more time—I'm gonna take some chickens in to town and—"

"Nothing doing," Luke snaps. "I want my dough. Unless of course, you can get Daisy to listen to reason and marry me."

"But—"

"She'd better make up her mind right quick," Luke tells him. "I got a nice wedding ring for her and she ought to be wearing it before it turns green."

"That's up to Daisy," says Al Falfa. "She's got a mind of her own. Maybe she'll marry you and maybe she won't."

"I'll ask her just once more, tonight," Luke the Duke answers. "Got no time to waste courting. Should be doing something useful, like butchering a shoat."

Daisy comes in and she and Luke the Duke leave for the show. Daisy doesn't look happy when she leaves me, and Al Falfa doesn't either. As for me, I am very down in the mouth.

AS IT turns out, this is a very appropriate place to be. For no sooner does the door close, than Al Falfa hauls out a big jug of liquor.

"Applejack," he tells me. "Have a drink?"

Well, I very seldom drink any more—any more than I can get. So we start to battle the bottle.

“This situation drives me to drink,” Al Falfa confesses. “What am I going to do? I must either pay off to Luke the Duke or let him marry my daughter. And the chickens are like a bunch of absentee workers these days—laying off instead of laying. It’s terrible.”

Quite a mess, is my guess. Of course, this is the cue for me to come out and try to sell Al Falfa some of my product.

But he seems like a nice guy, and I do not have the heart to spring Wooster’s Rooster Booster on him.

We take another drink.

“You want to know something?” demands Al Falfa. “To make matters worse, somebody is all the time stealing my chickens.”

The applejack is getting him. I am getting the applejack.

“Yep,” he sighs. “AH the time stealing my chickens, somebody is. Every time I get a nice batch up to take to market, somebody robs my hencoops.”

We take another drink on that. Al Falfa thinks about his lost chickens, and I think about that little chicken, Daisy.

“Honest,” hiccups Al Falfa. “I can’t help but feel that on this chicken farm a dastardly plot is hatching!”

On that we kill the bottle. And the bottle almost kills us. At least, I am very groggy. Groggy enough to remember that I also smuggle a pint along in the car.

“Next drink’s on me,” I announce, to cheer Al Falfa up. “Got it out in the car. I’ll bring it in.”

“But it’s wet outside.”

“I’m wet inside. Who cares? Just be a minute.”

And I am. I flounder outside to the car, grope around in the dark, and find my bottle.

Coming back through the yard I start to shiver, so I pull out the cork and gargle a gurgle.

Then I walk in and park the pint on the table.

“Here it is,” I tell Al Falfa. “Help yourself.”

“Not that stuff!” growls the farmer.

“No? What’s wrong with it?”

“Read the label,” he tells me, waving his finger at the bottle.

I read the label and understand all. In the dark I grab the wrong bottle. What I bring in is a pint of Wooster’s Rooster Booster!

“Whooie!” I mention, in a loud voice.

Because I just remember that when I am in the yard I drink a terrific swig of this elixir.

“What’s the matter?” yells Al Falfa.

“Uggglllooofffff!” I explain. “Guffonkk!”

All at once I feel my stomach going round and round. And then my head. A reeling feeling that makes me hit the ceiling.

There is a queer sensation buzzing under my belt—and then I know I am done for. I think I am hitting the ceiling, but I really hit the floor.

I am out, but icy.

WHAT happens after that I can only guess. Al Falfa must carry me up to bed. A fine way for a traveling salesman to spend the night!

All night long I am moaning and groaning and turning and burning.

And when I come to and open my eyes, I see something I never expect to see in all my life.

Dawn.

Yes, I am staring out the window at the cold, gray light of dawn. That elixir must have a strange effect to wake me up at this unearthly hour. I open my mouth to yawn at dawn.

But I do not yawn.

My mouth opens and a sound comes out, but it is not a yawn. It is a crow!

“Cockadoodle-doo!” I hear myself state. “Cockadoodle-doo!”

I am startled. What in the world am I cockadoodle-doing? I hop out of bed and lurch over in front of a mirror.

I stare at my reflection. That is, I stare at the spot where my recollection should be—but ain't! I do not see myself reflecting in the mirror at all. Instead I gaze at the image of a big rooster.

Yes, a big rooster, three feet tall in his stocking claws! That is what I see —and it is me!

I open my mouth to utter an appropriate comment, but all that comes out is a cackle.

And in the mirror, the rooster opens its beak.

There it is. I drink Wooster's Rooster Booster and I am now a foul-looking fowl.

Either that, or it's all a hangover. Only I simply can't be hanging that far over. I look down at my body—at the feathers and wings. They say fine feathers make fine birds, but I feel far from being in fine feather.

Like it or not, I'm a rooster. What can I do?

The mere thought of being a chicken makes me sicken. I am madder than a wet hen.

I remember that Skeetch and Meetch never actually experiment with this stuff yet. All they know is that it makes chickens grow and lay eggs. But what it does to human beings—!

I start hopping around the room, clucking and waving my feathers. They are lovely black feathers, and I find I can even jump a few feet by using my wings. I stare again at the mirror—at my red comb and yellow beak, at my spurs and my swelling chest. I am certainly the biggest rooster I ever expect to see, but the idea does not please me. I don't want to win prizes at a Poultry Show. I am not a chicken-fancier, and I do not fancy being a chicken. It sticks in my craw.

I must do something about all this, but quick.

I hop around the room, hopping mad, when a tap comes on the door.

"Who is it?" I mean to say, but all that I can show is a crow.

THE tap turns into a knock and the knock turns into a bang, and then the door opens and I see Daisy standing there.

“Mr. Feep!” she calls. And then she sees me.

“Why, where is Mr. Feep?” she asks herself. “And what is this rooster doing in his room?”

She advances on me and there is a glitter in her gorgeous eyes that I do not like.

“Who lets you out of the coop?” she mutters. “Shoo! Get out!”

All at once she is coming after me with a broom-handle, and I hop down the hall, and she chases me downstairs and out into the yard.

I can’t talk, and she does not understand my squawk, so I am helpless.

She stands there in the doorway and scratches her lovely head.

“What a big rooster,” she says. “I never realize we have such a huge thing! Why, it’s a freak! Maybe I ought to tell Dad—he’ll take it in and sell it to a butcher.”

For some reason this idea does not appeal to yours truly. I must make her understand who I am, somehow.

I stare at the gravel in the yard. Perhaps, if I cannot talk to her, I can write her a message. So I stretch out my claws and try to write in the gravel.

But as I travel through the gravel, I see that it is no use. I cannot write. I can only make hen-tracks.

Daisy doesn’t even watch me. She is still puzzling her pretty head.

“Now what becomes of Mr. Feep?” she sighs. “He couldn’t leave—his car is still outside. I do hope he’s all right. Perhaps that big black ugly rooster annoys him in his room.”

I stand there, but what can I do? Everything seems to be lost. I cannot hope to win Daisy’s affection in my present state. She is not going to share a love-nest with a chicken.

I stare around the yard and spot the nearest hen-coop. It is surrounded by barbed wire, but the gate is open. I figure that if I am a rooster I might as well make the best of it and examine the new world in which I must live. Perhaps I will find something to help me.

So I head for the coop and pass the barbed wire. It gives me a little panicky feeling to do so—but after all, this is not the first time I am in the pen.

I wander around and hear a lot of clucking from inside the henhouse. I waddle up to the door and stick my head close to it. The clucking is quite loud.

And the funny part of it is—I can understand it!

Yes, it doesn't sound like barnyard clucking to me any more. I can understand chicken talk!

That at least cheers me up a little. I am not going to be all alone. So I march into the henhouse and stand there, clearing my throat and crowing a little.

A bunch of chickens are squatting in the straw against the wall. They stop clucking and stare at me.

"Who is that big black brute?" clucks an old biddy in the comer. "I don't remember seeing him before."

"Isn't he a monster?" sniffs a Plymouth Rock. "Must be a freak of some kind. It fairly gives me goose-flesh to look at him."

A SPECKLED hen whispers something under her wing and they all stare at me and cackle.

I feel highly embarrassed. Even these chickens look on me as an outsider. I am neither flesh nor fowl.

"Why doesn't he go away?" sniffs the Plymouth Rock, again. "I am not used to associating with such queer birds. Why, he looks like he is brought up in a barn."

They all laugh. I am ready to sink through the floor. My comb turns red as I blush.

"Imagine," the Plymouth Rock goes on. "Such an indignity! How can he stay in the same farmyard with me, whose ancestor comes over on the Mayflower and hatches the first egg a chicken ever lays in this country."

“Well, what are we waiting for?” snaps a little bantam rooster, strutting into the center of the group of hens. “Let’s throw him out of here! We don’t want any intruders. This is our barnyard and we got no use for strangers. Down with strangers, I say—down with strangers!”

He talks like a Communist, but this does not surprise me when I notice he is a Rhode Island Red.

“I’ll fix the chicken-livered squab!” yaps another rooster. He is a big white puffed-up old bird, and his red eyes are angry as he stares at me in the doorway. “Watch me, girls.”

He stalks past the hens and comes up to me.

“Out of this hen-house, stranger,” he clucks.

I get mad. “Aw, cut the cackle,” I tell him. “This isn’t a hen-party.”

“Why you—” squawks the rooster. “I’ll twist your tail-feathers, you buzzard!”

This is about all I can stand. So much happens to me that I am overwhelmed. I am not a man any more, and now even the chickens won’t accept me. I feel like fighting. So I hand this bird a leer and a sneer.

“Are you a Leghorn?” I ask.

“Why, yes.”

“Then blow!” I suggest.

For answer, the white rooster digs his legs into the gravel and straw and then flies into a rage—at me. His sharp beak bends in a peck of trouble.

I duck. And then the rooster flies over my head and lands and starts to chase me around the hen-house. He fights with his head and beak, and I am not used to this style of argument.

He chases me and the other hens cackle and the whole place is filled with screams. It sounds like the WLS Barn Dance on a rainy night. They laugh at me while I run.

But all the while I am dodging the rooster’s pecks and figuring out a system. He corners me next to the feed-pan and then I turn.

The rooster makes a dive at my throat with his beak. And I merely balance on one claw and smack out with the other.

This is a kind of fighting a rooster isn't prepared for. I give him one hearty smack in the jaw—or craw. There is a crow, the sound of a blow, and then he starts to go.

In another moment he is a cold chicken.

I stand there and crow in triumph.

The hens are quiet. They shrink back. I stalk over to them.

"Now we'll see who rules the roost around here," I snarl. "Let's get organized."

"Yes, sir," mumbles the Plymouth Rock.

"Whatever you say," says the speckled hen.

I flash her a look. "What are you brooding about?" I demand.

"Just a nest of eggs."

"Aha! That's what I'm interested in. Eggs. Let's get the lay of the land around here. How's production?"

"Not so hot," confesses a little red hen. "As a matter of fact—"

"Shhh!" I interrupt.

Because I hear voices in the yard. Human voices.

I SNEAK out of the hen-house and stick my beak through the barbed wire for a peek.

Sure enough, Daisy and her father, Al Falfa, are standing in the yard. They are holding a violent conversation, with that big lout, Luke the Duke, on the violent end.

He has on his zoot overalls and a barnyard homburg hat.

"Well, here I am," he is saying. "Last night Daisy says she will give me her answer today. What's it going to be—will you marry me or not?"

Daisy gives him a long look. Then she stamps her foot. "No!" she snaps. "I will not marry you because (a) I do not love you and (b) I hate you." Luke the Duke turns red. He also turns to Al Falfa. "All right," he growls. "Then tomorrow I foreclose on this farm."

“But can’t you wait?” sighs Al Falfa. “You don’t need the money. And you won’t run this chicken farm anyway. You are just doing it out of spite.”

“Never mind,” sneers Luke the Duke.

“I have the law on my side and I’m getting what’s coming to me.”

“I hope so,” whispers Daisy. “That’s what they have a devil for.”

Al Falfa takes a look around the farmyard and shrugs his shoulders. “Very well,” he says. “Tomorrow morning I will get up early and take all the chickens and eggs into town and sell them, at a loss, if I must. I will raise some money if it’s humanly possible. Because I would hate to lose this farm.

“It’s a good farm. I can’t understand why I have such bad luck with chicken-thieves and such, but I know if I stay here long enough, I will win out. But—”

He shrugs again and turns away. “You have until tomorrow,” snaps Luke the Duke. “Pay up or shut up.” Daisy glares at him. She stamps her foot again—this time right on his instep. Luke the Duke howls, curses, and limps away to his car. He climbs in and drives off.

Daisy starts to cry and Al Falfa comforts her. They go into the house.

“That’s the guy,” whispers the little red hen, under her beak.

“Who? What?” I inquire.

“That guy there—that fellow who drives off in the car.”

“What about him?”

“He’s the one who comes in here at night,” the little red hen tells me. “He steals the eggs, and he runs off with dozens of the girls.” She shivers. “I’m afraid of him!”

“You mean he robs the henhouse?” I gasp. “He steals chickens?”

“Right,” cackles the hen.

It is all clear to me now. No wonder Al Falfa is in debt to Luke the Duke! Every time he is ready to pay off by selling eggs or chickens, Luke the Duke sneaks in and steals birds or eggs. Luke the Duke is a racketeer, a hijacker—a chickenlegger! That’s what he is, a chickenlegger!

Now Daisy and Al Falfa will be thrown out on their ears as a result.

Unless—

I DO some winking, blinking, and plain and fancy thinking. I remember that Al Falfa promises to sell all the chickens early tomorrow morning. If not, it's his neck. I understand that.

But if he does sell the chickens—it's my neck! I will be sold, and a big rooster like me won't last long in a poultry market!

It is a bad spot, and I am on it, all right.

I pace the barnyard floor. It gets to be twilight, then dark.

I am still thinking. The hens all brood, and the other roosters keep away. I know they share my fear.

There must be something we can do. But what?

Late at night I am still up and stewing. Who knows, by tomorrow night I may really be stewing!

Comes midnight, and no idea.

Comes midnight and comes—the truck.

I hear the motor chugging far away. Al Falfa and Daisy are in bed long ago in the house. But this motor comes from the road.

"Oh, oh!" cackles a Buff Orpington. "It looks like trouble!"

It looks like Luke the Duke to me. He parks a truck on the side of the road near the farmhouse and tiptoes into the barnyard. Behind him comes a little colored personality—evidently his assistant roost-robber, because he is carrying a wire-clippers and a lot of gunnysacks.

"I'm a dead pigeon!" wails the little red hen. Which is not so far from the truth. "I'm a gone goose!" she moans. "Can't you think of anything we can do?"

I do not answer this remark, because to tell the uncouth truth, I can already see myself lying across a butcher's block.

We huddle there in the henhouse while Luke the Duke and his colored helper cut the wires.

“Maybe if we all cackle at the top of our lungs they will be scared away,” suggests the Rhode Island Red.

“Uh-uh,” I hastily disagree. “All that will happen is Luke the Duke will wring our necks and drop us into the gunny-sacks. Better keep quiet and hope for the best.”

The best is none too good.

In a minute, Luke the Duke is inside the hencoop. He beckons to his shadow.

“Come on, Whitey!” he whispers. “Grab a handful of hens!”

Which is just what Whitey does. We run around the roost, dodging and fluttering our wings, but Whitey piles chicken after chicken into the gunny-sacks. He carries them out to the truck. Meanwhile, Luke the Duke starts loading eggs into crates.

I hide in the back with the little red hen, the Rhode Island Red rooster, the Buff Orpington, and the speckled hen. The last gunnysack is filled up and the last egg is crated away, and I breathe a sigh of relief. Maybe they will go away and leave us behind.

Whitey says, “We all loaded, boss. De truck is filled up. We gonna mosey along now?”

Luke the Duke scratches his head—a job I would like to do for him, with an axe—and then he frowns. “We must take the rest of the birds,” he decides, pointing at us in the darkness. “Don’t want that old fool to have anything left tomorrow. I want that big rooster there, particularly. Never saw such an overgrown hunk of white meat in my life.”

He points at me and I shiver. I can just feel him plucking at my wishbone.

“Wait a minute,” hisses Luke the Duke. “What about that car I see parked in the yard? It must belong to that dumb jerk salesman I meet here the other evening. We can take that. Just load the rest of these chickens in the back and off we go.”

“Good idea,” says Whitey.

I DO not think it is such a good idea. To be taken to the butcher in a car stolen from me is somehow a little unjust, I figure.

But I have nothing to say. I can only tackle a cackle as Luke the Duke makes a dive and tackles me.

I race around the coop and he chases me around the group. Finally he embraces me and I’m in the soup. He carries me out to the car and dumps me in the back seat.

“What a bird!” he whispers. “Big and fat—he’ll make a real meal.”

Whitey comes along with the speckled hen, the Buff Orpington, the Rhode Island Red, and the little red hen. They also get a thumping and a dumping in the back seat. When we are safe inside, Luke the Duke says, “Let’s go.”

“Go?” says Whitey.

“Sure. You drive this car and I’ll drive the truck. Follow me and I’ll meet you.”

“Meet me where, boss?”

“Black market?” quavers the colored personality. “You-all don’t mention we is gonna sell these birds to no black market.”

“Sure,” Luke the Duke answers. “I got a friend who pays good prices. Name of Blucher the Butcher. By sunrise this morning he’ll have these birds dead, cleaned, plucked and on their way to town.”

That is really something to look forward to. I always know I will be dead some day, but getting cleaned and plucked is not exactly what I expect. I may go to town after that, but I doubt if I will feel like it.

But there it is, and there am I. In the back seat of the car, as Whitey drives off and we fly away down the highway.

“Poor Al Falfa!” sighs the little red hen. “How he will miss us!”

“Poor us!” I groan. “How we will miss ourselves!”

The Rhode Island Red cackles to me. “What’s the matter with you, you chicken-hearted lummox? Why you’re almost four times as big as any of us birds. Why don’t you put up some kind of a fight?

“I remember you tell us you will try to save us from this monster. And what do you do? Nothing! You won’t let us cackle or run away or peck at those thieves, or anything. No—we just get caught and now we will be killed. A lot of good you’re doing, big as you are.”

FOR SOME reason his words make me just a little bit ashamed. And for another reason his words make me just a little bit inflamed. Because I get a sudden idea.

It is true I am bigger than any other chicken. Even if it does not help me, I am big.

Why am I big? Because I drink Wooster’s Rooster Booster. If I, a human, turn into a big chicken—what will happen if chickens drink the stuff? It is an elixir to increase their size. And we are now riding in the back seat of my cat—the car where I store my stock of the elixir!

“Cockadoodle-doo!” I yell, in triumph. “I get a great idea!”

“What are you crowing about?” sniffs the Buff Orpington.

“Listen,” I cackle. “Down on the floor of this car is a suitcase filled with bottles. I am going to peck it open now. I will take out a bottle and use my beak for a corkscrew. I want you all to take a drink from that bottle.”

“Huh!” scoffs the Rhode Island Red. “I ask for help and he tells us to get drunk! You think I want to face the last day of my life with a big head?”

“How would you like to face it with a big body?” I come back.

“What do you mean?” the rooster inquires.

I explain. Before I am finished, they cackle with joy, and swoop down on the suitcase. I start to work my beak and peck the lock.

Then I manage to pry the cork out of a big bottle of Rooster Booster. Meanwhile we bump down the road and Whitey drives and sings, not paying any attention to our clucking and jumping.

“Drink,” I whisper to my feathered friends.

They gulp and ulp.

“Again!” I command. They nuzzle and guzzle.

The bottle is empty. The chickens are full.

And then I look out of the car window at the pale light of dawn—

“Too late!” I gasp. “We’re here.”

And here we are. Ahead of us, Luke the Duke is swinging his truck into a yard. We turn into the driveway behind the truck.

Standing there in the yard of a big farmhouse is at least 900 ration-points of pork in the shape of Blucher the Butcher. At least I guess this bald-headed buzzard is the black sheep of the black market:—partly because fie wears white, and party because he carries a big axe in one hand. He looks entirely too cleaver to suit me.

My hen friends let out a wail and turn pale. It looks like we fail and I start to quail.

Luke the Duke is whispering to Blucher the Butcher. First he shows him the truck full of gunnysacks and egg crates. Blucher opens up a few crates and sacks and pulls out a chicken or two and pinches them hard. They squawk and Luke the Duke starts to talk, and Blucher the Butcher takes a walk—in our direction.

Whitey climbs out of the car and joins them and they are bargaining. I can see that.

I can also see something else. “Look!” gasps the little red hen. I stare at her.

The little red hen is not so little any more. Even as I watch her, she starts to swell. Her head and body bulges. I stare at the Buff Orpington. She grows, too. She is almost as big as I am. Then the speckled hen puffs up. They shoot up all around me.

Skeetch and Meetch will be pleased to see how their elixir works on real chickens, I figure. In a few moments all of the chickens are bigger than I am—and they don’t stop at that!

The Rhode Island Red is growing and growing. And all at once I must crane my neck to look up at him.

“Success!” I cackle. I get ready to issue orders, but I see there is no need to. They know what to do.

LOOKING out the window again, I see Luke the Duke pointing at our car. He is probably winding up his sales talk, telling Blucher the Butcher what a wonderful big rooster he has to sell him. Blucher the Butcher waves his big arms in the air and then walks our way. Whitey runs ahead to open our car door.

He arrives and pulls the door open.

“Here’s de rooster, boss,” he announces. Then he looks in. “Eeeyaa-ah!” he comments. “De chickens done begin to thicken!”

It is all too true.

Out of the car pours a horde of giant chickens—six feet tall!

I hop behind—because I cannot keep up with either the chickens or Whitey. Whitey starts to run behind the Buff Orpington, then the Rhode Island Red kicks him in the head.

Luke the Duke and Blucher the Butcher take one look and then to their heels. And at the heels of those heels are my fine feathered friends.

They chase the two racketeer black marketeers around the yard and there is plenty of cackling and feathers flying—only this time the cackling comes from the two men, not the chickens.

And feathers fly when the chickens start kicking them into the ground.

“Monsters!” howls Luke the Duke. “Help!”

Blucher the Butcher swings his axe at the speckled hen, but I jump up and peck him from the rear. His swing goes wild and so does he as he falls down and the little red hen points a beak at his beak.

To make a long story shorten a few seconds it is all over for the roost-robbers.

The birds are excited enough to murder these guys, but I put a stop to it. “Let’s not have any fowl play,” I tell them. “Just grab these bum’s shirt collars in your beaks and haul them into the truck.” Which they do, in a flurry of hurry.

After that we all lay down for a nap and several of the little chickens lay down for an egg.

When we shake awake the sun is around seven in the heavens. I raise my hands and rub my eyes.

This surprises me.

Because I now have hands to rub my eyes with!

I glance down at my body.

I am still a chicken. But a chicken with arms.

As I glance further, I ntoice that I am moulting, or something. Either that or somebody plucks me while I am asleep. Because I am losing my feathers—or my mind, or something.

Anyhow, I am not much of a chicken any longer.

“Look at him!” cackles the Plymouth Rock. “I never see such an odd-looking bird!” The other chickens wake up and stare.

“Never mind me,” I snap back. “Look, now—we’ve got to decide what to do. Those crooks are captured, but now you must make up your minds about your Own futures. Where do you want to go?”

“Back to Al Falfa, of course,” suggests the Rhode Island Red. “Pie’s a good old scout and he won’t harm us. Besides, he needs the eggs and stuff. Also—we’re not safe running around loose and when you’re six feet tall the way I am, you have to scratch for a living. I vote we go back there and get something to eat.”

“Good idea!” adds the Buff Orpington. The others join in.

This suits me. Having arms, I can now drive the truck. So I load the birds back into the truck. Some of them ride in the front with me and the rest make a nest on the bodies of Luke the Duke, Whitey, and Blucher the Butcher, in the back.

In a few minutes we glide off and ride off down the road.

MY FEET are numb, but when I look down I can see toes instead of claws. I shed feathers faster than a punched-out pillow, and looking in the mirror I see that my beak turns into a nose and my wattles are getting epiglottal. The further we go the further I go towards returning to manhood.

By the time we pull into the farmyard I can say "Today I am a man," without crowing about it. Matter of fact, I am so human I can't even talk to the chickens any more or understand them.

It is hard enough for me to understand what happens. I finally decide on the ride that something must happen to me inside.

Wooster's Rooster Booster is not for men anyway, and the dose I take probably wears off. On the chickens it still looks becoming—but with me it is very temporary. Which suits me swell.

It suits Al Falfa swell too when I turn up with his chickens and the knocked-out crooks. When he sees me he thinks I disappear a few nights ago just to hide out and capture Luke the Duke—so I let him believe that yarn.

Then when he sees the big chickens he is a pushover to buy the rest of my stock of Rooster Booster.

So the way it turns out, everybody is happy. The chickens are back in the roost, Al Falfa is back on the farm, Luke the Duke is back in the county jail, and I am back in the bucks. Also Daisy is back in my affections—after I manage to drape my shape in a blanket from the truck seat.

Of course I come back to town today to report to Skeetch and Meetch. All the way down I keep worrying, expecting to crow instead of talk, but I guess I am one hundred per cent a gent. . . .

LEFTY FEEP finished his yarn-spinning and I sat there, still dizzy from trying to follow it.

"I guess you are one hundred per cent a lunatic!" I told him. "Eve stood for a lot of unbelievable stories from you in my time, but this is the most fantastic. Lefty—do you expect me to swallow the idea that you turned into a chicken?"

Lefty Feep shrugged.

"There is nothing to swallow," he insisted. "Except Wooster's Rooster Booster. It changes me to a chicken but I am now completely normal again."

"I just can't believe it," I muttered. "Surely you couldn't turn from man to bird to man again without leaving some kind of evidence or clue."

Feep rose from his chair.

"Sorry," he said. "Too bad I cannot prove or improve my tale's details. But I do change from a chicken to a man again without leaving a trace."

He beamed and winked. "I am glad I am no longer a chicken, too!"

"I'm not so sure of that," I gasped. "What do you mean?"

I pointed a trembling finger at the seat of Lefty Feep's chair. "There's your evidence," I groaned. "Now I believe it—I believe you were a chicken, but I'm afraid you're not back to normal quite as much as you think. Look what happened while you told your story!"

We stared together at the seat of the chair—the seat of the chair where Lefty Feep had sat telling his story and . . . laying an egg!

THE END

The Man Who Cried “Wolf !”

She was half Indian and half goddess—but wholly evil!

THE moon had just come up. It was shining across the lake, and when Violet came in it cast a silver web Over her hair.

But it wasn’t moonlight that shone in sullen pallor from her face. It was fear. “What’s biting you?” I asked.

“A werewolf,” said Violet.

I put down my pipe, got up out of the armchair, and went over to her. All the while she kept staring at me; standing and staring like a big china doll with glass eyes.

I shook her shoulders. The stare went away.

“Now, then,” I said.

“It was a werewolf,” she whispered. “I heard it following me through the forest.

Its paws padded over the twigs behind me. I was afraid to look back, but I knew it was there. It kept creeping closer and closer, and when tire moon came up I heard it howl. Then I ran.”

“You heard it howl?”

“I’m almost positive.”

“Almost!”

Her eyes dropped into hiding, beneath lowered lashes. She bent her head and sudden color flamed in her cheeks. I kept watching her and nodded.

“You heard a wolf howling near the cabin?” I insisted.

“Didn’t—you—” she got out, in a strangled wheeze.

I shook my head, slowly and firmly. “Please, Violet. Let’s be sensible. We’ve been over this thing half a dozen times in the past week, but I’m willing to try again.” I took her by the hand, quite gently, and led her to a chair. I gave her a cigarette and lighted it for her. Her lips shook and it wobbled in her mouth.

“Now listen, darling,” I began. “There are no wolves here. Wilds of Canada or not, they haven’t seen a wolf in these parts for twenty years. Old Leon down at the store will bear me out on that.

“And even if, by some strange chance, a stray has wandered down here from the north, skulking around the lake, that doesn’t prove anything about a werewolf.

“You and I have enough common sense to he above such silly superstitions. Try to forget your Canuck ancestry and please remember that you’re now the wife of an expert in die field of legend.”

That crack about Canucks was pretty brutal, but I wanted to shock her out of the mood.

It had the opposite effect. She began to tremble.

“But, Charles, surely you must have heard something?” she sighed. Her eyes were pleading now. I had to look away.

“Nothing,” I murmured.

“And when I’ve heard it prowling around the cabin at night, you heard nothing?”

“Nothing.”

“That night I woke you—didn’t you see its shadow on the wall?”

I shook my head and forced a smile. “I’d hate to think you’ve been reading too many of my stories, darling,” I told her. “But I don’t know how to explain your—er—mistaken notions.”

VIOLET puffed on her cigarette and the glowing tip flared up. But her eyes were dead.

“You have never heard this wolf? It has never followed you in the woods? Not while you were up here alone?” Her voice entreated.

“I’m afraid not. You know I came up here a month ahead of you to write. And I wrote. I saw no werewolves, ghosts, vampires, ghouls, jinns or efreets. Just Indians and Canucks and other citizens. One night, after coming home from Leon’s place, I thought I saw a pink elephant, but it was a mistake.”

I smiled. She did not smile with me. “Seriously, Violet, I wonder if I made a mistake, having you up here. But I thought it would be like a bit of old times for you. After all, to a French-Canadian girl, this wilderness should be a treat. But now, I wonder—”

“You wonder if I’m insane.”

The words crawled from between her lips.

“No,” I muttered. “I never said that.”

“But that is what you’re thinking, Charles.”

“Not at all. We all get these—spells. Any medical man will tell you that errors of perception do not necessarily indicate any—mental unbalance.”

I spoke hastily, but I could see she was not convinced.

“You can’t fool me, Charles. And I can’t fool myself, either. Something is wrong.”

“Nonsense. Forget it.” I put the smile back on my face, but it didn’t seem to stick very well. “After all, Violet, I should be the last one to even hint at such a possibility. People who live in glass houses, you know. Don’t you remember, before we were married in Quebec, how I used to speak of you as a witch? I called you the Red Witch of the North, and I used to write those sonnets and whisper them to you.”

Violet shook her head. “That was different. You knew what you were doing. You didn’t see things, hear things that do not exist.”

I cleared my throat. “I’m going to make a suggestion to you, dear. You haven’t told anyone besides me about this, have you?”

"No."

"And it's been going on, you say, about two weeks?"

"Yes."

"Well, I don't want it to go on any longer. I can see that you're worried. For that reason, and for that reason only—remember—I recommend that we call in Dr. Meroux. Purely as a consultant, of course.

"I have a lot of faith in his ability, not only as a physician but as a psychiatrist. You know psychiatry is his hobby—of course, he's only an amateur stuck away here in the woods, but he's a man of repute. I'm sure he'd respect your confidences. And he might be able to make a diagnosis that would clear the whole matter up in a jiffy."

"No, Charles. I will not tell Dr. Meroux."

I frowned. "Very well. But I'm interested in your ideas about a mysterious werewolf. I'd like to find out what you heard about loup-garous in childhood. That grandmother of yours—she was part Indian, wasn't she? Didn't she ever scare the daylights out of you with some wild yarns?" Violet nodded. "Out—yes, I mean."

I noted her reversion to the speech of her childhood, but pretended to ignore it.

"Did she tell you about the wolf-men, the lycanthropes . . . who change their shape when the moon calls and run baying on all fours, their bodies shaggy shadows in the night? Did she tell you how they prowl for prey, tearing at the throats of their victims who in turn become inocculated with the dread virus of the werewolf?"

"Yes. She told me, many many times."

"Ah. And now, when you return to the wilderness, the image of your childhood fears arises. The werewolf, my dear, is merely a symbol of something you dread. Some inner guilt, perhaps, is personified in the hallucination of a beast-presence that lurks awaiting the time to reveal itself.

"I'm not even an amateur psychiatrist like Dr. Meroux, but I think I can safely hazard that such a delusion is natural enough. Now, if you'll be frank with me, perhaps we can dissect the nature of your fear, arrive at the real terror that disguises itself a snarling monster, a mythological hybrid that slavers at your neck in the forest—"

"No! Stop! Please, not now—I cannot stand to talk of it further."

Violet sobbed. I comforted her, crudely.

"Sorry. I imagine you're nervous enough as it is. We'll just forget about it for the time being, dear, and wait until you feel that you can face the problem. Better get some rest."

Patting her shoulder, I led her to the bedroom.

We undressed, got into bed. I dimmed the lamp, extinguished it.

The cabin was in utter darkness, save for the filtered moonlight that trickled through surrounding tree-tops. The lake beyond was a sea of silver fire, but I turned from its radiance and sank into sudden slumber.

Violet lay tense beside me, but as I drifted off I felt her relax, gradually and slowly.

We slept.

I do not know what time it was that I awoke. Violet's hand bit into my shoulder, and I heard the harsh inspiration of her breath.

"Listen, Charles!" she gasped.

I listened.

"Do you hear that? Outside the cabin—hear it scuffling against the door?"

I shook my head.

"Wake up, Charles—you must hear it.

It's been snaffling around under the window and now it's scraping at the door. Do something!"

I swung out of bed, grabbed her arm.

"Come on," I said. "Let's take a look."

I banged into a chair searching for the flashlight.

"It's going away," Violet sobbed. "Hurry."

Flash firmly gripped in one hand, I dragged Violet across the floor towards the door. I halted, released her, snapped the lock free.

The door flung open. I swung the flashlight in a wide arc. The forest clearing about the cabin was empty of all life.

Then I tilted the beam down towards our feet.

Violet screamed.

“Look, Charles! There, in the earth outside the doorway! Don’t you see the tracks—the tracks before the door?”

I looked.

There, clearly defined in the earth at our feet, were the unmistakable paw-prints of a gigantic wolf.

I turned to Violet and gazed at her a long time. Then I shook my head.

“No, dear,” I whispered. “You’re mistaken. I don’t see anything. I don’t see anything at all!”

II

THE next morning Violet stayed in bed and I went down towards town to see Lisa.

Lisa lived near the crossroads with her father. The old man was paralyzed, and Lisa supported him by doing Indian bead-work and basketry for the tourist trade.

That’s how I’d met her, last month when I came up alone. I stopped by the roadside stand, intending to purchase a bracelet to send to Violet.

Then I saw Lisa, and forgot everything else.

Lisa was half Indian and half goddess. Her hair was black. You couldn’t imagine a deeper, more lustrous darkness—until you gazed into her eyes. They were two oval windows opening upon Night. Her face and features were delicately moulded in faintly burnished copper. Her body was slim and strong, but strangely melting when clasped in an embrace.

I found that out very soon. Two days after I met her, in fact.

I hadn’t meant to be so precipitate. But Lisa was half Indian and half goddess.

And she was all evil.

Evil as the night that perfumed the sable splendor of her hair . . . evil as the gulf-deep gaze of her eyes . . . the very pagan perfection of her body was instinct with the substance of sin.

She offered me the bittersweet corruption of that ancient and forbidden fruit known to Lilith. She came to me on moonless night, silent as a succubus, and I feasted on night and darkness.

When Violet came up, our meetings halted. I told Lisa that we must be careful, and she merely laughed.

"For a little while, then," she agreed.

"A little while?"

Lisa nodded, her eyes sparkling. "Yes. Only as long as your wife remains alive."

She said it quite naturally. And after a moment I realized that it was quite a natural remark to me. Because it was true, logical.

I did not want Violet any more. I wanted this other thing—this thing that was not love nor lust, but a wedding of my soul with an utter wickedness.

And if I would have it, then Violet must die.

I looked at Lisa and nodded. "Do you want me to kill her?" I asked.

"No. There are other ways."

"Indian magic?"

A month ago I would have snickered at the mere suggestion. But now, knowing Lisa, holding Lisa, I knew the suggestion was quite valid.

"No. Not exactly. Suppose your wife did not die. Suppose she had to go away?"

"You mean if she left me—got a divorce?"

"You do not understand, I see. Is it not true that there are places where they keep the insane?"

"But Violet isn't crazy. She's quite levelheaded. It would take something very extraordinary to drive her mad."

"Like seeing wolves?"

"Wolves?"

“A wolf will follow your wife. It will plague her, torment her, haunt her when she is alone. She will come to you for explanations, for help. You must refuse to believe her. In a little while her mind—

Lisa shrugged.

I asked no questions. I merely accepted what she told me. If Lisa went to the woods and consulted the shamans, or whispered prayers to darker dispensers of doom, I did not know.

All I know is that a wolf came to follow my wife. And I pretended not to hear anything, see anything. It was working as Lisa predicted. Violet was going mad. From somewhere she had acquired the notion that her nocturnal nemesis was a werewolf. So much the better. Ker mind was going, fast.

And Lisa was waiting, smiling her secret smile.

Lisa waited for me this morning, in the little roadside stand near the crossing.

HERE in the sunlight she looked like a simple Indian beadworker. Only when her face was veiled in shadow did I see her eyes and hair, black and unchanging as her secret self.

She put her hand on my arm, and a touch of ice and fire shivered up my spine.

“And how is your wife?” she whispered. “Not so well. Last night she found wolf-tracks beside our door. She had hysterics.” Lisa smiled.

“She thinks it’s a werewolf, you-know-.” Lisa smiled.

“I wish you’d tell me the truth, darling. How do you make the wolf come and follow her?”

Lisa smiled.

I sighed. “I suppose I shouldn’t be too inquisitive.”

“That is right, Charles. Isn’t it enough to know that our plan is working? That Violet is going mad? That soon she. will be gone and we can be together—always?” I stared at her. “Yes, that is enough. But tell me, what happens next?”

"Your wife will see the wolf. Actually see it. She will become quite frightened. You will refuse to listen to her, as before. Then she will go to the authorities. She will come to the village here and try to make people believe her. Everyone will think her mad. And when they ask you, you know nothing. In a short time the doctor will be forced to examine her. After that —"

"She will see the wolf?" I echoed. "Actually see it?"

"Yes."

"When?"

"Tonight, if you like."

I nodded, slowly. Then a doubt came. "But she's almost overcome. She'll be too afraid to walk in the woods."

"In that case, the wolf will come to her."

"Very well. I shall erase the tracks, just as I erased them this morning."

"Yes. And you had better plan to go away from the cabin tonight. You are a sensitive person, Charles. You would find it painful to endure the sight of your wife's terror."

The image of Violet came to me—the image of her frightened face, her bulging eyes, her wide mouth opened in a scream of utter fear as the monster of her fancies crouched before her. Yes, that is how it would be, and very soon.

I smiled.

Lisa grinned back. As I turned away I could hear her laughing, and it came to me that there was something unnatural in her mirth.

Then, of course, I realized the truth. Lisa was not altogether sane herself.

III

WE ATE dinner in silence that evening.

As the moon came up over the lake, Violet rose and pulled the shades with a grimace she could not conceal.

“What’s the matter, dear? Is it too bright for your eyes?”

“I hate it, Charles.”

“But it’s beautiful.”

“Not to me. I hate the night.”

I could afford to be generous. “Violet, I’ve been doing a little thinking. This place—it’s getting on your nerves. Don’t you believe it might be helpful if you went back to the city?”

“Alone?”

“I could join you there when I finish my work.”

Violet brushed a lock of auburn hair from her forehead. I noticed with a shock how the fire had faded from her curls. The luster was gone; her hair was dead and dull. Just as her face, her eyes, were dead and dull.

“No, Charles. I couldn’t go alone. It would follow me.”

“It?”

“The wolf.”

“But wolves don’t come to the city.”

“Ordinary wolves, no. But this one—”

“Why do you think this wolf you—uh—see is not ordinary?”

She caught my hesitation but desperation overrode all reticence. She went on, hurriedly.

“Because it comes only at night. Because there are no real wolves here. Because I can sense the evil of the beast. It is not stalking me, Charles—it is haunting me. And me alone. It seems to be waiting for something to happen. If I went away, the creature would follow. I can’t escape it.”

“You can’t escape it because it’s in your mind,” I snapped. “Violet, I’ve been very patient. I’ve neglected my work to take care of you. I have listened to your fancies for two weeks now.

“But if you can’t help yourself, then others must help you. I took the liberty this afternoon of discussing your case with Doctor Meroux. He wants to see you.”

She crumpled physically before my direct accusation and statements.

“Then it’s true,” she gasped. “You do think I’m—out of my mind.”

"Werewolves don't exist," I said. "I find it easier to believe in the presence of a mental aberration than that of a supernatural entity."

I rose.

Violet looked up, startled.

"Where are you going?" she whispered. "Leon's," I told her. "I need a drink. This affair plays the devil with my nerves."

"Charles. Don't leave me alone—tonight."

"Afraid of imaginary wolves?" I asked, gently. "Now really, my dear! If you want me to retain any faith in your mental stability, you'd better show me that at least you can be trusted to stay by yourself a few hours without collapsing."

"Charles—"

I went to the door, opened it. She winced as the moonlight trickled across the floor in a silver pool. I stood there, smiling at her.

"Violet, I feel that I've been most patient with you. But if you will not see a doctor, insist upon staying here, and refuse to admit that you're mentally upset—then prove it."

I turned, went out, slammed the door, and walked briskly down the path.

It was a beautiful night and I inhaled deeply as I swung along towards the crossing a mile ahead.

Impatience set the pace for me. I was in a hurry to reach my destination. Actually, I had no intention of visiting Leon's tavern.

I went to Lisa.

Lisa's little cabin was dark, and I wondered if she bad retired. Her aged father was already asleep, I knew. There would be no trouble from that source.

As I approached the cabin, I had already determined to arouse her, should she be in bed. A night like this was not meant for slumber.

A SUDDEN sound arrested me a short distance from the doorway. The door was opening, slowly. Instinctively I stepped back into shadow as a figure emerged from the cabin.

"Lisa!" I whispered.

She turned, came towards me.

"So you had the same idea," I murmured, taking her in my arms. Come on, let's get away from here. We'll go down towards the beach."

Silently, she walked beside me as I led her along the path that led to the water.

We stood staring up at the moon for a long moment. Then, as my arms tightened about her waist, Lisa turned to me and shook her head.

"No, Charles. I must go now."

"Go?"

"I have errands at the crossroads."

"Let them wait."

I cupped her face, bent to kiss her. She drew away.

"What's the matter, Lisa?"

"Let me alone!"

"Is there something—wrong?"

"Nothing's wrong. Go away, Charles." I really stared at her, then. And staring, saw. Saw that her face was unnaturally flushed, her eyes overly luminous, her lips parted more in protest than in passion.

She wasn't looking at me. She was looking through me, looking at the moon behind my body. Twin moons were mirrored in her eyes. They seemed to expand, enlarge, then replace red dark pupils with globes of silver fire.

"Go away, Charles," she muttered. "Go—quickly."

But I didn't go.

It isn't every day that one has the unusual opportunity to witness the spectacle of lycanthropic metamorphosis. And I was watching a woman turn into a wolf.

The first indication came in the form of respiratory change. Her breathing turned to panting; the panting to hoarse gasps. I watched her bosom rise and fall, rise and fall, rise and fall—and change.

Her shoulders sloped forward. The body did not stoop, but seemed to grow outward at a slant. The arms began to telescope into the shoulder sockets.

Lisa had fallen to the ground now: she writhed partly in shadow and partly in moonlight. But the moonlight no longer gleamed against her skin. The skin was darkening, coarsening, putting out hairy tufts.

Hers was an agony akin to that of parturition—and in a sense, it was parturition. She was giving birth, not to a new soul but to another aspect of her own. Agony and action alike were purely reflex.

It was fascinating to watch her skull change shape—as though the hands of an invisible sculpture were kneading and moulding the living, clay, squeezing the very bony structure into new conformations.

The elongated head seemed miraculously shorn of curls for a moment, and then the fine fur sprang up, the ears flared outward, the pinkish tips twitched along a thickened neck.

Her eyes slitted upward, while the features of the face convulsed, then converged into a protuberant muzzle. The grimace of involuntary rictus became a snarl, and fangs jutted forth.

Her skin darkened perceptibly—so that her image was akin to that on an overdeveloped photographic print "coming up" in the hypo bath.

Lisa's clothing had dropped away, and I watched the melting of the limbs as they foreshortened, furred, and flexed anew. The hands that had pawed the earth in agony now became paws.

The whole process occupied about three and a half minutes. I know, because I timed it with my watch.

Oh yes, I timed it carefully. I suppose I should have been frightened. But it is not given to every man—this opportunity of seeing a woman turn to a wolf. I regarded the transformation with what might well be called professional interest. Fascination precluded the presence of fear.

Now the metamorphosis was complete. The wolf stood before me, poised and panting.

OF COURSE, I understood. Understood why Lisa had few friends, why she spent so many evenings alone, why she had urged me to go away—and why she could so confidently predict the movements of the phantom wolf.

I stood there and smiled.

The feral eyes searched mine imploringly. I suppose she had expected me to exhibit shock, dread, or at the least a definite repulsion.

My smile was an unexpected answer. A whimper rose in the furry throat, changed to almost a purr. She was reassured now. “You’d better go,” I whispered.

Still she hesitated. I reached down and patted the lupine brow, still clammy from the pangs of transmutation. “It’s all right,” I said. “I understand, Lisa. You can trust me, you know. And it doesn’t make any difference in my feelings about—the two of us.”

The purring subsided deep in the great wolf’s shaggy breast.

“You’d better hurry now,” I coaxed. “Violet is all alone. You promised to surprise her.”

The gray beast turned and padded off into the forest behind.

I walked down to the lake and watched the moonlight play over the water.

All at once the delayed emotional reaction came. Everything was dear—too dear.

I was in league with a girl to drive my wife mad. The girl herself was not wholly sane. And now I had learned she was a werewolf. Perhaps I was a little cram myself.

But there it was. I couldn’t think of an answer. I couldn’t back down now. Things would go on according to plan. And in the end I’d get what I wanted. Or—would I?

Suddenly I began to sob.

It wasn’t remorse, and it wasn’t self-pity and it wasn’t fear. It was merely a thought that came to me—the thought of holding Lisa in my arms and feeling her change; of kissing Lisa's red lips and suddenly finding, pressed against my mouth, the leering muzzle of a wolf.

My sobs were cut short by the far-off, mocking howl from the depths of the woods.

I put my hands over my ears and shuddered.

IV

ALL at once I found myself running through the woods. I couldn't hear any howling, but the sound of my own gasps roared in my ears. I ran madly, blindly, tearing my face and hands as I careened toward the cabin.

The place was dark. I panted towards the door, tried it and found it locked.

Violet screamed from within, and I was glad to hear her. At least she was —alive.

For the thought had come to me suddenly.

Werewolves not only frighten . . . they kill.

So her screams was welcome, and when I opened the door she ran sobbing into my arms; and that was welcome, too.

"I saw it!" she whispered. "It came tonight, peered into the window. It was a wolf, but the eyes were human. They stared at me, those green eyes—and then it tried to open the door—it was howling—I think I fainted—oh Charles, help me—help me—"

I couldn't go through with it. I couldn't carry out my plans in the face of her utter terror. Instead I took her in my arms and whispered what I could to comfort her.

"Yes, dear," I murmured. "I know you saw it. Because I saw it too, in the woods. That's why I came. And I heard it howling, too. I know now that you were right—there is a wolf."

"A werewolf," she insisted.

“A wolf, anyway. And tomorrow I’ll go down to the crossroads and we’ll get up a party and find the beast.”

She smiled at me, then. She couldn’t control her trembling, but she managed to smile.

We slept that night in each other’s arms, like frightened children.

And that’s just about what we were, at that.

It was past noon when I awoke. Violet was calmly preparing breakfast.

I rose and did things to my haggard face with a razor. The food was ready when I sat down, but I couldn’t eat much.

“The tracks are all around the cabin,” Violet told me. Her voice didn’t waver as she spoke—my belief gave her strength.

“All right,” I answered. “I’m leaving for the crossroads now. I’ll tell Leon, Doctor Meroux, some of the boys. Perhaps I’ll go to the Mountie Headquarters if I can get a ride over there.”

“You mean you’ll join the hunt?”

“Certainly. I’m going to be in at the kill. It’s the least I can do—or I’d never forgive myself for misjudging you.”

She kissed me.

“You won’t be afraid of staying alone, now?” I asked.

“No. Not any more.”

“Good.”

I left.

I did a lot of thinking during my walk to the crossroads. But my meditations were rudely interrupted when I walked into Leon’s tavern at the crossroads and demanded a drink.

Fat Leon was talking to little Doctor Meroux down at the end of the bar. His arms were flying and his eyes were rolling, but when he saw me he halted and came up to where I was standing. He leaned across the bar and stared.

“Ah, Meestaire Colby, it is good to see you.”

“Thanks, Leon. Been pretty busy lately—couldn’t get in here very often.”

“Is it at your cabin that you have been busy?”

Again the stare. I hesitated, bit my lip. Why should I hesitate to answer?

“Yes. My wife hasn’t been feeling so well, and I’ve spent most of my time with her.”

“It is lonely where you are, eh?”

“You know how it is,” I shrugged. “Why?”

“Nothing. It is merely that I wondered if you chanced to hear anything these nights.”

“Hear anything? What could I hear? Frogs and crickets, and—”

“Wolves, perhaps?”

I blinked. Fat Leon stared at me.

“Have you heard the howl of le loup?” he whispered.

My head shook. I hoped he was watching that instead of my trembling hands.

“Strange. One would think that across the lake the cries would echo.”

“But there are no wolves around here—”

“Ah!” breathed Leon. “You are mistaken.”

“How do you know?”

“Do you remember Big Pierre the guide—that dark one who lives across the lake from you?” asked Leon.

“Yes.”

“Big Pierre left yesterday with a party bound for the river. His daughter, Yvonne, stayed behind to tend to the cabin. She was alone in the night. It is because of her that we know about the wolf.”

“She told you?”

“She did not tell us, no. But this morning the good Doctor Meroux chanced to pass her door and paused to bid her good day. He found her lying in the yard. Le loup attacked her in the night, may her soul rest in peace.”

“Dead!”

"Assuredly. One does not like to think of it. Doctor Meroux lost the tracks in the forest, but when Big Pierre returns he will hunt the beast down, yes."

Doctor Meroux edged along the bar, his mustache fairly bristling with excitement.

"What do you think of that, Charles? A renegade wolf loose in this territory—a killer. I'm going to notify the Mounted Police and see that a warning is given. If you could have seen that poor girl's body—" I downed my drink and turned away hastily.

"Violet!" I muttered. "She's all alone. I must get back to her."

I hurried out of Leon's tavern, half-ran down the sunlit street.

NOW I knew where Lisa had gone after she left Violet. Now I knew that werewolves do more than change their shape.

I swung towards her roadside stand. It was closed. Abandoning caution, I hastened towards her door. The only response to my knocking was the querulous mumble of the paralytic old man within.

But as I turned away, the door swung open. Lisa stood there, blinking against the sunlight. She was pale, drawn, and her hair hung loosely down her bare back.

"Charles—what is it?"

I pulled her over to the shade of the trees behind the house. She stood there, staring up at me, her face haggard and her eyes dull with fatigue.

Then I slapped her, hard. She jerked, tried to dodge, but my other hand gripped her shoulder. I hit her again. She began to whimper softly, like a dog. Like a wolf.

I hit her again, with all my might. I felt a choking sensation in my throat and the words wouldn't come clearly.

"You little fool!" I muttered. "Why did you do it?"

She wept. I shook her fiercely.

“Stop that! You think I don’t know about last night? Well, I do. And so does everybody around here. Why did you do it, Lisa?” Then she understood, and knew that she could not hope to deceive me.

“I had to,” she whispered. “You don’t know what it’s like. After I left your wife at the cabin I went back around the lake. It was then that it—came over me.”

“What came over you?”

“The hunger.”

She said it simply.

“You can’t understand that, can you? The way the hunger comes. It gnaws at your stomach and then it gnaws at your brain, so that you cannot think. You can only—act. And when I passed Big Pierre’s cabin, Yvonne was at the well, drawing water in the darkness. I remember seeing her there and then—I forget.”

I shook her until her teeth rattled.

“You forget, eh? Well, the girl’s dead.”

“Thank le bon Dieu!” Lisa breathed.

I gasped. “You thank God for—that?”

“Certainly. For if she did not die—if she survived the bite of one like myself—she would become such an unfortunate being as I am.”

“Oh.” I scarcely whispered the word. “Don’t you understand? These things I do are not of my choosing. It is the hunger, always the hunger. In the past when I felt the—change—coming, I went far away so that no one would know. But last night the hunger came swiftly and I could not help myself. Still it is better that she is dead, poor child.”

“That’s what you think,” I muttered. “Except for one slight detail. It ruins our plans.”

“How so?”

“My wife won’t be frightened by thoughts of an imaginary wolf any more. When she comes babbling of a haunting beast, no one will think her crazy. Everybody knows that there is a wolf, now.”

“I see. What do you propose?”

“I propose nothing. We’ll have to let matters rest.”

Her arms were around me, her bruised face pressed to my own. “Charles,” she sobbed. “You mean we won’t be together—”

“How can you expect that, after what you did?”

“Don’t you love me, Charles?”

She was kissing me now, and her lips were soft. It was not the kiss of a wolf but the warm, vibrant kiss of a lovely woman. Tier arms were soft. I felt myself responding to her embrace, felt against the incredible crescendo of desire this girl could rouse in me. And I weakened.

“Well think of something,” I told her. “But you must promise me—what happened last night will never happen again. And you must not go near my wife.”

“I promise.” She sighed. “It is a hard thing to keep, that promise. But I shall do my best. You will come to me this evening, no? Then we can be together, and I will have you to protect me from my—hunger.”

“I’ll come to you tonight,” I said.

Her eyes flickered with sudden fear. “Charles,” she whispered. “You had better come before the moon rises.”

V

WHEN I got back to the cabin, Violet was waiting for me outside the door. “Have you heard?” she said.

“How do you know?” I parried. “There’s a man here to see you. He told me. He asked me about the wolf, and I mentioned what has been happening lately, he’s in there now, waiting for you.”

“You told him,” I said. “And he wants to see me.”

“Yes. You’d better go in alone. His name is Craigin, and he’s with the Mounted Police.”

There was nothing else to do but go inside.

I had never met a member of the Northwest Mounted Police before. Except for his uniform, Mr. Cragin might have been a big city copper. He had the manner and the mind.

“Mr. Charles Colby?” he said, rising from the armchair as I entered.

“Yes sir. What can I do for you?”

“I think you know. It’s about the death of that little Yvonne Beauchamps, across the lake.”

I sighed. “They told me at the crossroads. Wolf, wasn’t it? Wanted to know if I’d seen any signs of one.”

“Have you?”

I hesitated. That was a mistake. The big man in uniform looked up at me and smiled.

“It doesn’t matter. Anyone who bothers to take a look around this cabin will see wolf-tracks galore. Matter of fact, there’s a trail leading from here right around the lake to the Beauchamps place. I followed it from there this afternoon.”

I couldn’t say anything. I tried to light a cigarette and wished I hadn’t.

“Besides,” said Cragin, “I’ve been talking to your wife. She seems to know all about this wolf.”

“Really? Did she tell you she saw one here last night?”

“She did.” Cragin stopped smiling. “By the way, where were you last night when the wolf appeared?”

“I was in town.”

“At the tavern?”

“No. Just walking.”

“Walking, eh?”

The dialogue was far from sparkling, but it held my interest. I could see Cragin was leading up to something. And he did.

“Let’s drop that angle for a moment,” he suggested. “I have all the facts in the case anyway, just checking now to see if we can discover the habits of this renegade. We’re getting up a hunting party, you know. Don’t suppose you’d be interested in joining it—out of your line, isn’t it?”

I said nothing.

"Well, isn't it?" he repeated. "You're a writer."

I nodded.

"I'm told you do a lot of yarns about the supernatural. You just finished one about some kind of invisible monster, your wife says."

I nodded again. It was easy enough to keep nodding.

Cragin stood up, casually. "Do you ever get any funny ideas?" he asked me.

"Meaning?"

"Seems to me that an author like yourself would naturally be a little bit—different. If you'll pardon my saying so, I'd imagine that a man who writes about monsters must get a pretty queer slant on a lot of things."

I GULPED, but covered it up with a quick grin. "Are you inferring that when I write a story about a monster it's part of my autobiography?" I asked.

That wasn't exactly what he expected. I followed through.

"What's the matter with you?" I drawled. "Do you think I look like a vampire?" Cragin forced a laugh. "It's my business to be suspicious. Let me see your teeth before I answer."

I opened my mouth and said, "Ah!"

He didn't like that, either.

I saw my advantage and seized it.

"Just what are you driving at, Cragin?" I demanded. "You know that my wife has seen a wolf around here. You know that it appeared last night. You know that it left here and apparently went around the lake, killed the girl, and disappeared.

"We've given you all the information you wanted. Unless, of course, you have a vague idea that I might be some kind of a monster myself. Maybe your scientific police theory points to the notion that I change myself into a wolf, frighten my wife, and then go out and murder a victim in the dark."

I had him on the ropes now. “I’m not used to you backwoods Dick Tracy characters,” I said. “Of course I knew that some of the half-breeds around here believe in ghosts and werewolves and demons, but I didn’t think members of the Mounted Police adopted such superstitions.”

“But really, Mr. Colby, I—”

My hand was on the door. I pointed, smiling pleasantly. “My advice to you, sir, is to go chase your wolf.”

He took it, and departed.

I sat down and allowed myself the luxury of a good sweat as Violet came in.

For the first time, I was behaving sensibly. My direct attack had certainly dispelled any vagrant notions Cragin might have harbored. I had shamed him out of any faith he might possess in the element of truth behind werewolf-whisperings.

I decided to follow it up by doing the same for Violet. Casually, I recounted the details of our interview.

She listened in silence.

“Now, dearest, you see the truth,” I concluded. “The wolf is real enough—but it’s only a wolf. You thought it might be something more, because it exhibited intelligence. Doctor Meroux tells me that renegades like that are used to human beings and are much more cunning.

“But when it killed, it killed like an animal. It’s a wolf and nothing more. Tonight they’ll hunt it down and you can rest easier.” Violet put her hand on my arm.

“You’ll stay here?” she asked.

I frowned.

“No. I’m going back to the crossing and join the hunting party. I told you I would last night. And it’s a point of honor with me to be in on the kill.”

“I wish you wouldn’t—I’m frightened—”

“Lock the doors. A wolf can’t unbolt locks.”

“I’m going hunting. Believe me, you’ll be safer if I’m away tonight.”

VI

THE moon had almost risen when I came to Lisa under the trees behind her doorway.

She stood there in shadow, and something caught at my throat as I realized, with relief, that a woman waited for me and not a wolf.

Her smile reassured me, as did her quick caress.

“I knew you’d come,” she said. “Now we can be together. Oh, Charles, I’m afraid.”

“Afraid?”

“Yes. Haven’t you heard? That Cragin—the Mounted Policeman—he has been talking. He came to see me today and asked if I knew anything about the wolf. Leon, down at the tavern, has been gossiping like an old woman about the way I go out at night. And he has been carrying tales of werewolves.”

“You needn’t worry,” I soothed. Briefly, I repeated the substance of my interview with Cragin.

“But they are hunting tonight,” Lisa insisted. “Leon has closed his place, and most of the men are following Cragin. They left at dusk, to go around the lake. They will start from Big Pierre’s cabin and try to track down the wolf.”

“Why should that worry you?” I responded, smiling. “There is no wolf. Tonight you and I will be together.”

“That is right,” Lisa answered. “I am safe as long as I’m with you.” She gestured me towards the bluff beyond the trees.

“Shall we sit here and talk?” she suggested. “Leon is closed, but I went there earlier in the day and bought some wine. You like wine, don’t you, Charles?”

She produced a jug and we sprawled on the grass.

The wine was sweet but strong. As the moon rose in the east, I drank.

Suddenly she gripped my shoulder.

“Listen!”

I heard it from far away—far away across the lake. The faint yelling of human voices intermingled with a shrill, monotonous yapping.

"They're hunting, and they have hounds."

Lisa shuddered. I drank deeply, drew her close'.

"There's nothing to fear," I comforted her. Nevertheless, as I stared at the sky I felt a rising fear; rising in proportion to the increased clamor from across the lake.

They were hunting a werewolf—and she was in my arms.

Lisa's proud pagan profile was limned against the pale and half-gnawed face of the moon above.

Moon face and girl face, staring at each other. And I, staring at both. . . .

When ye moon waxeth, so doth ye accursed taint in ye veins of ye werewulf—"Lisa," I whispered. "Are you all right?"

"Of course, Charles. Here, drink!"

"I mean, you don't feel as if something is going to happen to—you."

"No. Not tonight. I'm all right. I'm with you now."

She laughed and kissed me. I drank to drown the dread I could not drive away.

"You won't bother Violet again? You'll stop prowling by night until this dies down?"

"Yes, of course." She held the bottle up to my lips.

"You'll be patient? You'll wait until I can think of another plan?"

"Whatever you say, lover."

I FACED her. "It may take time. Perhaps we can't be together as quickly as I'd planned. There may be no way out except divorce. Violet's strict about such things and she'll fight. The legal angle might take several years to work out before I was free. Can you stand waiting that long?"

"Divorce? Years?"

"You must promise me that you'll wait. That you won't harm Violet or—anybody. Otherwise we can't go on together."

She faced me, face in shadow. Then she bent low and sought my lips “with her mouth.

“Very well, Charles; if that is the only way, I can wait. I can wait.”

I drank again. Everything was very clear. Then it blurred. Then it was clear again. Yapping of hounds roared in my ears, then faded into a distant buzzing. Lisa’s face loomed large, then swam out of sight.

It was the wine, but I didn’t care. I had Lisa’s promise, and Lisa’s lips. I couldn’t stand the tension any longer. These last few days had been perpetual nightmare to me.

I drank my fill of lips and wine.

Some time later, I slept. . . .

“Wake up!”

The voice rasped urgently in my ears. Suddenly I was being cuffed on the neck. “Wake up, Colby! Hurry!”

I opened by eyes, sat up. The moon was high overhead, and its pallid rays fell upon the face bending towards mine—the face of Doctor Meroux.

“Sleeping,” I muttered. “Where’s Lisa?”

“Lisa? Nobody’s here but yourself. Wake up, man—come with me.”

I rose, lurched a moment, regained my balance.

“You all right?”

“Yes, Doc. What is it?”

“I don’t know if—”

There was indecision in his voice and a hint of dread. I caught the hint, held it. Suddenly I was sober and shouting.

“Tell me, Doctor. What has happened?”

“It’s your wife,” he said, slowly. “The wolf came to your cabin tonight while you were away. I happened by and stopped in to see if everything was all right. When I arrived the wolf had already departed. But—”

“Yes?”

“The wolf had tom Violet’s throat!”

VII

WE RACED in darkness, in a black blur born of the night without and the fear within.

Lisa had lied. She had given me wine, waited until I slept, and then struck—

I could think of nothing else.

We reached the cabin. Doctor Meroux knelt beside the bed where Violet lay. She turned and smiled at me, weakly.

"She's still alive?" I gasped.

"Yes. Her throat was torn, but I arrived and stopped the bleeding. It isn't too serious, but she's been badly frightened. Keep her quiet for a day or so."

I knelt beside my wife, pressed my lips to her cheek above the bandaged neck. "Thank God for that," I whispered. "Don't question her," Meroux advised, "Let her rest now. Evidently I arrived just after the attack. The wolf must have come in through the window. You'll notice the shattered glass. When I came near it bolted out again and scampered off. The tracks are all around."

I walked outside the cabin with him. It was as he said.

"The hunting party will be here shortly," he told me. "They can pick up the trail easily enough now, I think."

I nodded.

Suddenly the baying sounded from the forest. The voices of frantic men blended with the equally frenzied ululations of the dogs.

Doctor Meroux tweaked his mustache and turned. "They must have found it!" he cried. "Listen!"

Shouts and and murmurs. Sounds of scrabbling in the underbrush. A shrill cry. And then—

A volley of rifle shots.

"Nom de Dieu! They have it!" the doctor exulted.

Baying of hounds, closer now. Running footsteps snapped twigs in the brush beyond. Voices sounded near.

And then, out of the clearing before the cabin, crawled the wolf.

THE great gray beast was panting, spent. It dragged its broken body across the open space, leaving a black trail of blood. The huge head was lolling, fangs agape, and it wheezed painfully as it made its way toward us.

Meroux pulled out a revolver, cocked it. I held his hand.

“No,” I whispered. “No!”

I walked toward the wolf. Its eyes met mine, but they held no recognition—only the glaze of descending death.

“Lisa,” I whispered. “You couldn’t wait.” The doctor didn’t hear my mutterings, but the wolf did. The head jerked up, and for a moment a strangled sound issued from the shaggy throat.

Then the wolf died.

I saw it die. That was simple enough. Its paws stiffened, the head came down, and the wolf lay prone.

I could stand watching the wolf die. What came next was not so easy to endure.

For Lisa died.

When I had witnessed the change from woman to wolf, I coldly timed it with my watch.

Now, watching the transformation of wolf to woman, I could only shudder and cry out.

The body expanded, writhed, flexed. The ears sank into the skull, the limbs elongated, put forth white flesh. Dr. Meroux was shouting beside me, but I couldn’t hear what he said. I could only stare as the wolf-form vanished and Lisa’s nude loveliness burst into view like a blossoming flower—a pale white lily of death.

She lay there, a dead girl in the moonlight. I sobbed and turned away.

“No—it cannot be!”

The doctor’s harsh voice recalled me. He pointed with a palsied finger at the white form at our feet.

I stared and saw—another change!

This change I cannot bear to describe. I can only remember, now, that Lisa had never told me just how or when she had become a victim of lycanthropy. I can only remember that the feast of the werewolf preserves an unnatural youth.

For the woman at our feet aged before our eyes.

Woman to wolf—such a metamorphosis is hideous enough to behold. But more shocking still was this final abomination. The lovely girl became a raddled hag.

And the hag became—worse.

At the end, something incredibly old lay lifeless on the ground. Something wrinkled and shrivelled gaped up at the moon with a mummy's grin.

Lisa had assumed her rightful shape at last.

THE rest must have happened very swiftly. The men came, with the dogs. Dr. Meroux bent over the thing that had been wolf and woman, and now was neither. I fainted.

When I awoke the following afternoon, Dr. Meroux was dressing Violet's wound. She was well enough to be up, and she brought me some soup. I slept again.

The following morning Meroux came again. I felt strong enough to sit up, and to question him. What he had to report reassured me.

Apparently, Dr. Meroux had been wise. He had confirmed the werewolf story, but he did not identify the dead creature as Lisa. With Cragin's help, the matter was being hushed up. After all, there was no point in any further investigation. For the sake of local policy, it was best for all concerned to let it drop.

Violet was almost her old self again.

Last night I made a full confession to her.

She only smiled.

Perhaps, when she is rested, she will return to the city and divorce me. I do not know. She had not offered forgiveness, nor any comment. She seems restless, perturbed.

Today she went out for a walk.

I have been sitting all afternoon, typing out this account. I imagine now, since the sun had set, that she will return. Unless she had already slipped off quietly to the city. Still, with that wound still half-healed, she probably wouldn’t travel yet.

The moon is coming up across the lake, but I don’t want to look at it. I can’t seem to bear any reminder of what happened. By writing this, I hope to cleanse myself of the memories.

Perhaps I can find a measure of peace in the future. I’m sure now that Violet hates me, but she will get her divorce and I shall carry on.

Yes. She looked as if she hated me. Because I sent a werewolf to kill her—

But I’m rambling. I mustn’t think of that. No.

And yet I have to think of something. I don’t want to stop writing, yet. Then I’d be forced to sit here alone, while the night comes down like a dark shroud over a dead earth.

Yes, I’d have to sit here and listen to the stillness. I’d have to watch the moon rising over the lake, and wait for Violet to reborn.

I wonder where she has wandered today? With that wound in her throat, it isn’t good for her to be out.

That wound in her throat—where Lisa bit her.

There’s something I’m trying to remember about that. I can’t seem to think clearly. But I know I’m trying to recall a point about her wound. It all ties in with my fear of the moonlight and being alone here.

What is it?

Now I know!

Yes, I remember.

And I pray that Violet has wandered off, that she does not come back.

She was restless today, and she went off alone in the woods. I know why she left. The wound is working.

I RECALL what Lisa said when I told her that little Yvonne had died. She thanked God—because if Yvonne had survived her bite, she too would have become a . . .

Violet was bitten. Violet didn't die. Now the wound is working. And the moon is high, high over the lake. Violet, running through the forest, is a . . .

There! Outside the window—I can see her!

I can see—it.

It is creeping toward the cabin as I write. I can see it in the moonlight; the moonlight that glistens on the sleek fur along its back. The moonlight is gleaming on the black snout, too, and on sharp, pointed fangs. Violet hates me.

Violet is coming back. But not as—a woman.

Wait! Did I lock the door? Yes.

Good. She can't enter. Look at her pawing at the outside of the door. Scratching. And whining, deep in her throat. That throat—those jaws!

Perhaps Cragin will come, or Dr. Meroux. If not, I'll spend the night sitting here. In the morning she will go away. Then, when she shows up again I can have her put away.

Yes, I'll wait.

But listen to that howling! It gets on my nerves. She knows I'm in here. She can hear me typing. She knows. And if she could get at me—

She can't. I'm safe here.

Now what is she up to? She isn't at the door any more. I can hear those paws padding, moving around under the window. The window.

The pane of glass was shattered when Lisa came the other night. There is no glass in the window—

She's howling. She's going to lean in. Yes.

I see it now . . . the body of a leaping wolf against the moonlight . . . Violet . . . no . . . Vio . . .

One Way to Mars

JOE GIBSON was higher than hell and he didn't know where he was and he didn't care as long as the bar was in front of him and he was laughing and somebody was singing in a sad voice very far away and he said sure he'd have another one and then—There was this character in the brown overcoat.

He was an odd little whack and he kept his pockets and his collar turned up and his hat-brim pulled down low like an extra in a gangster movie.

The whack was talking to him but it took a minute before the words reached him and made sense.

"Trouble with you, friend, you need a little vacation," said the whack. "Sort of a get away from it all."

"Sure, sure," said Gibson, trying to find his glass. It was lost down there somewhere in the fog.

"I've been watching you, friend," said the whack. "Said to myself, there's a man with trouble. There's a man who needs to get out of all this. You look lost, friend."

"Sure," said Gibson. "Sure. I'm a lost soul. Will you have a drink or kindly get the hell out of here?"

The little whack didn't pay any attention. He went right on talking in an earnest voice. A Dutch uncle.

"I'm with the Ace Travel Bureau, buddy. How'd you like to buy a ticket?"

"Where to?" asked Gibson, as if he gave a damn.

The whack in the brown overcoat shrugged.

“How about a ticket to Mars?” he asked.

Gibson let that one sink in for a minute. Then he grinned.

“Mars, eh? How much it cost me?”

“Oh, I don’t know. Make it cheap for you. Let’s say $2.88.”

“$2.88 to Mars? Sounds very reasonable.” Gibson paused. “Is this a round trip or just one way?”

The whack coughed apologetically. “Uh—one way. You see, we haven’t been able to figure out how to make a return trip yet.”

“Bet you don’t sell many tickets,” said Gibson.

“We have our customers,” said the character in the overcoat. “You interested?”

“I don’t think so.” Gibson found the glass, drew it up through the fog and swallowed the scotch with a shudder.

“You will be interested some other time, perhaps?” coaxed the whack.

“Listen, you—” said Gibson, suddenly.

“I’ve had you on my list for quite a while, friend,” the whack mumbled, not noticing how Gibson’s fist closed around the glass in his hand. “I know we’ll do business sooner or later.”

“How about right now?” said Gibson, softly.

He drew his hand back, intending to smash the whack in the face. He was set for it, his body began to pivot, and he braced himself for the moment when the blow would land solid, hard.

And then he followed his fist and the fist shot out, out past the stars and into the darkness beyond. Joe Gibson went with it and fell through the darkness as it tunnelled down . . . deep down . . .

2

“JEEZ what a beaut you had last night,” said Maxie, stirring the cup before he placed it to Joe Gibson’s lips. “Were you stinko but completely.”

"Shut up," said Gleason.

"The face on the bar room floor. Out cold," said Maxie, forcing the contents of the cup down Gibson's unwilling throat.

"Forget it," said Gibson, as soon as he could talk.

Maxie shrugged.

"OK, pal," he said. "I'll forget it.

You're riding high. I line you up a five hundred a week deal with the hottest name combo in the business and what do you do? Go out and plaster yourself over half the brass rails in town and pass out in front of the guy who does the pillar for Billboard. You tell me to forget it. So I'm willing to forget everything—and that includes you." Gibson sat up in bed. He moved very quickly for a man with a hangover.

"No Maxie," he said. "I didn't mean it. Honest I didn't. I'm sorry. And I never would of socked the guy if he hadn't gone and cracked wise about this Mars stuff. I'm just standing and minding my own business when he ups with his wise lip about a trip. So I let him have it and went out on my face."

Maxie stared at him.

"I saw it happen, Joe," he murmured. "You're standing at the bar with nobody within ten feet of you on either side. You start mumbling to yourself, and then you turn around and haul off and go down for the count. Hitting air."

"But the whack in the brown overcoat—" Gibson began.

"I didn't see any whack in a brown overcoat," said Maxie, slowly. "All I see is a whack named Joe Gibson doing a nose-dive with a snootful."

Gibson sighed, "That's how it was?"

"That's how it was."

"I had the snakes," Joe Gibson shuddered.

Maxie sat down on the bed. "Remember the old days, Joe?" he asked. "You was a punk from K.C. when I picked you out of the Rialto pit. Playing non-union dates at stags. I spotted you, got you the bookings. Made you work. Brought out your style."

“Where’s your violin?” asked Gibson. “You need soft music for this line.”

“I’m not handing you a line,” said Maxie. “I’m just telling you.”

“What you telling me?” Joe Gibson sat straight up and he brushed Maxie’s hand off his shoulder. “So all right. You picked me up in the gutter and you made a big horn out of me. Not a side man, a big horn. Big enough for Goodman, Shaw, Miller, anybody.

“Like hell you did! It’s me, Joe Gibson—I’m the guy who blows his heart out through the tube. You know a good thing when you see it so all right, you build me up. But you get your ten per cent out of it, don’t you? I’m the musician. You’re just the flesh peddler.” Maxie didn’t move. His smile was slow and sad.

“It’s not that, Joe,” he sighed. “I don’t want the credit. You was a good kid. You worked hard. But not any more.”

He rose. “I don’t figure it,” he said. “First there’s the lush act you pulled in Scranton, when you got stinko on the stand. And the way you run out on that combo I set for the Rainbow Room, almost. And the time I hauled you out of the jam in Chi when you didn’t show for the Decca recordings.

“Between that wrongo babe of yours and the rotgut you’re getting a pretty good reputation for yourself, huh? Joe Gibson, one of the best boys on trumpet in the business. But don’t buy him! Because he’s also one of the best boys on blondes and bourbon.”

Joe Gibson was sitting almost bent double. His head hung in his lap and he sobbed.

“Awright,” said Maxie. “I don’t know what’s got into you. I don’t know what you’re scared of. Maybe you’ll snap out of it all of a sudden. Don’t make me promises, though.

“I’m gonna see what I can do. Maybe I can square that booking. The rest is up to you. Get some rest. Call you tomorrow.”

Maxie went out.

Joe Gibson slid back under the covers. His face gradually stopped twitching. He prepared to sleep.

The phone rang.

Joe Gibson slid one hand over to the bedside cradle phone.

“Hello,” said a familiar voice. Gibson couldn’t place it so he grunted softly.

“I was just wondering,” said the voice, “about our little talk last night. Made up your mind yet about that trip to Mars?”

Joe Gibson slammed the receiver down with a bang. His head disappeared under the covers and he lay shuddering and sobbing for a long time.

3

OPENING night was solid.

It had to be. The week before it was just pure hell. Maxie had worked like a dog sewing the contract up again. Joe Gibson sweated the alcohol out of his system in rehearsal.

Now he sat on the bandstand waiting for the downbeat and he had the trumpet poised in his lap. He knew it was all right.

There was just one thing wrong. His eyes. Joe Gibson’s eyes hurt him. They hurt him because of all the squinting he’d done for the past week. Squinting at faces in crowds, faces he saw from bus tops or through the windows.

Joe Gibson was looking for somebody. A little whack in a brown overcoat. He was afraid of seeing him. And somehow he was more afraid because he didn’t see him.

Now he gazed down at the dim dance floor, blinded by the harsh spot from overhead, and he squinted again.

So his eyes hurt, and all the time he kept kidding himself that it was all right, he was all right, this was just another opening—

But he prayed for the moment when he’d put the horn to his lips, and blow out all the fear and the worry, blow out the thought of squinting and the thoughts that lay behind the squinting.

The hands holding the trumpet trembled and little beads of sweat dropped along the sides of the horn.

One last hasty glimpse of the tables bordering the dance floor. No brown overcoat.

Downbeat.

Joe Gibson raised his horn.

Then it was all right for sure.

The crowd was dancing. Joe Gibson didn't even bother to look for the whack any more. His eyes were closed. He was out of this world. Riding for the stars on a trumpet, sweeping up with a boogie beat.

It was hot, solid; something to hang onto. He twisted each note, reluctant to let it go. He wanted a solo ride, wanted to play his horn, keep his eyes closed, keep his brain closed to everything except the sending sound. Out of this world.

He was all right at last. Completely grooved through each number until intermission.

Then Joe Gibson sat back after the signature and realized for the first time that his shirt and dickey were wringing wet and his new tux was ripped under the left arm. He had been too solid to notice. And now the other boys were leaving the stand for a smoke and the crowd drifted off the dance floor.

Joe Gibson got up. He saw Maxie waiting for him over behind the bandstand. He tucked his horn into the case and stood up straight, took a quick stride to the steps behind the stand.

He lanced out at the deserted floor. The deserted floor that was not quite deserted.

A brown blur spun out there beyond the glare of the lights. A solitary figure weaved into a solo dance of its own. And the figure whirled up to the platform in a strutting glide, and Joe Gibson saw the face under the pulled-down hat brim and then he heard the words rustle up.

“Enjoyed your playing. You’re almost ready for your Mars’ trip now, I believe.”

Joe Gibson cleared the bandstand in a leap. He wasn’t quite fast enough. The brown overcoat bobbed off between the tables. Nobody seemed to notice it at all.

But almost everybody saw Joe Gibson jump from the bandstand and run screaming out of the room into the streets beyond.

4

JOE was all right as long as Max stayed in the room with him but then the croaker told him to step outside and he began to talk to Joe alone.

The croaker was a smooth soft-speaking guy and he seemed to know his business. Maxie said he was the best psychiatrist in the racket and Maxie knew about those things.

But now Maxie bad stepped out and Joe was lying down on the couch with a light shining in his eyes, and the croaker was telling him to relax, take it easy, stop thinking and just say whatever popped into his head.

It reminded Joe too much of those gangster pictures where they give a guy the third degree. But at that it was better to lie down than to have the croaker tapping him on the knee and making him stretch out his arms with his eye? closed. That was supposed to test your reflexes, but Joe Gibson didn’t give a damn about his reflexes. He was afraid of the man in the brown overcoat. The man he couldn’t catch, the man he couldn’t even see on the street the night he chased him out of the cafe and lost his job.

Joe began to explain this to the croaker, choosing his words very carefully, because after all he didn’t want this psychiatrist to think there was anything the matter with his really.

It wasn’t as if he heard voices, or stuff like that. There was nothing wrong with him except seeing that whack.

But the croaker kept asking questions, and pretty soon he had Joe admitting all kinds of stuff—not so much admitting as remembering. Dizzy ideas he had when he was a kid. Screwy things.

Like when he used to sneak off to sit in the coal cellar after his old man had a fight with his old lady. He'd fall asleep down in the basement and dream that he wasn't in a coal cellar at all—that he wasn't really anywhere. There was no coal cellar in those dreams and no upstairs, either. No outside and no people. There was just the dark and Joe Gibson.

Joe told the croaker a lot of dizzy things like that. He could remember more and more as he lay there under the lamp. He told about getting his first horn and practicing indoors all the time so he wouldn't have to play with the gang outside.

He told about getting his first job and the way he'd run off without collecting his dough from the stick, and then he got to telling how he loved music—particularly the kind where you didn't have to read notes but just played it out of your own head and it did something to you, the way liquor did.

Then Joe realized he was getting his story pretty close to now, and he would have to tell about the man in the brown overcoat and he didn't want to do that, so he talked louder and faster to keep the thoughts back, but it didn't work, and then he was spitting it all out and the croaker was firing questions in a very low voice, and he said yes, he'd seen the man at the bar and no, he wasn't queer-looking and yes, he did have a face and the skin around the mouth was like crumpled tissue-paper.

Funny . . . Joe didn't know he remembered about the skin around the whack's mouth until the croaker asked him.

Now it felt kind of good to get it off his chest. So he told all about it, what he said and what the guy said about the Ace Travel Bureau and the $2.88 ticket to Mars, one way only, and about the other customers the man said they got, and he told about passing out.

Then he explained about the phone call and the dance floor. Only he kept insisting to the croaker that he didn't have anything to drink this last time, and he saw the little whack in the brown overcoat just as plain, and he could hear his voice, so he wasn't—nuts.

The croaker smiled and said Joe was all right and then he called Maxie back and they stood talking together for a while in the next room and Joe couldn't catch anything of what they said.

The croaker came in again and showed him a telephone book. It was the Classified one, and he opened it up to where the travel bureaus were and there was no Ace Travel Bureau in the list.

That made Joe feel a little better until the croaker began to ask him what he knew about the planet Mars. Then he realized what the guy was driving at, and shut up like a clam. The croaker asked him what the number 288 meant to him and Joe played dumb like a fox.

So the croaker smiled and told him to get up and he should come back in a couple days when they checked the physical tests.

Maxie told Joe to run along to the hotel alone, he'd be up in a few minutes after he settled the bill with the psychiatrist.

So Joe got up and walked out.

There was a patient in the waiting room reading a National Geographic, but when Joe walked through, the patient put his magazine down and Joe saw the little man in the brown overcoat.

"I've got your ticket all made out," said the whack. "You can leave today if you like."

Joe didn't say anything. He just stood there, staring down at the crinkly crumpled skin around the whack's lips and the little eyes under the shadow of his hat brim. Joe looked at the brown overcoat with the stains on it, and the big ragged moth holes along the collar.

He took a deep breath and he could smell the coat and something else—something old and stale and sour.

So Joe knew he could see and hear and smell this thing and all the while the little guy was grinning up at him and then he reached into his pocket and Joe knew he was fumbling around for his ticket to Mars.

This time Joe was ready. He jumped him in a flash, and he felt his fingers close around something and choke and choke and everything turned red and black and back to red again and somebody was screaming, way off in the distance and it was Joe screaming but he didn't know that any more because he went out cold.

5

WHEN Joe Gibson woke up he was lying in bed again and he felt good. Very good.

At first he couldn't figure it out and then he remembered why. Because he'd jumped the whack, of course. He wondered if he'd killed him. He couldn't have or he would be in jail now, not in his hotel room.

Still, it was a good feeling. He wanted to celebrate.

Maxie came in. He didn't look as though he felt so good.

Joe began to tell him he was all right now, but Maxie kept mumbling something about the fit he'd thrown in the croaker's office.

Joe proved he wasn't crazy right then and there. He admitted he had thrown a fit and he didn't say anything about choking the whack in the brown overcoat.

"I think I'll get dressed and go out for a. walk," Joe said.

He knew Maxie wouldn't like this, but he felt too good to care.

But Maxie didn't try to stop him. He said, "OK," and sat down on the bed and lit a cigar while Joe dressed. He stared at the carpet and frowned when Joe began to whistle.

"Joe," he said.

"Yeah?"

"You aren't gonna take a walk."

“Who says?”

“You got to take things easy.”

“Sure. I am taking things easy. I’ll be bade early.”

“No. That’s not what I mean, Joe. You’re going to rest up in bed. In a sanatorium.”

“What the—”

“I been talking to the Doc. They’re coming for you in half an hour. It’s nothing to get excited about now, you’ll be out again in—”

That’s the way it was going to be. He understood the setup now.

Joe walked over to the bureau.

“Where are you going?” asked Maxie.

“Got to get my cigarettes. Don’t worry. It’s all right. I understand everything.”

“After all, it’s for your own good,” said Maxie, still not looking at Joe.

“Of course it is,” Joe said. He opened the drawer.

“No hard feelings,” said Maxie.

“No hard feelings,” said Joe.

He turned away from the bureau and shot Maxie twice through the stomach with the gun he’d pulled from the drawer.

6

JOE wasn’t crazy and he’d never felt better in his life, or else he couldn’t have figured it so perfect.

He went downstairs and checked out, paid his bill with the dough he found on Maxie, and grabbed a cab. If he could get over to Jersey in the supper rush, they’d never find him.

So he went to the station and got his ticket and ran for the 5:14 and made it just as the train started to pull out.

He walked down the aisle and laughed because he remembered that the little whack in the brown overcoat was dead. There was nothing to worry about now except this crowd, all these people. He wanted to get away for a while and think out his next move.

So he looked for the washroom at the end of the car and opened the door and walked in. The light wasn't working and it was dark in there, but Joe could see out of the window.

It took a minute for his eyes to focus right, but then he saw what was outside. Just a big black emptiness with stars sweeping past, glaring and winking.

Then the door opened, and Joe knew it was the conductor. But the conductor was wearing a brown overcoat and his hat had a pulled-down brim. A hand reached out for Joe's ticket.

He stared at it in the light from the stars, and read his name and the price and the destination—and then there was nothing for Joe Gibson to do but stand there and wait while he rushed on and on, out of this world.

The Skull of the Marquis de Sade

For he was the Apostle of Pam and those who knew his caresses came to prefer even those of his-rival, Death!

CHRISTOPHER MAITLAND sat back in his chair before the fireplace and fondled the binding of an old book. His thin face, modelled by the flickering firelight, bore a characteristic expression of scholarly preoccupation.

Maitland’s intellectual curiosity was focussed on the volume in his hands. Briefly, he was wondering if the human skin binding this book came from a man, a woman, or a child.

He had been assured by the bookseller that this tome was bound in a portion of the skin of a woman, but Maitland, much as he desired to believe this, was by nature skeptical. Booksellers who deal in such curiosa are not overly reputable, as a rule, and Christopher Maitland’s years of dealing with such people had done much to destroy his faith in their veracity.

Still, he hoped the story was true, it was nice to have a book bound in a woman’s skin. It was nice to have a crux unsaid fashioned from a thigh-bone; a collection of Dyack heads; a shrivelled Hand of Glory stolen from a graveyard in Mainz. Maitland owned all of these items, and many more. For he was a collector of the unusual.

Maitland held the book up to the light and sought to distinguish pore-formation beneath the tanned surface of the binding. Women had finer pores than men, didn't they?

"Beg pardon, sir."

Maitland turned as Hume entered. "What is it?" he asked.

"That person is here again."

"Person?"

"Mr. Marco."

"Oh?" Maitland rose, ignoring the butler's almost grotesque expression of distaste. He suppressed a chuckle. Poor Hume didn't like Marco, or any of the raffish gentry who supplied Maitland with items for his collection, Hume didn't care for the collection itself, either—Maitland vividly remembered the old servant's squeamish trembling as he dusted off the case containing die mummy of the priest of Horus decapitated for sorcery.

"Marco, eh? Wonder what's up?" Maitland mused. "Well—better show him in."

Hume turned and left with a noticeable lack of enthusiasm. As for Maitland, his eagerness mounted. He tan his hand along the reticulated back of a jaddle tao-tieh, and licked his lips with very much the same expression as adorned the face of the Chinese image of gluttony.

Old Marco was here. That meant something pretty special in the. way of acquisitions. Perhaps Marco wasn't exactly the kind of chap one invited to the Club—but he had his uses. Where he laid hands on some of the things he offered for sale Maitland didn't know; but he didn't much care. That was Marco's affair. The rarity of his offerings was-what interested Christopher Maitland. If one wanted a book bound in human skin, old Marco was just the chap to get hold of it—if he had to do a bit of flaying and binding himself. Great character, old Marco!

"Mr. Marco, sir."

Hume withdrew, a sedate shadow, and Maitland waved his visitor forward.

Mr. Marco oozed into the room. The little man was fat, greasily so; his flesh lumped like the tallow coagulating about the guttering stump of a candle. His waxen pallor accentuated the simile. All that seemed needed was a wick to sprout from the bald ball of fat that served as Mr. Marco’s head.

THE fat nun stared up at Maitland’s lean face with what was meant to be an ingraciating smile. The smile oozed, too, and contributed to the aura of uncleanliness which seemed to surround Marco.

But Maitland was not conscious of these matters. His attention was focussed on the curious bundle Marco carried under one arm—the large package, wrapped in prosaic butcher’s paper which somehow contributed to its fascination, for him.

Marco shifted the package gingerly as he removed his shoddy gray ulster. He did not ask permission to divest himself of the coat, nor did he wait for an invitation to be seated.

The fat little man merely made himself comfortable in one of the chairs before the fire, reached for Maitland’s open cigar case, helped himself to a stogie, and lit it. Meanwhile the large round package bobbed up and down on his lap as his rotund stomach heaved convulsively.

Maitland stared at the package. Marco stared at Maitland. Maitland broke first. “Well?” he asked.

The greasy smile expanded. Marco inhaled rapidly, then opened his mouth to emit a puff of smoke and a reply.

“I am sorry to come unannounced, Mr. Maitland. I hope I’m not intruding?”

“Never mind that,” Maitland snapped. “What’s in the package, Marco?”

Marco’s smile expanded. “Something choice,” he whispered. “Something tasty.” Maitland, bent over the chair, his head outthrust to throw a vulpine shadow on the wall.

“What’s in the package?” he repeated.

“You’re my favorite client, Mr. Maitland. You know I never come to you unless I have something really rare. Well, I have that, sir. I have that. You’d be surprised what this butcher’s paper hides, although it’s rather appropriate. Yes, appropriate it is!”

“Stop that infernal gabbling, man! What is in the package?”

Marco lifted the bundle from his lap. He turned it over gingerly, yet deliberately.

“Doesn’t seem to be much,” he purred. “Round. Heavy enough, Might be a medicine ball, eh? Or a beehive. I say, it could even be a head of cabbage. Yes, one might mistake it for a head of common cabbage. But it isn’t. Oh no, it isn’t. Intriguing problem, eh?”

If it was the little man’s intention to goad Maitland into a fit of apoplexy, he almost succeeded’.

“Open it up, damn you!” he shouted.

Marco shrugged, smiled, and scrabbled at the taped edges of the paper. Christopher Maitland was no longer the perfect gentleman, the perfect host. He was a collector, stripped of all pretenses—quivering eagerness incarnate. He hovered over Marco’s shoulder as the butcher’s paper came away in the fat man’s pudgy fingers.

“Now!” Maitland breathed.

The paper fell to the floor. Resting in Marco’s lap was a large, glittering silver ball of—tinfoil.

Marco began to strip the tinfoil away, unravelling it in silvery strands. Maitland gasped as he saw what emerged from the wrappings.

It was a human skull.

Maitland saw the horrid hemisphere gleaming ivory-white in the firelight—then, as Marco shifted it, he saw the empty eye-sockets and the gaping nasal aperture that would never know human breath. Maitland noted the even structure of the teeth, adherent to a well-formed jaw. Despite his instinctive repulsion, he was surprisingly observant; It appeared to him that the skull was unusually small and delicate; remarkably well preserved despite a yellow tinge hinting of age. But Christopher Maitland was most impressed by one undeniable peculiarity. This skull was different, indeed.

This skull did not grin!

THROUGH some peculiar formation or malformation of cheekbone in juxtaposition of jaws, the deathshead did not simulate a smile. The classic mockery of mirth attributed to all skulls was absent here.

The skull had a sober, serious look about it.

Maitland blinked, and uttered a self-conscious cough. What was he doing, entertaining these idiotic fancies about a skull? It was ordinary enough. What was old Marco's game in bringing him such a silly object with so much solemn preamble?

Yes, what was Marco's game?

The little fat man held the skull up before the firelight, turning it from time to time with an impressive display of pride.

His smirk of self-satisfaction contrasted oddly with the sobriety set indelibly upon the skull's bony visage.

Maitland's puzzlement found expression at last. "What are you so smug about?" he demanded. "You bring me the skull of a woman, or an adolescent youth—"

Marco's chuckle cut across his remark. "Exactly what the phrenologists said!" he wheezed. "Damn the phrenologists, man! Tell me about his skull, if there's anything to tell."

Marco ignored him. He turned the skull over in his fat hands, with a gloating expression which repelled Maitland.

"It may be small, but it's a beauty, isn't it?" the little man mused. "So delicately formed, and look—there's almost the illusion of a patina upon the surface."

"I'm not a paleontologist," Maitland snapped. "Nor a grave-robber, either. You'd think we were Burke and-Hare! Be reasonable, Marco—why should I want an ordinary skull?"

"Please, Mr. Maitland! What do you take me for? Do you think I would presume to insult your intelligence by bringing you an ordinary skull? Do you imagine I would ask a thousand pounds for the skull of a nobody?"

Maitland stepped back.

"A thousand pounds?" he shouted. "A thousand pounds for that?"

"And cheap at the price," Marco assured him, "You'll pay it gladly when you know the story."

"I wouldn't pay such a price for the skull of Napoleon," Maitland assured him. "Or Shakespeare, for that matter."

"You'll find that the owner of this skull tickles your fancy a bit more," Marco assured him.

"Enough of this. Let's have it, man!" Marco faced him, one pudgy forefinger tapping the osseous brow of the deathshead.

"You see before you," he murmured, "the skull of Donatien Alphonse Francois, the Marquis de Sade."

II

GILES DE RETZ was a monster. Torquemeda's inquisitors exercised the diabolic ingenuity of the fiends they professed to exorcise. But it remained for the Marquis de Sade to epitomize the living lust for pain. His name symbolizes cruelty incarnate—the savagery men call "sadism." Maitland knew de Sade's weird history, and mentally reviewed it.

The Count, or Marquis de Sade was born in 1740, of distinguished Provencal lineage. He was a handsome youth when he joined his cavalry regiment in the Seven Years' War—a pale, delicate, blue-eyed man whose foppish diffidence cloaked an evil perversity.

At the age of 23 be was imprisoned for a year as the result of a barbaric crime. Indeed, 27 years of his subsequent life he spent in incarceration for his deeds—deeds which even today are only hinted at. His flagellations, his administration of outre drugs, and his tortures of women have served to make his name infamous.

But de Sade was no common libertine with a primitive urge towards the infliction of suffering. He was, rather, the "philosopher of pain"—a keen scholar, a. man of exquisite taste and breeding. He was wonderfully well-read, a disciplined thinker, a remarkable psychologist—and a sadist.

How the mighty Marquis would have squirmed had he envisioned the petty perversions which today bear his name! The tormenting of animals by ignorant peasants . . . the beating of children by hysteric attendants in institutions . . . the infliction of senseless cruelties by maniacs upon others or by others upon maniacs . . . all these matters are classified as "sadistic" today. And yet none of them are manifestations of de Sade's unnatural philosophy.

De Sade's concept of cruelty had in it nothing of concealment or deceit. He practised his beliefs openly, and wrote explicitly of such matters during his years in prison. For he was the Apostle of Pain, and his gospel was made known to all men in Justine . . . Juliette . . . Aline et Valcour . . . the curious La Philosophie dans le Boudoir, and the utterly abominable Les Journees.

And de Sade practised what he preached. He was a lover of many women—a jealous lover, willing to share the embraces of his mistresses with but one rival. That rival was Death, and it is said that all women who knew de Sade's caresses came to prefer those of his rival, in the end.

Perhaps the tortures of the French Revolution were indirectly inspired by the philosophy of the-Marquis—a philosophy that gained circulation throughout France following the publication of his notorious tomes.

When the guillotine arose in the public squares of the cities, de Sade emerged from his long series of imprisonments and walked abroad among men maddened at the sight of blood and suffering.

He was a gray, gentle little ghost; short, bald, mild-mannered and soft-spoken. He raised his voice only to save his aristocratic relatives from the knife. His public life was exemplary during these latter years.

But men still whispered of his private life. His interest in sorcery was rumored. It is said that to de Sade, the shedding of blood was a sacrifice. And sacrifices made to certain beings bring black boons. The screams of pain-maddened women are as prayer to the creatures of the Pit.

The Marquis was cunning. Years of confinement for his "offenses against society" had made him wary. He moved quite cautiously, and took full advantage of the troubled times to conduct quiet and unostentatious burial services whenever he terminated an amour.

Caution did not suffice, in the end. An ill chosen diatribe directed against Napoleon served as „an excuse for the authorities. There were no civil charges, no farcical trial was perpetrated.

De Sade was simply shut up in Charenton as a common lunatic. The, men who knew his crimes were too shocked to publicize them—and yet there was a satanic grandeur about the Marquis which somehow precluded destroying him outright. One does not think of assassinating Satan, But Satan chained—

Satan, chained, languished. A sick, half-blind old man who tore the petals from roses in a last gesture of demoniac destructiveness, the Marquis spent his declining days forgotten by all men. They preferred “to forget, preferred to think him mad.

In 1814, he died. His books were banned, his memory desecrated, his deeds denied. But his name lived on; lives on, an eternal symbol, of innate evil. . . .

SUCH was de Sade, as Christopher Maitland knew him. And as a collector of curiosa. the thought of possessing the veritable skull of the fabulous Marquis intrigued him.

He. glanced up from revery; glanced at the unsmiling skull and the grinning Marco. “A thousand pounds, you said?”

“Exactly,” Marco nodded. A most reasonable price, under the circumstances.”

“Under what circumstances?” Maitland objected. “You bring me a skull. But what proofs can you furnish me as to its authenticity? How did you come by this rather unusual memento mori?”

“Come, come Mr. Maitland—please! You know me better than to question my source of supply. That is what I choose to call a trade secret, eh?”

“Very well. But I can’t just take your word, Marco. To the best of my recollection, de Sade was buried when he died at Gharenton, in 1814.”

Marco’s oozing grin expanded.

“Well, I can set you right about that point,” he conceded. “Do you happen to have a copy of Ellis’s Studies about? In the section entitled Love and Pain there is an item which may interest you.”

Maitland secured the volume and Marco riffled through the pages.

“Here!” he exclaimed triumphantly. “According to Ellis, die skull of the Marquis de Sade was exhumed and examined a phrenologist. Phrenology was a popular pseudo-science in those days, eh? Chap wanted to see if die cranial formation indicated the Marquis was truly insane.

“It says he found the skull to be small and well formed, like a woman’s. Exactly your remark, as you may recall!

“But the real point is this. The skull wasn’t re-interred.

“It fell into the hands of a Dr. Londe. but around 1850 it was stolen by another physician, who took it to England. That is all Ellis knows of the matter. The rest I could tell—but it’s better not to speak. Here is the skull of. the Marquis de Sade, Mr. Maitland.

“Will you meet my offer?”

“A thousand pounds,” Maitland sighed. “It’s too much for a shoddy skull and a flimsy story.”

“Well—let us say eight hundred, perhaps. A quick deal and no hard feelings?”

Maitland stared at Marco. Marco stared at Maitland. The skull stared at them both.

“Five hundred, then,” Marco ventured. “Right now.”

“You must be faking,” Maitland, said; “Otherwise you wouldn’t be so anxious for a sale.”

Marco’s smile oozed off again. “On the contrary, sir. If I were trying to do you, I certainly wouldn’t budge on my price. But I want to dispose of this skull quickly.”

“Why?”

FOR the first time during the interview, fat little Marco hesitated; He twisted the skull between his hands and set it down, on the table. If seemed to Maitland as if he avoided looking at it as he answered.

“I don’t exactly know. It’s just that I don’t fancy owning such an item, really. Works on my imagination. Rot, isn’t it?”

“Works on your imagination?”

“I get ideas that I’m being followed. Of course it’s all nonsense, but—”

“You get ideas that you’re followed by the police, no doubt,” Maitland accused: “Because you stole the skull. Didn’t you, Marco?”

Marco averted his gaze. “No,” he mumbled. It isn’t that. But I don’t like skulls—not my Idea of ornaments, I assure you. Squeamish I am, a bit. “Besides, you live in this big house here. You’re safe. I live in Wapping, now. Down on my luck at the moment and all that. I sell you the skull. You tuck it away here in your collection, look at it when you please—and the rest of the time it’s out of sight, not bothering you. I’ll be free of it knocking around in my humble diggings. Matter of fact, when I sell it, I’ll vacate the premises and move to decent lodgings. That’s why I want to be rid of of, really. For five hundred, cash in hand.”

Maitland hesitated. “I must think it over,” he, declared. “Give me your address. Should I decide to purchase it, I’ll be down tomorrow with the money. Fair enough?”

“Very well.” Marco sighed. He produced a greasy stub of pencil and tore a hit of paper from the discarded wrappings on the floor.

“Here’s the address,” he said.

Maitland pocketed the slip as Marco commenced to enclose the skull in tinfoil once more. He worked quickly, as though eager to obscure the shining teeth and the yawning emptiness of the eye-sockets. He twisted the butcher’s paper over the tinfoil, grasped his overcoat in one hand, and balanced the round bundle in the other.

“I’ll be expecting you tomorrow,” he said. “And by the way—be careful when you open the door. I’ve a police dog now; a savage brute. He’ll tear you to pieces—or anyone else who tries to take the skull of the Marquis de Sade.”

III

IT SEEMED to Maitland that they had bound him too tightly. He knew that the masked men were about to whip him, but he could not understand why they, had fastened his wrists with chains of steel.

Only when they held the metal scourges over the fire did he comprehend the reason—only when they raised the white-hot rods high above their heads did he realize why he was held so securely.

For at the fiery kiss of the lash, Maitland did not flinch—lie convulsed. His body, seared by the hideous blow, described an arc. Bound by thongs, his hands would tear themselves free under the stimulus of the unbearable torment. But the steel chains held, and Maitland gritted his teeth as the two black-robed men flogged him with living fire.

The outlines of the dungeon blurred, and Maitland’s pain blurred, too. He sank down into a darkness broken only by the consciousness of rhythm—the rhythm of the savage, sizzling steel flails that descended upon his naked back.

When awareness returned, Maitland knew that the flogging was over. The silent, black-robed men in masks were bending over him, unfastening the shackles. They lifted him tenderly, and led him gently across the dungeon floor to the great steel casket.

Casket? This was no casket. Caskets do not stand open and up-ended. Caskets do not bear upon their lids the raised, moulded features of a woman’s face.

Caskets are not spiked, inside.

Recognition was simultaneous with horror.

This was the Iron Maiden!

The masked men were strong. „ They dragged him forward, thrust him into the depths of the great metal matrix of torment. They fastened wrists and ankles with clamps. Maitland knew what was coming.

They would close the lid upon him. Then, by turning a crank, they would move the lid down . . . move it down as spikes drove in at his body. For the interior of the Iron Maiden was studded, with cruel barbs, sharpened and lengthened with the cunning-of the damned.

The longest spikes would pierce him first as the lid descended. These spikes were set so as to enter his wrists and ankles. He would hang there crucified as the lid continued its inexorable descent. Shorter spikes would next enter his thighs, shoulders, and arms. Then, as he struggled, impaled in agony, the lid would press closer until the smallest-spikes came dose enough to penetrate his eyes, his throat, and—mercifully—his heart and brain.

Maitland screamed, but the sound served only to shatter his ear-drums as they closed the lid. The rusty metal grated, and then came the harsher grating of the machinery.

They were turning the crank, bringing the banks of spikes closer to his cringing body. . . .

Maitland waited, tensed in darkness, for the first sharp kiss of the Iron Maiden.

Then, and then only, he realized that he was not alone here in the blackness.

There were no spikes set in the lid! Instead a figure was pressed against the opposite iron surface. As the lid descended, it merely brought the figure closer to Maitland’s body.

The figure did not move, or even breathe. It rested against the lid, and as the lid came forward, Maitland felt the pressure of cold and alien flesh against his own. The arms and legs met his in unresponsive embrace, but still the lid pressed down, squeezing the lifeless form closer and closer. It was dark, but now Maitland could see the face that loomed scarcely an inch from his eyes. The face was white phosphorescent. The face was—not a face!

And then, as the body gripped his body in blackness, as the head touched his head, as Maitland's lips pressed against the place where lips should be; he knew the ultimate horror.

The face that was not a face was the skull of the Marquis de Sade!

And the weight of charnel corruption stifled Maitland, and he went down into darkness again with the obscene memory pursuing him to oblivion.

Even oblivion has an end, and once more Maitland woke. The masked men had released and were reviving him. He lay on a pallet, and glanced toward the open doors of the Iron Maiden. He was oddly grateful to see that the interior was empty. No figure rested against the inside of the lid. Perhaps there had been no figure.

The torture played strange tricks on a man's mind. But it was needed, now. He could tell that the solicitude of the masked ones was not assumed. They had subjected him to this ordeal for strange reasons, and he had come through unscathed.

They anointed his back, lifted him to his feet, led him from the dungeon. In the great corridor beyond, Maitland saw a mirror. They guided him up to it.

Had the torture changed him? For a moment, Maitland feared to gaze into the glass.

But they held him before the mirror, and Maitland stared at his reflection stared at his quivering body, on which was set the grim, unsmiling death's head of the Marquis de Sade!

IV

MAITLAND told no one of his dream, but he lost no time in discussing Marco's visit and offer.

His confidante was an old friend and fellow-collector, Sir Fitzhugh Kissroy. Seated in Sir Fitzhugh's comfortable study the following afternoon, he quickly unburdened himself of all pertinent details.

Genial, red-bearded Kissroy "heard him out in silence.

"Naturally, I want that skull," Maitland concluded. "But I can't understand why Marco is so anxious to dispose of it at once. And I'm considerably worried about its authenticity. So I was wondering—you're quite an expert, Fitzhugh. Would you be willing to visit Marco with me and examine the skull?"

Sir Fitzhugh chuckled and shook his head.

"There's ho need to examine it," he declared. "I'm quite sure the skull, as you describe it, is that of the Marquis de Sade. It's genuine enough."

Maitland gaped at him.

"How can you be so positive?" he asked. Sir Fitzhugh beamed. "Because, my dear fellow—that skull was stolen from me!"

"What?"

"Quite so. About ten days ago, a prowler got into the library through the French windows facing the garden. None of the several ants were aroused, and he made off with the skull in the night."

Maitland rose. "Incredible," he murmured. "But of course you'll come with me, now. We'll identify your property, confront old Marco with the facts, and recover the skull at once."

"Nothing of the sort," Sir Fitzhugh replied. "I'm just as glad the skull was stolen. And I advise you to leave it alone.

"I didn't report the theft to the police, and I have no intention of doing so. Because that skull is—unlucky."

"Unlucky?" Maitland peered at his host. "You, with your collection of cursed Egyptian mummies, tell me that? You've never taken any stock in such superstitious rubbish?"

"Exactly. Therefore, when I tell you that I sincerely believe that skull is dangerous, you must have faith in my words."

Maitland pondered. He wondered if Sir Fitzhugh had experienced the same dreams that tormented his own sleep upon seeing the skull. Was there an associative aura about the relic? If so, it only added to the peculiar fascination exerted by the unsmiling skull of the Marquis de Sade.

"I don't understand you at all," he declared. "I should think you couldn't wait to lay hands on that skull."

"Perhaps I'm not the only one who can't wait," Sir Fitzhugh muttered.

"What are you getting at?"

"You know de Sade's history. You know the power of morbid fascination such evil geniuses exert upon the imagination of men. You feel that fascination yourself; that's why you want the skull.

"But you're a normal mail, Maitland. You want to buy the skull and keep it in your collection of curiosa. An abnormal man might not think of buying. He might think of stealing it—or even killing the owner to possess it. Particularly if he wanted to do more than merely own it; if, for example, he wanted to worship it."

Sir Fitzhugh's voice sank to a whisper as he continued, "I'm not trying to frighten you, my friend. But I know the history of that skull. During the last hundred years it has passed through the hands of many men. Some of them were collectors, and sane. Others were perverted members of secret cults; worshipers of pain, devotees of Black Magic. Men have died to gain that grisly relic, and other men have been—sacrificed to it.

"It came to me quite by chance, six months ago. A man like your friend Marco offered it to me. Not for a thousand pounds, or five hundred. He gave it to me as a gift, because he was afraid of it.

"Of course I laughed at his notions, just as you are probably laughing at mine, now. But during the six months that the skull has remained in my hands, I've suffered.

I've had queer dreams. Just staring at the unnatural, unsmiling grimace is enough to provoke nightmares. Didn't you sense an emanation from the thing? They said de Sade wasn't mad—and I believe them. He was far worse; he was possessed. There's something unhuman about that skull.

Something that attracts Others, living men whose skulls hide a bestial quality that is also unhuman or inhuman.

"And I've had more than my dreams to deal with. Phone calls came, and mysterious letters. Some of the servants have reported lurkers on the grounds at dusk."

"Probably ordinary thieves, like Marco, after a valuable object," Maitland commented.

"No," Sir Fitzhugh sighed. "Those unknown seekers did more than attempt to steal the skull. They came into my house at night and adored it!

"Oh, I'm quite positive about the matter, I assure you! I kept the skull in a glass case in the library. Often, when I came to see it in the mornings, I found that it had been moved during the night.

"Yes, moved. Sometimes the case was smashed and the skull placed on the table. Once it was on the floor.

"Of course I checked up on the servants. Their alibis were perfect. It was the work of outsiders; outsiders who probably feared to possess the skull completely, yet needed access to it from time to time in order to practise some abominable and perverted rite.

"They came into my house, I tell you, and worshiped that filthy skull! And when it was stolen, I was glad—very glad.

"All I can say to you is, keep away from tire whole business! Don't see this man Marco and don't have anything to do with that accursed graveyard relic!"

Maitland nodded. "Very well," he said. "I am grateful to you for your warning."

He left Sir Fitzhugh shortly thereafter.

Half an hour later, he was climbing the stairs to Marco's dingy attic room.

V

HE CLIMBED the stairs to Marco's room; climbed the creaking steps in the shabby Soho tenement and listened to the curiously muffled thumping of his own heartbeat.

But not for long. A sudden howl resounded from the landing above, and Maitland scrambled up the last few stairs in frantic haste.

The door of Marco's room was locked, but the sounds that issued from within stirred Maitland to desperate measures.

Sir Fitzhugh's warnings had prompted him to carry his service revolver on this errand; now he drew it and shattered the lock with a shot.

Maitland flung the door back against the wall as the howling reached the ultimate frenzied crescendo. He started into the room, then checked himself.

Something hurtled toward him from the floor beyond; something launched itself at his throat.

Maitland raised his revolver blindly and fired.

For a moment sound and vision blurred. When he recovered, he was half-knee ling on the floor before the threshold. A great shaggy form rested at his feet. Maitland recognized the carcass of a gigantic police dog.

Suddenly he remembered Marco's reference to the beast. So that explained it! The dog had howled and attacked. But—why?

Maitland rose and entered the sordid bedroom. Smoke still curled upward from the shots. He gazed again at the prone animal, noting the gleaming yellow fangs grimacing even in death. Then he stared around at the shoddy furniture, the disordered bureau, the rumpled bed—

The rumpled bed on which Mr. Marco lay, his throat torn in a red rosary of death.

Maitland stared at the body of the little fat man and shuddered.

Then he saw the skulk It rested on the pillow near Marco's head: a grisly bedfellow that seemed to peer curiously at the corpse in ghastly camaradie. Blood had spattered the hollow cheekbones, but even beneath this sanguinary stain, Maitland could see the peculiar solemnity of the death's head.

For the first time, he fully sensed the aura of evil which clung to the skull of de Sade. It was palpable in this ravaged room; palpable as the presence of death itself. The skull seemed to glow with actual charnel phosphorescence.

Maitland knew now that his friend had spoken the truth. There was a dreadful magnetism inherent in this bony horror . . .

a veritable Elixir of Death that worked and preyed upon the minds of men—and beasts.

It must have been that way. The dog, maddened by the urge to kill, had finally attacked Marco as he slept, and destroyed him. Then it had sought to attack Maitland when he entered. And through it all, the skull had watched; watched and gloated just as de Sade would gloat had his pale blue eyes flickered in the shadowed sockets.

Somewhere within the cranium, perhaps, the shriveled remnants of his cruel brain were still attuned to terror. The magnetic force it focussed had a compelling enchantment even in the face of what Maitland knew.

That is why Maitland, driven by a compulsion he could not wholly explain or seek to justify, stooped down and lifted the skull. He held it for a long moment in the classic pose of Hamlet.

Then he left the room, forever carrying the death's head in his arms.

FEAR rode Maitland's shoulders as he hurried through the twilit streets. Fear whispered strangely in his ear, warning him to hurry lest the body of Marco be discovered and the police pursue him. Fear prompted him to enter his own house by a side door and go directly to his rooms so that none would see the skull he concealed beneath his coat.

Fear was Maitland's companion all that evening. He sat there, staring at the skull on the table, and shivered with repulsion.

Sir Fitzhugh was right, he knew it. There. was a damnable influence issuing from the skull and the black brain within. It had caused Maitland to disregard the sensible warnings of his friend—it had caused Maitland to.

steal the skull itself from a dead man—it had caused him now to conceal himself in this lonely room.

He should call the authorities; he. knew that. Better still, he should dispose of the skull. Give it away, throw it away, rid the earth of it forever. There was something puzzling about the cursed thing—something he didn't quite understand.

For, knowing these truths he still desired to possess the skull of the Marquis de Sade. There was an evil enchantment here; the dormant baseness in every man's soul was. aroused and responded to the loathly lust, which poured from the death's head in waves.

He stared at the skull, shivered—yet knew he would not give it up; could not. Nor had he the strength to destroy it. Per-; haps possession would lead him to madness in the end, The skull would incite others to unspeakable excesses.

Maitland pondered and brooded; seeking a solution in the impassive object that confronted him with the stolidity of death.

It grew later. Maitland drank wine, and paced the floor. He was weary. Perhaps in the morning he could think matters through and reach a logical, a. sane conclusion.

Yes, he was upset. Sir Fitzhugh's outlandish hints had disturbed him; the gruesome events of the late afternoon preyed on his nerves.

No sense in giving way to foolish fancies about the skull of the mad Marquis . . . better to rest.

Maitland flung himself on the bed. He reached out for the switch and extinguished the light. The moon's rays slithered through the window and sought out the skull on the table, bathing it in eery luminance. Maitland stared once more at the jaws that should grin and did not.

Then he closed his eyes and willed himself to sleep. In the morning he'd call Sir Fitzhugh, make a clean breast of things, and give the skull over to the authorities.

Its evil career—real or imaginary—would come to an end. So be it.

Maitland sank into slumber. Before he dozed off he tried to focus his attention on something . . . something puzzling . . . an impression he'd received upon gazing at the body of the police dog in Marco's room. The way its fangs gleamed.

Yes. That was it. There had been no blood on the muzzle of the police dog. Strange, For the police dog had bitten Marco's throat. No blood—how could that be?

Weil, that problem was best left for morning, too. . . .

It seemed to Maitland that as he slept, he dreamed. In his dream he opened his eyes and blinked in the bright moonlight. He stared at the table top and saw that the skull was no longer resting on its surface.

That was curious, too. No one had come into the room, or he would have been aroused.

IF HE had not been sure that he was dreaming, Maitland would have started up in terror when he saw the stream of moonlight on the floor—the stream "of moonlight through which the skull was rolling.

It turned over and over again, its bony visage impassive as ever, and each revolution brought it closer to the bed.

Maitland's sleeping ears could almost hear the thump as the skull landed on the bare floor at the foot of the bed. Then began the grotesque progress so typical of. night fantasies. The skull climbed the side of the bed!

Its teeth gripped the dangling corner of a bedsheet, and the death's head literally whirled the sheet out and up, swinging it in an arc which landed the skull on the bed at Maitland's feet.

The illusion was so vivid he could feel the thud of its impact against the mattress.

Tactile sensation continued, and Maitland felt the skull rolling along up the covers. It came up to his waist, then approached his chest.

Maitland saw the bony features in tine moonlight, scarcely six inches away from his neck. He felt a cold weight resting on his throat. The skull was moving now.

Then he realized the grip of utter nightmare, and struggled to awake before the dream continued.

A scream rose in his throat—but never issued from it. For Maitland’s throat was seized by champing teeth: teeth that bit into his neck with all the power of a moving human jawbone.

The skull tore at Maitland’s jugular in cruel haste. There was a gasp, a gurgle, and then no sound at ail.

After a time, the skull righted itself on Maitland’s chest.

Maitland’s chest no longer heaved with breathing, and the skull rested there with a curious simulation of satisfied repose.

The moonlight shone on the death’s head to reveal one very curious circumstance. It was a trivial thing, yet somehow fitting under the circumstances.

Reposing on the chest of the man it had killed, the skull of the Marquis de Sade was no longer impassive. Instead, its bony features bore a definite, unmistakably sadistic grin.

Soul Proprletor

If somebody wants to sell his soul why shouldn't he advertise? That's sound business!

> "FOR SALE—One human soul, in reasonable condition, to highest bidder. Owner must dispose of same at once. What am I offered?—BOX 418."

PETE RYAN read the damp proof-sheet of the advertisement and whistled.

"You aren't going to run this ad in our Personal column are you?" he objected.

"Why not?" Editor Lesser raised his head and met Pete Ryan's scowl with a grin.

"But it's screwy," Ryan protested. "I mean, the whole thing's obviously some kind of fake."

"The $4.60 paying for this ad is genuine currency," replied Lesser. "And we must give value received. We have no editorial control over the advertisers in our paper. Ethically, we can't refuse to take an ad, either, unless the message is obscene or offensive."

"Don't you think this ridiculous hoax is offensive?" stormed Pete Ryan. "It's a case for the Better Business Bureau, that's what it is!"

The older man pushed back his chair and shook his head as he confronted Ryan's scowling gaze. Lesser tried hard to suppress a strangely youthful twinkle in ms eyes. Clearing his throat, he ventured a reply.

“I hardly think so,” he mused, putting his finger-tips together and staring down at the desk.

“If somebody wants to sell his soul, why shouldn’t he advertise? That’s sound business, you know. It pays to advertise.”

“But how can anyone sell their soul?” complained Ryan.

“I don’t know,” Lesser admitted. “But if he can produce the merchandise when he gets paid for it, there’s no hoax involved. Certainly the Better Business Bureau hasn’t got an investigator in occultism—”

Lesser halted. A twinkle came into his eyes.

“That’s it!” he chuckled. “An investigator in occultism!”

“Meaning what?”

“Meaning you, my boy!”

“Me?”

“Exactly.” The older man bundled elbows over the desk and talked rapidly. “What do you think those dogs on the city desk will do when they see this item in the bladder? They’ll send out a leg man to cover the yarn. Find out who inserted the ad and try to build up a godawful human interest story.

“Well, we’ll just beat them to the pundi. We’ll go out and interview this advertising client. We’ll get there first and sew the story up. We’ll build a little feature to promote the sale of want ads. We’ll get the jump on all of them. We’ll—”

” We?” interrupted Pete Ryan, skeptically. “Uh—not exactly. You will cover this story.”

“You know what you can do with—” The twinkle disappeared, and Editor Lesser’s eyes narrowed. “That’s an assignment, Ryan,” he snapped.

Young Pete Ryan had been with the Want Ad Department long enough to know when to keep his mouth shut This was definitely one of these times.

“That’s settled, then,” his boss went on. “Early edition will hit the street. Better get started tomorrow morning. Meanwhile I’ll warn the city desk to lay off—it’s our baby for promotion angles.”

He burrowed among the papers on his desk.

"Here's the address," he said, holding out a crumpled slip of stationery.

"Be on the spot tomorrow morning—bright, early, and sober. Inquire for the party who inserted this ad. Ask if there have been any answers."

"But suppose they won't tell me anything?" asked Ryan.

"Listen to what wants to be a reporter!" sneered Editor Lesser. "You talk like that and you'll be selling want ads all your life."

HE BIT his lip for a moment. "Here's your angle," he suggested. "Tell the party you're with our sales force, and it's part of the service to see if the ad pulls any results. Keep talking. Get all the story you can.

"Ten to one, it's just some crackpot. But there's a chance we might really dig up a great yarn."

Pete Ryan frowned. "You should talk about crackpots," he grumbled. "Of all the screwball ideas, this takes the cake. Souls for sale!"

"Don't be childish," said Editor Lesser. "Be broadminded, like I am. Why I'd sell my own soul, if I could get a fair offer!" Pete Ryan faced his boss, grinning. "If you ever insert an ad offering your soul for sale," he declared, "you could be sued for fraud!"

The door closed behind him, just in time to deflect the inkwell that Editor Lesser hurled at his departing head.

II

PETE RYAN walked up the steps to the door of the big brownstone house. The morning sun beamed, but not Ryan.

"A fine assignment," he muttered. "Oh well, here goes."

His index finger pressed the buzzer. Footsteps pattered along the hall beyond, and he braced himself.

"Bet two bits it's Dracula," he murmured. "Nope, I'm wrong. It's a zombie."

That was hardly an accurate description of the pert, smiling colored maid who opened the door.

"Yes, sir?"

"Pardon me, but I'm looking for the party who inserted an advertisement in yesterday's paper."

"Step in, please."

Ryan stepped along a mahogany-panelled hallway. The maid led him toward a parlor down the hall.

He went in, trying a repress a stare of admiration as he gazed at the handsome interior. The furniture was dated, but it consisted of opulent period pieces that hinted of luxury and good taste. Deep carpeting almost clung to his ankles as he set his feet down firmly and sank into an overstuffed chair.

"No screwball put that ad in," he mused. "Anyone rich enough to afford this stuff deserves to be called eccentric, anyway." The maid left the room, and Ryan waited. He was getting strangely nervous. There was something definitely suspicious about all this. . . .

There was a moment of silence. Ryan strained his ears for the sound of approaching footsteps. Right now he didn't know what to expect. A decadent old millionaire, hoping to play Faust . . . a cynical amateur diabolist . . . a foreign nobleman . . . a degenerate younger son out of Huysmans. . . .

Footsteps.

Ryan braced himself.

A figure appeared in the doorway, and Ryan almost whistled.

The girl was gorgeous. Sheer brunette perfection. Ryan's eyes admiringly catalogued her charms—shimmering black hair, coiled at the nape of a shapely, creamy neck—blue eyes, piquantly slanted—full, sensitive, scarlet lips—a body moulded from the stuff which dreams are made. She was a dream come true.

Young Ryan had had little experience with dreams. Not knowing what to say, he blurted out the thought foremost in his mind.

"You're not the person who inserted that ad about the soul, are you?" he gasped.

"Yes. What do you offer for it?" replied the girl, calmly.

Ryan flushed. "Well—you see—that is, I'm not a prospective purchaser," he stammered.

"Then what is the meaning of this visit?" persisted the girl. The smile had vanished from her face. "Who are you, and how did you find my address? I listed a box number in the ad."

ONCE again Ryan, unprepared for duplicity, replied with the truth. He gave his name and occupation and ran through the little prepared speech about dropping around to see if the ad had "pulled" results. But by the time he had finished, the girl was smiling once more.

"I'm sorry," she said. "I misunderstood you." Her lips shaped a sigh. "But I was hoping you were a genuine customer."

"Then you haven't had any results?" Pete Ryan attempted to assume a professional attitude and interest.

"Well, I've just come from the letter box now," said the girl. "I found letters of protest from two religious organizations, one utterly insane scribble from a fanatic, a note from a would-be wolf, an anonymous threat, and a bottle of Pluto Water from a practical joker."

Ryan grinned. "But honestly now, isn't this whole thing some sort of practical joke on your part?"

"Not at all, Mr. Ryan." The brunette beauty faced him squarely. "I'm deadly serious about this matter."

"But why, Miss—er—"

"Cabot. Lucille Cabot," she answered. She sat down on the sofa and crossed her shapely legs as she lit a cigarette. "Is your interest in my affairs personal or professional?" she asked.

YAN shrugged and smiled. "Both, I'm afraid," he answered, softly.

R“Well, then. The story’s simple, really. Father had a lot of money. Mother died when I was still a baby, and I’ve spent most of my time in private schools. When I graduated two years ago I came back here to live with Father. Then he passed away. The lawyers went over his estate and found out he’d made bad investments. I was left with the house, a load of debts, and some bad securities.”

“But that doesn’t explain anything!” Ryan protested. “After all, selling one’s soul for the sake of a few debts—if you can sell such a thing as a soul—it’s utterly fantastic!”

“Really? Then I’m afraid there’s nothing further to discuss. Good day, Mr. Ryan.” Her tones were icy.

“Now wait a minute! Don’t take it that way,” Ryan soothed. “I’m anxious to listen. It’s only that all this strikes me as a little strange.”

“There’s nothing strange about it,” said Lucille Cabot. “What can a girl in my position do? I have two choices. I can take a sordid job, for which I am not suited. Not a very pleasant choice, that one. Or I can do my best to find a wealthy husband. And that’s all.”

“What’s wrong with that?” demanded Ryan. “Millions of women face those choices every day. Some of them take their sordid jobs and mould splendid careers out of them. Others marry, and not necessarily for money, either. Strikes me as a pretty good solution. With your schooling and beauty you’re better off than most. Why not settle down, make up your mind to—”

“Are you quite done?” Lucille Cabot rose. Her slanted blue eyes flashed fire. Yet her voice was gentle, almost maternal.

“You stupid, petty fool,” she sighed. Her tender tones lent incongruity to her words. “Look at me,” she said, coming close. Ryan didn’t miss the opportunity.

“No, don’t stand there goggling like a sick calf,” breathed the girl. “Look into my eyes. Look into my eyes and tell me if you think I was meant to be a clerk, or a stupid housewife.”

Ryan stared into cerulean depths. There was something about this girl, something vital and intense, that swept aside all doubts.

She was sincere.

"I was destined for greater things," die whispered. "Haven't you ever dreamed of power—riches—reaching the heights?"

Ryan nodded dumbly. There was a tightness in his throat.

"Haven't you ever wanted to reach out and shake down the stars?" Her voice was low, vibrant. "Aren't there ambitions, hidden desires, which if realized are worth the price of the human soul?"

She stood close to him, very close. He could feel her aura, the pulsation of power emanating from her lovely presence.

"In olden times, men conjured up demons and received boons," she said. "I am not a sorceress. I cannot cast spells. I cannot call up the Devil. But perhaps there exists, somewhere, somehow, a man who can. A man with which to bargain. For I swear to you, to gain what I desire, I'd deal with the Devil himself."

"But—" said Mr. Ryan.

The buzzing doorbell cut through his objection. The maid appeared in the hallway.

"Gentleman to see you, Miss Lucille," she said softly.

"Show him in," commanded the girl.

It was as simple as that.

Into the room walked his Satanic Majesty—the Devil.

III

"YOU have a soul to sell?" asked the devil, politely.

"I have."

"I would like to purchase it," he purred.

"What am I offered?"

"What do you desire?"

He came close to Lucille Cabot, but the girl did not flinch. For a long minute he stared directly into her oblique eyes.

“You shall have all that and more,” he smiled.

Then Lucille broke. Her composure drained away as she shuddered and drew back from die tall man in black—the man with the two horned forelocks of raven hair, the pointed mustachio and waxed goatee—the man with the sabre eyebrows, the deep-set, burning red eyes and cleft chin of the Devil.

“Wh-who are you?” she quavered.

“Who do I look like?”

“The Devil himself—but you can’t be!”

“Why can’t I?”

“There’s no such person as die Devil.” He smiled. “If I adopted such a skeptical attitude, I might reply that there is no such thing as a human soul.”

Ryan interrupted. “Let’s get down to cases,” he snapped.

The black eyes turned and fixed upon the young man’s face. “Who are you?” Lucille opened her mouth to intervene, but Ryan stepped forward. “I’m with the sales department of the Daily Press,” he offered. “I’m representing Miss Cabot in this matter.”

The girl turned away, eyes twinkling at his impudence. But she did not stop him.

“Now,” said Ryan, “what I want to know is—just who are you and what are your credentials for making an offer to purchase a soul?”

“All right, wise guy,” said the stranger. “I’ll give. My name’s Sam Bolman, but I travel under the stage name of the Mighty Mephisto.”

“You’re that stage magician?” asked Pete Ryan.

“Yeah, that’s right. Now here’s the angle. I’m opening a new vaude unit for a tour, see? I see this ad in the paper and I say to myself, here’s a hot idea for a publicity tie-up. I’ll look up this bozo and hire him as an assistant or something. Now that I find out the party who put in the ad is a pretty dame, it’s all the better, get me? We can work up a nifty of a stunt. Miss Cabot we’ll announce that you sold your soul to me, understand? Then we go out on tour. I’m willing to pay—”

“Sorry. We’re not interested,” said Ryan, curtly.

“Hey, wait a minute, fella!”

“You mean you actually want to sell a soul to Satan?” breathed the Mighty Mephisto.

“Or to anyone else who will pay the price,” said Ryan. “Now, if you happen to know Of any way to evoke a demon—”

“I’m getting out of here,” announced the magician. “You’re stark, raving screwy, that’s what you are!”

As the outer door banged Shut behind him, Lucille Cabot sighed. Her big eyes clouded as she faced Ryan once more.

“It’s hopeless, I’m afraid. They’re all alike. Either they’re crazy or they think I am. This was my last foolish effort, but I can see it’s no use. Now what will I do?” Pete Ryan grinned. “I’ve decided that quite a while ago,” he announced. “I guess you’ll just have to marry me!”

IV

THE funny part of it was that she did. It took two weeks—two frantic, fantastic weeks of courtship.

Lucille had ordered him from the house at once, naturally. He called that night, the next day, and the next. He wrote letters, sent flowers, telegrams, and inserted ads in the Personals column of the paper. He wined, dined, and wooed her. He did all the usual foolish things.

There were no further repercussions on her advertisement. And before the week was up, the incident of their meeting was almost forgotten; at least by Pete Ryan.

He talked to her very candidly, very sincerely, very earnestly. He told her of his own ambitions to reach the top, but insisted that one must move sanely, serenely. He informed Lucille that she was a little off balance, a little introverted. When Ryan learned of her love for bizarre jewelry, outlandish dress, fantastic music, and odd books, he took her to task.

“We’ll get out and live,” he promised her. “What you need is a little laughter, a little gayety. You’ve been alone too much. You brood, get morbid too easily. It isn’t right that a beautiful girl like you should have such weird notions.”

No YMCA lecturer could have done a better job. Ryan felt as if he had “converted” her when she consented to dine and dance that second week.

The marriage itself was a little more difficult to bring off, but he managed it. One night after they returned to her home, they sat in her father’s old library and talked before the dying fire. She snuggled into his arms.

“All right,” she sighed. “Right away, then, if you want me.”

The usual embrace punctuated the discussion for a while.

“But it must be a civil ceremony,” she insisted. “No fuss or bother.”

“Anything you say,” he agreed. “Just so it’s quick. I’ll get the license tomorrow. We can be married Saturday. I’ll take two weeks off and we’ll go south for the honeymoon.”

He rose, radiant of eye, and paced the floor in growing enthusiasm and excitement.

Abruptly he halted before bookshelves.

“What’s all this?” he demanded.

“Why, just some of father’s old books.”

Ryan stared at the brown and black-backed tomes. Thick, ponderous volumes. Iron-hasped books with yellowed, crumbling pages. Thick, illuminated Gothic texts. Titles in Greek and Latin.

“Demonalatra,” he read. “Ye Complete Grimoires.”

He stared at her. “I thought you said you didn’t have any of these books?” he said. “This stuff deals with sorcery, doesn’t it? Black magic?”

“Oh, darling, those books are no good. Father made a hobby of collecting such items. But it’s all nonsense. I admit that’s where I got the idea for inserting the ad, though.”

He grasped her slim shoulders with ruthless fingers. He stared deeply into her slanted blue eyes.

“Promise me one thing,” he whispered. “I don’t know much about all this. I’m not asking you to tell me. But you must promise me this much—never try to sell your soul to the Devil or anyone or thing else.”

“I promise.”

She offered the red seal of her lips. And Ryan knew she told the truth, and was content. And so they were married and—

SATURDAY night was hectic. The afternoon wedding was followed by a dinner. Editor Lesser had insisted on that, and Lucille bore it with good grace. After all, at ten they would be departing on the train for New Orleans. She knew how much it meant to Ryan to display her before his boss and his friends. She sparkled at dinner.

At eight-thirty they broke away.

“We must dash for the house,” she said. “I’ve got to Change and finish packing.”

They dashed.

It was a rather wavering dash on Pete Ryan’s part. There had been champagne at dinner, and Scotch and soda had played a part in the celebration.

Lucille, he noticed, was a little “high” herself. But her radiance was of the spirit rather than “spirits.”

They clung to each other in the hall as they entered the house.

“Now I must get busy,” Lucille told him.

“Wait—let’s have a drink first,” Ryan suggested.

“No, darling. There isn’t time. I’ll pack. If I’m done promptly we’ll have one together before we leave.”

He pouted a bit. She kissed the pout. “Why don’t you sit down here?” she suggested. “Pour yourself some Scotch. I’ll be down in a jiffy.”

Ryan sat down and poured. Then he poured again. The stuff was potent. Potent enough to make him whimsical.

"I'll sneak up and surprise her," he decided.

He tiptoed up the stairs. The light burned in her room and he headed down the hall.

"Confound it," he muttered. "I never did believe all those gags about women taking so long to dress. Guess I'm in for it."

Cautiously, he poked his head around the bedroom door.

Lucille Cabot was not dressing.

She stood stark naked in the shadow of a single lamp. Her magnificently moulded body was debased in an attitude of adoration on the floor.

The rug had been carefully rolled back. The. polished surface of the floor held strange markings in green chalk. Triangles, and a pentagram.

There was an acrid odor of incense in the room, commingled with a musty, sour smell of death. It was hot in the wavering shadows.

THE shadows were everywhere. They concealed the furniture, the prosaic outlines of the walls. They played weird tricks with normal vision.

It seemed to Ryan, as he gaped, that he saw nothing but the naked woman, the shining green design, and the shadows. The weaving, growing shadows. The shadows that crept and crouched like black beasts, moving as if in response to the summons from the scarlet lips of the nude girl.

For she was chanting, chanting—chanting into the darkness and the shadows. Chanting a summons.

Ryan opened his mouth to speak, then let it hang.

For as he watched, the summons were answered.

There was a flicker, elusive as heat lightning—just a flicker that filled the room with a momentary glare. And then the shadows on the wall congealed. Congealed into a Presence.

Ryan didn’t see it with his eyes. His mind perceived it, tried to encompass the hideous, distorted outline of that ebony shape that emerged, squatting, and thrust a leering muzzle into the light. The thing was not meant to be seen, save with die eye of dreams.

Yet it squatted there, and the girl raised her eyes and praised it in a shrill voice, calling it by a name that Ryan dared not hear. And it moved closer to her, and Ryan saw its jaws part as it mewed and mewed—

He moved, then. He forced himself into the room. Every step was agony, but he moved. And then he stood before her, trying to keep his physical balance, his mental balance.

“Lucille,” he muttered. “You’re—a——”

He couldn’t say it. But she said it for him, with a smile.

“A sorceress. Yes. And my father practised the mantic arts, and now you know.”

She spoke rapidly, without defiance. There was nothing but candor in her voice, and a curious amusement.

“But your promise,” muttered Ryan, his world reeling. “You made me a promise. A promise that you would never sell your soul.”

“Oh, that.” She stepped close, and the witchery of her presence encompassed him. “But I am keeping that promise,” she whispered, softly.

“Then why—this—?” He dared say no more, dare not indicate the thing that waited with them in that tiny room.

She ignored him and went on swiftly. “Besides, you silly boy, I never had any intention of selling my soul. If you recall the way I worded the ad in the paper, I merely said that I would have a soul for sale. And I have, now.”

Ryan turned. The Presence blocked the doorway, and he saw Lucille nod toward it quickly. As he stood there, powerless to scream or move, the black horror glided swiftly toward him—and then at last, Ryan understood whose soul was for sale.

C.O.D.—Corpse on Delivery

Mae didn't like going away alone, but I couldn't go where she went. For I had a date with a redhead—and she had one with death!

When I came in, the living room was empty. I set the trunk down in the middle of the rug and lay down next to it.

I was too bushed to move. I lit a cigarette and panted on it. My coat was sweated under the arms, so I took it off and used it for a pillow.

After a while I got up and went over to the window. I pulled back the shade and looked across the street to the cigar store. That's where I figured he'd be, if he'd picked me up again.

He was there, all right. Just loitering in the doorway with a waiting-for-a-streetcar look. Well, maybe he thought it was going over. It might have, if I lost my nose. But outside of that, I can smell a shamus a mile off—and cheap dicks like Logan I can smell from here to Hoboken.

I peeked just long enough to make sure he wasn't going to move for a bit. Because while he was playing cigar-store Indian, I had work to do.

I walked back, doused my cigarette, took another look at the trunk on the floor, and headed for the bedroom. Sure enough, Mae was asleep in there. She was lying on her stomach with her kimono all tangled up under her. Quite a dish, all right. But this was no time for sentiment.

I reached down and slapped her in a likely spot. She snorted and opened her eyes.

"Hello, honey. When'd you get in?"

"Little while ago. Figured I'd let you rest. You don't know it, but you got a long stretch ahead of you."

"Huh?"

"Rise and shine, baby. You're pulling out of this dump." She sat up and stared at me, pushing her hair out of her eyes.

"What's cooking, Tony?"

I smiled. "Plenty. It's all lined up. You're taking a little trip, starting tonight. Chicago."

"Alone, you mean?"

I nodded.

She got that sulky look. "What's the big idea? You trying to pull a fast one?"

"Come here, baby," I said.

I pulled her off the bed and over to the window. You could see the cigar store from here, too. Logan was still standing in the doorway, trying to look inconspicuous. His feet stuck out a mile.

I pushed the curtains back and pointed him out to her.

"Copper?"

I shrugged. "Logan. He's been tailing me all over town today. I shook him for a little while, but he must have picked me up again. He. doesn't know enough to put the finger on me yet, but he sure as hell won't like it if he sees us scramming out of town together. That's why you're going alone."

She gave me one of those searching looks. I didn't mind. When it came to reading my mind, Mae needed glasses.

"What about you?" she asked. "How do I know you aren't pulling a fast one?"

I heaved a sigh. "I can't figure this, baby. We hook up together. We plan the slickest heist you ever saw. You case the job for me, but I pull it off alone. Why? Just so they can't pin anything on you if something goes wrong."

She didn't say anything.

"I plant the ice in a safe place until we can turn it into cash," I went on. "Then I run around town brushing dicks off the trail. Now we're being tagged. So what do I do? Before I get the dough, I take all kinds of chances just to figure a way to get you out of town ahead of me, in the clear. And then you ask me if I'm pulling a fast one!"

I sighed, just for emphasis.

"Aw, gee, Tony. You know I trust you."

"You better trust me," I said. ' You're getting on a train tonight. Alone. Logan may tail us, but he'll stick to me. Tomorrow, sometime, I'll manage to shake him. Then I'll get the cash. It's coming through; don't worry about that."

"Honest?"

"Sure." I grinned. "I saw Fat Frisco today. He's made a connection."

"How much?"

"Eighteen."

Her eyes got wide.

"Eighteen grand?"

I nodded. "In cash. Strictly. Three days from now I'm joining you in Chi with the folding. After that we're hitting for the big time. Okay?"

"Okay," she said. But she didn't sound as if she meant it.

I grabbed her by the shoulders.

"Look, Mae. You're dumb. Suppose I don't show up? What then? You know all about the job, don't you? You know just how I stuck up the joint—you ought to, because you used to work there. You got the time, the details, everything. You even know I planted the ice with Fat Frisco. So if I don't show up, you run to the law and sing. Do you think I'd turn a canary like you loose ahead of me if I didn't intend to play it square? Look at your hand, baby—you've got aces."

She grabbed me and kissed me. I could tell that she was sold, all right. We fooled around for a minute and then I pushed her away.

"Better start packing," I said. "The train leaves at eight."

"Packing?" she said. "What'll I pack in?"

“I got it all fixed,” I told her. “Brought you a trunk.”

SHE followed me into the living room and I pulled down the shades. It was getting dark outside and I figured the bright lights from the living room would dazzle Logan’s eyes. When I turned them on, Mae got a load of the baggage.

“Where did you get that crummy outfit?” she complained “It’s second-hand.”

“I know it. I’m sorry, baby. I told you how Logan’s been sniffing my heels all day. I didn’t dare shake him to go into a luggage store, or he’d get panicky. Had to ditch him down along Fourteenth and duck into Fat Frisco’s. He gave me the trunk. It was the best he had.”

She looked at the big green old-fashioned trunk and shook her head.

“After all,” I said. “What does it matter? After you hit Chi and I come out, you’ll get the damnedest set of luggage you ever laid eyes on. Airplane luggage, baby. From now on we travel in style.”

“That’s a good girl. Well, snap into it. I’m going out and have a drink. It’s been a tough day.”

I went into the kitchen and poured a shot. I needed it. After I got it down I figured I needed another, so I took it. Then I began to sweat, so I had a third one.

That did it.

I reached down for a pile of old newspapers. Mae was always after me to throw them out, but I’d kept saving them. I knew they’d come in handy at a time like this.

I put them under my arm and walked back into the living room.

Mae had opened the trunk, but she wasn’t packing yet. She just stood there looking sick.

“Brought you some papers to line the bottom with,” I said. “Keep your clothes clean.”

"Oh, honey, I don't like this. Going away and leaving you all alone with that dick following you."

"Cheer up. It's just for a few days."

I patted her shoulder.

"But it's such a long trip. I don't like long trips, Tony."

I stood behind her and breathed down her neck. It made the little blonde curls jump up and down.

"Well, it's just one long trip you've got to take," I told her. "We all have to take things as they come."

"Did you get my ticket?" she asked.

"Yeah," I said. "I got your ticket. Lucky you reminded me. Here you are, going away on a trip and I almost forgot to give you your ticket. Here it is."

I reached under the bundle of newspapers and gave Mae her ticket.

A hatchet in the back of the neck.

IT WAS funny about those newspapers. They'd helped me all the way through.

Reading a story in one of them about a murderer had given me the idea in the first place.

Carrying them in when I talked to Mae helped to hide the hatchet I used.

And now they kept the blood off the rug.

It took me quite a long time to do what I had to do, in order to fit Mae into that trunk. A couple of times I stopped and went out for a drink. The sweat just poured off me. Even though the hatchet was plenty sharp, I had to work. There were five separate jobs to do before I got her to fit the way I wanted. Sort of like a jigsaw puzzle, except for the thumping.

I hoped Mrs. Callahan downstairs wouldn't notice the noise. But after some of the drunken brawls Mae and I used to throw, she ought to be used to it. Besides, this was the last time I'd be bothering her.

When I was all finished, I used the newspapers again, this time to pack around Mae inside the trunk. I should have used salt, I guess, but it didn't matter. She wasn't going on a very long trip, after all, and the newspapers would keep her in pretty good shape. Damned good shape for the shape she was in.

Just for good luck I went through the bureau drawers and dumped in all of her clothes I could find. I wrapped dresses and blouses around each loose part and then put more newspapers over the top. That made it perfect.

I threw the hatchet in, slammed down the top, and locked the trunk tight.

After that I took one more drink, a double shot this time, and stepped over to the window. Sure enough, Old Faithful was still doing sentry duty.

I looked at my watch. A little after eight now. I had to get moving.

I went into the bedroom and looked around for a clean shirt. There was a pile of stuff in the top drawer—mostly a lot of bills, unopened. Mae's work. I always gave her enough to pay the bills, but she couldn't be bothered.

Well, it didn't matter. Another day or so in this town and after that they could all whistle. Bill collectors, coppers, the whole pack.

I found a white shirt from the laundry, right next to Mae's purse. She wouldn't be needing that anymore. I opened it and looked for loose change.

She had it, all right. A wad of small bills, not exactly big enough to choke a horse but plenty to choke a Shetland pony.

One hundred and eighty-eight bucks, I counted. Plus—a ticket to Palm Beach dated for just two days ago.

That set me back on my heels a little.

No wonder she wasn't paying bills! Holding out a roll and buying a ticket to Palm Beach—it was as plain as the nose on what used to be her face.

Evidently I'd done the right thing just in time. No wonder she wasn't sold on the idea of blowing for Chicago. She had her own plans. Probably meant to squeal on me and get a cut for the return of the ice. Only thing holding her up was she didn't know where I'd planted the stuff.

I may have felt a little sorry for her, particularly while I was doing some of the messier work with the hatchet, but I didn't anymore.

She got what was coming to her, all right. Got it in the neck.

I put the bills and the ticket in my pants pocket and then slipped into the new shirt. I chose a tie, went in the closet and got my sports jacket, turned out the bedroom light and walked back into the living room.

Eight-thirty.

I hoped it wasn't too late. But the Ace Express ad in the phone book said "Night or Day Service," and I hoped they meant it.

I dialed their number.

"Hello? Ace Express? This is Mr. Anthony Carello, four-one-six-three, Hyde Mount Avenue. Apartment twenty-five. Got it?"

The voice on the other end got it.

"I want you to pick up a trunk over here right away. Yes, a trunk. It goes to Mr. Sid Frisco. Frisco, F-r-i-s-c-o, one-eight-one-eight Fourteenth Street. That's right. Frisco's Auction Shop. Collect. He's expecting it before eleven tonight. Yes. What's in it? Oh . .. books. Books. Uh-huh. Tell you what you do. I won't be here when you come. I'll leave it sitting right in the front room. You can get the passkey from my landlady downstairs. Apartment one. Mrs. Callahan. Right? Thank you."

I hung up.

You could bet I wouldn't be here. That was part of the gag. My cue was to scram out now and let Logan follow me. Then he wouldn't be around to see the trunk when it came down.

Eight forty-five. Almost time to go.

I had it all timed down to the split second, almost. You got to do it that way in this business. Nothing can go haywire, or the whole thing falls apart.

This was a perfect setup.

I'd send the body to Fat Frisco in the trunk. He was wise, of course. He'd promised to get rid of it for me in a hurry.

That's why I liked old Frisco—he was so good at getting rid of stuff. Anything from hot ice to cold meat.

I couldn't take a crazy chance and dump the body myself. That's the mistake the guy made I read about in the paper. He sent his trunk off in care of General Delivery or something. And sure enough, it turned up.

But I was sending it to Frisco. He'd quicklime it in the cellar of his auction joint. He'd quicklime anything for a cut of eighteen thousand bucks.

Tomorrow he'd pick up the ice and give me the cash. By tomorrow night, if I ditched Logan, I could hit out of town. Maybe I could use Mae's ticket to Palm Beach. Thoughtful of her to pick it up for me.

By the time Logan found out I was gone for good, there would be no loose ends. The trunk would be gone, Mae would be gone, I would be gone. If Logan investigated, he'd find out that Mae had worked for the jeweler. And since she wasn't around, he'd probably figure she had copped the ice in the first place.

Neat, very neat. Now I'd go out, get Logan to follow me, and then ditch him. I just wanted him at my heels long enough to get the trunk away during his absence.

* * *

Five to nine. Time to go.

I pushed the trunk next to the door where they couldn't miss it. They'd get the passkey from old lady Callahan downstairs.

I could have left my key, but I knew what that meant. The old dame might come up and sniff around. It wouldn't be smart.

It was cold when I hit the street. Logan saw me and drifted along behind as I walked toward the comer, slowly. He wasn't taking any chances of losing me.

I grinned.

The next hour was just good clean fun. I took a taxi, rode on the subway, ducked down an alley. Logan had an interesting time, but I finally got tired. Fun is fun, but there's a limit. Besides, I had a heavy date.

I ditched Logan uptown in a bar I knew. It had a long back corridor leading to the washroom. What Logan didn't know is that a side door led out to the street again.

I took the side door, and ten minutes later I was in the Ace of Clubs, watching Connie in the floor show.

Connie did one of those military numbers, wearing a big fur hat. Shako, they call it. And she certainly knew how to shake.

After her act was over, she headed back to her dressing room. I followed.

I didn’t bother to knock, just walked right in. She turned, and when she saw me she made a big red “O” with her mouth.

“Tony,” she said. “You’ve come back.” She put her hands on my shoulders. “Remember what I said, Tony. Nothing doing until you get rid of that woman.”

“I remember.” I kissed her. “And—I got rid of her. For good.”

“Honest?”

“Cross my heart. From now on, it’s just you and me, kid.”

I walked over to the dressing table and picked up her big fur shako. I reached inside the lining and pulled out a lot of stuff that gleamed and glittered. It was the ice, of course. I’d planted the jewels here for safekeeping a week ago.

“Tony! Where did that come from?”

So I told her. Not about Mae, of course—I just explained that Mae had gone away forever. But I gave her the pitch on the jewels. We’d get the money tomorrow and head for Florida.

Connie clung to me. She got powder all over my lapels, but I didn’t care. “Darling, you’re wonderful,” she whispered.

That was the start of a very big evening.

But the next morning. . . .

THE next morning I came walking up to Fat Frisco’s auc-tion joint, very fast, and almost bumped into a man in the doorway.

It was Logan. He stood there, big as life, pretending to read a paper. His big face was blank and his puffy eyelids only flickered as I brushed past him.

This was bad. He must have been nosing around trying to pick up my trail and found out I visited Fat Frisco recently. So he was hanging around here on the chance I'd show.

Well, his dumb hunch paid dividends.

Now I couldn't head for the back room and see Frisco. Not with Logan tagging me.

I decided to stall. The easiest way was to sit down and make like an auction hound.

It was almost noon, and the joint was crowded with live ones. I never figured the deal that gets them into these places, but they come. There was a bunch of women and a lot of old whiskers in the dump, and I noticed one or two quaint faces in the lot—Frisco's shills, of course, planted to heist the bidding. The auctioneer was up on the platform, spieling. He was a tall skinny wallio with a smooth line. Rico Zucconi—one of Frisco's boys. He had on a morning coat and his hair was plastered down. He looked like a waiter in a clip joint, but he could make with the tongue.

I sat there listening to him raffle off a grandfather's clock—a genuine antique that Frisco probably made over in Jersey—and he raised the ante on bidding to $145.

Easy dough. But then, that's what Fat Frisco liked. Easy dough.

I looked around for him out of the comer of my eye, but couldn't spot him. Instead, I spotted somebody else.

Logan.

The big dick was sitting two rows behind me. He still looked half asleep, but when I gave him the eye, his cigarette flared up and I knew he was breathing hard.

I didn't breathe so easy myself.

I had to see Frisco, get the dough, and catch the night train with Connie. But I didn't have any extra ticket for Logan.

It was a bad spot. I turned my head back to the auction platform and sat half-listening to Rico Zucconi's patter.

Then it was as if somebody had stepped up the volume on me. All at once his voice came booming out.

“And now we come to Lot Four-fifty-six. Lot Four-fifty-six, ladeez an’ gen’mum, consistin’ of one trunk, locked and sealed, contents unknown. To be sold for storage charges ...”

I looked at Lot 456. It was a big secondhand green trunk, all right. Rico Zucconi hadn’t lied about that. But he did lie when he said the contents were unknown.

I knew what was in that trunk.

Mae was!

No, there was no mistake about it. I saw the trunk I’d brought home last night—sitting up there on the platform, waiting to be auctioned off right now!

Zucconi was giving with the heat.

“A sporting proposition,” he said. “Who knows what this trunk contains? Clothing, bonds, jewelry—even cash. There is no key. The lucky owner can break the seal himself. All right, what am I offered for this trunk, contents absolutely unknown—what am I offered for this treasure chest? Who has the feeling that this is his lucky day?”

“Ten dollars!” yelled a voice.

I looked around, gulped. It was my voice that yelled.

Zucconi spotted me, gave me a grin. “Gen’mum bids ten dollars! A ridiculous offer! Think of it, friends, this trunk may be worth a fortune—”

He was telling me!

“Fifteen!”

The bid came from behind me. Two rows behind me. From—Logan.

He wasn’t playing possum anymore. He was sitting up straight, staring right at the trunk.

“Twenty!” I snapped.

“Twenty-five!” Logan again.

Zucconi was a little confused, but happy about the whole thing.

“Twenty-five from the sporting gentleman—a man who knows a good thing when he sees it!”

I could tell Zucconi was excited, because he remembered to pronounce that “t” in “gentleman.” Well, he wasn’t the only one who was excited.

“Thirty!” I yelled.

“Forty.”

“Fifty!”

When I said it, sweat ran into my mouth. I just couldn’t figure it out. I sent the trunk to Frisco. Now he was auctioning it off. What was this—a double-cross?

“Seventy-five,” said the voice behind me. And Zucconi was chanting, “Seventy-five once, seventy-five twice—”

“One hundred!” I said, but my throat choked up, so that it was only a gasp. I put air into my lungs to shout, but before the words came out, Zucconi had done it.

“. . . seventy-five three times, and—sold!”

Logan got up and walked briskly down the aisle.

I couldn’t scream now, either—because there was something new in my throat. My heart.

Logan walked down the aisle to the side of the platform and slipped bills to Zucconi’s assistant at a little table. He didn’t wait for a receipt.

Zucconi was working on Lot 457, and nobody bothered to watch Logan when he took out his pocketknife and began to pry the lid off the trunk.

That is, nobody watched him except me. I watched from way over next to the door. I should have run, but I had to look. I had to.

Logan was prying at the lock, and he was so excited the knife kept slipping. I didn’t blame him—I was excited, too.

Then at last the lid gave, and there was a loud creak, and the trunk opened.

Logan looked down inside it. I couldn’t see his face.

All at once he slammed the lid back down with all his might. He shrugged, and walked up the aisle toward me. I didn’t run, just waited. I put my hands behind me, holding the blackjack very tight.

Logan drew abreast of me, but he didn't stop. He didn't even look at me. He just walked straight out of the store and disappeared down the street.

I went down that aisle in five steps and tore the lid off the trunk.

It was full of old books.

IT'S too bad there were no track officials around to watch me. I broke the world's record for the one-hundred-yard dash, getting into Frisco's back room.

Fat Frisco was hunched over his desk. He didn't look so hot to me, because he resembled a big fat killer shark.

Then he smiled, and that was better. He still looked like a killer shark, but a happy killer shark.

I didn't return his smile. I grabbed him by the nearest roll of fat on his neck and pulled him to his feet.

"All right," I said. "Spit it out. Where's the body?"

"Body? What body, Tony?"

I shook him into quivering blubber. "I sent it to you in the trunk. I know you got it, because you just auctioned the trunk off now."

"I never got any trunk with a body in it, Tony. So help me—"

He was going to need help before I got through with him. The help of a licensed embalmer. Two kills come as easy as one.

"Cut it. I saw the trunk auctioned off out there. The big green trunk I bought from you yesterday to hide Mae's body in. I had the express company deliver it last night to you here and—"

"We didn't get any trunks in." He blinked his eyes and shook. I helped him shake a little.

"Now I understand," Frisco wheezed. "That trunk I sold you yesterday was part of a job lot I bought. All green, all alike. I filled the rest with junk: old books and stuff. You saw one of them out on the platform. But I didn't get any trunk by express from you."

I dropped Frisco in a hurry and picked up the phone.

What Ace Express had to tell me didn't help much. Sure, they called for my trunk. But the landlady was out. Nobody there to let them in. They figured on picking it up again this noon—

"Cancel the order!" I yelled and hung up, sweating.

This was sweet. Very sweet. The trunk was still sitting in my apartment. We still had to get it out without Logan seeing it.

I explained matters to Fat Frisco. He shrugged.

"What can I do?" he said.

"Plenty. That is, if you're interested in these items."

I fished the ice out of my inside pocket. It made a very pretty glitter on his desk. But it had to go some to match the glitter in Fat Frisco's eyes.

"Well, I'll be damned!" he whispered.

Why should I contradict him? It seemed like a pretty sure prediction.

"All right," I snapped. "Where's the moola?"

He opened a drawer in his desk. When I saw the big bills, my eyes made the glitter unanimous.

"Everything's okay, then?" he asked. "It's a deal?"

"Just one little detail left. You have to help me dispose of that body. But fast."

He started to shrug again, but I was tired of that routine. I picked up the jewelry, and let him grab my arm.

"All right, Tony. I've got it figured. We can get the body ourselves. Right now. We'll take my truck. Pick up the trunk and bring it back here."

"What about Logan?"

"You'll be inside the truck, won't you?" Frisco reminded me. "And he won't pay any attention to my truck pulling out."

Frisco was right, it turned out. Because when we drove out of the alley ten minutes later, Logan wasn't around to pay attention. I couldn't spot him anywhere on the street.

I got a little happier as we drove along. I was beginning to figure things straight, now. There was nothing to worry about.

Logan didn't know about a body. He didn't know there was a body. The dumb shamus was just tagging me until he could spot those jewels. When I bid on the trunk, he figured the ice was inside—so he outbid me. After he saw what he'd bought, he went back to headquarters to sulk.

Well, by the time he got over his little pet, it would be too late. Quicklime would have the body, Frisco would have the ice, and I would have my eighteen grand and a ticket south for Connie and me.

It was perfect. When we went through the hall and upstairs without meeting anybody, it was still perfect.

I opened the door of the apartment and walked in. The trunk still stood in the center of the rug, lid down. That was perfect, too.

"Everything set?" Frisco asked.

"I'll make sure," I told him. I took a quick look around the place. Nothing had been disturbed. We were clear.

We lifted the heavy trunk and carried it down to the truck. I slid it in back and then climbed in next to Frisco. The motor started.

I looked at the street ahead and smiled into the bright sunshine. It looked so pretty—I couldn't understand how all at once everything turned black.

* * *

I can't understand it even now, when I'm sitting here, with the D.A.'s reporter taking the whole confession down in shorthand.

Of course, Logan is here too, and he explained a lot.

He said he didn't get suspicious at all until he saw me bidding on that trunk at the auction. He figured the jewels were planted there, and he was disappointed, of course.

But when he marched out, he got to thinking. Guess he'd read about the trunk murders, too, in his day.

Because he started calling the express companies in town—and when he hit the Ace Express, it was the tip-off. So he beat it over to my place and found the stuff.

They had already picked Mae up—a lot less of her than I'd once picked up—when Frisco and I arrived.

Then we came, carried the trunk out to the truck, put it in, and started away.

That's when Logan sapped us, of course. And here we are.

Still, it bothers me. How could Logan sneak up behind and knock me over the head? I know for a fact he wasn't hiding outside, and he wasn't crouching down in back of the truck when I put the trunk in. I know, because I looked.

I just asked Logan that question, and he told me.

I might have known the answer.

He was hiding inside the trunk.

1946

". . . but doth suffer . . ."

The love story of a man of science in a not-likely future.

The first time I saw Lorraine she was combing her hair in front of a mirror. The movements of the comb made little golden ripples against the smooth white shores of her brow.

Sometimes the little things like that hit you the hardest. But what's the use of explaining? I fell in love with her.

We were introduced immediately, of course. It's never hard to get acquainted at one of Sid's parties. Usually I felt like an outsider there, but with Lorraine present everything changed.

Apparently Sid had been talking, because she seemed to know all about me, and about the work I had been doing. She was friendly, casual, but with a certain intensity. I suppose that's what really attracted me -- the vibrant quality, the enthusiasm and sheer vitality of her personality. Again, there's no use attempting to analyze her power. I was hopelessly infatuated from the start.

Lorraine had been assigned to a Rocket Sector in New City and she was eager to talk about her work. The party ebbed and flowed around us while we talked. I don't think either of us was conscious of the passage of time.

It came as a shock when the darkhaired man tapped her on the shoulder.

"Time to go, darling," he said.

"Hello, Matt." She turned. "Matt Collins, this is Don. You've heard Sid speak of him, I suppose?"

Matt nodded, a bit curtly. I sensed jealously -- and something else.

Many of Sid's guests disapproved of his asking me, and I knew it. But his parties are always a bit unconventional, and Sid's not the type to let prejudice govern his friendships.

Matt was obviously uncomfortable. He had to force himself to respond. "Oh yes, Don. Sid's always talking about your brilliant work. Dehydration, isn't it? I've seen some of your graphs. We use them in Transport."

He didn't look at me. He looked at Lorraine -- at the golden waves cascading down her back.

"We really must be going, dear," he said. Lorraine rose. She smiled, held out her hand. I pressed it. Purely a gesture, of course. But Matt Scowled.

They left together. I started after them, and Sid drifted over.

"Gorgeous, isn't she?" he murmured.

I nodded.

"But not for you, Don."

I nodded again. But something inside me rebelled. Why not for me? Why not?

Back at quarters, I went through the routine mechanically. All the next day I thought of her, doing my work in a daze.

Feld noticed it too.

He was watching me carefully all day, and about four o'clock he made up his mind.

"Better get a check-up, Don. You're not functioning up to standard."

Feld is probably the only man in the world who can order me around, but I've never known him to take advantage of it. He knew as well as I did that it was an order, but he was decent enough to make it sound like a suggestion.

I had hoped to contact Lorraine that evening, but I knew it was useless arguing with him. It's his job, after all, and he's responsible. He took me over right away in the giro.

It was just the usual routine. I hate it, the blackout worst of all. Sometimes it brings peace, but this time I fought it. It robbed me of my memories of Lorraine, robbed me of any chance to thin about her.

Perhaps I'm a little bitter about the whole thing. Dr. Tal and the whole lab staff have done wonders for me. Certainly I felt refreshed, invigorated, afterwards. It had help, you see.

Fortunately, they didn't use the probe. They decided it was all mechanical; and when consciousness flooded back they knew no more than they had before.

But I remembered Lorraine.

It didn't take me long to teleflash her. We arranged to meet that evening. Sid was giving another party and it would less conspicuous that way. I had sense enough not to want to attract any attention; and she was tactful enough to leave the responsibility to me.

She came, and without Matt. That proved she was interested after all; it wasn't hopeless.

We talked. We walked, after the affair was over. We planned to meet again. Already the conversation had assumed an intimacy. We no longer spoke of our work, but of ourselves.

Lorraine was wonderful. No self-consciousness, no embarrassment, nothing to mar the communion of minds.

It was the first of several meetings. I can remember every detail with a clarity that is at once precious and painful. No sense in going over the whole story . . . probably dull enough to an outsider.

Only the climax is important. It came one afternoon during Rest Day. It had to come.

After all, she had encouraged me. I knew she did not share the general prejudice; knew she was generous, understanding, and kind. She liked me, wanted to be with me . . . and I could hope for the rest.

Of course I told myself it was impossible, fought against it. But it had to come. And so . . . I told her that I loved her.

We were sitting on a bench over looking the Flight Ground, high above the field. I remember how she pulled away me and stood up, turning her head so I couldn't see the look on her face.

The wind whipped the golden curls across her shoulders as she faced me once more, and I saw there were tears in her eyes. She couldn't speak, but she was crying.

I couldn't cry. I could only watch her as moved her hands pitifully in ivory patterns of bewilderment and fear.

"No, Don," she whispered. "No, we can't . . . don't you see? We can't . . . ever . . ."

The Matt appeared, out of nowhere. He didn't speak, nor did I. Maybe he'd been spying on us. I didn't know, and it didn't matter.

What mattered was the way Lorraine turned to him instinctively, and held out her arms.

He led her away. Neither of them looked back. Neither of them said a word.

I never saw Lorraine again. They said she had been transferred the next day. Matt went with her. I don't go to Sid's parties anymore. I've learned my lesson; I just keep working.

After all, I should have known it was hopeless. What Lorraine did was natural, inevitable, and I don't suppose I ever really expected it to turn out any other way.

They can use all the high-sounding phrases they like, but admiration and respect don't add up to anything more than . . . admiration and respect. They have gone to great deal of trouble to praise and honor my brain, but they can never know what it is to live in my body.

I understand it all. But it doesn't make any difference in the way I feel about Lorraine. I will always love her, always endure the torment of that love.

Or perhaps not always. The brain they thought enough of to seal it up in this perfect plastic body must surely learn some day to control the glands and organs that, after all, depend on it. Eventually it must learn to banish the emotions that have lingered so unaccountably long after the flesh.

But in the meantime there is memory, that perfect valency made the brain to too valuable to lose, to keep me from forgetting even a single moment of the rapture, or the pain.

Satan's Phonograph

An instrument of the devil, its contents created in hell!

THIRTY-THREE revs a minute. Thirty-three revs. Thirty-three revolutions. That's the way it plays—night and day, night and day. The black disc on the playback of the recording machine, whirling around and around. Thirty-three times every minute . . .

It looks just like an ordinary machine for making home recordings. But it isn't! You won't find any tubes or wires inside. I couldn't begin to guess what is inside. The box is sealed—and its contents were created in hell.

Take a look at the record. You'd think that was ordinary, too. But you're wrong. Because when you play the record, you don't hear a human voice. You hear—a human soul!

You think I'm crazy, eh; babbling like this? Well, I don't blame you. I thought he was crazy, too, when he brought me that instrument of the devil—Satan's phonograph.

Yes, I thought Gustav Frye was mad.

I always knew he possessed the eccentricities of a genius, of course. Ever since he taught me the piano—as only Gustav Frye could teach it. One of the greatest virtuosos in the world; this little, shriveled-up old man. He made a concert pianist out of me, and a good one. But even in the old days he was moody, filled with queer ideas.

He didn't concentrate on technique. "Let your soul express itself through the music," he would tell me.

I laughed, then. I thought it was just an affectation. But I know now that he believed it; and surely he taught me to go beyond mere mastery of the keyboard, into the realms of the spirit. He was a strange teacher, and a great one.

After Carnegie Hall, my first successes, I didn't see Gustav Frye any more. I went out on tour—traveled abroad for several years. It was on my European trip that I met and married Maxine.

When we came back here together, I heard startling news of my old teacher. Gustav Frye had gone mad, they said—he had been put away in an institution. I was shocked, sorry, and anxious for further details. But nobody seemed to know the exact circumstances, and in the pressure of settling down once more, I overlooked the news for the moment.

Maxine and I took a little studio apartment uptown, and we were happy for a while.

And then—Gustav Frye came back!

I'll never forget the night. I was home alone. Maxine had gone out to spend the evening with friends, I remember that I was sitting before the fire stroking the black fur of Tiger, our cat.

Suddenly, the cat arched its back and hissed. Then silently, out of nowhere, Gustav Frye glided into the room.

He was little, and wrinkled, and old. He was clad in rags. But somehow, he looked terribly impressive. Perhaps it was his eyes—perhaps something that seemed to peer from within his eyes or behind them.

HE STARTLED me. I stammered out something trite, but he didn't respond. He kept looking at me and nodding his head as though marking the beat of some strange inward rhythm.

Oh, he was mad enough, and no mistake! I discovered that as soon as I ventured to comment concerning the big black case he carried under his arm.

I remember what he said as he set the case down and opened it.

"So, Roger, my old pupil—you want to know what this is, ja? You shall never guess! Twenty years I work to perfect this thing—this machine. I call it a machine because there is no other word you could understand; but it is not mechanical, nein!

"They laugh at me, Roger, when I tell them of my work. They call me crazy. They even lock me up; perhaps you hear of this?

"But I work. And I finish it. When I finish it, I break out of that place where they shut me away—and I come here to you. Now, look at this!"

I looked at the open case; at the two turntables, the cutting arm, the playback arm, the package of discs.

"Why, it's a phonograph," I said. "A home-recording machine."

Gustav Frye nodded—kept time, rather, to invisible music.

"And how do you make such a home-recording, as you call it?" he asked.

"Why, it's very simple," I faltered. "I don't know the technical process, but—you talk into a microphone, and the sound waves of your voice are electrically reproduced on the record. It's just a matter of vibrations impressed on the surface of the record; that's all. And when you play it back, you hear your voice."

Gustav Frye chuckled. Even his chuckle seemed to accent the rhythm to which his nodding head responded.

"Very good! You always were a smart pupil, Roger. But you are wrong. This is not an ordinary recording phonograph. It does not capture voices alone. It captures—souls."

I gaped at him. "Souls?"

"Yes, souls." He regarded me so earnestly that I felt pity for him in his delusion. "Sound is vibration," he said. "Well, vibration is the source of life. The atoms and molecules of your body are all moving, vibrating in certain set rhythms. They put out electrical impulses—wavelengths which can be recorded. They have recorded heartbeat and thought-waves. But suppose you could invent a machine that would pick up the vibrations of your soul, or your life-beat itself?"

"Impossible!"

He nodded again, faster. "I have such a machine here," he whispered. "A machine to capture and record the human soul. Mind you, I said capture and record."

How I laughed at him, then! I thought if he knew I was skeptical he might stop his tirade and go away. But the old man insisted. He said he had always tried to capture the essence of the soul in music—but never succeeded. That is why he had worked on the machine. He wouldn't explain what he had learned or done; I might steal the secret, he said.

Oh, it was fantastic! In the end, I told him so to his face.

Then he became stubborn. He insisted on giving me a "demonstration"—with Tiger, the cat.

What could I do? One humors madmen, eh? So I humored Gustav Frye.

I ALLOWED him to set up his recording microphone there before the fireplace. It was just an ordinary microphone—in fact, the whole set appeared to be quite ordinary, though it bore no manufacturer's label. I wondered where he had obtained it.

He attached the mike to the machine, and put the cutting arm in place above a fresh disc. He had no brush, and I noticed that there were no sound-level controls visible to my eye. The mike extended on a cord, and when he lifted it, I saw that a tiny red light seemed to glow from the mike head.

That was curious—the light glowed; he appeared ready to cut a record, and yet he hadn't plugged any wire into a wall socket. Apparently the machine did not operate on electric current.

I started to question him, then checked the impulse. It would only provoke a harangue on his mad theories. And I wanted him to get it over with, go away before Maxine returned. It was embarrassing and disturbing. Better to humor him, now.

So I held Tiger, writhing in my arms, as he placed the mike before the cat's eyes. The red glare rose from the mike in inexplicable phosphorescence, and Tiger stared at it, spitting and hissing.

Then Gustav Frye started the cutting arm moving across the black record. Tiger howled into the microphone.

It only took a minute.

After that, old Frye lifted the arm, switched the record over to the playback turntable, and played the recording. I could hear Tiger howling—howling hideously with nerve-wracking clarity.

It disturbed me—that dreadful squalling. I told him to stop the record. He shrugged and lifted the needle.

Then I looked around. Everything was unchanged in the room. I still held Tiger under my arm. But Tiger wasn't struggling.

Tiger was limp. Tiger was cold. Tiger was—dead.

Yes. The cat was dead.

I can hear old Frye chuckling now, as I protested in sudden, incoherent rage.

"But of course, your cat is dead! Didn't I tell you that my machine captures the soul as well as records it? The sudden shock; the translation of soul-essence into vibration—that does it. So, you see, it isn't Tiger's voice you hear. It is his soul!"

I threw him out, then. Yes, literally threw him out. The old lunatic had frightened my cat to death—and I admit he scared me, too—with his crazy talk of putting souls on phonograph records!

I hustled him out of there in a sort of unreasoning fury. He protested with the fervor of the madman that he was. He had made me rich and famous, he said. Now he wanted me to protect him while he perfected his infernal machine. He had great plans; he and I could share the rewards.

I lost my head completely. I shouted at him to go away, to stay away.

Then he cursed me. He cursed me and swore revenge.

I hardly heard him. I was too busy hustling him downstairs. He scuttled off with his bulky machine under his arm, his head still nodding frantically as he wheezed threats under his breath.

I shouted after him that he'd better not let me catch him around here again—and I meant it.

But he came back. Yes—he came back!

I found that out the next afternoon.

You see, I hadn't told Maxine about the madman. I knew it would only alarm her. I got rid of poor Tiger's body before she returned that night, and said nothing about the incident.

Then—the next afternoon—when I came back from a stroll after lunch, I opened the door and heard Maxine scream.

"Roger!" she shrieked. "Roger! Roger!"

I rushed into the studio. I saw Maxine there, lying on the floor. She was pale and lifeless.

But how could that be?

For I still heard her voice. She was screaming.

"Roger! Roger! Roger!"

She screamed my name over and over again, without a change of inflection; screamed it in utter agony.

Heaven help me, I knew then! I saw that accursed instrument over on a table, saw the record whirling and the needle pressing down.

The phonograph—Satan's phonograph—was grinding away. I knelt beside Maxine's body and kissed her cold, dead lips—while on the record she screamed her endless torment.

"Roger! Roger! Roger!"

I knew how it must have happened, of course. Gustav Frye had sworn revenge. While I was away he had come here, talked to Maxine; probably persuaded her to record her voice as a joke. "To surprise Roger," he must have said.

Yes, Frye had lured her before the microphone—and captured her soul on the record!

I rose, took the record off. It was an ordinary black disc, and its surface seemed grooved in the usual manner. I held it and it felt cold; cold as Maxine’s body. I couldn’t think, couldn’t comprehend what had happened.

After that I just sat there for a long time. It was quite a long time, because twilight crept into the room as I stared into the shadows and tried to think.

What could I do?

The police would laugh at me if I called them. The whole story was so incredible. But it was true!

Perhaps I had better destroy the machine, then find Frye. But that’s when Frye came back.

Yes, I must have fallen asleep. And that’s when Frye came back. Yes, he must have tiptoed into the room in the twilight, nodding his head in that alien rhythm. And Frye must have seen me sleeping and hypnotized me.

Do you hear? He came to me in sleep and hypnotized me! He changed the records, put on a new disc, and held the microphone before my lips.

Then, as I slept, he commanded me to speak.

He made me speak these words—the words that put my soul on a record like all the rest.

Do you hear me? Do you hear my voice? Then do something!

Find that man.

Find Gustav Frye, wherever he may be—and destroy him. Destroy that hideous machine, too, before it is too late. And do something to get me off this record.

Yes. . . get me off this record, do you hear?

Get me out of here . . . out of here . . . out of here . . . out of here . . . out of here . . .

The Noose Hangs High

Kay's light was on, all right, when I stopped by her house, but the silhouette of the hanging corpse on the shade should have warned me of the silent, ghastly passenger waiting in my bus, who had already punched my ticket for the hungry gallows!

CHAPTER ONE

Hangman's House

THE FAT lady got off the bus. I looked at the part of her that got off last and thought, accurately enough, "This is the end."

That cleaned up my last run for the night. End of the line—nothing to do now but haul the empty bus down to the garage.

I looked at my watch. Exactly midnight. I wasn't due in at the garage until 12:20. That left me with just enough time to drive out of my way four blocks and pass Kay's house.

I always try to pass her house after I finish my last run, just to see if there's a light in her window. That means she's home from the modeling school. If everything's okay, she's waiting for me and waves out of the window. Then, after I take the bus in I walk back and pay her a visit.

Not exactly an ideal method of calling on your girl friend, but that's the way it is. She runs the school at night and I ran my bus.

I pulled away from the stop and rounded the corner. It was dark out here. No streetlights. I didn't go for the idea of Kay living all alone in the middle of nowhere, but her folks had left her the bungalow, so there it was.

I was hoping there'd be a light in the window for her wandering boy tonight. There hadn't been any lately, and I was beginning to get worried.

Joe Slade, the night man down at the garage, didn't help any, either. He had passed a few hints, very delicately—like hitting me over the head with the Empire State Building—about other visitors. Larry Keeler, in particular.

That got me where it hurt. Larry Keeler had an early night run and got off around 10. He could be paying social calls on Kay. Except that he happened to be my best friend.

But they say your best friends don't tell you. And nobody was telling me. All I knew was: no signals the last few nights. So I worried. And hurried.

Kay's house loomed through the darkness up ahead, to the left of the road. I wondered if I would find somebody hanging around there tonight.

I slowed down and stared at the house across the field that separated it from the road. The light was on tonight, but the shade was down. Funny. I squinted out at the window. Then I saw it.

Shadowed against the shade was a black blur, moving back and forth as the shade flapped and bulged. The shadow was sharp, distinct. There was a long line—and depending from it, a dangling form. I stopped the bus, and my hands trembled.

Somebody was hanging around Kay's house, all right—hanging on the end of a rope!

THERE was only one thing to do. I turned off the bus lights and opened the door. Before I jumped out, I groped around under the seat until I found what I wanted. My sweating palm closed around the cold, reassuring heft of a wrench.

As I groped through the darkness of the field, I circled to the right, trying to hit the path that led to Kay's door. This was complicated, Because my legs had a tendency to moved backwards instead of forward. But I got a grip on that wench. By the time I reached the porch, I was all right, but I couldn't step sweating.

I went up the porch steps quietly and rang the bell. It sounded loud. Too loud. No answer.

I rang again, leaving plenty of sweat on the buzzer. Still no answer.

I didn't really expect one. A guy who has just been hanged is probably too busy to bother with answering doorbells. The door was locked, too.

That was that. I could break the door in with my shoulders, if I had a pair of shoulders built for door-breaking. But it wouldn't work. I ran down the steps and circled around to that window. Then I got another shock. The light had been switched off. The window was open, but the shade had been rolled up. My spine began to roll up, too.

Hanging men that don't answer doors I can understand. But lights that go out by themselves and shades that roll up, that's out of my line entirely.

Somebody pulled the switch and rolled the shade. Somebody made a noose and tied the hangman's knot. Not a Boy Scout, either. Somebody in Kay's house—now!

That was it. This was Kay's house. I had to find out. The window was open, and I had the wrench in my hand. There was no turning back.

So the fly stepped into the spider's parlor. Not stepped, exactly. I clambered, crawled, and dropped. I tried to be quiet. I very much wanted to be quiet. But my teeth were rattling in conga rhythm, and it didn't much matter. My feet touched the floor and I moved away from the windowsill slowly. It was blacker than the inside of a goat and silent as hell.

A board squeaked beneath my feet. There was a sudden sound of breathing—mine. Whatever was hanging in that room didn't breathe.

I edged along the wall. I didn't want to bump into a lurking figure. Even more than that, I didn't want to bump into that dangling thing.

My right hand kept the wrench in readiness. My left left perspiration along the wall as I groped for the light switch. Now was the moment. I knew what I'd have to look at when I turned it on. By this time I was almost certain that whoever had turned out the light had left by the window before I arrived. But that dangling shape was still there.

Suddenly I wanted to scream bloody murder. For the first time the thought crossed my mind.

That hanging thing! What if it was Kay?

No. It couldn't be. Please God it couldn't! The thick rope around that lovely throat of hers, those eyes bulging out, and her tongue . . .

I turned on the light—and stared.

The room was empty.

No rope, nobody hanging from the low crossbeam of Kay's living room. Nothing. I wasn't afraid any more. I walked across to the door and kicked it open. The hall was dark, empty. I went into the dinette, the kitchen. Empty. There was still the bedroom. That was empty, too. I didn't miss the closets. Nobody. No body, living or dead. Then I was back in the living room, all alone. Just me and my problem.

How could a guy turn out the light, cut a body down, drag it out of the window and sneak off, all in the two minutes it took for me to cross the field and beat a tatoo on the front door?

I made for the front door, unlocked it, and stepped out on the porch. My head was beginning to hurt. It had been a hard day. I was worried about Kay. My eyes were tired. Maybe I had made a mistake. Everybody has hallucinations. Guys in nut factories have them all the time.

But this was no asylum. It was Kay's house. And the body I saw—or thought I saw—was missing. Whoever sneaked it out in such a hurry would have provided a getaway. A car, perhaps. It would be parked in back of the house. I walked over to the driveway, bent down and lit a match.

For the first time I got somewhere.

No hallucination had put those fresh tire marks in the dust. There had been a car here, recently. It might still be here. As the match flickered out, I rose and started walking along the driveway. I walked quietly, very quietly. And then, all at once, it wasn't dark any more. Because a handful of stars rushed down and hit me over the head. . . .

AFTER that it was dark again. Very dark.

Something kept throbbing in the darkness. I knew what it was. My head. I reached out and touched it, then wished I hadn't. There was more than sweat on my fingers when they came away again. I'd been sapped.

There was a pleasant little thought. I lay there and contemplated it for a few minutes. It didn't seem worthwhile to do any more. After a while I got enough energy to look at my watch. Twelve twenty-two by the radium dials.

That couldn't be right. It must have been twelve-fifteen when I left the house and started along the driveway. And I felt I'd been out for a lot longer than seven minutes.

I found out that I had what it takes to get up, and even to stay up, once I reached my feet. There was a small hole in my head, but apparently my brains hadn't fallen out through it. The house was still dark. I held on to the side of it as I completed my little sentimental journey around to the rear.

No car. But there were tire marks in the yard.

I wondered why the driver hadn't made a good job of it and run the car over me as he backed out. He backed out? Suppose it had been she who backed out? No. Not Kay. She wasn't hung, and she wouldn't hang anyone.

But where in hell was she? Where was the body? Where was the guy who slugged me?

I didn't care any more. All at once I could think of just one thing: to stagger back to my bus and drive it down to the garage.

I can drive in my sleep, and this time I practically did. The whole thing was a dream. I didn't wake up until I drove up the ramp.

Joe Slade was waiting for me, sitting in his usual spot next to the door. He was lettering an "EXPRESS" sign for a bus.

But when he saw me, he dropped the brush and bent down until his black mustache nearly touched his watch. What you call a "significant" gesture.

"What's the big idea?" he grumbled. "You're fifteen minutes late."

I didn't answer.

Slade got up, wiping his hands on a rag. I watched the black paint stains form. Joe Slade watched me.

“Calling on the girl friend again, eh?” he muttered.

I sat there, weak and dizzy. Too weak and dizzy to leave the bus.

Slade came over to the door, eyeing me. “Listen, Collins,” he said, “I’m gonna have to report you. I don’t mind if you drive by her house every night. Yeah, I know all about that. But when you decide to park and run in for a midnight snack—”

I stood up. “Cut it out, Slade,” I said. “Something’s happened.”

He stared at me. My face was in the light for the first time.

“Yeah,” he muttered. “I’ll say. You look all mussed up. That gal been clawing you up?”

I shook my head.

“You get into a fight with Larry Keeler?” I must have showed something in my face when he mentioned that name, because he shrugged.

“Oh, I know all about Larry, pal. I know he’s been beating your time. Over there nearly every night. Jealous, huh?”

I shook my head again. Not exactly a brilliant come-back, but it kept me from thinking.

I didn’t want to think. The whole thing was just a dream. Nothing was real from the moment I saw the fat lady’s posterior disappear from the bus. I wished it was back again.

Joe Slade climbed in and stood over me. Real concern lined his forehead now. “What’s the matter, Collins? You sick or something?” I did that routine with my head again. Slade spotted the wrench lying on the seat next to me. “Car trouble?”

I was tired of shaking my head. This time I nodded. I had to answer him, had to explain, had to decide what to do. But I couldn’t think clearly.

Slade sighed. “All right, pal. Never mind. Why don’t you beat it and get some rest? You can tell me in the morning. I’ll clean up the seats and check receipts for you.”

He turned and walked down the aisle of the bus behind me. I was too woozy to watch. I heard his footsteps as he moved. Then he stopped.

“Collins,” he said.

I didn't like the way he said it.

I got up and walked back to him. He was bending over the long seat in the rear of the bus. He was bending and staring at something. I bent and stared, too.

Lying on the floor beneath the rear seat was the body of a man.

He was cold, but he wasn't stiff yet I found that out as we turned him over.

No need to ask how he died. The front of his head had been crushed by what they love to call a "blunt instrument."

I even knew what that instrument was. So did Joe Slade. Because the bloody initials T & L stood out on the wound in reverse. There was no mistaking them.

We both recognized those initials. They're stamped on all Company property. They're stamped on those big, heavy steel wrenches, like the wrench I had next to me on the front seat. We knew what killed him, all right. And we knew who he was, too.

The dead man lying in the back of my bus was Larry Keeler!

CHAPTER TWO

Sign of the Rope

I LOOKED at Joe. He looked at me. Then he pulled out a gun. That was all right. As night man at the garage, he always carried a gun, for burglars. But he wasn't pointing it at a burglar now.

He was pointing it at me. "All right, Collins," he said.

I didn't answer.

We got off the bus and marched into the garage. Slade picked up the phone from the wall bracket. He dialed with one hand, the other kept that gun levelled at my chest.

He was phoning for the cops. I didn't listen. I had other problems.

Who did it? Who killed Larry and put his body in my bus? How was I going to tell my story?

> Accused appeared at garage in dishevelled condition, unable to give coherent account of his activities. When questioned by night attendant he told fantastic story of seeing a hanging figure —

No. That was out. I could never explain. And it was going to be pinned on me. I'd find out plenty about hanging, soon. The hard way.

Slade hung up.

"Not that it's any of my business, understand," he said, "but would you mind telling me why you did it?"

"I wouldn't mind," I answered. "But I didn't do it. The kid was my best friend. You know that, Slade! Larry was my friend."

"He seems to have been Kay's best friend, lately," said Joe. He tugged at his mustache and there was a long pause.

I felt that rope tighten around my neck. I swallowed hard. If I couldn't get a guy like Slade to believe me, how could I ever convince the law? Or a jury? Or the governor, who might grant the reprieve?

"Larry wouldn't cheat on me, Slade. Neither would Kay. I didn't do it. I didn't see either of them tonight at all. I stopped at Kay's house. She wasn't home. When I came back to the bus I just got in and drove here. I didn't see any body. I don't know how it got here. Somebody planted it. If you'll wait until I get things straight in my own mind, I can explain."

"Better make it a good one," Slade advised. "The cops like to have it good. And not too complicated. If I were you, I'd try and keep Hummell out of it, too."

"Hummed?" I said. "That old goat? Kay never had anything to do with him. He was chasing her ever since he sent his niece to the modeling school, but she brushed him off. I know. She hasn't seen him in months."

"Larry told me different," Joe informed me. "After all, he's a millionaire. It's only natural if a girl like Kay takes a shine to him."

> Accused had previously displayed insane, jealousy, forbidding the young woman to associate with James B. Hummell, prominent industrialist. . . .

Yes. Slade was right. I'd have to keep Hummell out of it. And Kay, wherever she was, she'd be. dragged into this mess, too. What if they tried to make her out as an accessory? What if she was an accessory?

But nobody would bother with that one. I was the real killer. Slade thought so. The cops would think so. Even Kay would probably think so. I almost thought so myself.

That rap on the head! Was I really out? Hadn't it all been a weird nightmare, a distortion of my own? I thought I saw a hanging body. I went into the house and thought it was empty, then came out and thought I got slugged.

Suppose I went into the house, actually, and it wasn't empty? Suppose Larry had been there, and I had the wrench and we fought and I got knocked out but I hit him with the wrench, first, and got him into the bus and then the frenzy died and I was my normal self again, forgetting all about it and driving the bus here?

Accused pleads temporary insanity. . . .

But it didn't matter. Larry was dead, and I was waiting for the cops to come, and Slade had his gun. I was on the spot.

Slade leaned against the wall, watching me.

"Tough, brother," he said.

"I wish you believed me," I answered. "I've always thought you were a square shooter, Slade. You liked Larry. You know Kay and me. We're all in this mess together. If you'd only help me, I could figure this thing out. I want to find the killer."

"Are you suggesting I let you get away?" Slade asked. "No dice, Collins. You know better than that. It would look swell if the cops arrived and found me holding the gun—and the bag. Sorry."

I glanced at the phone on the wall and shrugged. "All right. I understand. But you could give me a little break."

"Such as?"

"Such as letting me call up Firestone before the law takes over. You remember, he's Kay's lawyer, and he knows me. I want legal counsel, Slade. I'm going to need it, bad. Come on, be a pal."

Slade hesitated, twisting his mustache. He got paint on it.

"Hurry up. They'll be screaming up in a squad car any minute now. Just let me call. I'm entitled to a lawyer."

"All right. But no funny business. I'm standing right behind you with the gun. And this gun hasn't got any friends, understand?"

"I understand. Thanks, pal."

I moved over to the phone. Slade moved right behind me. He breathed over my left shoulder as I moved to take the receiver off the hook.

"Got a nickel?" I asked.

He nodded.

While he nodded, I grabbed the receiver on its cord in my right hand. I raised it, turned suddenly, and brought it down on Slade's head.

He slumped, out cold.

I grabbed the gun out of his hand. I was going to need it more than he did.

Then I ran out of the garage. I spotted Slade's little coupe at the curb. He always left the keys in.

It was convenient, all right. I gave her the gun, and over the motor I heard the high, thin wailing of the squad car coming down the road behind me.

I'd be a post office pinup, all right. Or else, another kind of pinup. The rope grew tighter. . . .

I SKIDDED down the side roads. Evidently the squad car boys hadn't spotted my get-away, but I took no chances. I made for town by a roundabout route.

It was after one o'clock when I got around to looking at my watch again. I stepped on the gas, heading for the Lyon School of Modeling. Don't ask me why. Kay worked there, and I had to find Kay. She wouldn't be sitting there at this hour. Nobody would. But I had nowhere else to go.

The cops would be camping on my doorstep. Let them camp. They could pitch pup tents and build a bonfire for all I cared.

I had to find Kay. Maybe there'd be a message for me at the school, a call. Something. There must be an explanation to this whole business. It just didn't make sense to me.

A hanging body, and then no hanging body. A sap on the skull. Larry, lying dead in my bus, his skull crushed. Kay and Hummell.

Yes, Hummell. James B. Hummell, prominent industrialist.

Where did he fit into the picture?

Slade had mentioned Hummell's name. Said Larry spoke of him. Could Hummell kill Larry? Why?

I began to think about Hummell. I never met the guy, but I'd heard of him. Kay had told me. He'd sent his niece to the Lyon School, just a crazy kid who wanted to become a model. Kay was a good teacher; ran a nice little business with her school. Hummell made sure of this before he enrolled his precious niece. He came down and talked to Kay personally.

Quite personally, it seems. Because he came back, and not to-discuss his niece, either. He was rich, retired, a widower. Kay's a pretty girl. She's got personality and what it takes. What it takes to take a guy like Hummell.

She didn't tell me she was seeing him. I found it out by accident. Then she said she wasn't serious. She promised to give him up. The big limousine didn't drive her home any more. I know, because I had Kay's word for it and I trusted her. As far as she was concerned, it was all over.

But was it all over as far as Hummell was concerned?

This I didn't know.

A rich, lonely old man. An old man used to commanding what he desired. Thwarted now, and brooding. Perhaps a bit cracked. It happens in the best of families.

Suppose he investigated, learned about the steady boyfriend? Only he made a mistake and thought Larry was the steady, not me? So he hits Larry over the head with a wrench . . .

No. That still didn't make sense. Neither did the hanging body I'd seen. That could be Hummell's work, too. That could be Hummell.

It wasn't Larry. I knew that now. No rope marks around his neck. But there would be rope marks around mine if I didn't find Kay and straighten this thing out.

I drove up to the Brice Building and parked. The Lyon School of Modeling was on the third floor. The building was open all night. I could ask the caretaker. . . .

Uh-uh.

I forgot. My days for asking caretakers were over. Fugitives from the law talk to nobody.

So there went my plan of inquiring about Kay, or about a message for me. I was stuck. My sweating palms were stuck to the wheel.

I looked at them under the light. Nothing clicked.

I sat there a moment, waiting. My eyes crawled up the outside of the building, boosted themselves on the ledge of the third floor, and looked at the windows of the Lyon School. Everything was dark. This was my night for dark windows. Still, I had to find out.

I left the car and walked up to the door. I stared through the glass. The lobby was empty, but well-lighted. The elevator door was closed. I squinted at the indicator. It read "Twenty." Good. That meant the caretaker was up on the top floor. Probably reading a detective magazine. I walked in and took the stairs.

The third floor hall was dimly lighted, but there was no light shining behind the panelled door marked Lyon School of Modeling.

That didn't stop me—Jim Collins, ace investigator (formerly employee T & L Bus Company) wanted for a slight charge of murder.

I walked up to the door and tried the doorknob. I swear I wasn't even surprised when the knob turned and the door opened. But I was surprised a moment later—when the voice whispered out of the darkness, "Oh, Larry! Thank God you've come!"

It was Kay.

CHAPTER THREE

Key to Hell

AS I closed the door, I reached over and switched on the lights. Kay stood there, her mouth working curiously.

“Jim!”

“Yeah,” I said. “It’s Jim. Larry couldn’t make it tonight.”

“But what are you doing here? What do you know about Larry?”

It was brutal, but I told her.

She began to sob, very quietly, and she kept on sobbing all through my story. When I finished, she managed to pull herself together.

“Jim, I’ve been a fool! I can’t explain it, but I know this is all my fault.”

“What you mean, you can’t explain it? You’ve got to explain it. Perhaps to a jury.” She put her head on my shoulder. It seemed to belong there, and somehow it felt pretty good. But I could still feel that rope biting into my neck. I jerked away.

“Let’s have it,” I said. “There’s no time to lose. Why was Larry hanging around your place tonight? Did you expect anyone else to pay you a visit? What about that body?” Her blue eyes clouded. She dabbed at them with a handkerchief designed to be used by a mosquito with sniffles. Then she faced me again, with everything under control. Her voice didn’t waver.

“Before I answer your questions, let me ask you one. If you’re telling me a straight story—”

I couldn’t choke my anger back on that one. “You mean to say you don’t like the way I tell it either? Do you think I killed him?”

She hung her head. Everything seemed to be hanging tonight.

“No, Jim,” she whispered. “I believe you. But I thought you might still be able to answer my question. It’s important.”

“Ask me.”

"I wanted to know if you had the key."

"Key? What key?"

"Oh. Then you still don't know."

"You bet your life I don't. And I want to find out. Now, let's have a few answers from you."

"All right. But they won't help any," she sighed. "You ask me why Larry was at my place. I don't know. He called me about seven, between runs, and said he'd meet me here at 11:30. That's why I've been waiting."

"But he gets off at 10. What would keep him for an hour and a half longer?"

"He was going to do something for me. Well get to that later."

"All right. Larry said he'd meet you here. Are you sure it was Larry who called?" Yes-s—no, I'm not. It was a public phone booth, and there was a lot of noise. But it sounded like him."

"Hiraran. Well, that's something to go on. If it was Larry, then he was still—alive—at seven."

Kay's mouth started to twitch again, but she got it turned off in time. "You wanted to know if I expected anyone else to visit me at the house tonight. The answer is no. I thought I'd meet Larry here, go home, and be there in time to give you the shade signal." She said it as if she meant it. I wanted to believe it.

"And about the body," she murmured, "I don't know anything."

"You and me both," I answered. "But there's one other thing you do know and I don't. The key."

I GRABBED her by the shoulders and shook her. "Come on," I said. "Tell me. Don't you realize they're looking for me right now? It's murder! They're breathing down my neck. They pay the hangman a hundred bucks in this state to do his job. You want him to earn a C note the easy way, with me?"

"All right," she said, faintly. "Maybe you'll hate me for it. But you ought to know, even if it doesn't help.

"It's Mr. Hummell's key."

"Hummell again!" I said. Then, as she stared at me, "Never mind. I'm listening."

"You know I'm all through with him, darling," Kay told me. "But when I went to him and told him I wouldn't see him any more, he gave me the key.

"You see, all during the time that I—that I saw Mr. Hummell, I refused to take anything from him. Gifts, I mean. There was a bracelet, and other things. He'd show them to me and I refused. Believe me, darling, I've been waiting for you."

"Cut the violins," I said. "Let's have the rest."

"But when we broke up, he asked me to take the key. Just for old times' sake. He's really a very nice old man, you know."

"We were talking about a key," I reminded her.

"He told me that he'd drawn up his will. He wouldn't embarrass me by mentioning my name, but he'd thought of another way. He had left instructions with the lawyer in charge of his estate, and with the bank, that anyone presenting this key would have access to a safety deposit vault box after he died.

"He didn't tell me what was in the box, and I didn't ask. I wanted to refuse the key, but he insisted. I took it to avoid a scene."

I nodded. "Then you changed your mind and decided you didn't want the old boy's present. Right? So you decided to give it back."

"Yes, Jim. That's what happened. I felt—well, I felt that the key would stand between us. If something happened to Hummell and I opened the box, and you heard about it—well, I'd have to explain. The way I'm explaining now. I would feel ashamed. And I do feel ashamed, now."

"So you gave the key back."

"I wish I had. But don't you understand, Jim? I wanted to give it back without a scene. I didn't want to see Hummell again. And so I asked Larry to take the key back for me and deliver it to Hummell in person, so no one would ever know."

"Larry," I said.

She put her arms around me. "Yes. Poor Larry. No, Jim, I didn't love Larry. But he was a friend. Yours and mine. And now somebody has—"

I felt her shudder as she broke off.

"Take it easy," I said. "I can guess the rest. You gave the key to Larry. He promised to take it to Hummell tonight and meet you here afterward. That's why you were waiting.

"But somebody else was waiting, too. Somebody who knew about the key."

I got a brainstorm. "Did Slade know about it?"

"Slade?" Her brow wrinkled.

"Joe Slade at the garage. Friend of Larry's."

"No. How would he know?"

"Larry could have told him, casually. But let's drop that for a moment. To your knowledge, just who did know?"

"Well, Hummell. And of course, his lawyer."

"What's his name?"

"Mr. Kinsella, I think. Yes, Avery Kinsella. I've never seen him."

"But neither of these men knew that you were giving the key back, did they?" I demanded.

"Of course not."

"Well, I'm just thinking out loud. Suppose there was a reason—a strong reason—for wanting that key again. Wouldn't they try to get it?"

"And—you mean they would kill for it?"

"Somebody killed Larry. And somebody killed someone else, before that. Hung him. Or it could have been suicide."

I walked over to the door and turned out the light. "My eyes hurt," I said. "I can't think any more. This whole thing is too complicated for a bus driver. Let's get some fresh air, kid."

I spoke loudly. Kay winced, but led the way to the door and opened it.

I stayed behind long enough to pick up a paperweight from the office desk. Then I walked out of the door as she held it open.

But I didn't walk out in a straight line. I swerved. Then I brought the paperweight down on the wrist of the man who crouched next to the door.

He had a gun.

But he didn't have it long. I knocked it to the floor. He swung. I swung. We both connected. And then we were locked together, rolling over and over on the floor.

He was good. He began to squeeze on my windpipe. It felt tight—like a rope. Everything began to blur. I gave him my knee but he wasn't taking any. He kept on squeezing. The lights were going out. . . .

THEY went on again, fast. Good old Kay—she had the gun. The man saw it and had sense enough to let go of me. He stood there with his hands in the air, as if he were asking double permission to leave the room. I'll bet he felt like it at that.

I got up and brushed myself off. I don't know how long he'd been standing there. I noticed him, or rather, his shadow, about the time Kay started crying. It was a good idea to pick up that paperweight when I left.

Kay didn't look in character, holding that heavy gun. I took it away from her, but kept it pointing at our friend.

He was a tall, husky-looking guy in a blue suit that wasn't meant to be rolled around the hallway of an office building. He had a nice hat, too, but it was crushed. And. so was his self confidence.

That suited me.

"Pardon me, stranger," I said, politely. "Would you mind telling me just what in hell you're doing around here?"

"Sure. I'm supposed to be capturing you." He grinned.

I grinned back. I grin very cheap. "Detective?"

He nodded. "Homer Thatch, Homicide. Card in my pocket, if you search me. You Jim Collins?"

"Check. Pleased to meet you. My fiancee, Kay Lyons."

He nodded. "Heard of you. After we got to the garage we sort of figured out where you'd head for. At least, I did. Guess I'm. a bum guy at figuring or I'd had sense enough not to come up here all alone."

"Live and learn," I said. "We all make mistakes. I take it you heard our conversation in there?"

"That I did," said Thatch, Homicide. "Very interesting."

"Any other comments to make?"

"Only that I don't believe a word of it. Collins, you're caught red-handed."

"I agree with you," I answered, "Except for a couple of little details. My hands are white, and I'm not caught. You are. Come on."

"Where we going?"

"Out."

Kay bit her lip. "But there'll be more cops downstairs, waiting. Probably a squad car at the curb."

"We're going out the back door," I said. "Forward, march!"

Our little military procession went down the back stairs and out through the Service Entrance. The street was deserted. There was a squad car around the corner, I knew, but the car was parked here at the curb.

We got in. Kay and Thatch took the jump seats in the rear, and I gave Kay the gun again, just to keep her company. I drove.

I backed up as quietly as possible, turned around and purred past the corner. Safe.

"Where are we going, Jim?" Kay's voice was troubled.

"Don't you worry about that," I told her. "Everything is under control."

Oh, yeah? Wanted for kidnapping an officer of the law. . . .

But I couldn't think about that. Instead, I began to talk to Thatch. I told him the whole story all over again, in detail.

"And so," I concluded, "we're going back to Kay's house, now. I slipped up on something when I searched the first time. There's a bare chance I can find what I'm looking for now—and I have to take it, tonight. Tomorrow will be too late; cops swarming all over the joint. I'm on the spot."

"You can say that again," Thatch muttered.

"I'm on the spot," I repeated. "There. You satisfied?"

"What are you looking for, Jim?" Kay seemed puzzled. "Is it the key? Or another—body?"

"Both," I answered. "And Thatch, here, is going to help me."

Thatch cleared his throat. "You know, Collins, that story of yours is so cockeyed I could almost believe it. But who do you suspect?"

"You're the detective," I reminded him. "Maybe we'll find some answers."

We were getting out into the darkness now. I drove slowly, peering ahead along the road. There might be a lot of law hanging around Kay's place now—late as it was.

The house was dark. We parked half a block down and got out. I took the gun back and kept Thatch in front of me.

We were halfway up the drive when I saw it—the big black bulk of a car, parked in the rear.

"Go on ahead, Kay," I whispered. She did. We waited there, quietly.

"I don't recognize it," she said. "It isn't a police car. Now what do we do?"

"We go right ahead," I answered. "This time I've got a friend with me." I hefted the gun.

For a wonder, the boards in the porch steps didn't squeak. The door wasn't locked; I remembered leaving it open when I went out of there, way back dim centuries ago.

We moved through the utter darkness of the hall. Not a sound from us. Not a sound from anyone else.

Then we were at the parlor threshold. Thatch went ahead of me. I wasn't taking any chances.

Kay switched on the light.

A tall, gaunt man rose from the depths of the armchair. One bony hand reached towards his coat pocket.

"Drop that," I snapped.

"Why—Mr. Hummell!" Kay gasped.

CHAPTER FOUR

Killer's Date

"NEVER mind who we are and what we're doing here," I said, anticipating his question. "Just concentrate on sitting down again, and keep your hands in your lap. Thatch, you sit down, too. It makes me nervous to see you all standing around."

"What are you doing here?" Kay asked the gaunt man.

Hummell coughed and shifted uneasily.

"It's all right," Kay assured him. "This is Jim Collins. You remember, I've spoken of him. And this is Mr. Thatch. He's a detective."

"But why is Collins pointing that gun at us?" Hummell whined.

"I told you I'm a nervous man," I said.

"We'll explain later," Kay promised him. "But you can talk. They both know about you."

Hummell's pasty face went whiter. He bit his lip and sighed. I kept looking at him. The gun looked at him, too.

"It's very simple, my dear," Hummel said. "I had to see you right away. I know it's very late, but this matter couldn't wait. When I found you were gone, I took the liberty of trying the door. Finding it open, I came in to wait. I kept the lights out because I was worried about attracting attention. And I was worried about you."

"Very thoughtful," I interrupted. "But what is this matter that couldn't wait?"

Hummell ignored me and talked to Kay. "I got a phone call at the house tonight from a young man who said he was a friend of yours. Larry Keeler was the name. He said he was coming out to see me, but he'd been detained and probably couldn't make it until tomorrow."

"Yes?"

"He said it was highly important. Something about you . . . and me."

"I see."

"I was—well, frankly, a bit frightened. I thought of blackmail. You know I've always tried to protect your name, my dear. I began to wonder if you knew anything of this matter. So I decided to take a chance and come to see you. And here I am."

"Better tell him about the call," I suggested.

Kay told him.

"Yes," Hummell said. "He was just planning to return my key. I understand, now. But what are these men doing here?"

"Looking for a body," Thatch interrupted. "The body of a man who was hung in this room some time before midnight tonight. All right, Hummell, where'd you hide it?"

"Body? But I didn't get here until nearly two o'clock. I don't know anything about a body."

"Then maybe you can tell us how you killed Keeler," Thatch suggested.

Hummell's face worked. He was sweating. It felt good to watch somebody else sweat for a change.

"You came here to look for that key tonight, didn't you?" Thatch said. "After you discovered Kay was really through with you for keeps, you decided to get that key back, right? So you came here, ran into Larry Keeler, somehow, and—"

"But what about the hanging?" Kay interrupted.

I used to watch it in the movies, and I never believed it. The tense, dramatic moment, and then, suddenly—the entrance of the cops.

I believed it now.

"Drop that gun, you! Everybody stay where they are." The voice barked, the feet thudded, and the room filled with law.

I dropped the gun. It was all over, now.

THERE was a cop standing behind me and another one at my side. There was a cop next to Hummell, and even one to escort Kay. Thatch stood over near the door with another man in a grey suit, and Joe Slade. Slade tossed me a feeble wave. It didn't help much.

Thatch mumbled to the man in gray very quickly. He nodded, then shook his head. Just a guy who couldn't make up his mind, I guess.

"All right, folks," said the man in gray, stepping suddenly forward a pace and giving us all a great big smile. "I'm Lieutenant Olson, Homicide."

I wondered if he expected us to applaud. "We've been over at the garage checking with Slade, here," he explained. "Just on our way back downtown to run him in as a material witness, but when we passed here we saw lights. And here we are."

Kay moved closer to me. She was trembling. I patted her arm. I wished I had somebody to pat mine.

"So I guess we'll all go along together," Olson concluded.

"Hey," I said. "Wait a minute."

"You can talk down at the station," said Olson.

"Give him a chance," Thatch urged. "Maybe he's decided to sing."

"All right," Olson shrugged. "Start singing."

Something happened in the room. Eyes turned towards me. The cops stared. Hummell stared. Slade stared, Even Kay stared.

I looked out of the window and began talking, in a low voice.

"Guess you all know what happened here tonight. I saw that body hanging here. The shade was down and I only caught the shadow. I don't know yet who was hung. When I came in, the body was gone.

"I walked around in back, spotted a car, and got slugged. When I recovered, the car was gone. I drove to the garage, met Slade, and he found Larry Keeler's body in the back of my bus. Keeler was killed with a blow from a wrench. I got away, picked up Kay downtown, ran into Thatch and disarmed him. We came here and found Hummell waiting."

"We know all that," Olson snapped. "Get on with it."

I got on with it. I told the story of the key. Slade's eyebrows went up. So did Olson's.

"Anybody presenting that key had access to the vault after Hummell's death," I said. "That establishes the motive for Larry's murder. He had the key and somebody else wanted it."

I looked at them all for the first time. "That's important, because it lets Hummell out," I said. "He wouldn't kill Larry for the key. If he wanted to get into the vault or fix it so nobody else could, he'd merely instruct his lawyer to change his will. You're clear, Hummell."

Hummell gasped, but whether in relief or indignation, I couldn't tell.

"That leaves only two possibilities we know of, besides myself," I said. "And since I know I'm innocent—"

Olson snorted. "Keep talking," he said.

"Two other suspects," I said. "Slade—and Kay."

I got more gasps on this one. The act was going over.

WHOEVER wanted to kill Larry for the key also wanted to pin the rap on me. It would be someone who knew my habits and Larry's habits. Knew that I drove past here every night looking for a signal to come in. Knew that Larry was coming here to Kay's house.

"It was all damn smart. Larry was killed some time before I arrived. When I came in, I was sapped, as planned, and the body planted in the car. I was to be left with a wild story of a hanging man when the cops arrived to pick me up for murder. The key never would enter into the story at all. And the killer had good reason to suspect that Hummell would never open his mouth about it if he knew; because Hummell wanted to protect Kay's good name."

I paused. Slade chewed his mustache. Kay bit her lip.

"Now there's only a little more to decide. Which of these two could do the planning, set the wheels in motion?

"Somebody had to phone Larry and tell him to be here early in the evening to see Kay. Some last minute plan changes would be the excuse. Something about not taking the key up to Hummell after all. That would bring Larry here in time to be murdered.

"Then, somebody had to come out here and murder him, take the key, and set the trap for me. When I came, I was sapped and the plant was complete."

"But Slade, here, was at the garage," Olson objected. "And Kay was down at the school."

"I've been thinking about that," I said.

I walked over to Kay and nodded. "You could run out here after school closed at ten and get back to the office again without anyone noticing it."

Kay's eyes widened. "Jim, what are you saying?"

"You could call Larry and get him to come here, too. You knew about my habit of passing the house.

"But you couldn't sap Larry with a company wrench and kill him. Besides, you didn't need to. If you changed your mind and wanted the key back, you'd merely ask for it and he'd give it to you."

I pointed at Slade. "Looks like you're it!"

"You're crazy, you murdering fool!" he snapped. "I was at the garage. I got witnesses all evening to prove it."

"Yes," I said. "You were at the garage at seven when you called Kay and imitated Larry's voice. You told her to wait down at the school, just to make sure she wouldn't come home and blunder into the killing.

"Then, when Larry got off his run, you told him Kay had called the garage and left a message for him. Said he was to meet her here instead of downtown.

"That got Larry over here in a hurry. But you weren't far behind. After eleven, nobody comes to the garage but me. You had to take a chance on that one, but it was worth taking, wasn't it? Because of the key and the vault. Because you were certain the murder would be pinned on me.

“You hopped into your car, raced out here behind Larry, and slugged him with a wrench. Then you planted the trap for me. When I came you let me have it, lugged the body into my bus while I was still out, and raced back to the garage to wait for me.”

I turned to Olson. “I suggest you check the tire marks in the driveway against Slade’s coupe,” I said. “They’ll match.”

“What does that prove?” Slade shouted. “You’ve driven my car in here too tonight.”

“You’d like more proof?” I said. “I’ll oblige. First of all, I’ll have Olson examine all our fingernails. A chemist might make something out of what he finds underneath your nails, Slade. Do you want me to show them the hanging man?”

“Why, you dirty—”

HE CAME at me in a blur. There were six guns in the room, but they didn’t dare fire.

Slade was on top of me, and we went back over a chair together. There was screaming and shouting, but I was too busy to notice.

Slade’s hands were around my windpipe. They felt like a hangman’s knot. I tore at them and then punched upwards. I put my shoulders behind every blow. Something sagged, gave. The hands went limp. The noose wasn’t around my neck any more.

I picked Slade up and dusted him off.

“Here you are, Lieutenant,” I said. “Don’t forget to get a chemical analysis of the stuff under his nails. You’ll find paint. The same paint he uses to make signs with at the garage.”

Thatch stepped over to me. “One thing still puzzles me,” he said. “About that hanging figure?”

“That’s where the paint comes in,” I told him. “You see, Slade’s entire scheme depended on pinning the rap on me He had to figure out a way of luring me to the house. So he showed me the hanging man.”

I stepped over to the window and pulled down the shade. “There it is.”

And there it was. Olson let out a low whistle.

Painted on the windowshade was the cleverly executed figure of a man, dangling from a rope. The figure I saw as a shadow when I stopped the bus at midnight.

“Slade probably intended to come back and switch the shades later on,” I hazarded. “But now he won’t get the chance.”

I put my arm around Kay. “Cheer up, kid,” I said. “I’ll buy you a new windowshade tomorrow.”

The idea seemed to appeal to her. She looked up at me, but I looked at Slade. They were taking him out now. He glanced at the dangling figure on the windowshade as it swayed back and forth, flapping in the night breeze.

He shuddered a little. I knew what Slade reminded me of, then. He looked like a man who has come to the end of his rope.

THE END

The Bogy Man Will Get You

He was so very different from other men!

THE first time Nancy met Philip Ames, he didn't even notice her. Of course, you really couldn't blame him. After all, she was only fifteen—just a kid. But that was last year, and this time it was different.

Nancy's folks went back to Beaver Lake for the summer in June, and she could hardly wait to find out if Philip Ames still had his cottage down the road.

Hedy Schuster said he was up, all right. She said Mr. Ames lived at the cottage all year. Everybody knows how cold it gets at the lake in winter—practically out of this world. But Hedy Schuster knew, because she talked to Mr. Prentiss down at the store and he said so. That Prentiss was like an old woman, he had his nose in everybody's business.

The first chance she got, Nancy took a walk up the road past Philip Ames' cottage. The door was closed and there were curtains on tire windows, so she didn't see anything. But then, Mr. Ames wasn't around much in the daytime. Practically a hermit. Hedy Schuster said it was because he was writing his Ph.D. thesis for the university. He only shined around at night.

"But after all, that's the best time, isn't it?" Hedy Schuster said. It was just like her to make such a snotty remark to Nancy, knowing how it would burn her up.

Not that Nancy ever tried to hide the way she felt about Philip Ames. Why should she? After all, she was sixteen, she had a mind of her own. And Philip Ames was really something.

Nancy always liked tall men, and Philip Ames was positively statuesque. He had such luscious black hair and dark eyes and his skin was so white. That came from not getting any sun at the lake. She wondered how he would look in bathing trunks and if he would spend much time with her folks again this year. He was very friendly with them the last season. He seemed to like Ralph—but then, everybody liked her Dad. And Laura was glad to have company.

Of course, if her mother even suspected how Nancy felt about the man she would be positively furious. But she needn't know, yet. Not unless that Hedy Schuster gave it away, and she'd better not or Nancy would kill her.

Hedy knew some boys around on the other side of the lake who had a roadster, and she wanted Nancy to double-date some night, but the first few evenings Nancy stayed at the cottage. Of course she was hoping Philip Ames would come over, and she dressed very carefully; no bobby-socks or kid stuff, only her best slacks and one of those luscious sweaters Laura bought for her at Saks. Those sweaters really did something for her, and it was about time Mr. Philip Ames found it out.

But he didn't come over and he didn't come over, and it was almost a week now and Nancy was going stark raving goony because Hedy kept telling her what she was missing not coming along.

And then, Philip Ames came over. He was even better than she'd remembered—she'd forgotten all about that deep voice of his. A real man's voice, and he didn't laugh all the time like those repulsive young icks Hedy was so excited about. He really was reserved; you could tell he was deep. He was glad to see Ralph and Laura, but he didn't smile.

Then Laura said, "You remember our Nancy, don't you, Phil?" and he looked at her and nodded and then he just looked.

Honesty, it just sent shivers through her. You'd think she was a mere infant, standing there and trying to keep from blushing. But he didn't seem to notice that. He noticed other things, though, because when they all went out on the porch and sat down, he sat next to her and asked her all sorts of questions.

It wasn't that he was trying to be polite. Nancy could tell the difference. For the first time he was looking at her as a woman; she knew it. And she would never forget it, never. Some day they would both remember this moment together. Some day—

RALPH and Laura kept interrupting Philip with questions about his thesis. He said it was coming along and he hoped to finish it this summer. Then Ralph insisted on telling him about his old construction job, and Nancy knew he was just enduring it all. He wasn't really interested a bit.

Philip asked her why she didn't have much of a tan, and she said she wasn't going out much these days.

"I don't know what's gotten into her," Laura butted in. "She just mopes around the cottage all day, reading. I wish she'd get some fresh air."

"Oh, mother!" Nancy said. You'd think Laura was talking about a ten-year-old child or something.

"I don't get out very much myself these days," Philip said, rescuing her. "We serious students have to stick together. What say we go for a hike tomorrow evening? Like to see what's going on at the pavilion across the lake, Nancy?"

Would she? Imagine showing up with Philip when Hedy Schuster and her crowd was around. Why it would be—

"No objections, I hope?" Philip was asking Ralph and Laura now and it was OK, of course.

"All right, young lady. See you about eight, then."

That was all that mattered. Of course Ralph had to kid her later about her new boy-friend, and the next afternoon Laura made her promise on her bended knees that she'd be back before eleven. "After all, we don't really know very much about Mr. Ames. He seems like a very fine young man, but —"

"Please, mother! I hope you don't tell me about the bees and flowers."

Laura looked just a little bit shocked, but she didn't say any more, and Nancy went back to work on her hair.

She scarcely took time out for supper because the upsweep was so difficult. Her hair wasn't really long enough for an upsweep yet, but it added years to her appearance and it was worth it. After all, Philip was older. Twenty-seven? Twenty-eight? Certainly not thirty. Maybe she could ask him tonight. Or in a couple of nights. Because there would be other nights. The whole summer was ahead of them. Their summer.

At quarter to eight, Nancy was out on the porch, waiting. It would be just childish to pull that old gag about not being ready yet. Philip didn't deserve such treatment. So she was all ready when he came up the path.

"Good evening, my dear."

Yes. He said it. "My dear." Nancy was glad he couldn't see her face plainly in the shadows. The sun was just setting.

She started down the path to join him. "I'm all ready," she said.

Philip sort of backed away and looked down.

"I—I'm sorry," he mumbled. "Came around to tell you I couldn't make it tonight. Something came up all of a sudden—"

"Oh!"

"I hope you understand—"

Why did he keep backing away from her? What was the matter?

"Well, I'll have to be running along now. Some other time, perhaps."

Nancy just stood there with her mouth open. It was a brushoff, all right.

Who did he think he was, anyway? Was he crazy?

She wanted to say something but couldn't seem to think. It made her so mad she almost cried. The tears came into her eyes and she saw Philip sort of swimming away from her. The moon was just rising over the lake now, cutting the darkness. Philip was disappearing down the path.

All at once he was gone, and then she noticed this thing flying low, along the trees. It squeaked at her and came for her head.

It came straight from where Philip had been standing, and when it got close she could smell it, all rubbery, and see its little red glaring eyes.

It was a black bat.

Nancy didn't scream. She didn't make a sound, just ran straight into the house and up to the bedroom. She didn't begin to cry until she had her mouth biting into the pillow.

LAURA was really swell about the whole thing. She didn't say a word. She pretended she never even noticed. Nancy would have died if she did.

Besides, what was there to say?

The brush-off wasn't so bad. Nancy got over that. But when she was lying there in bed, in the middle of the night, she got the other idea. And you wouldn't even dare whisper about things like that.

But it had to be that way. He couldn't have just stood her up on the spur of the moment. He wanted to be with her.

Oh, she was being silly. Frightened of a bat. Just because Philip Ames lived up there all year and nobody saw him in the daytime and he broke a date when the moon came up and all at once this bat—

Maybe somebody would know something. That old woman of a Mr. Prentiss down at the store. Of course you couldn't come right out and ask him that.

Then Nancy thought of a way. The next morning she went down to the store and gave Mr. Prentiss the works.

"We're going to have Mr. Ames over for dinner this week and Mother wanted to find out if there's something special he might like—you know, some kind of canned stuff—"

Mr. Prentiss said it, then. She knew he would.

"He don't trade here at all. Never seen him in my place."

Yes. Philip Ames lived here all the year round, but he never came out in the daytime. And he never bought any food. Never. And it was a lie about having him over for dinner because come to think of it, Nancy had never seen him eat anything.

That proved it.

But—she had to be sure. Weren't there other tests?

In the afternoon Nancy made a date with Hedy Schuster to visit the boys across the lake. She was glad, because when she got home after dark, Ralph said he'd met Philip. Philip was coming over tonight for a while.

So Nancy was able to tell him she already had a date and wouldn't be there because she just simply could not break it.

Yes, she was glad. She couldn't face him tonight, after what happened and after—what she thought.

And also, that meant tonight would be a good chance to do what she planned. If Philip was out, she could go to the cottage.

IT WASN'T easy. Hedy was just ready to blow her top when Nancy broke the date. But she didn't ask any questions, and it was only about nine when Nancy sneaked back past the cottage.

Philip was in there, all right. Nancy went up the path then to his place. It was dark, and there were clouds over the moon. She almost fell flat on her face before she got to the door.

It was locked, anyway. But the window was open. Nancy took off the screen and crawled inside.

The cottage was just a cottage. She had a pencil flashlight and held it down low while she looked around. But there was nothing to see. Nothing!

Of course, the bed hadn't been slept in. At least, it was made pretty well for a man. And he didn't have any dishes or stuff. Not even a camp stove in the place. There were suits in the closet and a drawer full of clothes.

It gave Nancy a funny feeling to open his bureau and feel the shirts and socks and stuff, all lying there in stacks. Most of it was brand new.

There was no mirror above the bureau. There was no mirror in the bathroom, or anywhere else. Of course there wouldn't be, if—

But she had to be sure.

Nancy finally went over to the work table. There was a typewriter on it, and a big stack of manuscript on one side. Maybe he was writing a thesis, after all.

She ruffled through the pile of papers, looking for the title page. It was there.

"Some Notes Upon the Empirical Approach to Demonology in the Modern World."

Somehow, that shocked her more than anything else. It seemed to all tie in. Demonology. In the modern world, today. He was writing about demons, and—things.

Nancy knew now that she'd have to do something, tell somebody.

Yes. That was it. Tonight, after Philip left, she'd tell Laura. Tell her that Philip didn't eat and there were no mirrors and he was so pale and nobody saw him in the daytime and a bat flew out of the sum set.

Tell her that Philip was . . . a vampire.

NANCY never knew how she managed to get through that night after she told Laura. Laura was afraid she would go into hysterics, until she managed to deadpan. If Laura wanted to take it that way, let her. Some people are just too superior for their own good.

But Nancy wouldn't stop now. She couldn't. If her own mother acted that way, how could you expect anyone else to—?

There was only one thing left to do and that was see it through. At least Laura wouldn't say anything—she positively wouldn't dare.

So the next night, when she heard that Philip might drop it again, Nancy excused herself just in time. She waited outside until she saw Philip come up the path. It was cloudy again, but that suited her. Then she headed straight for the cottage down the path.

After she finished there, Nancy came back to their place. Philip was still talking with Laura and Ralph. She could hear him through the window.

"You're afraid of the dark, aren't you?

"Oh, but you are. I know all about you, do you understand? You were afraid of the dark when you were a child. Not because of robbers . . . or thieves . . . or murderers. Children don't think of such things. You were afraid of the dark because of . . . the Bogy Man!

"That's the term your parents used. Bogy Man. One of those smart, sophisticated, grown-up terms, designed to hide the terror behind it. But the terror exists.

"Because, when you were a child, you knew what the Bogy Man looked like. You would see him in your dreams—that black, grinning face with the wicked red eyes. You heard-,his buzzing voice mumbling to you in sleep, when you had nightmares. And you'd wake up, screaming for your mother.

"Admit it. You did scream, didn't you? And now that you're grown up, you laugh about it. Now you're ashamed of your fear.

"But—you're still afraid. You may have learned to sneer at witchcraft and demonology. You read slick, scientific explanations dismissing the basic phobias with a psychiatric phrase. Mythology, folklore, primitive ignorance—that's what tales of witches and wizards are, aren't they? There is no Satan, no Hell. Right?

"Yet somehow, you can't keep away from such thoughts. You will buy books about the supernatural and patronize horror movies, and visit spiritualists, and listen to ghost stories, and talk about your dreams, and speculate on the Faust legend. Even though you parrot the arguments you've learned—you can't keep away from the mysteries. And ever so often, you'll find yourself in the darkness with that deep fear; the fear which all bravado and pretending cannot drive from your soul.

"Because you know it's true. There are such things, such forces, such Evil. And . . . the Bogy Man will get you if you don't watch out!"

Philip laughed. “Now—in the face of all that—is it so difficult for you to understand why your daughter might think I’m a vampire?”

They all laughed. But Nancy didn’t laugh. She crouched under the window and bit her lip.

Laura had opened her trap, after all. And—to him! Probably blabbed everything; about the food and the bat and all the rest. Now they were having a good time over it.

“Damn them!” she muttered.

Philip had keen ears. She heard him get up and come to the window. There was no use in trying to hide. Nancy walked around to the porch and opened the door.

“Why, hello, my dear.”

“Nancy—back so soon?”

They were all grinning at her at once. She couldn’t look at them. Philip had a big smile on his face, and for the first time she noticed his teeth. His big, white teeth; the points hidden under his full red lips. That was all she could see—Philip’s teeth, gleaming at her.

Nancy made the sign of the cross and ran sobbing into her room.

HE next day they had it out.

Laura told her she was acting like a child. She had just embarrassed them to death.

“But why did you have to tell him about it?” Nancy wanted to know.

“Because he asked us.”

“Asked you?”

“Yes. Somebody told him you were making inquiries about him at the store.”

So that was it. That was why he came up with his long line about the Bogy Man. Oh, he w-as clever, all right. Making them think she was just pulling some kid stuff. Making them laugh at her.

It was no use talking to Laura at all, after that. She was just waiting to fly off the handle about the whole thing.

“Let’s skip it,” Nancy said, and went out.

She sat under the trees for a long time that afternoon, just trying to think things out.

After all, she could have made a mistake. There were lots of bats flying around at sunset. A man doesn't have to keep house for himself—he can always eat in restaurants. Maybe he did work all day on his thesis. You don't have to be a vampire to write about demonology. Many people have gleaming white teeth. And nobody had been bitten in the throat, or killed, or stuff like that. . . .

But something was wrong. She felt it. Nancy knew what Laura thought . . . that she was just burned up because Philip had brushed her off on the date. That she had been reading too much silly stuff in books. That she invented the whole thing just to make Philip notice her.

Well—it was true. She did want him to notice her. He was the most attractive man she'd ever met. If only it wasn't true. It couldn't be true. But Philip had no mirrors. . . .

She went on like that for hours. It was getting dark before she pulled herself together. Laura and Ralph would be going ahead with supper by now.

Nancy got up and started along the path near the lake. She had the jitters, all right; the shadows kept jumping around so, and she walked fast.

All at once something moved out of the Shadows up ahead. She nearly jumped out of her skin.

"Did I startle you?"

He was standing there.

"Sorry, I didn't mean to frighten you, my dear."

Just standing there, smiling at her.

"But say, I've been up at the house looking for you."

"For—me?"

"Yes. I wanted to talk to you. Let's take a walk, shall we?"

"Oh, I'm sorry. I have a date—"

"Too bad. I was hoping we might get together. You aren't angry with me about the other night, are you?"

“Not at all.” Nancy couldn’t figure out what the score was. Philip sounded like an ordinary drip, now. Well, she could handle that one.

They kept walking along the path. It was getting darker now, and she wondered if the clouds would lift. Not that she was really frightened, but—

Philip was rubbing his eye.

“What’s the matter?”

“Got a speck in my eye, or something. Have you got a mirror in your purse, my dear?”

“A—mirror?”

“Yes. If you please.”

NANCY’S hands trembled so she nearly dropped the purse. But she got the mirror out and gave it to him.

He looked straight into it and rubbed his eye.

Nancy leaned over his shoulder and saw his reflection. He had a reflection.

She didn’t know what she was doing, what she was saying. The words just blurted out. “You—you looked into the mirror!”

Philip smiled and handed the mirror back to her.

“Of course I did. And I found that sprig of hemlock on my doorknob last night, too. The one you put there when you sneaked off before coming into the cottage to make the sign of the cross at me.”

“Why—I—”

“Oh, don’t look so startled, Nancy! I know all about your ideas. You thought I was a vampire, didn’t you?”

She couldn’t say a word. She felt as if she would sink right into the ground.

But Philip grinned.

“Just because I work all day and eat in restaurants and walk at night, you wondered about me. My thesis had you puzzled too, didn’t it?

"But you're wrong, you know. Vampires wear long black cloaks and during the day they sleep in coffins or grave-earth. You didn't find any cloaks or coffins when you searched my cottage."

"But I—"

"I'm not angry with you, my dear. I just wanted you to get things straight. I wanted you to know that I can touch hemlock and look in mirrors and all the rest."

Nancy looked away. The clouds were lifting from the moon. Like the weight was lifting from her heart.

"I see," she whispered. "I guess you think I'm an awful dope, Philip."

"Not at all." He took her hand. A vampire's hand is cold, but his touch was warm. "I think you're a very lovely girl. You have beautiful hair, Nancy. Did you know that? Look—the moon is rising. Gleaming on your hair. I can see you, now. Nancy—you aren't afraid of me any more?"

"No, Philip. I never was afraid. Not really. I—I guess Laura was right. It was my subconscious."

"Subconscious? Scientific, aren't we?"

"You know. I must have thought up all this vampire stuff just to make you notice me. And besides, vampires are supposed to be tall, dark and handsome—like you—" Philip held her very close, then. "You're a very clever little girl, Nancy. Very clever. It's a pity you had to stir up such a fuss over nothing."

"But I didn't mean it, really. And it's all over now. Only Laura and Ralph know."

PHILIP didn't kiss her yet. He shook his head. "I'm afraid it isn't that simple after all. Like throwing a stone into a pool. Ripples."

"Ripples?"

"Laura and Ralph will talk to people.

Make a joke out of it. Laura has, already—she said something to Prentiss. Pretty soon people will start whispering. Wondering. A stranger is always a suspect, Nancy. A reputation is a very flimsy thing. It's no use, my dear. I shall have to clear out of here."

Nancy couldn't believe her ears.

"What do you care?" she whispered. "Let them talk. We'll just laugh at them."

"I'll laugh at them," said Philip. "You won't."

He held her very close and she couldn't see his face. He mumbled against her shoulder.

"Too bad you were such a meddling little fool, Nancy. But I can't let you get away now. It would spoil everything. You've guessed too much."

Nancy pulled away, but he held her. He was very strong.

"Philip! Let me go!"

He kept pulling her closer—closer—there was no escape.

The moonlight was full on his face now, and for the first time Nancy noticed the change.

"Philip—it's true, then! You are a vampire!"

"Oh no, my dear," he whispered. "I'm not a vampire. I'm . . . just a werewolf!"

Frozen Fear

You don't realize 'til you try how hard it is to chop up the human body

WALTER KRASS used to cut his fingernails over the kitchen sink.

Ruby would give him hell if she found any nail parings lying around. Ruby was like that. She enjoyed giving him hell in one form or another.

Krass was used to that, after four years of marriage.

But one afternoon he came home early from the office and found that Ruby had gone out. While rummaging around in a bureau drawer, looking for a tobacco pouch, Walter Krass happened to find some old nail parings.

They were imbedded in the body of a little wax doll—a tiny mannikin with a mop of brown hair and a curiously familiar face.

Walter Krass recognized his hair in the doll, and the features had been moulded to resemble his own.

Then he knew that Ruby was trying to kill him.

He looked at the little wax figure for a long moment, then dropped it into the drawer again and covered it with a pile of Ruby's handkerchiefs.

Krass padded out of the bedroom and sat down in the parlor. His pudgy little body slumped in the easy chair, and he ran stubby fingers through his sandy brown cowlick.

He felt shocked, but not surprised. Ruby had Cajun blood, and in her hatred of him she would resort to Cajun superstitions. He knew she hated him, of course.

But this attempt on his life was another matter.

It could mean only one thing. Somehow, Ruby had found out about Cynthia.

Yes. She knew. And her reaction was typical. Ruby would never think of a separation, or a divorce. She'd rather kill him.

Krass shrugged. He wasn't worried about wax images, or herb-poisons, or any of the childish Cajun methods she might employ. He could destroy dolls and avoid eating unusually flavored foods.

But he couldn't destroy her intention—her purpose. And sooner or later she would abandon her silly beliefs and resort to direct action. A knife, or a bullet. Yes, Ruby would do just that.

Unless—

Unless he acted first.

Suppose he just quietly turned his assets into cash and left town with Cynthia some night?

It was a tempting notion, but of course it wouldn't work. Ruby would find him. She'd put them on his trail; ruin him, ruin Cynthia. She'd make trouble for him as long as she lived.

As long as she lived—

Walter Krass snapped his fingers. They made a curious echoing sound in the room. Like a death-rattle.

Ruby's death-rattle, for instance. . . .

RUBY was out shopping again in the night Walter Krass brought the deepfreeze unit home.

He hauled it over on the trailer and sneaked it down to the cellar. It was hooked up and working by the time she arrived.

Ruby was all set to fix supper, but he suggested she come down to the cellar with him.

"I have a surprise for you," he announced.

Ruby loved surprises.

She lost no time following him down the cellar stairs. For once, she fairly bubbled with high spirits, and it pleased Krass to see her in such good humor.

“Oh Walter, I’m so excited! What can it be?”

Krass gestured and pointed around the cellar. “Take a look, Ruby. Notice anything different?”

Then she saw it.

“Walter! Not really? A deep-freeze unit—just what I’ve always wanted!”

“Like it?”

“Oh, it’s a wonderful surprise, darling!”

Krass stepped back as she bent over the unit. Then he cleared his throat.

“But that’s not the real surprise,” he said.

“Isn’t it?”

“No. I have another surprise for you, Ruby.”

“Another one? What is it?”

“This,” said Krass.

He gave her the real surprise, then. A poker, in the back of the head.

IT TOOK Krass a long time to do what he had to do—even though the cleaver was sharp. He had a pile of old newspapers and some butcher’s paper. It was necessary to make six separate bundles before he could fit Ruby’s remains into the freezing compartment of the small unit.

Krass was glad when he finished and put the packages in the deep-freeze. He turned the lock handle and sighed. He had never realized that chopping up a woman’s body would be such hard work.

Well, live and learn. . . .

Krass turned and surveyed the cellar. Everything was in order. A bit of mopping had done the trick as far as any stains were concerned. The poker was back in place, the cleaver was tucked away in the corner once more, and the papers disposed of down die drain.

The deep-freeze hummed away, squatting and purring in the gloom like some monstrous beast that has just dined well.

Walter Krass hummed a bit himself as he went upstairs. He was sweating, but merely from exertion—not from fright. Strange. He'd expected fright, shock, revulsion. Instead, there was just a sense of relief. Relief at the thought of escaping Ruby forever; escaping her animal vitality, her overwhelming energy, her frenzied possessiveness which used to assume the proportions of a positive aura.

Well, it was over now. And why should he be afraid? After all, he had a plan, and a good one.

Now it was time to put that plan into action.

Krass went straight to the telephone and called Cynthia.

She answered immediately; she had been waiting for the call.

Their conversation was short but sweet. Krass hung up the receiver knowing that all was well. They were rolling, now.

Early in the morning, Cynthia would be taking the train for Reno. She had papers, photographs, all the necessary items; even some of Ruby's clothes that Krass smuggled out for her. Cynthia had practised Ruby's mannerisms for hours, just as she concentrated on imitating her handwriting.

It was set. Cynthia, travelling under the name of Mrs. Ruby Krass, would arrive in Reno, establish residence, and obtain a divorce. Exit, Ruby.

And at this end—

All Krass had to do was wait. Wait for the summer to end. Wait for house-heating time. Then, a nice little fire in the furnace, stoked by six packages from the deep-freeze unit.

Exit, Ruby.

That was that. Sell the house, clear out, join Cynthia on the Coast. Everything was neatly wrapped up—just as neatly as those packages downstairs in the deepfreeze.

Krass took a drink on that.

It was too early to go to bed, so he had another. Then a third. After all, it had been a strain. He could admit that to himself, now. He deserved a little relaxation. Another drink, for instance—

That fourth drink brought relaxation. Krass leaned his head back in the armchair. His eyes closed. His mouth opened. Everything was quiet . . . very quiet. . . .

Except for the bumping.

THE sound seemed to come from the stairs—the cellar stairs. The noise didn't resemble footsteps at all; just a bumping. Something was flopping and thudding, and then it was rolling, rolling closer and closer.

Ruby's head rolled into the room.

Just her head.

It stopped about a yard away from where Krass was slouching in his chair. He could have stretched out his leg and touched the upturned face with his foot, if he wanted to.

He didn't want to.

The face glared at him, and then the lips parted. Lips don't part when the head is severed—but then, severed heads don't roll, either.

But here it was. And the lips were parted.

Krass heard her whispering.

"Can you hear me, Walter? You think I'm dead, don't you? You think you killed me and locked me away, forever. Well, you're wrong, Walter. You couldn't kill me. You couldn't lock me away.

"Oh, you killed my body all right, and locked that away. But you couldn't kill my hate. You can't lock my hatred away. It will seek you out, Walter—seek you out and destroy you!"

SHE was talking nonsense, melodramatic nonsense. Yes, the head Off the dead woman was talking nonsense, all right. But Krass listened, anyway.

He listened as Ruby's voice told him everything. All about his plans with Cynthia. All about her trip, and the divorce, and selling the house, and going away. She knew everything, it seemed.

"You meant to keep my body in the deep-freeze until fall, until you could build a fire in the furnace and burn it. That was a clever idea of yours, Walter.

"But it won't work. Because I'm not staying in that deep-freeze. My hatred won't let me. We Cajuns know how to hate, Walter. And we know how to kill—even from beyond the grave!

"You don't dare run away from this house and leave my body here. And you don't dare to build a fire until fall comes. It would arouse suspicion.

"So you're trapped here, Walter. Trapped, do you hear?"

Walter Krass didn't hear. The words were lost in the sound of his own gasping. It was the gasping that caused him to awake.

The minute he opened his eyes he knew it was a dream. There was nobody there with him—no head staring up.

But he had to be sure, quite sure.

That was why he went back down into the cellar. He cursed himself for a drunken, over-imaginative fool the minute he switched on the light down there. Naturally, everything was all right.

The deep-freeze hummed its merry little song over in the corner. The lock was still set.

Just out of curiosity, Krass turned the lock handle and slid the door back.

A wave of cold air hit his face as he bent and examined the packages. Nothing was missing, of course. All six of the bundles were still there.

Except that the big package . . . the round package . . . the one Krass had put on the bottom . . . was now right on top!

KRASS got out of the cellar, fast, but not until he made sure that the deepfreeze was securely locked once more.

By the time he got upstairs again he knew it was just a mistake. It had to be. It was just a nightmare—the voice of his own conscience.

The next morning Krass felt all right again. He phoned Cynthia's apartment. No answer. That was good—it meant she had really left for Reno. Things would work out now, if only he kept his nerve.

He put down the telephone and went out to the kitchen to make breakfast.

It was then that he saw it, lying on the floor near the cellar steps.

It wasn't much to look at. Just a little strip of butcher's paper—a little, bloody strip of butcher's paper that might have come off a bundle of meat!

Krass was a brave man. He didn't gasp, or faint, or hide under the bed.

He marched down the steps into the cellar and opened the deep-freeze unit. He didn't have to unlock it—it was unlocked.

There were only five packages in the unit now.

One of the bundles was missing!

Krass turned away, hanging onto the edge of the deep-freeze for support. He locked it and walked over to the corner to pick up the cleaver.

Then, cleaver in hand, he began to search the cellar.

He didn't even dare admit to himself just what he was looking for. It had been a long, thin package—and he could imagine something crawling around in the cellar shadows like a big white snake. But he couldn't find it.

After a while, Krass went upstairs. He still carried the cleaver, just in case. But it wasn't upstairs. It wasn't anywhere. It was hiding. Yes, hiding.

Sooner or later, he'd fall asleep. Then it would come out. It would slither across the floor, wind around his neck and strangle him.

Yes—it was no dream. Ruby's body was still alive down there; alive and filled with hate.

She was right. Krass couldn't go away, because they'd break in sooner or later and find her there. He couldn't light a fire, either, in midsummer.

So he would have to-stay here. That's what she wanted. He would stay here and fall asleep, and then she'd—

No. It mustn’t be that way.

Better to take the risk and run away. If he was clever, perhaps they wouldn’t find him. Ruby’s absence was accounted for by Cynthia, posing as her in Reno.

Maybe if he spread the story of the “divorce” around and said he was leaving to follow Ruby and persuade her to return—that might do the trick. Then he could meet Cynthia there and they’d hide out together. They could go to Mexico, anywhere.

Yes. That was the way. The only way. And he’d better not wait any longer.

“Trapped, do you hear me?”

Well, he wouldn’t stay trapped. He’d get out, now.

Krass went upstairs and started packing his suitcase. There was no time for a careful selection—he took what clothes and articles he really needed and let the rest go. He’d travel light and travel fast.

The case held everything he needed, except money. That was in the wall-safe in the dining-room he’d converted into a “library.”

He lugged his suitcase downstairs to the hall, set it down, and went into the library to get the cash. There was about eight hundred dollars in small bills, plus his bonds, insurance policies, and bank book. He’d stop at the bank on his way to the office. Better think up a good sob-story for the bunch down there.

It seemed to him, as he turned the corner, that a shadow scuttled across the floor. But shadows don’t scuttle. And shadows don’t make a thumping noise. . . .

Walter Krass stared down at his suitcase. It wasn’t locked and closed any more. It was open. Open—and unpacked!

His clothing lay littered all over the hall floor.

And from the cellar stairs came the sound of thumping . . . a faint, receding thumping. . . .

Yes. Something was crawling back into the cellar. He couldn’t let it get away this time. It could open the windows, it could follow him. But he wouldn’t permit it to escape!

Krass ran upstairs to the bedroom. He’d left the cleaver on the bed. This time he’d make a thorough search. First of all, he’d take all the rest of the packages out of the deep-freeze and chop them to bits. Then he’d find the missing bundle and give it the same treatment.

Chop everything into little bits. That was the way!

Panting heavily, he ran down the stairs and made for the cellar steps. He shifted the cleaver to his left hand as he clicked on the cellar light switch. Now he could see everything down there. Nothing would escape him. Nothing would escape the cleaver.

The deep-freeze unit hummed. The droning seemed to blur into a mocking frenzy of sound as Krass slid the lid open and peered down into the cold depths.

It was empty.

The packages were gone. All the packages were gone!

Krass straightened up. He gripped the handle of the cleaver and whirled around to face the cellar walls.

“I’m not afraid,” he shouted. “I know you’re down here! But I have the cleaver. Before I leave, I’ll find you—and chop you into bits!”

A sharp click put a period to his words.

It was the click of the wall-switch at the head of the stairs. The lights had been turned out!

“Ruby!” he shrieked. “Ruby—you’ve turned out the lights. But I’ll find you! I can still hear you, Ruby!”

It was true. He could hear.

The rustling was all around him. A soft, brittle sound, like the unwrapping of paper from a parcel. From several parcels.

There was a slithering, too, and a thumping.

Krass edged back until he stood against the wall. He whirled the cleaver around in darkness. He began to swing it in a wide arc across the floor at his feet.

But the thudding and bumping went on. It came closer, and closer.

Suddenly Krass began to chop at the floor with his cleaver. He rasped out great racking gouts of laughter as he hacked away at the air.

Something was slithering around behind him. He felt the coldness all over him now . . . the touch of icy fingers, the kiss of frigid lips, the clammy caress of a frozen hand. And then the icy band was tight around his neck.

The scream was cut off. The cleaver clattered to the floor. Krass felt the coldness constricting his windpipe, felt himself falling back into a greater coldness. He fell into the coldness but he didn't know, because everything was freezing, freezing. . . .

IT WAS weeks later when Cynthia was exposed as an impostor in Reno, and almost a month had passed before they actually broke into the Krass residence.

Even after entering the house, it took fifteen minutes of preliminary searching before Lieutenant Lee of the Homicide Squad went down into the cellar.

Another fifteen minutes were spent in frantic conjecture and incredulous surmise.

It was then, and only then, that Lee put through his phone call.

"Hello . . . this Burke? Lee, Homicide. Yes . . . we're at the house now. Found a body in the cellar—locked in a deep-freeze unit.

"No . . . it was a man. Walter Krass. "His wife? Yeah . . . we found her, all right. Chopped into pieces, lying all around the deep-freeze. All but her right arm.

"Missing? No, it isn't missing. It's on top of the deep-freeze. I said, it's on top of the deep-freeze, holding the lock shut.

"I don't know how to tell you this . . . but it almost looks like that arm pushed Walter Krass into the deep-freeze and then—locked him in!"

The Man Who Told The Truth

Have you ever sat on the edge of your bed and talked to a green mist?

WHEN Hartwood came in, it seemed that a smothering presence filled the room.

He figured it must be a combination of the liquor and the closed windows that affected him. But when he threw the windows open, the oppression continued. It was like a heavy weight pressing him from all sides.

Hartwood sat down on the bed, his head cupped between his hands. He noticed by the alarm dock on his dresser that it was already past two o'clock. He should have been in bed four hours ago. If he had a hangover tomorrow, and showed it, old Brenner would be on his neck harder than ever.

He tried to get up and could not. It was much pleasanter to sit on the edge of the bed with his head in his hands. Dreamily, he watched the hands on the alarm clock creep ahead another five minutes.

Then he glanced up, sharply, head clearing abruptly. There was something wrong with the air in his room. He couldn't see anything—but he felt it. A definite, palpable vibration. Heaviness. Pressing down. It wasn't a heaviness in his head. It came from outside.

Intense, intolerable pressure.

And then . . . it was gone.

Yes, just like that.

The sense of oppressive heaviness departed, as though whatever had come into the atmosphere was gradually adjusting itself to conditions there. Within a few minutes Hartwood felt light, gay, happy.

If he could only feel like this all the time, instead of having to drudge eight hours a day at Swazey and Sloan’s for thirty bucks a week! He had been born for better things, but he never got toe breaks.

Hard-luck Hartwood. That was him, all right. No justice at all. No wonder he was drinking more and more lately.

But now, he felt good. It was as though he had a hunch; a hunch that tomorrow would bring better things. Of. course it was all a lot of malarkey. Tomorrow he’d be back where old Brenner could get at him.

Old Brenner, his boss, just loved to ride him. Hartwood had to admit that he was afraid of Brenner. The old crab could have Hartwood fired any time he felt like it. He knew it and Hartwood knew it.

Hartwood often dreamed of what he would do to Brenner if he ever got him in his power.

“Brenner,” he said aloud, “is a dirty, stinking rat.”

“That’s right,” a voice said. “That’s a hundred per cent right.”

Hartwood jumped from toe bed.

HE LOOKED around. The room was empty, of course, save for his presence. There was nobody else there. There couldn’t be.

The closet door was open. He peered inside. The closet was untenanted, too. Hartwood chuckled, harshly.

“That rye’s got a helluva kick,” he murmured.

Hartwood blinked at toe door. Gradually he made out a greenish mist. It was about three feet high, cone-shaped, with the big end at the top and toe point on the floor. At times it faded so that he could not see it at all, and never was he able to see it dearly. It swayed back and forth with a gentle, oscillating motion.

The voice came from this cone. It was a high voice, and it carried no echo. It was almost as though toe voice came from within Hartwood's head. But he saw toe mist—

"Who are you?" Hartwood whispered. "Never mind who I am," toe voice said. "I want to talk to you, and if you'll listen, you'll profit."

Hartwood shook his head. It was a dream, but a honey! Sitting on the edge of his bed talking to a green mist! Old Brenner had always said he was crazy. But he might as well see toe dream through.

"What gives?" he asked.

"You don't like your life, do you, Hartwood? That job—that thirty-a-week job—gets you down, as you would say? You would like to be rich, powerful?"

"Sure. I'd give anything—"

"We need not discuss giving. I do not take gifts," said the voice. "That is merely an unkind rumor. I prefer to bestow gifts . . . to those I feel deserving of them. You are such a man, Hartwood. I have decided to give you riches and power."

"How?"

"From this night on everything you say, provided that it can take place in the future and has not already happened, will happen. All you need to do is say it."

"Everything I say is going to come true," Hartwood repeated cynically. "Do you know any more fairy tales?"

"That's not a fairy tale. I can give you that power, but it will have to be without reservations. Everything you say is going to come true. You might test it by saying you won't have a hangover in the morning."

"I won't have a hangover in toe morning," Hartwood said, and fell over asleep.

2.

THE next morning Hartwood jumped out of bed with toe first tinkle of toe alarm clock. He ran across the room, shut the alarm off, and closed the window before he realized that he had been drinking heavily last night and had had only three hours sleep. He should be very tired and have a headache. Instead, he had never felt keener or more alive.

Thoughtfully, as the dream of last night came back to him, he sat down on the edge of the bed and took his pajamas off. It had, of course, been a dream—but what a wow of a dream! Everything he said, he remembered, was going to come true. He'd have to go back to the same place tonight for more of the same rye. It couldn't be bad if it left this kind of an effect.

But, by the time he had shaved and washed, thoughts of the day ahead brought depression. It would be another endless eight hours at Swazey and Sloan's under the carping watchfulness of Old Brenner. Hartwood groaned. He had worked nine years for Swazey and Sloan, and should be doing something besides menial tasks. Other people got better things.

It had never occurred to Hartwood that he might possibly get something better if he wasn't too lazy to work for it.

Dressed, he left his room and walked down to Joe's lunch wagon. He was hungry, and had just remembered that he had wanted one more drink last night and couldn't buy it because he had no more money. He already had enough on the cuff at the lunch wagon so that Joe wouldn't trust him with any more. But he would see if he couldn't work one more dodge. He'd order something to eat and jump for the door when he was finished. He'd have to move fast, though. Joe had told him the last time he pulled a swifty what would happen if he tried it again—and Joe weighed a hundred and ninety pounds.

Hartwood entered the lunch wagon and sat down at the counter. He tried to look as though he had money, but felt that he was not putting it across. Joe had been too many years in the business not to be able to size a moocher up pretty accurately. Still, Hartwood was hungry.

“Bacon and eggs and a cup of coffee,” he said.

Joe slid the plate down the counter, shoved a cup of coffee at him, and strolled out from behind the counter to take a stance in front of the door. Hartwood watched him from the corner of his eye as he ate. Joe knew what he intended to try, and was there to see that he didn’t try it. Hartwood dawdled over his food in a desperate effort to gain time. When he was finished, Joe still stood. Hartwood plunged his hand deep into his inside coat pocket for some papers he had there. By looking at them he might stall until another customer came in and Joe had to go behind the counter again.

“Wish I had four bits,” he muttered.

But—what was this? Hartwood’s fingers touched a hard round something and he drew out half a dollar! He sighed in relief. He must have put it in there and forgotten it. Casually he dropped the coin on the counter, noting with malicious pleasure the chagrin on Joe’s face as he rang it up and handed back fifteen cents change.

Hartwood returned to the street, so pleased with this little triumph that the entire day assumed a brighter hue. He did not in any way connect the propitious finding of the half dollar with the events of last night. They existed for him now only as an amusing memory induced by too much whiskey.

He halted at an intersection waiting for the light to change. There was no policeman there. When the light was in his favor Hartwood stepped from the curb—and instantly leaped back to escape by inches a taxi that was cutting through the light. Hartwood glared at it as it careened down the street.

“I hope you break your neck!” he muttered viciously.

The words were scarcely out of his mouth when the taxi swerved in its wild flight, seemed to hang in the air for the fraction of a second, and with a thunderous crash and a shattering of glass went head on into a concrete light pole. Hartwood ran down. The driver of the cab sat hunched over his wheel, his head hanging at a grotesque angle.

Hartwood stared until he was waved on by one of the blue uniformed police, a half dozen of which seemed to have appeared from nowhere. For a few minutes he walked silently, overawed as he remembered what the cone of green mist had said to him. He shrugged. There couldn't be anything to it. The lack of a hangover, the finding of the half dollar, and the wrecking of the taxi were all coincidence. Well, whether he'd had anything to do with it or not, one fresh taxi pilot had got what was coming to him.

But he was at Swazey and Sloan's now. In guilty panic he glanced up at the clock in the hall and realized that he was ten minutes late again. But maybe he could still get in without being seen by Old Brenner. Hartwood opened the door quietly, and made no noise as he hung his hat and coat on the rack. He tried to slip down to his desk, but just then Old Brenner came out of his office. Hartwood grabbed a ledger and Old Brenner was standing over him.

Hartwood!" he snapped. "This is the third time in three weeks you've been late."

Hartwood looked down to conceal the hate and loathing in his eyes.

"Yes, sir," he said meekly.

"This is your last chance," Old Brenner went on. "If you're late again, you'll be needing another job."

"Yes, sir," Hartwood said again.

"Such things aren't necessary. You know it and I know it."

"Yes, sir."

But, when Old Brenner had gone, Hartwood thrust his tongue to the side of his cheek.

"What you know," he growled. "You don't know a damn thing."

3.

ALL MORNING Hartwood worked hard without speaking. He wasn't popular in the office, but that was all right with him because he didn't like anybody there either. They were all fools, Hartwood thought. They worked hard without complaining, studied in their spare time, and thought to get somewhere by pushing pencils up and down Swazey and Sloan's ledgers. Swazey and Sloan took all the profits. They had the summer homes, the stables of horses, the chauffeur-driven limousines. All the rest of them did was make the money for Swazey and Sloan.

It was quarter to twelve when Swazey stepped to the door of his office—Sloan was on the road most of the time. Hartwood glanced at Swazey from under his eye shade. The old horse pretended to be quite democratic. He called all the office force by their first names and slapped them on the back at Christmas time. But he ruled Swazey and Sloan with an iron hand. What Hartwood wouldn't give to be in his place!

"Will somebody tell Mr. Brenner that I'd like to see him?" Swazey called.

Pretense, Hartwood decided. Old Swazey had a secretary to run his errands for him, and a buzzer that he could have used to call Brenner, but he preferred to do things this way so the office force would think him a regular fellow and give the last ounce of sweat they had for the glory of Swazey and Sloan. Hartwood saw a girl get up and open the door of Brenner's office. He heard her call.

"Mr. Brenner."

There was no answer. Hartwood saw the girl go a little farther into the office and heard her call again. Then she screamed, and came screaming out of the office with her hands covering her face. Old Swazey appeared again, bent over the girl who had sunk down in a chair and was moaning incoherently. She raised a trembling hand, and pointed at Brenner's office. Then Hartwood found himself, along with the seven other men in the office and Swazey, entering Brenner's office. The girls made an anxious ring in the background.

Old Brenner slumped in his swivel chair with his hands trailing down the sides. His eyes were open and staring, and except for the spasmodic heaving of his chest, he was absolutely motionless. Swazey bent over him.

“Brenner!” he shouted.

There was no answer. Swazey felt his pulse, then together with Hartwood and Jack Dom lifted Old Brenner from his chair and carried him to a couch in an adjoining office. The old man lay full length and motionless there. Hartwood stared at him, puzzled. Swazey shook his head.

“It looks like a sudden stroke. Did any of you notice whether he seemed to be feeling ill this morning?”

“He talked to Hartwood,” Jack Dorn said.

“I didn’t notice anything unusual about him,” Hartwood said. “He seemed all right when he talked to me.”

A bustling little doctor with a black instrument bag in his hand came into the office. He took Old Brenner’s temperature, checked his heart and reflexes.

“I can’t understand it,” he said, his brow wrinkling in a frown. “Physically he seems perfect. I never saw a case exactly like it fore. It’s just as though a black shade has been drawn over his mind and shut out everything. He doesn’t know enough to raise a hand, or turn his head, or speak—he’s exactly like a new-born baby. He breathes and his heart beats because that’s involuntary.”

AN ELECTRIC shock stung Hartwood.

He remembered the words he had muttered when Brenner left him. “You don’t know a damn thing.” Brenner didn’t know a thing! Hartwood gasped, and staggered to the window. He threw it open; let the cool air caress his perspiring cheek. The hangover, the half dollar, and the taxi wreck could have been coincidence. But were they? And, if they were, could this possibly be? Hartwood seemed to be sitting in his room watching with cynical eyes a cone of green mist. Again he heard a voice emerging from that cone.

“From this night on everything you say is going to come true.”

Hartwood felt Swazey's arm across his shoulders, heard Swazey's sympathetic voice.

"I know how you feel Hartwood. The firm will have suffered a severe loss if Mr. Brenner doesn't recover. But, after all, such things happen. I would suggest that you take an hour or two off until you feel better." Dazed, Hartwood walked out of the office. He must be crazy, he told himself. He was crazy. This couldn't have happened. Before long he would wake up in his room with a hangover and have to hurry to get to work on time. He looked uneasily to the right and left as he walked out to see if anybody would look at him and comment. Nobody did. The sudden trance that had stricken Old Brenner was so much the topic of conversation that nobody had time for anything else.

Hartwood was not hungry and did not even think of food as he descended to the street. His whole mind was occupied with the cone of green mist and what it had said to him. He slid a hand into his pocket to pinch himself. The pain was real enough. A traffic cop in the middle of the street shouted at him.

"Oh shut up," Hartwood muttered.

The cop halted in the middle of his tirade and swung to halt another line of cars. Hartwood gasped again. Everything couldn't be just happening this way. A man didn't encounter that much coincidence in an entire life. There had to be something to it!

Hartwood continued to a park and sat down on a bench facing a lagoon. He was mightily thrilled, but more confused. He would have to have time to think. If he, Charles Hartwood, could make something real simply by saying it—If everything he said came true—The possibilities were so dazzling that his mind could not grasp any of them.

Vaguely he saw a couple of swans swimming about on the lagoon. For a moment Hartwood was tempted to say that the biggest swan would sink into the water, but he checked himself. If it didn't work the disappointment right at this moment would be too keen.

Crazy or not, he was going to be a little king for the next hour. He was going to believe that anything he said would come true. But he was not going to delude himself for very long. Of the men and women in the office, there were at least twenty whom Old Swazey would pick to fill Brenner's job before he got around to Hartwood. If by saying he was going to get Brenner's job, Hartwood got it, he would know that what had happened last night was more than a drunkard's dream. If he didn't get it, he would know that everything that had happened today would have happened anyway.

"I'll get Brenner's job," he said.

HARTWOOD was still breathless and shaken when he got back to the office. He sank down at his desk, but opened no ledgers. Around him the office hummed busily. Brenner was just another man in a fairly big organization, and that organization could not pause for very long because another man had gone out of it. Hartwood thought of the far flung offices and factories of Swazey and Sloan. This office was only the headquarters, the brain cell that sent impulses out to other offices who in turn transmitted them to twenty thousand people. For nine years Hartwood had been just another little cog in this big machine. This afternoon he might take his first step up in it Tomorrow—Who knew what could happen tomorrow?

Nevertheless Hartwood was surprised when Swazey's secretary came out of the office to his desk.

"Mr. Swazey would like to see you," she said.

Hartwood's face colored when he stood up, and his heart was pounding. He saw about him the faces of the people he had worked with all these years. They were surprised, resentful, amused. All of them knew that Swazey would have to appoint somebody to carry on in Brenner's place. None of them thought it could be Hartwood.

The secretary led Hartwood through her office into Swazey's and returned to her desk. Hartwood was nervous when he faced Swazey alone. Maybe Old Brenner had said something before he passed out.

"Mr. Hartwood," Swazey said finally, "you have been with the firm a fairly long time?"

"Nine years," Hartwood murmured.

He sensed something here that was not as it should be. In the first place Old Swazey had called him Mr. Hartwood. Never before had Hartwood heard him call anybody mister. But that wasn't all. Swazey, ruler of millions of dollars, actually seemed afraid of him! Hartwood looked for the trap. Surely he was not important enough and had never done anything important enough to warrant fear on Old Swazey's part. Maybe this was the way men got promoted—or fired.

"Nine years is a long time to work without recognition," Swazey said. "But this firm rewards its faithful workers. Mr. Hartwood, do you think you could take Mr. Brenner's place?"

"Yes!"

"Hm—m," Old Swazey sat back. "Then the place is yours, Mr. Hartwood."

Hartwood watched him through narrowed eyes, but his mind was a leaping, exulting, mad thing. Swazey was not offering him this job because he wanted to or because he thought Hartwood was the best man for it. There was something pushing Swazey, and Hartwood thought he knew what it was. He hadn't the least idea as to the identity of his extraordinary visitor last night. It was enough that it was watching over Hartwood, was powerful enough to make Old Swazey afraid of him.

"Thank you," he said dryly.

"Very well, Mr. Hartwood. Probably you are already acquainted with (be policies of the firm, but I'll review them for you. It's always been our aim to pay our employees a living wage. We consider it fair to demand efficiency, but we pay for it. And, which is very important, we ask that no man in a key position do anything to injure the unity of the firm as a whole. Your job—"

"Listen," Hartwood said gruffly, "if I'm in charge, I issue my own orders. Got it?" Hartwood sat back, amazed and a little appalled by what he had said. But something had told him that now or never was the time to cast the die. With the acquired shrewdness of one who all his life has barely skinned through by seizing every little advantage, he had sensed that Old Swazey had some reason to fear him. When a man was afraid of another anything could be done with him. Breathlessly he awaited Old Swazey's reaction.

"That's quite all right, Mr. Hartwood," he said at last. "You're in full charge." Hartwood's brain was a dizzy whirl when he left Old Swazey to go into the office that until this morning had been occupied by Brenner. He still didn't know what had happened, couldn't realize that it had happened. He knew only that, after a lifetime of resenting those in authority, at last he was in authority himself!

He still hadn't any definite plans when, at six o'clock, he left the office. The sudden respect for him that had overtaken Jack Dorn and the rest of the office force was scarcely noticed. Hartwood wanted to be by himself, wanted seclusion so that he could think and plan.

His pocket was full of money now. Hartwood dropped into the lunch wagon and ordered and ate a plate of beans. Absently he laid a twenty-dollar bill on the counter, and told Joe to take out what Hartwood owed him. Ordinarily the bill would have been a matter for bitter quibbling. Now Hartwood paid no attention to it. He wanted no liquor tonight. He was already drunk with this new power that was his.

Hartwood climbed to his room, and sat on the edge of bed staring at the wall. His mind was a tangle of so many things that he could not separate one from the other. They came running and leaping at him and went away again. Hartwood wanted them all. But at the same time a thread of caution ran through the disordered pattern. If he asked for too many things at once there might be a conflict and he would lose all. Big things—Big things—

What were they? The biggest thing he could even begin to have any clear grasp of was Swazey and Sloan. He didn't know exactly how big that was, but he decided that he would get it first.

"Tomorrow," he said, "I'll be boss of Swazey and Sloan."

HE WAS out of bed very early. Again he felt fresh and alert, but again he was inclined to doubt that anything like this had happened or was happening. Oh, yes—he knew all about yesterday. But that was merely one day that would stand forever cameo clear against the drab pattern of a man's life. All those things would have happened anyway. He could have gotten the promotion simply because he had worked a long time for Swazey and Sloan, and Old Swazey could have considered that he was the best man for the job.

He had thought that Old Swazey was afraid of him because the offer of promotion had come like a bombshell and he hadn't been able to see straight or think clearly. Swazey hadn't fired him because he had realized that Hartwood, naturally, would be excited about his new job.

Hartwood forced himself into some restraint, but in spite of that he was at the office half an hour early. Because of long established habit he nearly dropped info the chair at his old desk. But he remembered in time and continued on to Brenner's office. There he sat down in the swivel chair and waited.

He was calm now, had full possession of himself. Yes, everything had happened naturally. If it had been a little startling, that was not surprising. But at least he was in charge of the office and all those snakes who had jeered at him for years could start watching their steps. His secretary came in, greeted him, and went to her own desk.

Hartwood opened his door a few minutes before eight, but closed it disappointed. Everybody had come in on time and he hadn't any excuse for bawling anyone out.

Well, he would have an excuse for tying into somebody before the day was finished or his name wasn't Hartwood. Absently he pulled open a drawer of the desk and began to thumb through the papers there. The buzzer on the secretary's desk shuddered. Hartwood saw her pick up the listening tube.

"Yes?" All right. I'll tell him, Mr. Swazey."

She turned to Hartwood.

"Mr. Swazey would like to see you, Mr. Hartward."

For a moment Hartwood remained in the swivel chair. Swazey wanted to see him, did he? Well, all right, but it had been fun while it lasted. Besides, the most Swazey would probably do was send him back to his old job. Hartwood stamped out of his office into Swazey's.

Old Swazey sat behind his desk. Hartwood looked at him sharply. The old man's face was gray and his eyes were red and very weary. Dozens of cigarette butts lay on trays on the desk. He had probably been here all night.

"Mr. Hartwood," Old Swazey spoke in a husky whisper, "I don't want you to think there's been any plotting against you."

"I don't think so," Hartwood said, puzzled.

Old Swazey smiled tiredly. "Very well, Mr. Hartwood. I had hoped you'd take it in this spirit and are able to forgive an old man. But Mr. Sloan and I built this business up. Mr. Hartwood, listen to me just a few minutes before you take over. There are undeniable advantages to being in a position like mine and Mr. Sloan's. But there's a broader view than that.

"We have twenty thousand people in various capacities on our payrolls. That means we take care of approximately eighty thousand. If you'll continue to take care of those people as we have, to maintain the good wages we pay them, and to help them maintain the standard of living they are accustomed to, both Mr. Sloan and myself offer to place ourselves at your disposal without recompense."

Hartwood leaped to his feet. "Are you crazy?" he demanded bluntly.

Another shade of weariness seemed to shroud those already on Old Swazey's face.

"I'm sorry, but I had to say it, Mr. Hartwood. Of course, you may do as your judgment decides. I now turn over to you fifty-one per cent of die stock of Swazey and Sloan. I might add that yesterday afternoon I was quite sure you were going to get it. Congratulations, Mr. Hartwood."

Harfwood's jaw hung slack. His eyes bulged as he stared past Swazey's head through the window.

It worked! It was so! Everything he said came true!

Suddenly everything speeded up, as though a film were unreeling through his brain. He was thinking now of the things he could say . . . the things that could come true. . . .

"I will live forever."

"I will rule the world."

"Everybody on earth becomes my slave."

"I am greater than G—"

It was too much. His mind couldn't encompass it. Perhaps because the atmosphere was suddenly so heavy, so very heavy. . . .

Hartwood blinked at Old Swazey, trying to grope for a word, a phrase, something fitting to the newly-created Lord of the World. But all he could do was bring his hand down on the desk and call forth one of his stock expressions.

"Well, I'll be damned!" said Hartwood. The next instant he was on the floor, and Old Swazey was staring at a dead man who had been alive a minute ago. Hartwood's face held the look of one who knew, just before he died, that his soul must suffer all the torments of hell.

Tree's a Crowd

Lefty Feep had never experienced such an unhappy experience as this —he became a tree; believe it or not!

WHEN people ask me, "What brings you to Jack's Shack?" I usually answer, "A bicycle."

This is not strictly true. But I certainly don't want to admit I go there for the food they serve. And of course, I can't say I go there to meet Lefty Feep.

Not that I have anything against Mr. Feep. It's just that if I go to Jack's Shack and order a beef sandwich, Lefty Feep is sure to be there. So instead of beef, I get tongue. Lefty always has plenty of tongue in his cheek. Plenty of cheek, too.

That's why I've come to sneak into the restaurant at odd hours, hoping Lefty Feep won't be around to strike up a conversation.

The other day I decided on an early breakfast. Knowing Mr. Feep loves his night life, I figured he wouldn't be up and around at 7 a.m. I strode into Jack's Shack, ordered my meal, and began to eat.

"Is this seat vacant?" chirped a familiar voice.

"Vacant as your mind," I snapped, recognizing the tonsil-splitting tones of Lefty Feep.

Feep grinned and sat down opposite me. I raised my eyes cautiously—a good policy, for his clothes are apt to blind the unprepared eyes of a beholder.

But today Feep had gone conservative. He wore a neat purple hat with a green band, a yellow shirt, orange tie, and a very mild sky-blue suit with pink stripes.

“Where do you stare?” he inquired, noting my shocked glance at his clothing. “Appraise me of your gaze.”

I covered up hastily. “Why, I’m not staring at you,” I protested. “I was just wondering what on earth you are doing up at such an early hour in the morning.”

“The early worm catches the bird,” grinned Feep. “It is all a part of my new system.”

“New system?”

“Of course. It is very sensible to get up early,” Feep told me. “These mornings I am out of bed by 6 o’clock.”

“Really?”

“Of course. I am up at 6. I am shaved, dressed, and down here eating breakfast by 6:30. By 7 o’clock I am all through, and back in bed again. Very sensible.”

I blinked and shrugged. “Oh well,” I sighed. “What are you eating today?”

“I do not pick my starting selections yet.”

“How about some nice breakfast food?” I suggested.

Feep winced and half-rose from his seat, glaring wildly.

“I do not wish to be rude or crude, but I will not touch breakfast food!” he yelled.

“Why not? Everybody eats it.”

“Never!” Feep groaned. “I do not wish to start a feud about the food. Let me tell you just why I scorn such corn in the early mom.”

“Don’t tell me there’s a story connected with it,” I sighed.

“There is a story disconnected with it,” Feep replied.

“Some other time,” I said hastily. “I’m not in the mood, just now. I didn’t sleep so well last night and—”

“This is a bedtime story,” insisted Lefty Feep. “So just lie down and listen.”

“I’ll do the listening if you’ll do the lying,” I answered.

Lefty Feep commenced to grin and wobble his chin. I closed my eyes and listened, wishing I could close my ears.

Feep told his tale.

ONE morning a couple of months ago I am running up a high score on the snore when a telephone rings and brings me one of those things.

I shake and awake and grab the receiver in a fever.

“Hello?” I suggest.

“Lefty Feep, you lowdown, good-for-nothing hound! Do you know who this is?”

“I do not recognize the name, but the manner is familiar,” I reply.

“This is Joyce.”

“All right, Joyce—make with the voice,” I groan.

“Listen to me, you scoundrel! You’re three months behind on your alimony payments, and unless you send me a check, I’ll put you in jail. Make up your mind now. Which do you prefer—checks or stripes?”

“I will be only too happy to take care of you, dear,” I mutter. “With an axe.” This last I repeat under my breath. But Joyce is so busy giving me the loose abuse that she doesn’t notice. I hang up on her and hang my head.

There is no more reason to lay in the hay. I sit there thinking that everybody makes mistakes, but I do worse than that. I not only make mistakes, I marry them. And Joyce is my ex-wife. Now she is handing me the phoney boloney about alimony, and I am in a tight spot. I have large quantities of no money at all, so how will I send her a check? With the rubber shortage, I cannot even give her one that bounces.

I am so discouraged by all this that I get dressed and start to shave. Just as I am about to gather my lather, the phone rings again. I answer.

“Hello?” I improvise.

“You dog—you cur—you no good hound!” screams a voice.

“You must have the wrong number, lady. This is not the Animal hospital.”

“Listen, Lefty Feep, I’m going to bend you so far out of shape you’ll have to change your name to Righty.”

“With whom have I the displeasure of shrieking?” I inquire.

“This is your darling ex-wife, Gloria,” yells the voice.

“Is that so?” I answer. “Well, what’s on your mind besides a henna rinse?”

“You know very well what is on my mind,” Gloria squawks. “You are five months behind on your alimony payments to me. Unless I get my money today, I’ll wheel you into the Bastille.”

“Oh is that all you want?” I purr. “Why, honey, I’ll be glad to flash some cash. Think nothing of it.”

“I do,” she assures me: “I think nothing of your promises, and less of you. Send me that dough or prepare to despair.”

I hang up the receiver and wonder whether to do the same with myself.

After all, Gloria is my ex-wife too, and she is entitled to a little consideration, to say nothing of a little strychnine. There is nothing wrong with the woman except that before she is born her mother is frightened by Secretary Morgenthau—and ever since, Gloria is fond of money. Somebody else’s money.

I FINISH shaving and decide the razor blade is too dull to cut my throat with. So I apply a necktie, rest my chest in a vest, and tote a coat ready to go outside.

The bell rings and I answer the phone.

Nobody there.

I breathe a sigh of relief.

The bell rings again, and I realize it is the front door.

“Who’s there?” I yell, before opening.

"Open up, you snivelling skunk!" squeals a voice.

"Why, Aileen, darling!" I say, recognizing her friendly greeting.

"Open up the door and I will break your thick skull."

"That is your best offer?" I inquire.

"Don't you stall around with me, Lefty Feep! I'm here to collect six months of back alimony! Pay up or lay down—because I'll plug you, you thug!"

"Give me a day of grace," I plead.

"Leave her out of it," snaps my third ex-wife. "You'll give me that check or I'll stretch your neck. How would you like to go to jail?"

"I'd love it," I confess. "At least I will not be listening to you women all the time."

"All right, I am going down now to swear out a warrant."

"Wait," I call through the door. "Give me until tomorrow. I'll see to it that you get what's coming to you."

"That goes double," says Aileen. "Unless you pay me."

I hear her footsteps go away down the hall, and pull my head out from under the covers again.

Then I race my pace out of the house and straight to the office of my lawyer—Bernie the Attorney.

If there is one man who can advise me what to do, it is Bernie the Attorney. He is a legal eagle who lays a lot of eggs—but he is also good at hatching plots. So I fly up to his nest.

Bernie's office door is closed and I can tell he is busy with a client, so I sit down in the reception room and wait.

I fidget and fume, because there is nothing to read but magazines and newspapers—not a Racing Form in the joint.

I am just opening my mouth to bite the two nails I save for an emergency like this, when the door opens and a guy walks in.

He is a little round butterball with a shiny noggin bare enough to slide a toboggan. He is carrying a brief-case with his name stamped on it in gold. I sneak a peek and read it.

"Herman Hormone."

He sits down, pays no attention to me, and begins to peer into his briefcase with a happy smile.

I am too fidgety to keep still. I must make conversation.

"Pardon me, Mr. Hormone," I say. "I know it is none of my business, but what do you have that is so fascinating in that short-case of yours?"

This is a very crude and rude of me and I expect Mr. Hormone will tell me to go peddle my popsicles, but instead he flashes me a big smile with teeth that do not go off the gold standard.

"I am so glad you are interested, sir," he tells me, giving me an exhibition of his dentition. "You may not be aware of it, but I am Herman Hormone, the inventor."

RIGHT then and there I am sorry I mention the whole thing. In the past I have enough trouble with screwball inventors like my friends Sylvester Skeetch and Mordecai Meetch. And here is another one. I realize he is probably not carrying a brief-case but a grief-case. Still, it is too late to wiggle out of it, and he is giving me his upper and lower plates in a smile.

"My name is Lefty Feep," I say, tipping my cigar politely. "And I am afraid I do not know very much about inventions. They are a little too scientific for me."

"Well, I will be glad to explain," says Herman Hormone, drawing his chair closer. His eyes begin to gleam like a couple of electric eels at mating time.

"I have here," says Mr. Hormone, "the breakfast food creation of the ages."

"Breakfast food?"

"A new creation, an innovation that will be the sensation of the nation for the duration, an inspiration that will require no demonstration for universal acclimation, according to my intimation, but will receive an ovation to stagger the imagination."

My imagination is staggering for some time before he finishes all this. But I manage to force a smile.

"What is this?" I ask.

"Reekies!" says Herman Hormone.

"Reekies?"

"The new breakfast food." He scrabbles in his brief-case. "Here, take a look at it. I bring it down to get my patents from Bernie, and to consult about marketing it. He is very much interested and wants to start a company with me. We will advertise nationally and over the radio. Reekies will be a big thing."

Herman Hormone fishes out a handful of flakes from his brief-case.

"Go ahead and try a little," he says, all excited and delighted. "Here." He reaches into the case again and comes up with a bowl, a spoon, a bottle of cream and a little package of sugar.

"Try it this way," he insists, putting the crumbs into the bowl and pouring milk and sugar into the mess.

Well, I wish to humor this crackpot, and besides I have a hummock in my stomach from not eating any breakfast yet, so I gulp down some of the stuff and play a tune with the spoon for this goon.

It has a very remarkable flavor—quite different from any breakfast food I know. Leafy, like a vegetable, with just a touch of fertilizer.

"How do you like it?" asks Herman Hormone, rubbing his bald noggin and jumping up and down.

I manage to choke the stuff into my system and force a grin to my chin.

"I never taste anything like it in all my life," I declare.

"Do you think I can make a success of this new breakfast food?" he asks.

"They say the public will swallow anything," I tell him.

"Look here," says Herman Hormone, fishing into his brief-case again. "How do you like the package I design?"

He flashes a big box with the Reekies label stamped all over it.

"Why not make the box top bigger?" I suggest.

"Bigger?"

“Sure. Easier to tear off. Every cereal has big box tops. When somebody buys a box they tear off the top and send it in to enter prize contests with.”

“A fine idea,” Hormone comments. “I will remember it. You are quite a practical man, Mr. Feep.”

AT THE moment I do not feel so practical. In fact, I feel a little sick. My stomach is buzzing like a bee-hive during the honey-making season.

But I pile on a smile full of guile.

“Of course I am practical,” I tell the inventor. “I know all about marketing, because I play the markets for years. I know all about the things women buy, because I am married three times. Why right now I have women just hounding me to death to handle financial affairs.”

I wince when I think of it. But I brush the idea aside and continue with my sales talk.

“Maybe you can use a guy like me to help you on the practical end of this business,” I suggest. “Promoting and building up sales and thinking of slogans and such. With your inventions and my intentions we can put Reekies into the stomachs of each and every lummox!”

“Very well,” says Herman Hormone. “You can consider yourself as general manager of the Reekies Breakfast Food Company, if you like.”

I like very much indeed. All at once I manage to solve my biggest headache—now I will be able to draw a salary and pay up on that alimony.

All I wish now is to solve my biggest stomach-ache, because the strange breakfast food has me in a most peculiar mood. I secretly wonder if anybody will ever eat such rough, tough stuff. My stomach churns and burns. I try to imagine what Herman Hormone must make the flakes out of. Probably he uses a lot of old mattressstuffing he pulls out of condemned Japanese army cots.

But there is no time to let my mind wander and ponder. Because just then the door opens and out dashes Bernie the Attorney.

His mustache bristles in the breeze when he sees Herman Hormone. He ignores me and pumps the inventor by the hand.

"Ah, here you are!" he booms. "Come right in, my dear fellow—we're all set to go! I'm lining up our radio program right now. Matter of fact, I'm auditioning."

"Auditioning?"

"No matter what kind of a show we put on, everybody knows that breakfast foods are really sold by the commercials. And what do you need for commercials? Announcers! And who is the best announcer in the world? J. Selwyn Spellbinder, that's who! So who is auditioning for you right now?"

"What kind of a quiz program is this?" I interrupt. "You ask the questions and give the answers too. How can you lose?"

But nobody notices me. They are hot to go into the private office and listen to this J. Selwyn Spellbinder drool through some sample commercials.

So I follow the leader and head for the private office.

MR. SPELLBINDER turns out to be a fatso in a tuxedo, only his belly sticks out where his tuxedo junction should be. He is full of hair-oil and looks like a well-greased hub-cap.

We sit down, and this yard of lard gets up in the middle of the room and rattles some papers and makes some capers.

"I will read you some sample commercial announcements," he says. "Naturally, we have no copy on Reekies as yet. But these samples will give you some idea of the style of advertising I advise over the air."

Twirling his tonsils, Spellbinder gazes down at an imaginary microphone and croons.

"This program is sponsored by the makers of FOOD, spelled F-O-O-D! Eat FOOD, it's good for you! FOOD, that new taste sensation, is the ideal nourishment for everyone! FOOD is good for men, women, and children!

Eat FOOD for that extra pep and energy you all need. Doctors recommend using FOOD as often as three times a day! Everybody likes FOOD—it will not harm the tiniest infant! Amazing scientific tests show that lack of FOOD is one of the chief causes of starvation! Are you one of the many people who suffer from hunger? Correct your difficulties with FOOD! FOOD is rich in vitamins, and comes in many delicious flavors. The next time you go into a restaurant, order some FOOD. You'll like it! Or better still, why don't you run down to your neighborhood grocer's right away and order some FOOD? Remember the name, folks—FOOD—that important part of everyone's diet. Serve a little FOOD at every meal!"

J. Selwyn Spellbinder mops his brow and pants.

"How do you like it?" he asks. Some style, eh? Would you like to hear another sample?"

"No!" I yell. But it is too late. He whips out another script and he is off.

"Everybody's doing it! Doing what? Why, BREATHING! Yes sir, millions everywhere are finding new satisfaction in that great American pastime of BREATHING. Why not do as your doctor does and breathe a little air every day? BREATHING brings you that rich oxygen content so necessary to a healthy bloodstream—it exercises the lungs—promotes new vigor. Learn to breathe, and soon you'll be saying, with millions of others, "I just can't live without it!"

Spellbinder is so red in the face when he finishes this that he has to sit down and fan himself.

"There," he pants. "That gives you an idea of how to put across a product with a spot announcement. I will get up a series like that for Reekies and in no time at all everybody will buy them."

"Sounds good," agrees Bernie the Attorney. "Everything you say about food and breathing is true. If you can say as much for Reekies, we're made."

"I agree," squeaks Herman Hormone.

"Very well, we'll sign you up right now," the lawyer says.

"Wait a minute," I interrupt, very abrupt. "You forget the most important thing—the program that goes with the announcements."

"Program?" says Bernie the Attorney. "Who cares?" he sniffs.

"Well; you must have a show that will appeal to the women. Women buy breakfast food, you know. And what do women want to hear? Serials. So why not put on a serial to sell cereal?"

"Okay by me," agrees J. Selwyn Spellbinder. "We have a real tear-jerking soap opera down at the station, just waiting for a sponsor. It is called GLORIA GOOHAMMER—GIRL HOGBUTCHER."

"Will it really appeal to women?" I inquire. "Does it have lots of divorces and accidents and funerals and deathbed scenes? Do the actors wail and sob and scream?"

"Exactly," says J. Selwyn Spellbinder. "It has everything." He makes a face. "But I guarantee you that if it goes on the air, I will stop breathing."

"Just what we want!" exclaims Bernie the Attorney. "Feep, that is a very right and bright idea."

Little Herman Hormone beams up at me. "Let us go now, Mr. Feep," he suggests. "You and I have a lot of work to do."

WE SEEK the nearest exit and clatter down the stairs. Herman Hormone carries his briefcase full of Reekies and I carry my stomach full of same.

Only I do not seem to be carrying it so well. As a matter of fact, I feel a little dizzy going downstairs. My legs ache and my head feels heavy.

Something like a bad morning after—but I do not have any night before. It is vexing and perplexing.

However, I figure I need a little fresh air and so I huff and puff along the street.

Herman Hormone trudges along, using his lung and tongue to describe how we will set up a factory to turn out Reekies and so forth.

Me, I am still weak in the physique. I feel my forehead. The skin is rough and scaly.

"What's the matter?" asks Herman Hormone. "You look a little queer."

"I feel funny," I answer. "But not like laughing."

I get out my handkerchief to wipe my forehead. It is difficult for me to move my arms or bend them. But I wipe my forehead because I am sweating—and then I look down at my handkerchief and see—

"Sawdust!" gasps the little inventor. "You are sweating sawdust!"

I stare at it. Yes, little flakes of sawdust trickle from my brow! I am so staggered that I stagger, and reach out to grab hold of an iron fense rail to keep my feet. My finger is scraped and begins to bleed.

One look at my finger is enough. I am not bleeding red blood—but something mean and green!

"Chlorophyl," whispers Herman Hormone. "It's chlorophyl."

"Like trees?" I whisper.

"Yes, like trees," breathes Hormone.

I stand there, feeling like a sap, and looking at the sap that flows out of my hand. My fingers are stiff, numb.

"It can't be," I mutter. I try to raise my hand. It jerks up very stiffly, but I manage to grab my hat and take it off to cool my head.

"Youoooffff!!!" Herman Hormone remarks, in a slight scream.

"Now what?" I wail.

"Your hair—it's green and stringy—like vines!"

Hormone stares at me with bulging eyes. "What can it be?" he pants. "Something you inherit from a branch of your family?"

"No vines in my branches," I tell him.

But Herman Hormone thinks otherwise. He stares at me as I stand there, stiff as a board. Others notice my peculiar condition, too.

A bird comes sailing around my head. A dog moseys up and begins to sniff at my feet.

“Take me to a doctor!” I yell, trying to beat off the bird and kick the dog with wooden arms and feet.

“What doctor?” asks Hormone.

“Better make it a tree surgeon!” I gulp.

To make it so you can take it, I am suffering from a bad case of stiff limbs. I am afraid I am going to blossom right there in the street. I feel aged in the wood.

All I can do is lumber along.

AS HORMONE guides me down the sidewalk, I bump into a guy accidentally. The guy turns to me and growls, “Where do you think you’re going, bud?”

Then he screams.

Because I do bud. Buds spring out of my ears.

“Something in the Reekies,” Herman Hormone wails, pulling me away and trying not to look at me. “Something must cause a change in your system! You eat it and you turn into a—”

“Don’t say It,” I beg him. “Get me to the doctor, quick!”

Finally Herman Hormone guides me up the stairs to the office of a tree surgeon.

This branch-butcher doesn’t need to take a second look at me to tell what the matter is. As a matter of fact, he refuses to take a second look. One glimpse is enough, and he hides his face in his hands and moans.

I make a pass at a looking glass and understand. I am a pretty weird specimen. My hair is green, and my skin seems to be covered with scales or bark. My arms and legs are stiff and little buds are shooting out from my ears, from under my sleeves, and at the bottom of my trouser legs. I look like a cross between a bad tree and a good camouflage job.

My stomach is heavy, my head is light, and I am losing all feeling. Except for a sort of pulsing inside—which must be the sap coagulating in my veins.

“Come on, Doc, do your stuff,” urges Herman Hormone. “My friend here is in need of attention.”

“Take him away and plant him,” groans the Doc.

“I’m not dead,” I rasp. “But I will be unless you do something.”

“What can I do?” says the Doc, looking away from me and trembling. “Do you want me to comb the bird’s nests out of your hair? How can I help you? I think I’m going mad. This is the first time I ever see such a thing.”

“But there must be something you can do,” I yell. “Don’t leave me out on a limb.”

“I’d like to saw off your limbs,” says the Doc. “To think that I should ever hear a tree bark!”

“I’m not a tree,” I tell him. “I’m a man who is turning into a tree.”

“When does this condition begin?” asks the Doc, in a quavering voice. “I suppose you start out as a little shaver?”

“Not at all,” I inform him. “Kindly do not cast any aspersions on my family tree! All this starts about an hour ago.”

I TELL him the story and Herman Hormone nods. At last the tree surgeon is convinced.

“It must be a case of hamadryadism,” he says.

“Which?”

“Hamadryadism,” he insists, sticking to his story. “A hamadryad, in ancient legend, is a tree-spirit, or a human being imprisoned in a tree. Usually it is the result of a supernatural occurrence.”

“Super or natural,” I rave, “do something for me!”

“What can I do?” shrugs the Doc. “I am just a tree-surgeon.”

"Prune me," I suggest. "Get these buds and twigs off me. And remove the bark from my skin. I do not wish to be a walking caterpillar cafeteria."

"It may hurt," the Doc warns me.

It may and it does, but I grin and bear it as he stretches me out on the table and chops away at the buds and vines. Then he sandpapers my skin and removes the bark with a plane. By this time I am stiffer than ever, and I cannot feel the sandpaper or planing job at all.

"There," sighs the Doc. "That's that."

"But I'm still stiff," I object. "I feel more wooden than ever. What can I do to change?"

The Doc shrugs again. "I don't know," he sighs. "Speaking as a tree surgeon, I must admit the problem stumps me."

I pay him off with money I borrow from Herman Hormone.

"All you can do is go home and go to bed," the Doc tells me. "Maybe it will wear off in time."

Herman Hormone and I take our leave. Hormone has to carry me home, I am so rigid. And when I get there he leaves me, sighing and shrugging and promising to analyze the Reekies and see if he can discover some clue as to what makes the change and what can help me out of my fix.

There is nothing left for me to do but follow the tree surgeon's advice and go to bed.

I do.

I sleep like a log.

The next thing I know, I hear a banging and a thumping and a pounding outside my room. I open my eyes and somebody opens my door. Rather violently—with an axe.

The axe smashes through the panel, followed by the hatchet face of my ex-wife, Joyce.

"There he is, girls!" she squeals. She rushes through the opening, and I see that Gloria and Aileen are right behind her.

My three ex-wives give me a stare and a glare.

"Here it is tomorrow!" Gloria reminds me, in a mild tone of yell. "Where is our alimony?"

I do not answer. I merely keep a very wooden face.

It is not hard for me to do so—because when I try to move, I suddenly discover that I can't! I am stiff and solid—solid wood!

The tree surgeon removes my buds and bark, but that does not halt the process which goes on in my sleep. Now I am a wooden man—and with a slight amount of horror I realize I cannot stir a bit.

The three alimony moaners stand over my bed and shriek at me.

"Get up out of bed, you lazy goon!" suggests Aileen.

"He's too drunk to move," Gloria guesses.

"He's positively stiff!" Joyce sneers.

She reaches out a finger and touches my cheek. "Eeeek!" she complains. "He is stiff! Maybe he's dead."

AILEEN reaches into her purse and pulls out a little bottle of whiskey. She waves it in front of my nose.

"Yes," she shudders. "He's dead all right, if he doesn't make a grab for that."

"Wait a minute." Gloria runs her hand along my shoulder. "Wait a minute, girls. This isn't Lefty."

"No?"

"No—it's just a dummy."

"How do you tell the difference?" Aileen wants to know.

"Really," Gloria insists. "This is a dummy made up to look like Lefty." She taps my chin. "See, it's wood!"

"Just a chip off the old block, eh?" Aileen remarks.

"The dirty dog," says Gloria. "He must skip town when he can't pay us our alimony, and leave this dummy for a decoy to fool us."

"A vile trick," Aileen declares. She raises the axe. "I'm going to chop this dizzy-looking dummy to splinters. At least we'll have some kindling to split up for our furnaces, girls."

It looks like I'm going to have a hot time in a little while. But I cannot move to avoid the axe, and I must lie there and listen. This talk about chopping me up gives me a splitting headache, too.

Aileen swings the axe. This is it. But—

"Hold it!" Gloria yells. "I've an idea! Why ruin a perfectly good dummy?"

"What's good about it?" demands Joyce. "It looks like Feep."

"Even so, a dummy is a dummy. Why can't we sell it to a department store? They ought to pay something for clothing dummies. We can split up the dough and at least get something for our troubles breaking in here."

"Why not?" Aileen lowers the axe. "Grab hold of it and we'll carry the dummy out to the car."

I lie there. I would like to quake with horror, but I cannot make with a shake. I would like to yell like hell, also, but I cannot talk or squawk. It is frightful, and far from delightful.

Just as the girls are about to grab me, I hear footsteps on the stairs. At least I can still hear, and what I hear makes me hope.

But the footsteps turn out to belong to J. Selwyn Spellbinder and Bernie the Attorney. They stick their necks through the hole in the door.

"Pardon me," says Bernie, "but we are looking for Lefty Feep."

"You and the sheriff," snaps Aileen. "We want him too. But the big lug skips town on us and leaves a dummy as a decoy."

"Dummy?" asks J. Selwyn Spellbinder. "What dummy?"

"This one here," says Aileen. "We are going to take it and sell it to a department store."

Spellbinder gazes at me. Then he claps his hands together.

"I've got it!" he shouts.

"What?" gasps Bernie the Attorney.

"I tell you, I've got it!"

"Well, get rid of it if it makes you holler so," Bernie advises him.

“Wait until you hear this,” says Spellbinder. “I’ve got a terrific idea for our Reekies show.”

“We already have a show,” Bernie reminds him. “A serial program.”

“Nuts to the serial! Grape nuts to it!” says Spellbinder. “Listen to this! A serial show appeals only to women. Why not a show that will appeal to everyone? I mean a comedy program.”

“Comedy program?”

“Certainly—like Bergen and McCarthy, for instance. Take a look at that dummy. What a character! It’s much goofier looking than Charlie McCarthy. I’ll go on the air in a ventriloquist act with this life-sized dummy. We’ll change our opening program, build it around this act, play it up big! We can hold a big banquet for the opening, with lots of ballyhoo. We’ll cram Reekies down the throat of the nation.”

BERNIE the Attorney catches some of the enthusiasm. I just lie there and catch the dirty digs.

“You know radio, Spellbinder,” he says. “If you say that’s the thing to do, we’d better do it.” He turns to the women. “How much do you want for this dummy?” he asks.

“$100 in cash,” pipes Gloria.

“Don’t be silly, we can get more than that,” whispers Joyce.

“I doubt it—the thing is too sillylooking,” Gloria says.

I wince.

Bernie the Attorney beams. “Sold!” he says. He pulls out a handful of bills and the girls get busy fondling the currency.

“Come on,” says Spellbinder. “We have no time. First show is scheduled for tomorrow night. I’ll have to bat out a script and rehearse. You know, I always figure I want to be a radio comedian.”

They grab me and tote me down the stairs. I am helpless. The ideas these people have fairly makes the sap run cold in my veins.

I will not bark a remark about what happens when I get to the broadcasting station. I am propped up against the wall while Spellbinder and a bunch of continuity writers go into a muddle and huddle and grind out some comedy dialogue between a ventriloquist and a dummy. Then Spellbinder holds a rehearsal with me on his lap.

I cannot say a word—except for the awful stuff Spellbinder's ventriloquism puts into my mouth. He rehearses and curses and I just give him my wooden stare.

It is late at night before the practising is over. Spellbinder puts me down and gets ready to leave. Bernie the Attorney comes in to pick him up and check over last-minute plans for the show.

"How's the Reekies manufacturing going?" asks Spellbinder.

"I don't know," says Bernie. "I do not see Herman Hormone all day. And Feep skips town. But Hormone must be busy."

Hormone is busy.

As a matter of fact he is busy coming through the door right now. And he is still busier staring at me.

"Lefty Feep!" he screams.

Bernie turns and laughs.

"No," he tells Hormone. "This is just a dummy of Feep."

Herman Hormone comes over and touches me with a shaking finger.

"No," he says. "This is no dummy. This is Lefty Feep."

"Why it's nothing but wood," chuckles Spellbinder.

"You are mistaken." Herman Hormone sighs. "It is Lefty Feep. He turns to wood after eating the Reekies."

"No—you're crazy!"

"Look at this." Herman Hormone fumbles in his bulging briefcase and pulls out something. It is a wooden dog.

"I have a pet dog," he says. "Last night I feed it some Reekies. Today I have a wooden toy."

"But why—how—?"

HERMAN HORMONE explains everything. He tells what happens to me yesterday. The two high-pressure artists listen and gape.

"Last night I go home and experiment," Hormone tells them. "I find that the vegetable substances I make my Reekies out of cause a strange reaction on the system of any form of animal life. Anyone who absorbs Reekies assumes the characteristics of vegetable life—particularly of trees. Feep eats Reekies and turns to wood. So does the dog. That proves something."

"Maybe it proves Feep is a dog," says Bernie, unkindly.

"I always figure only God can make a tree," adds Spellbinder.

"Reekies can make a tree," Hormone insists. "I swear to you this is not a dummy but Lefty Feep."

Bernie the Attorney looks at me and shrugs. "Well," he mutters, "he can't talk or move. No harm in him. We'll just go ahead as we plan, put the program on and forget about it."

He smiles. "Of course you must go to work and change that Reekies formula again before the show tomorrow. Otherwise everybody will turn to wood from eating Reekies. Not that I mind that, either—but wooden people won't buy a second package."

He laughs. Herman Hormone stares at him. I stand there, feeling like an overgrown toothpick.

"You don't mean it!" wails the inventor. "You can't be so cold-blooded. This is a man—we must help him to get out of this terrible situation somehow! And I certainly can't revise my Reekies and invent a new breakfast food in just one night."

"Listen," says Bernie the Attorney, chewing on a cigar. "You're doing what I say. I have a contract with your signature on it. Get busy and keep your mouth shut."

Spellbinder nods and looks very smug. Little Herman Hormone knows he can expect no sympathy from him.

"I—I won't do if," he says, sticking out his chin. "It's too inhuman."

"Oh yes you will," chuckles Bernie. "Because if you don't, I will tell the police you feed breakfast food to Lefty Feep and turn him to wood. That's murder.”

Hormone steps back in horror. The two men nod at him and wink.

“Obey me or fry,” Bernie tells him. He scowls at my wooden face. “As for you, Feep—if you can still hear me—you’d better behave too. Or I’m liable to turn some woodpeckers loose on your face.”

“We’ll kick his slats for him,” grins Spellbinder.

“We’ll set him up as a cigar-store Indian!” Bernie guffaws. “But Feep will behave, I’m sure. And so will Herman, here. And nobody will ever know.”

“Knock on wood,” laughs Spellbinder, hitting me on the head.

“Uh—er—” Hormone gulps.

“What is it?”

“I would like to take Lefty home with me,” suggests the little inventor. “Maybe if I study his condition I can hit on a clue in changing the Reekies formula.”

“All right,” says Bernie the Attorney. “But no funny business—or you’re up for murder.”

Hormone is almost down for the count when he hears this. But he picks up my wooden body in trembling hands and lugs me out to a car.

We drive home.

“Can you hear me, Lefty?” Hormone wails. I cannot answer him. He just looks at me and shakes. I wish I could.

“This is an awful spot,” he sighs. “I will never forgive myself for this. How can I get you out of this mess? And how can I get myself out of it?

“I do not tell Bernie the Attorney that almost all our money is being spent right now—I have a batch of Reekies waiting to be put in boxes that will cost us at least $50,000.

“So if I change the formula tonight and throw the stuff away, we are broke. And they will kill me when they hear about it tomorrow.”

I wish I could help him. I wish I could help myself. But I just sit there like the dummy I am until we arrive at Herman Hormone’s hangout.

HE LIVES in a big house with a long shed in the back yard. He carries my stiff body out to the shed and we enter a big open space. Set along the walls are a lot of machines—for mixing and sifting and sorting. Piles of Reekies boxes are lying next to conveyor belts. Big vats in the center of the room are filled with breakfast food flakes.

"Here is where I manufacture the Reekies," he says. "The workers will be here tomorrow ready to box and ship to the wholesalers who place orders already. Now what can I do?"

His bald head looks like Niagara Falls as he sweats.

"I can check and re-check my formula," he sighs. "But I know I cannot isolate one element that makes people turn to wood. The whole batch is no good, that's all. My money is lost and we are ruined. I have 200,000 boxes to fill with Reekies and no Reekies to put into them."

He paces the floor. "And that isn't the worst," he sighs. "It is what I do to you that hurts. Changing you into wood! If there is only some way—"

Herman Hormone approaches me and touches my head. "No use," he says. "You're wooden from head to toe. An overgrown clothespin. No—wait—"

He grabs my wrist. I can't feel anything, but he can.

"Your heart," he gasps. "Your heart is still beating! That means you must be alive. Alive, but with a wooden shell. You are not completely wood fiber. The Reekies must act like the erratic chromosone agent that turns some people to stone. Petrification, calcification, ossification—only in your case, it's woodenification!"

He grabs me and picks me up.

"Maybe this will work," he gasps. He carries me to one of the big metal vats. It is empty. He dumps me inside.

"I will soften up the pulp that covers you, if I can," he says. He turns a spigot on the side of the vat and hot water starts to bubble into it. Soon I am swirling around in a steam bath. I float like a celluloid duck.

"Look!" he murmurs. "The outer layers of vegetable fiber are peeling off."

Sure enough, I see slivers falling away from my body. My eyes are clouded with steam. And all at once, I can move!

My movements are stiff, but I actually feel blood circulating in my veins! I try to speak. I can’t, yet.

But a minute later I feel the boiling water, and I open my mouth and let out a yowl, and then I break the world’s record for a broad jump as I dive out of the vat.

“Feep—you’re alive!” shouts Herman Hormone.

“Boiled alive!” I howl.

TO MAKE a long story short, in a few minutes I am absolutely normal once more, except for a few blisters where the water burns me.

“Saved,” Hormone sobs. “I am so happy I am not a murderer.”

I put on one of his old suits and pat him on the back.

“Hormone,” I say, “I like you. You are more interested in saving me than you are in your investment—even though those crooks are out to ruin you.”

He looks grim. “That is right,” he admits. “I still lose all this money on Reekies. I cannot buy stuff for a new formula, even if I prepare it tonight. There is no dough to make new cereal.”

I grin.

“Am I still your general manager?” I ask.

“Yes—why?”

“Then I will save you. I have an idea that will make our fortune—and fix Bernie the Attorney and J. Selwyn Spellbinder for good. If you promise to do exactly what I say, I’ll take charge.”

“You’re the boss,” says Herman Hormone, holding out his hand.

Then I tell him what I plan, and we get busy.

We work all night. When the employees come to the factory shed the next day, we make them hustle. By the time it is ready to show up at the broadcasting studio for the first program, we are all set.

Herman Hormone goes in alone, just as we plan it out. Everybody is ready for the show. In a private office, Bernie the Attorney and J. Selwyn Spellbinder are celebrating. The setup is perfect.

To make everything complete, they invite my three ex-wives to the performance. Aileen and Joyce and Gloria are there ready to see their wooden dummy of a husband perform a ventriloquist act.

As Hormone enters, Bernie is just telling my heartless spouses how it is really me that turns to wood and is mistaken for a dummy.

“Ha, that’s good!” cackles Aileen. “You mean we actually sell Lefty for that hundred bucks? I know we will get some dough out of his worthless carcass some day! Now I will get a real laugh out of the show.” Everybody chuckles.

“Ahem,” says Herman Hormone.

“Ah, there you are. Do you succeed in changing the Reekies formula?” asks Spellbinder.

“Yes. I bring some for this banquet,” Herman Hormone announces.

Bernie the Attorney sniffs at the package suspiciously. “No tricks now,” he says. “You don’t bring us anything that will change us into wood,” he snarls.

“How can you think of such a thing?” asks Hormone, with an innocent smile. “It would spoil the program, wouldn’t it?”

“Well, let’s have some,” says Spellbinder. “We are celebrating with these charming ladies, after all—and we might as well sample our new product. I hope the new Reekies are better than the old ones.”

“See for yourself,” Hormone suggests.

Everybody eats a bowl of Reekies with milk and sugar.

Bernie the Attorney grunts. “Tastes like dried leaves,” he complains. “We’ll have to work to dump this junk on the public. Say—by the way—where’s our dummy? Where is Lefty Feep, that wooden-headed termite’s delight?”

“Here I am,” I say, walking into the office.

There are howls and scowls.

I grin through the din.

"What happens? How come you are not aged in the wood?" they shout.

"Yeah, and what happens to our program—who will be the ventriloquist's dummy?" squawks J. Selwyn Spellbinder.

"You will," I tell him.

"What the—?"

"You just eat a bowl of the old Reekies," I inform the mob. "Double strength, too. I have Hormone mix up an extra-severe batch of it. You should be turning to wood much faster than I do. In fact, you should be wood right now, but good."

TO THEIR horror, they find that what I say is true. My ex-wives feel themselves becoming numb. Aileen's hair is green. Joyce has a bud on her neck. Gloria looks like a factory throwout from a sawmill. Bernie the Attorney has a face like a cigar box.

Spellbinder tries to get up and tackle me, but his legs are too stiff to carry him.

They sit there and gawk instead of talk.

"Yes, you are wood," I repeat. "And you will stay wood for several days. I find out the secret of recovery. And if you all behave, I will release you in due time."

"But this is treachery!" gasps Bernie.

"Call it tree-son," I grin. "Because that's what you will be in a few minutes—a tree, son. So just relax and save what's left of your voice.

"We go on the air in a little while. I will do the announcing and carry on with Spellbinder's part. Spellbinder will be my dummy in the comedy act."

"But—"

Bernie's complaint comes from far away. His voice is going fast. "But, what happens? You can't sell Reekies that turn people to wood."

"Of course not. We change the material we make Reekies out of. I think of something sensational last night after I recover. I guarantee people will eat this stuff up. But wait—you'll hear about it on the program in a little while."

And that is just what they do. We carry the wooden wives and the two leafy gentlemen out to the studio. They sit there and listen with budding curiosity—as they bud all over the place.

I step up to the microphone with my dummy and read the script. Then I launch into my commercial announcement.

"Remember, folks—this program is sponsored by the makers of Reekies . . . Reekies, that amazing new breakfast food! The breakfast food to end all breakfast foods!

"Friends, why do you eat breakfast food? Why, for bulk and roughage, of course. And what has more bulk and roughage than the average breakfast food? Why—the boxes out of which breakfast food is made! Reekies is the first breakfast food made entirely out of breakfast food boxes! Good nourishing cardboard has plenty of bulk and roughage! Remember to buy Reekies, folks—Reekies, made from ground-up breakfast food boxes. It's the new taste sensation of the nation."

That ends the first program, and it of course explains what I do. In order to save Hormone the money it costs to manufacture an entirely new product, I merely advise him to grind up the 200,000 cardboard boxes. They taste as good as most breakfast food does, and I figure they are just as nourishing.

Funny thing, the public thinks so too. After that first program they buy like mad.

In a few days I give Spellbinder, Bernie, and the three women a good hot bath and they come out all right. But from this time on, I am the boss.

My wives never bother me for alimony. Bernie and Spellbinder dare not squawk because they are making too much money on the new Reekies.

Herman Hormone is happy.

So am I. But I do not eat breakfast food any more.

LEFTY FEEP grinned at me.

“You are done with your story?” I asked.

He nodded.

“Well, I’m not done with you,” I told him. “To begin with, the whole idea of your breakfast food is more than I can swallow. You say you changed to wood and back again. Maybe. And you say you decided to make your breakfast food out of the cardboard boxes it came in. Well, I’ll stand for all that. But there is one thing you did not and cannot explain.”

“What is that?” asked Lefty Feep.

“If you used all the boxes to make breakfast food out of,” I purred, “then will you kindly tell me what you used for boxes to put the breakfast food into?”

“Very simple,” said Mr. Lefty Feep. “A breakfast food box must be solid and durable. So I merely suggest to Herman Hormone that he make them out of all his old Reekies.”

“Then you—?”

“Exactly.” Feep smiled. “We make our breakfast food out of the boxes. And we make our boxes out of pressed breakfast food!”

THE END

Enoch

My business? Killing people . . . so step right up!

I ALWAYS starts the same way.

First, there's the feeling.

Have you ever felt the tread of little feet walking across the top of your skull? Footsteps on your skull, back and forth, back and forth?

It starts like that.

You can't see who does the walking. After all, it's on top of your head. If you're clever, you wait for a chance and suddenly brush a hand through your hair. But you can't catch the walker that way. He knows. Even if you clamp both hands flat to your head, he manages to wriggle through, somehow. Or maybe he jumps.

Terribly swift, he is. And you can't ignore him. If you don't pay any attention to the footsteps, he tries the next step. He wriggles down the back of your neck and whispers in your ear.

You can feel his body, so tiny and cold, pressed tightly against the base of your brain. There must be something numbing in his claws, because they don't hurt—although later, you'll find little scratches on your neck that bleed and bleed. But at the time, all you know is that something tiny and cold is pressing there. Pressing, and whispering.

That's when you try to fight him. You try not to hear what he says. Because when you listen, you're lost. You have to obey him, then.

Oh, he's wicked and wise!

He knows how to frighten and threaten, if you dare to resist.

But I seldom try, any more. It's better for me if I do listen and then obey.

As long as I'm willing to listen, things don't seem so bad. Because he can be soothing and persuasive, too. Tempting. The things he has promised me, in that little silken whisper!

He keeps his promises, too.

Folks think I'm poor because I never have any money and live in that old shack on the edge of the swamp. But he has given me riches.

After I do what he wants, he takes me away—out of myself—for days. There are other places besides this world, you know; places where I am king.

People laugh at me and say I have no friends; the girls in town used to call me "scarecrow." Yet sometimes—after I've done his bidding—he brings the riches of the world to me.

Just dreams? I don't think so. It's the other life that's just a dream; the life in the shack at the edge of the swamp. That part doesn't seem real any more.

Not even the killing. . . .

Yes, I kill people.

That's what Enoch wants, you know.

That's what he whispers about. He asks me to kill people, for him.

I don't like that. I used to fight against it—I told you that before, didn't I?—but I can't any more.

He wants me to kill people for him. Enoch. The thing that lives on the top of my head.

I can't see him. I can't catch him. I can only feel him, and hear him, and obey him.

Sometimes he leaves me alone for days. Then, suddenly, I'll feel him there, scratching away at the roof of my brain. I'll hear his whisper ever so plainly, and he'll be telling me about someone who is coming through the swamp.

I don’t know how he knows about them. He couldn’t have seen them, yet he describes them perfectly.

“There’s a tramp walking down the Aylesworthy Road. A short, fat man, with a bald head. That makes it easier.”

Then he’ll laugh for a minute, and go on.

“His name is Mike. He’s wearing a brown sweater and blue overalls. He’s going to turn into the swamp in about ten minutes when the sun goes down. He’ll stop under the big tree next to the dump.

“Better hide behind that tree. Wait until he starts to look for firewood. Then you know what to do. Get the hatchet, now. Hurry.”

SOMETIMES I ask Enoch what he will give me. Usually, I just trust him. I know I’m going to have to do it, anyway. So I might as well go ahead at once. Enoch is never wrong about things, and he keeps me out of trouble.

That is, he always did—until the last time.

One night, I was sitting in. the shack eating supper when he told me about this girl.

“She’s coming to visit you,” he whispered. “A beautiful girl, all in black. She has a wonderful quality to her head—fine bones. Fine.”

At first I thought he was telling me about one of my rewards. But Enoch was talking about a real person.

“She will come to the door and ask you to help her. To fix her car. She has taken the side road, planning to go into town by a shorter route. Now the car is well into the swamp, and one of the tires needs changing.”

It sounded funny, hearing Enoch talk about things like automobile tires. But he knows about them. Enoch knows everything.

“You will go out to help her when she asks you. Don’t take anything. She has a wrench in the car. Use that.”

This time I tried to fight him. I kept whimpering, “I won’t do it, I won’t do it.” He just laughed. And then he told me what he’d do if I refused. He told me over and over again.

"Better that I do it to her and not to you," Enoch reminded me. "Or would you rather I—"

"No!" I said. "No. I'll do it."

"After all," Enoch whispered, "I can't help it. I must be served ever so often. To keep me alive. To keep me strong. So I can serve you. So I can give you things. That is why you have to obey me. If not, I'll just stay right here and—"

"No," I said. "I'll do it."

And I did it.

She knocked on my door just a few minutes later, and it was just as Enoch had whispered it. She was a pretty girl—with blonde hair. I like blonde hair. I was glad, when I went out into the swamp with her, that I didn't have to harm her hair. I hit her behind the neck with the wrench.

Enoch told me what to do, step by step.

After I used the hatchet, I put the body in the quicksand. Enoch was with me, and he cautioned me about heel-marks. I got rid of them.

I was worried about the car, but he showed me how to use the end of a rotten log and pitch it over. I wasn't sure it would sink, too, but it did. And much faster than I would have believed.

It was a relief to see the car go. I threw the wrench in after it. Then Enoch told me to go home, and I did, and at once I felt the dreamy feeling stealing over me.

ENOCH had promised me something extra special for this one, and I sank down into sleep right away. I could barely feel the pressure leave my head as Enoch left me, scampering off back into the swamp for his reward. . . .

I don't know how long I slept. It must have been a long time. All I remember is that I finally started to wake up, knowing somehow that Enoch was back with me again, and feeling that something was wrong.

Then I woke up all the way, because I heard the banging on my door.

I waited a moment. I waited for Enoch to whisper to me, tell me what I should do.

But Enoch was asleep now. He always sleeps—afterwards. Nothing wakes him for days on end; and during that time I am free. Usually I enjoy such freedom, but not now. I needed his help.

The pounding on my door grew louder, and I couldn't wait any longer.

I got up and answered.

Old Sheriff Shelby came through the doorway.

"Come on, Seth," he said. "I'm taking you up to the jail."

I didn't say anything. His beady little black eyes were peeping everywhere inside my shack. When he looked at me, I wanted to hide, I felt so scared.

He couldn't see Enoch, of course. Nobody can. But Enoch was there; I felt him resting very lightly on top of my skull, burrowed down under a blanket of hair, clinging to my curls and sleeping as peaceful as a baby.

"Emily Robbins' folks said she was planning on cutting through the swamp," the Sheriff told me. "We followed the tire tracks up to the old quicksand."

Enoch had forgotten about the tracks. So what could I say? Besides.

"Anything you say can be used agin you," said Sheriff Shelby. "Come on, Seth."

I went with him. There was nothing else for me to do. I went with him into town, and all the loafers were out trying to rush the car. There were women in the crowd too. They kept yelling for the men to "get" me.

But Sheriff Shelby held them off, and at last I was tucked away safe and sound in back of the jailhouse. He locked me up in the middle cell. The two cells on each side of mine were vacant, so I was all alone. All alone except for Enoch, and he slept through everything.

It was still pretty early in the morning, and Sheriff Shelby went out again with some other men. I guess he was going to try and get the body out of the quicksand, if he could. He didn't try to ask any questions, and I wondered about that.

Charley Potter, now, he was different. He wanted to know everything. Sheriff Shelby had left him in charge of the jail while he was away. He brought me my breakfast after a while, and hung around asking questions.

I just kept still. I knew better than to talk to a fool like Charley Potter. He thought I was crazy. Just like the mob outside. Most people in that town thought I was crazy—because of my mother, I suppose, and because of the way I lived all alone out in the swamp.

What could I say to Charley Potter? If I told him about Enoch he'd never believe me anyway.

So I didn't talk.

I listened.

Then Charley Potter told me about the search for Emily Robbins, and about how Sheriff Shelby got to wondering over some other disappearances a while back. He said that there would be a big trial, and the District Attorney was coming down from the County Seat. And he'd heard they were sending out a doctor to see me right away.

SURE enough, just as I finished breakfast, the doctor came. Charley Potter saw him drive up and let him in. He had to work fast to keep some of the oafs from breaking in with him. They wanted to lynch me, I suppose. But the doctor came in all right—a little man with one of those funny beards on his chin—and he made Charley Potter go up front into the office while he sat down outside the cell and talked to me.

His name was Dr. Silversmith.

Now up to this time, I wasn't really feeling anything. It had all happened so fast I didn't get a chance to think.

It was like part of a dream; the sheriff and the mob and all this talk about a trial and a lynching and the body in the swamp.

But somehow the sight of this Dr. Silversmith changed things.

He was real, all right. You could tell he was a doctor by the quiet way he talked; he sounded like a the doctor who wanted to send me to the institution after they found my mother.

That was one of the first things Dr. Silversmith asked me—what had happened to my mother?

He seemed to know quite a lot about me, and that made it easier for me to talk.

Pretty soon I found myself telling him all sorts of things. How my mother and I lived in the shack. How she made the philtres and sold them. About the big pot and the way we gathered herbs at night. About the nights when she went off alone and I would hear the queer noises from far away.

I didn't want to say much more, but he knew, anyway. He knew they had called her a witch. He even knew the way she died—when Santo Dinorelli came to our door that evening and stabbed her because she had made the potion for his daughter who ran away with that trapper. He knew about me living in the swamp alone after that, too.

But he didn't know about Enoch.

Enoch, up on top of my head all the time, still sleeping, not knowing or caring what was happening to me. . . .

Somehow, I was talking to Dr. Silversmith about Enoch. I wanted to explain that it wasn't really I who had killed this girl. So I had to mention Enoch, and how my mother had made the bargain in the woods. She hadn't let me come with her—I was only twelve—but she took some of my blood, pricking me with a needle and dropping it into a little bottle.

I don't know exactly what she did, but when she came back in the morning, Enoch was with her. I couldn't see him, of course, but she told me about him—and I could feel him when he perched on my head.

He was to be mine forever, she said, and look after me and help me in all ways.

I told this very carefully and explained why it was I had to obey Enoch, ever since my mother was killed. Enoch protected me, just as my mother had planned, because she knew I couldn't get along alone. I admitted this to Dr. Silversmith because I thought he was a wise man and would understand.

That was wrong.

I knew it at once. Because while Dr. Silversmith leaned forward and stroked his little beard and said, “Yes, yes,” over and over again, I could feel his eyes watching me.

He had the same kind of eyes as Sheriff Shelby. Beady eyes. Mean eyes. Eyes that don’t trust you when they see you. Prying, peeping eyes.

THEN he began to ask me all sorts of funny questions. You’d think he’d ask me about Enoch, since he was the explanation of everything. But instead, Dr. Silversmith asked me if I ever heard any other voices. If I ever saw things that I knew weren’t there.

He asked me how I felt when I killed Emily Robbins and whether I—but I won’t repeat that question! Why, he talked to me as if I was some kind of —crazy person!

I just laughed at him, then, and shut up tighter than a clam.

After a while he gave up and went away, shaking his head. I laughed after him because I knew he hadn’t found out what he wanted to find out. He wanted to know all my mother’s secrets, and my secrets, and Enoch’s secrets too.

But he didn’t, and I laughed. And then I went to sleep. I slept almost all afternoon.

When I woke up, there was a new man standing in front of my cell. He had a big, fat smiling face, and nice eyes.

“Hello, Seth,” he said, very friendly. “Having a little snooze?”

I reached up to the top of my head. I couldn’t feel Enoch, but I knew he was there, and still asleep. He moves fast, even when he’s sleeping.

“Don’t be alarmed,” said the man. “I won’t hurt you.”

“Did that doctor send you?” I asked.

The man laughed. “Of course not,” he told me. “My name’s Cassidy. Edwin Cassidy. I’m the District Attorney, and I’m in charge here. Can I come in and sit down, do you suppose?”

“I’m locked in,” I said.

“I’ve got the keys from tire sheriff,” said Mr. Cassidy. He took them out and opened my cell; walked right in and sat down next to me on the bench.

“Aren’t you afraid?” I asked him. “You know, I’m supposed to be a murderer.”

“Why Seth,” Mr. Cassidy laughed, “I’m not afraid of you. I know you didn’t mean to kill anybody.”

He put his hand on my shoulder, and I didn’t draw away. It was a nice, fat, soft hand. He had a big diamond ring on his finger that just twinkled away in the sunshine.

“How’s Enoch?” he said.

I jumped.

“Oh, that’s all right. That fool doctor told me when I met him down the street. He doesn’t understand about Enoch, does he, Seth? But you and I do.”

“That doctor thinks I’m crazy,” I whispered.

“Well, just between us, Seth, it did sound a little hard to believe, at first. But I’ve just come from the swamp. Sheriff Shelby and some of his men are still working down there. Digging, you know.

“They found Emily Robbins’ body just a little while ago. And other bodies, too. A fat man’s body, and a small boy, and some Indian. The quicksand preserves them, you know.”

I WATCHED his eyes, and they were still smiling, so I knew I could trust this man.

“They’ll find other bodies too, if they keep on, won’t they, Seth?”

I nodded.

“But I didn’t wait any longer. I saw enough to understand that you were telling the truth. Enoch must have made you do these things, didn’t he?”

I nodded again.

“Fine,” said Mr. Cassidy, pressing my shoulder. “You see, we do understand each other now. So I won’t blame you for anything you tell me.”

“What do you want to know?” I asked. “Oh, lots of things. I’m interested in Enoch, you see. Just how many people did he ask you to kill—all together, that is?”

“Nine,” I said.

“And they’re all buried in the quick Sand?”

“Yes.”

“Do you know their names?”

“Only a few.” I told him the names of the ones I knew. “Sometimes Enoch just: describes them for me and I go out to meet them,” I explained.

Mr. Cassidy sort of chuckled and took out a cigar. I frowned.

“Don’t want me to smoke, eh?”

“Please—I don’t like it. My mother didn’t believe in smoking; she never let me.”

Mr. Cassidy laughed out loud now, but he put the cigar away and leaned forward.

“You can be a big help to me, Seth,” he whispered. “I suppose you know what a District Attorney must do.”

“He’s a sort of a lawyer, isn’t he—at trials and things?”

“That’s right. I’m going to be at your trial, Seth. Now you don’t want to have to get up in front of all those people and tell them about—what happened. Right?”

“No, I don’t, Mr. Cassidy. Not those mean people here in town. They hate me.”

“Then here’s what you do. You tell me all about it, and I’ll talk for you. That’s friendly enough, isn’t it?”

I wished Enoch was there to help me, but he was asleep. I looked at Mr. Cassidy and made up my own mind.

“Yes,” I said. “I can tell you.”

So I told him everything I knew.

After a while he stopped chuckling, but he was just getting so interested he couldn’t bother to laugh or do anything but listen.

“One thing more,” he said. “We found some bodies in the swamp. Emily Robbins’ body we could identify, and several of the others. But it would be easier if we knew something else. You can tell me this, Seth. Where are the heads?”

I stood up and turned away. “I won’t tell you that,” I said, “because I don’t know.”

“Don’t know?”

“I give them to Enoch,” I explained. “Don’t you understand—that’s why I must kill people for him. Because he wants their heads.”

Mr. Cassidy looked puzzled.

“He always makes me cut the heads off and leave them,” I went on. “I put the bodies in the quicksand, and then go home. He puts me to sleep and rewards me. After that he goes away—back to the heads. That’s what he wants.”

“Why does he want them, Seth?”

I told him. “You see, it wouldn’t do you any good if you could find them. Because you probably wouldn’t recognize anything anyway.”

Mr. Cassidy sat up and sighed. “But why do you let Enoch do such things?”

“I must. Or else he’d do it to me. That’s what he always threatens. He has to have it. So I obey him.”

MR. CASSIDY watched me while I walked the floor, but he didn’t say a word. He seemed to be very nervous, all of a sudden, and when I came close, he sort of leaned away.

“You’ll explain all that at the trial, of course,” I said. “About Enoch, and everything.”

He shook his head.

“I’m not going to tell about Enoch at the trial, and neither are you,” Mr. Cassidy said. “Nobody is even going to know that Enoch exists.”

“Why?”

"I'm trying to help you, Seth. Don't you know what the people will say if you mention Enoch to them? They'll say you're crazy! And you don't want that to happen."

"No. But what can you do? How can you help me?"

Mr. Cassidy smiled at me.

"You're afraid of Enoch, aren't you? Well, I was just thinking out loud. Suppose you gave Enoch to me?"

I gulped.

"Yes. Suppose you gave Enoch to me, right now? Let me take care of him for you during the trial. Then he wouldn't be yours, and you wouldn't have to say anything about him. He probably doesn't want people to know what he does, anyway."

"That's right," I said. "Enoch would be very angry. He's a secret, you know. But I hate to give him to you without asking—and he's asleep now."

"Asleep?"

"Yes. On top of my skull. Only you can't see him, of course."

Mr. Cassidy gazed at my head and then he chuckled again.

"Oh, I can explain everything when he wakes up," he told me. "When he knows it's all for the best, I'm sure he'll be happy."

"Well—I guess it's all right, then," I sighed. "But you must promise to take good care of him."

"Sure," said Mr. Cassidy.

"And you'll give him what he wants? What he needs?"

"Of course."

"And you won't tell a soul?"

"Not a soul."

"Of course you know what will happen to you if you refuse to give Enoch what he wants," I warned Mr. Cassidy. "He will take it—from you—by force."

"Don't you worry, Seth."

I stood still for a minute. Because all at once I could feel something move. Enoch was waking up!

"He's awake," I whispered. "Now I can tell him."

Yes, Enoch was awake. I could feel him crawling over my scalp, moving towards my ear.

"Enoch," I whispered. "Can you hear me?"

He heard.

Then I explained everything to him. How was I giving him to Mr. Cassidy.

Enoch didn't say a word.

Mr. Cassidy didn't say a word. He just sat there and grinned. I suppose it must have looked a little strange to see me talking to—nothing.

"Go to Mr. Cassidy," I whispered. "Go to him, now."

And Enoch went.

I felt the weight lift from my head. That was all, but I knew he was gone.

"Can you feel him, Mr. Cassidy?" I asked.

"What—oh, sure!" he said, and stood up. "Take good care of Enoch," I told him. "The best."

"Don't put your hat on," I warned. "Enoch doesn't like hats."

"Sorry, I forgot. Well, Seth, I'll say goodbye now. You've been a mighty great help to me—and from now on we can just forget about Enoch, as far as telling anybody else is concerned.

"I'll come back again and talk about the trail. That Dr. Silversmith, he's going to try and tell the folks you're crazy. Maybe it would be best if you just denied everything you told him—now that I have Enoch."

That sounded like a fine idea, but then I knew Mr. Cassidy was a smart man.

"Whatever you say, Mr. Cassidy. Just be good to Enoch, and he'll be good to you." Mr. Cassidy shook my hand and then he and Enoch went away. I felt tired again. Maybe it was the strain, and maybe it was just that I felt a little queer, knowing that Enoch was gone. Anyway, I went back to sleep for a long time.

It was night time when I woke up. Old Charley Potter was banging on the cell door, bringing me my supper.

He jumped when I said hello to him, and backed away.

"Murderer!" he yelled. "They got nine bodies out'n the swamp. You crazy fiend!"

"Why, Charley," I said. "I always thought you were a friend of mine."

"Loony! I'm gonna get out of here right now—leave you locked up for the night. Sheriff'll see that nobuddy breaks in to lynch you—if you ask me, he's wasting his time." Then Charley turned out all the lights and went away. I heard him go out the front door and put the padlock on, and I was all alone in the jailhouse.

All alone! It was strange to be all alone for the first time in years—all alone, without Enoch.

I ran my fingers across the top of my head. It felt bare and queer.

THE moon was shining through the window and I stood there looking out at the empty street. Enoch always loved the moon. It made him lively. Made him restless and greedy. I wondered how he felt now, with Mr. Cassidy.

I must have stood there for a long time. My legs were numb when I turned around and listened to the fumbling at the door.

The lock clicked open, and then Mr. Cassidy came running in. He was all out of breath, and he was clawing at his head.

"Take him off me!" he yelled. "Take him away!"

"What's the matter?" I asked.

"Enoch—that thing of yours—I thought you were crazy—maybe I'm the crazy one—but take him off!"

"Why, Mr. Cassidy! I told you what Enoch was like."

"He's crawling around up there now. I can feel him. And I can hear him. The things he whispers!"

"But I explained all that, Mr. Cassidy. Enoch wants something, doesn't he? You know what it is. And you'll have to give it to him. You promised."

"I can't. I won't kill for him—he can't make me—"

"He can. And he will."

Mr. Cassidy gripped the bars on the cell door. "Seth, you must help me. Call Enoch. Take him back. Make him go back to you. Hurry."

"All right, Mr. Cassidy," I said.

I called Enoch. He didn't answer. I called again. Silence.

"It's no use," I sighed. "He won't come back. He likes you."

Mr. Cassidy started to cry. It shocked me, and then I felt kind of sorry for him. He just didn't understand, after all. I know what Enoch can do to you when he whispers that way. First he coaxes you, and then he pleads, and then he threatens—

"You'd better obey him," I told Mr. Cassidy. "Has he told you who to kill?"

Mr. Cassidy didn't pay any attention to me. He just cried. And then he took out the jail keys and opened up the cell next to mine. He went in and locked the door.

"I won't," he sobbed. "I won't, I won't!"

"You won't what?" I asked.

"I won't kill Dr. Silversmith at the hotel and give Enoch his head. I'll stay here, in the cell, where I'm safe! Oh, you fiend, you devil—"

He slumped down sideways and I could see him through the bars dividing our cells, sitting all hundred over while his hands tore at his hair.

"You'd better," I called out. "Or else Enoch will do something. Please, Mr. Cassidy—oh, hurry—"

Then Mr. Cassidy gave a little moan and I guess he fainted, because he didn't say anything more and he stopped clawing. I called to him once but he wouldn't answer.

So what could I do? I sat down in the dark corner of my cell and watched the moonlight. Moonlight always makes Enoch wild.

Then Mr. Cassidy started to scream. Not loud, but deep down in his throat. He didn't move at all, just screamed.

I knew it was Enoch, taking what he wanted—from him.

What was the use of looking? You can’t stop him, and I had warned Mr. Cassidy.

I JUST sat there and held my hands to my ears until it was all over.

When I turned around again, Mr. Cassidy still sat slumped up against the bars. There wasn’t a sound to be heard.

Oh, yes, there was! A purring. A soft, faraway purring. The purring of Enoch, after he has eaten. Then I heard a scratching. The scratching of Enoch’s claws, when he frisks because he’s been fed.

The purring and the scratching came from inside Mr. Cassidy’s head.

That would be Enoch, all right, and he was happy now.

I was happy, too.

I readied my hand through the bars and pulled the jail keys from Mr. Cassidy’s pocket. I opened my cell door and I was free again.

There was no need for me to stay now, with Mr. Cassidy gone. And Enoch wouldn’t be staying, either. I called to him.

“Here, Enoch!”

That was as close I’ve ever come to really seeing Enoch—a sort of a white streak that came flashing out of the big red hole he had eaten in the back of Mr. Cassidy’s skull.

Then I felt the soft, cold, flabby weight landing on my own head once more, and I knew Enoch had come home.

I walked through the corridor and opened the outer door of the jail.

Enoch’s tiny feet began to patter on the roof of my brain.

Together we walked out into the night. The moon was shining, everything was still, and I could hear, ever so softly, Enoch’s happy chuckling in my ear.

Lizzie Borden Took An Axe . . .

Yes, horror comes at midnight, born of whispers out of dreams

"Lizzie Borden took an axe
And gave her mother forty whacks
When she saw what she had done
She gave her father forty-one

* * * * * *

MEN SAY that horror comes at midnight, born of whispers out of dreams. But horror came to me at high noon, heralded only by the prosaic jangling of a telephone.

I had been sitting in the office all morning, staring down the dusty road that led to the hills. It coiled and twisted before my aching eyes as a shimmering sun played tricks upon my vision. Nor were my eyes the only organs that betrayed me; something about the heat and the stillness seemed to invade my brain. I was restless, irritable, disturbed by a vague presentiment.

The sharp clangor of the phone bell crystalfized my apprehension in a single, strident note.

My palms dripped perspiration-patterns across the receiver. The phone was a warm, leaden weight against my ear. But the voice I heard was cold; icy cold, frozen with fear. The words congealed.

"Jim—come and help me!"

That was all. The receiver clicked before I could reply. The phone slid to the desk as I rose and ran to the door.

It was Anita's voice, of course.

It was Anita's voice that sent me speeding towards my car; sent me racing down that desolate, heat-riddled road towards the old house deep in the hills.

Something had happened out there. Something was bound to happen, sooner or later. I'd known it, and now I cursed myself for not insisting on the sensible thing. Anita and I should have eloped weeks ago.

I should have had the courage to snatch her bodily away from this atmosphere of Faulkneresque melodrama, and I might have, if only I had been able to believe in it.

At the time it all seemed so improbable. Worse than that, it seemed unreal.

There are no legend-haunted houses looming on lonely hillsides. Yet Anita lived in one.

There are no gaunt, fanatical old men who brood over black books; no "hex doctors" whose neighbors shun them in superstitious dread. Yet Anita's uncle, Gideon Godfrey, was such a man.

Young girls cannot be kept virtual prisoners in this day and age; they cannot be forbidden to leave the house, to love and marry the man of their choice. Yet Anita's uncle had her under lock and key, and our wedding was prohibited.

Yes, it was all sheer melodrama. The whole affair struck me as ridiculous when I thought about it; but when I was with Anita, I did not laugh.

When I heard Anita talk about her uncle, I almost believed; not that he had supernatural powers, but that he was cunningly, persistently attempting to drive her mad.

That's something you can understand, something evil, yet tangible.

There was a trust fund, and Gideon Gadfrey was Anita's legal guardian. He had her out there in his rotting hulk of a house—completely at his mercy. It might easily occur to him to work on her imagination with wild stories and subtle confirmations.

Anita told me. Told me of the locked rooms upstairs where the old man sat mumbling over the mouldering books he'd hidden away there. She told me of his feuds with farmers, his open boastings of the "hex" he put on cattle, the blights he claimed to visit upon crops.

Anita told me of her dreams. Something black came into her room at night. Something black and inchoate—a trailing mist that was nevertheless a definite and tangible presence. It had features, if not a face; a voice, if not a throat. It whispered.

And as it whispered, it caressed her. She would fight off the inky strands brushing her face and body; she would struggle to summon the scream which dispelled spectre and sleep simultaneously.

Anita had a name for the black thing, too.

She called it an incubus.

In ancient tracts on witchcraft, the incubus is mentioned—the dark demon that comes to women in the night. The black emissary of Satan the Tempter; the lustful shadow that rides the nightmare.

I knew of the incubus as a legend. Anita knew of it as a reality.

Anita grew thin and pale. I knew there was no magic concerned in her metamorphosis—confinement in that bleak old house was alchemy enough to work the change. That, plus the sadistically-inspired hintings of Gideon Godfrey, and the carefully calculated atmosphere of dread which resulted in the dreams.

But I had been weak. I didn't insist. After all, there was no real proof of Godfrey's machinations, and any attempt to bring issues to a head might easily result in a sanity hearing for Anita, rather than the old man.

I felt that, given time, I would be able to make Anita come away with me voluntarily.

And now, there was no time.

Something had happened.

The car churned dust from the road as I turned in towards the tottering gambrels of the house on the hillside. Through the flickering heat of a midsummer afternoon, I peered at the ruined gables above the long porch.

I swung up the drive, shot the car past the barn and side-buildings, and parked hastily.

No figure appeared at the open windows, and no voice called a greeting as I ran up the porch steps and paused before the open door. The hall within was dark. I entered heedless of knocking, and turned towards the parlor.

Anita was standing there, waiting, on the far side of the room. Her red hair was disheveled about her shoulders; her face was pale—but she was obviously unharmed. Her eyes brightened when she saw me.

“Jim—you’re here!”

She held out her arms to me, and I moved across the room to embrace her.

As I moved, I stumbled over something.

I looked down.

Lying at my feet was the body of Gideon Godfrey—the head split open and crushed to a bloody pulp.

2.

THEN Anita was sobbing in my arms, and I was patting her shoulders and trying not to stare at the red horror on the floor.

“Help me,” she whispered, over and over again. “Help me!”

“Of course I’ll help you,” I murmured. “But—what happened?”

“I don’t—know.”

“You don’t know?”

Something in my intonation sobered her. She straightened up, pulled away, and began dabbing at her eyes. Meanwhile she whispered on, hastily.

“It was hot this morning. I was out in the barn. I felt tired and dozed off in the hayloft. Then, all at once, I woke up and came back into the house. I found—him—lying here.”

“There was no noise? Nobody around?”

“Not a soul.”

“You can see how he was killed,” I said, “Only an axe could do such a job. But—where is it?”

She averted her gaze. “The axe? I don’t know. It should be beside the body, if somebody killed him.”

I turned and started out of the room. “Jim—where are you going?”

“To call the police, naturally,” I told her. “No, you can’t. Don’t you see? If you call them now, they’ll think I did it.”

I could only nod. “That’s right. It’s a pretty flimsy story, isn’t it, Anita? If we only had a weapon; fingerprints, or footsteps, some kind of clue—”

Anita sighed. I took her hand. “Try to remember,” I said, softly. “You’re sure you were out in the barn when this happened? Can’t you remember more than that?”

“No, darling. It’s all so confused, somehow. I was sleeping—I had one of my dreams—the black thing came—”

I shuddered. I knew how that statement affected me, and I could imagine the reaction of the police. She was quite mad, I was sure of it; and yet another thought struggled for realization. Somehow I had the feeling that I had lived through this moment before. Pseudo-memory. Or had I heard of it, read of it?

Read of it? Yes, that was it!

“Try hard, now,” I muttered. “Can’t you recall how it all began? Don’t you know why you went out to the barn in the first place?”

“Yes. I think I can remember. I went out there for some fishing sinkers.”

“Fishing sinkers? In the barn?” Something clicked, after all. I stared at her with eyes as glassy as those of the corpse on the floor.

“Listen to me,” I said. “You’re not Anita Loomis. You’re—Lizzie Borden!”

She didn’t say a word. Obviously the name had no meaning for her. But it was all coming back to me now; the old, old story, the unsolved mystery.

I guided her to the sofa, sat beside her. She didn't look at me. I didn't look at her. Neither of us looked at the thing on the floor. The heat shimmered all around us in the house of death as I whispered the story to her—the story of Lizzie Borden—

3.

IT WAS early August of the year 1892.

Fall River, Massachusetts lay gasping in the surge of a heat-wave.

The sun beat down upon the home of Tail River's leading citizen, the venerable Andrew Jackson Borden. Here the old man dwelt with his second wife, Mrs. Abby Borden; stepmother of the two girls, Emma and Lizzie Borden. “The maid, Bridget “Maggie” Sullivan, completed the small household. A house guest, John V. Morse, was away at this time, visiting. Emma, the older Borden girl, was also absent.

Only the maid and Lizzie Borden were present on August 2nd, when Mr. and Mrs. Borden became ill. It was Lizzie who spread the news—she told her friend, Marion Russell, that she believed their milk had been poisoned.

But it was too hot to bother, too hot to think. Besides, Lizzie's ideas weren't taken very seriously. At 32, the angular, unprepossessing younger daughter, was looked upon with mixed opinion by the members of the community. It was known that she was “cultured” and “refined”—she had travelled in Europe; she was a churchgoer, taught a class in a church mission, and enjoyed a reputation for “good work” as a member of the WCTU and similar organizations. Yet some folks thought her temperamental, even eccentric. She had “notions.”

So the illness of the elder Bordens was duly noted and ascribed to natural causes; it was impossible to think about anything more important than the omnipresent heat, and the forthcoming Annual Picnic of the I Fall River Police Department, scheduled for August 4th.

On the 4th the heat was unabated, but the picnic was in full swing by 11 o'clock—the time at which Andrew Jackson Borden left his downtown office and came home to relax on the parlor sofa. He slept fitfully in the noonday swelter.

Lizzie Borden came in from the barn a short while later and found her father asleep no longer.

Mr. Borden lay on the sofa, his head bashed in so that his features were unrecognizable.

Lizzie Borden called the maid, "Maggie" Sullivan, who was resting in her room. She told her to run and fetch Dr. Bowen, a near neighbor. He was not at home.

Another neighbor, a Mrs. Churchill, happened by. Lizzie Borden greeted her at the door.

"Someone has killed father," were Lizzie's words.

"And where is your mother?" Mrs. Churchill asked.

Lizzie Borden hesitated. It was hard to think in all this heat. "Why—she's out. She received a note to go and help someone who is sick."

Mrs. Churchill didn't hesitate. She marched to a public livery stable and summoned help. Soon a crowd of neighbors and friends gathered; police and doctors were in attendance. And in the midst of the growing confusion, it was Mrs. Churchill who went directly upstairs to the spare room.

Mrs. Borden rested there, her head smashed in.

By the time Dr. Dolan, the coroner, arrived, questioning was already proceeding. The Chief or Police and several of his men were on hand, establishing the fact that there had been no attempt at robbery. They began to interrogate Lizzie.

Lizzie Borden said she was in the barn, eating pears and looking for fishing sinkers—hot as it was. She dozed off, was awakened by a muffled groan, and came into the house to investigate. There she had found her father's hacked body. And that was all—

Now her story of a suspected poisoning was recalled, with fresh significance. A druggist said that a woman had indeed come into his shop several days before and attempted to procure some prussic acid—saying she needed it to kill the moths in her fur coat. She had been refused, and informed by the proprietor that she needed a doctor's prescription.

The woman was identified, too—as Lizzie Borden.

Lizzie's story of the note summoning her mother away from the house now came in for scrutiny. No such note was ever discovered.

Meanwhile, the investigators were busy. In the cellar, they discovered a hatchet with a broken handle. It appeared to have been recently washed, then covered with ashes. Water and ashes conceal stains. . . .

Shock, heat, and embarrassment all played subtle parts in succeeding events. The police presently withdrew without taking formal action, and the whole matter was held over, pending an inquest. After all, Andrew Jackson Borden was a wealthy citizen, his daughter was a prominent and respectable woman, and no one wished to act hastily.

Days passed in a pall of heat and gossip behind sweaty palms. Lizzie's friend, Marion Russell, dropped in at the house three days after the crime and discovered Lizzie burning a dress.

"It was all covered with paint," Lizzie Borden explained.

Marion Russell remembered that dress—it was the one Lizzie Borden had worn on the day of the murders.

The inevitable inquest was held, with the inevitable verdict. Lizzie Borden was arrested and formally charged with the slayings.

The press took over. The church members defended Lizzie Borden. The sob-sisters made much of her. During the six months preceding the actual trial, the crime became internationally famous.

But nothing new was discovered.

During the thirteen days of the trial, the bewildering story was recounted without any sensational development.

Why should a refined New England spinster suddenly kill her father and stepmother with a hatchet, then boldly "discover" the bodies and summon the police?

The prosecution was unable to give a satisfactory answer. On June 20th, 1893, Lizzie Borden was acquitted by a jury of her peers, after one hour of deliberation.

She retired to her home and lived a life of seclusion for many, many years. The stigma had been erased, but the mystery remained unsolved with her passing.

Only the grave little girls remained, skipping their ropes and solemnly chanting:

"Lizzie Borden took an axe
And gave her mother forty whacks
When she saw what she had done
She gave her father forty-one."

4.

THAT'S the story I told Anita—the story you can read wherever famous crimes are chronicled.

She listened without comment, but I could hear the sharp intake of breath as I recounted some singularly significant parallel. The hot day . . . the barn . . . the fishing sinkers . . . a sudden sleep, a sudden awakening . . . the return to the house . . . discovery of a body . . . took an axe. . . .

She waited until I had finished before speaking.

"Jim, why do you tell me this? Is it your Way of hinting that I—took an axe to my uncle?"

"I'm not hinting anything," I answered. "I was just struck by the amazing similarity of this case and the Lizzie Borden affair."

"What do you think happened, Jim? In the Lizzie Borden case, I mean."

"I don't know," I said slowly. "I was wondering if you had a theory."

Her opal eyes glinted in the shadowed room. "Couldn't it have been the same thing?" she whispered. "You know what I've told you about my dreams. About the incubus.

"Suppose Lizzie Borden had those dreams, too. Suppose an entity emerged from her sleeping brain; an entity that would take up an axe and kill—"

She sensed my protest and ignored it. "Uncle Gideon knew of such things. How the spirit descends upon you in sleep. Couldn't such a presence emerge into the world while she slept and kill her parents? Couldn't such a being creep into the house here while I slept and kill Uncle Gideon?"

I shook my head. "You know the answer I must give you," I said. "And you can guess what the police would say to that. Our only chance now, before, calling them, is to find the murder weapon."

We went out into the hall together, and hand in hand we walked through the silent ovens that were the rooms of this old house. Everywhere was dust and desolation. The kitchen alone bore signs of recent occupancy—they had breakfasted there early in the day, Anita said.

There was no axe or hatchet to be found anywhere.

It took courage to tackle the cellar. I was almost certain of what we must find. But Anita did not recoil, and we descended the dark stairwell.

The cellar did not yield up a single sharp instrument.

Then we were walking up the stairs to the second floor. The front bedroom was ransacked, then Anita's little room, and at last we stood before the door of Gideon Godfrey's chamber.

"It's locked," I said. "That's funny."

"No," Anita demurred. "He always kept it locked. The key must be downstairs with—him."

"I'll get it," I said. And I did so. When I returned with the rusty key, Anita stood quaking in the hallway.

"I won't go inside with you," she breathed. "I've never been inside his room. I'm afraid. He used to lock himself in and I'd hear sounds late at night—he was praying, but not to God—"

"Wait here, then," I said.

I unlocked the door, opened it, stepped across the threshold.

GIDEON GODFREY may have been a madman himself. He may have been a cunning schemer, bent on deluding his niece. But in either case, he did believe in sorcery.

That much was evident from the contents of his room. I saw the books saw the crudely drawn chalk circles on the floor; literally dozens of them, hastily obliterated and repeated endlessly. There were queer geometric configurations traced in blue chalk upon one of the walls, and candle-drippings covered walls and floor alike.

The heavy, fetid air held a faint, acrid reek of incense. I noted one sharp instrument in the room—a long silver knife lying on a side-table next to a pewter bowl. The knife seemed rusty, and the rust was red. . . .

But it was not the murder weapon, that was certain. I was looking for an axe, and it wasn't here.

I joined Anita in the hall.

"Isn't there anywhere else?" I asked, "Another room?"

"Perhaps the barn," she suggested.

"And we didn't really search in the parlor," I added.

"Don't make me go in there again," Anita begged. "Not in the same room where he is. You look there and I'll go through the barn."

We parted at the foot of the stairs. She went out the side entrance and I walked back into the parlor.

I looked behind the chairs, under the sofa. I found nothing. It was hot in there; hot and quiet. My head began to swim.

Heat—silence—and that grinning thing on the floor. I turned away, leaned against the mantel, and stared at my bloodshot eyes in the mirror.

All at once, I saw it, standing behind me. It was like a cloud—a black cloud. But it wasn't a cloud. It was a face. A face, covered by a black mask of wavering smoke; a mask that leered and pressed closer.

Through heat and silence it came, and I couldn't move. I stared at the swirling, cloudy smoke that shrouded a face.

Then I heard something swish, and I turned.

Anita was standing behind me.

As I grasped her wrists she screamed and fell. I could only stare down at her, stare down as the black cloud over her face disappeared, oozed into air.

The search was over. I'd found the murder weapon, all right; it rested rigidly in her hands—the bloodstained axe!

5.

I CARRIED Anita over to the sofa. She didn't move, and I made no attempt to revive her.

Then I went out into the hall, carrying the axe with me. No sense in taking any chances. I trusted Anita still, but not that thing—not that black mist, swirling up like smoke to take possession of a living brain and make it lust to kill.

Demoniac possession it was; the legend spoken of in ancient books like those in the room of the dead wizard.

I crossed the hall to the little study opposite the parlor. The wall telephone was here; I picked it up and rang the operator.

She got me the Highway Police headquarters. I don't know why I called them, rather than the sheriff. I was in a daze throughout the entire call. I stood there holding the axe in one hand, reporting the murder in a few words.

Questions rose from the other end of the wire; I did not answer them.

"Come on out to the Godfrey place," I said. "There's been a killing."

What else could I say?

What would we be telling the police, half an hour from now, when they arrived on the scene?

They wouldn't believe the truth—wouldn't believe that a demon could enter a human body and activate it as an instrument for murder.

But I believed it now. I had seen the fiend peering out of Anita's face when she tried to sneak up behind me with the axe. I had seen the black smoke, the conjuration of a demon lusting for bloody death.

Now I knew that it must have entered her as she slept; made her kill Gideon Godfrey.

Perhaps such a thing had happened to Lizzie Borden. Yes. The eccentric spinster with the over-active imagination, so carefully repressed; the eccentric spinster, sleeping in the barn on that hot summer day—

"Lizzie Borden took an axe
And gave her mother forty whacks"

I leaned back, the verse running through my head.

It was hotter than I had believed possible, and the stillness hinted of approaching storm.

I groped for coolness, felt the cold axe-blade in my hand as I leaned the weapon across my lap. As long as I held on to this, we were safe. The fiend was foiled, now. Wherever that presence lurked, it must be raging, for it could not take possession.

Oh, that was madness! The heat was responsible, surely. Sunstroke caused Anita to kill her uncle. Sunstroke brought on her babblings about an incubus and dreams. Sunstroke impelled that sudden, murderous attack upon me before the mirror.

Sympathetic hallucination accounted for my image of a face veiled by a black mist. It had to be that way. The police would say so, doctors would say so.

"When she saw what she had done
She gave her father forty-one."
Police. Doctors. Lizzie Borden.
The heat. The cool axe.
Forty whacks. . . .

6.

THE first crash of thunder awakened me.

For a moment I thought the police had arrived, then realized that the heat-storm was breaking. I blinked and rose from the armchair. Then I realized that something was missing.

The axe no longer rested across my lap. It wasn't on the floor. It wasn't visible anywhere. The axe had disappeared again!

"Anita," I gasped. I knew without conscious formulation of thought how it must have happened. She had awakened while I slept—come in here and stolen the axe from me.

What a fool I had been to sleep!

I might have guessed it . . . while she was unconscious, the lurking demon had another chance to gain possession. That was it; the demon had entered into Anita again.

I faced the door, stared at the floor, and saw my confirmation scrawled in a trail of red wetness dotting the carpet and outer hall.

It was blood. Fresh blood.

I rushed across the hall, re-entered the parlor.

Then I gasped, but with relief. For Anita was still lying on the couch, just as I had left her. I wiped the sudden perspiration from my eyes and forehead, then stared again at the red pattern on the floor.

The trail of blood ended beside the couch, all right. But did it lead to the couch—or away from it?

Thunder roared through the heat. A flicker of lightning seared the shadows of the room as I tried to puzzle it out.

What did it mean? It meant that perhaps Anita was not possessed of a demon now while she slept.

But I had slept, too.

Maybe—maybe the demon had come to me when I dozed off!

All at once, everything blurred. I was trying to remember. Where was the axe? Where could it possibly be, now?

Then the lightning came again and with it the final confirmation—the revelation.

I saw the axe now, crystal-clear—the axe—buried to the hilt in the top of Anita’s head!

Sweets to the Sweet

You can't bring up all children the same way. For instance, take a little witch. . . .

IRMA didn't look like a witch.

She had small, regular features, a peaches-and-cream complexion, blue eyes and fair, almost ash-blonde hair. Besides, she was only eight years old.

"Why does he tease her so?" sobbed Miss Pall. "That's where she got the idea in the first place—because he calls her a little witch."

Sam Steever bulked his paunch back into the squeaky swivel chair and folded his hammy hands in his lap. His fat lawyer's mask was immobile, but lie was really quite distressed.

Women like Miss Pall should never sob. Their glasses wiggle, their thin noses twitch, their creasy eyelids redden, and their stringy hair becomes disarrayed.

"Please, my dear, control yourself," coaxed Sam Steever. "Perhaps if we could just talk this whole thing over sensibly—"

"I don't care!" Miss Pall sniffled. "I'm not going back there again. I can't stand it. There's nothing I can do. The man is your brother, and she's your brother's child. It's not my responsibility. I've tried—"

"Of course you've tried." Sam Steever smiled benignly, as if Miss Pall were foreman of the jury. "I quite understand. But I still don't see why you are so agitated, dear lady."

Miss Pali removed her spectacles and dabbed at her eyes with a floral-print handkerchief. Then she deposited the soggy ball in her purse, snapped the catch, replaced her spectacles, and sat up straight.

"Very well, Mr. Steever," she said. "I shall do my best to acquaint you with my reasons for quitting your brother's employ."

She suppressed a tardy sniff.

"I came to John Steever two years ago in response to an advertisement for a housekeeper, as you know. When I found that I was to be governess to a motherless six-year-old child, I was at first distressed. I know nothing of the Care of children."

"John had a nurse the first six years," Sam Steever nodded. "You know Irma's mother died in childbirth."

"I am aware of that," said Miss Pall, primly. "Naturally, one's heart goes out to a lonely, neglected little girl. And she was so terribly lonely, Mr. Steever—if you could have seen her, moping around in the corners of that big, ugly old house—"

"I have seen her," said Sam Steever hastily, hoping to forestall another outburst. "And I know what you've done for Irma. My brother is inclined to be thoughtless, even a bit selfish at times. He doesn't understand."

"He's cruel," declared Miss Paul, suddenly vehement. "Cruel and wicked. Even if he is your brother, I say he's no fit father for any child. When I came there, her little arms were black and blue from beatings. He used to take a belt—"

"I know. Sometimes I think John never recovered from the shock of Mrs. Steever's death. That's why I was so pleased when you came, dear lady. I thought you might help the situation."

"I tried," Miss Pall whimpered. "You know I tried. I never raised a hand to that child in two years, though many's the time your brother has told me to punish her. 'Give the little witch a beating,' he used to say. 'That's all she needs—a good thrashing.' And then she'd hide behind my back and whisper to me to protect her. But she wouldn't cry, Mr. Steever. Do you know, I've never seen her cry."

SAM STEEVER felt vaguely irritated and a bit bored. He wished the old hen would get on with it. So he smiled and oozed treacle. "But just what is your problem, dear lady?"

"Everything was all right when I came there. We got along just splendidly. I started to teach Irma to read—and was surprised to find that she had already mastered reading. Your brother disclaimed having taught her, but she spent hours curled up on the sofa with a book. 'Just like her,' he used to say. 'Unnatural little witch. Doesn't play with the other children. Little witch.' That's the way he kept talking, Mr. Steever. As if she were some sort of—I don't know what. And she so sweet and quiet and pretty!

"Is it any wonder she read? I used to be that way myself when I was a girl, because—but never mind.

"Still, it was a shock that day I found her looking through the Encyclopedia Britannica. 'What are you reading, Irma?' I asked. She showed me. It was the article on Witchcraft.

"You see what morbid thoughts your brother had inculcated in her poor little head?

"I did my best. I went out and bought her some toys—she had absolutely nothing, you know; not even a doll. She didn't even know how to play! I tried to get her interested in some of the other little girls in the neighborhood, but it was no use. They didn't understand her and she didn't understand them. There were scenes. Children can be cruel, thoughtless. And her father wouldn't let her go to public school. I was to teach her—

"Then I brought her the modelling clay. She liked that. She would spend hours just making faces with clay. For a child of six, Irma displayed real talent.

"We made little dolls together, and I sewed clothes for them. That first year was a happy one, Mr. Steever. Particularly during those months when your brother was away in South America. But this year, when he came back—oh, I can't bear to talk about it!"

"Please," said Sam Steever. "You must understand. John is not a happy man. The loss of his wife, the decline of his import trade, and his drinking—but you know all that."

"All I know is that he hates Irma," snapped Miss Pall, suddenly. "He hates her. He wants her to be bad, so he can whip her. 'If you don't discipline the little witch, I shall,' he always says. And then he takes her upstairs and thrashes her with his belt—you must do something, Mr. Steever, or I'll go to the authorities myself."

The crazy old biddy would do that, Sam Steever thought. Remedy—more treacle. "But about Irma," he persisted.

"She's changed, too. Ever since her father returned this year. She won't play with me any more, hardly looks at me. It is as though I failed her, Mr. Steever, in not protecting her from that man. Besides—she thinks she's a witch."

Crazy. Stark, staring crazy. Sam Steever creaked upright in his chair.

"Oh, you needn't look at me like that, Mr. Steever. "She'll tell you so herself—if you ever visited the house!"

He caught the reproach in her voice and assuaged it with a deprecating nod.

"She told me all right, if her father wants her to be a witch she'll be a witch. And she won't play with me, or anyone else, because witches don't play. Last Halloween she wanted me to give her a broomstick. Oh, it would be funny if it weren't so tragic. That child is losing her sanity.

Just a week ago I thought she'd changed.

That's when she asked me to take her to church one Sunday. 'I want to see the baptism,' she said. Imagine that—an eight-year-old interested in baptism! Reading too much, that's what does it.

"Well, we went to church and she was as sweet as can be, wearing her new blue dress and holding my hand. I was proud of her, Mr. Steever, really proud.

"But after that, she went right back into her shell. Reading around the house, running through the yard at twilight and talking to herself.

"Perhaps it's because your brother wouldn't bring her a kitten. She was pestering him for a black cat, and he asked why, and she said, 'Because witches always have black cats.' Then he took her upstairs.

"I can't stop him, you know. He beat her again the night the power failed and we couldn't find the candles. He said she'd stolen them. Imagine that—accusing an eight-year-old child of stealing candles!

"That was the beginning of the end. Then today, when he found his hairbrush missing—"

"You say he beat her with his hairbrush?"

"Yes. She admitted having stolen it. Said she wanted it for her doll."

"But didn't you say she has no dolls?"

"She made one. At least I think she did. I've never seen it—she won't show us anything any more; won't talk to us at table, just impossible to handle her.

"But this doll she made—it's a small one, I know, because at times she carries it tucked under her arm. She talks to it and pets it, but she won't show it to me or to him. He asked her about the hairbrush and she said she took it for the doll.

"Your brother flew into a terrible rage—he'd been drinking in his room again all morning; oh, don't think I don't know it!—and she just smiled and said he could have it now. She went over to her bureau and handed it to him. She hadn't harmed it in the least; some of the hair from his head was still in it, I noticed.

"But he snatched it up, and then he started to strike her about the shoulders with it, and he twisted her arm and then he—"

Miss Pall huddled in her chair and summoned great racking sobs from her thin chest.

Sam Steever patted her shoulder, fussing about her like an elephant over a wounded canary.

“That’s all, Mr. Steever. I came right to you. I’m not even going back to that house to get my things. I can’t stand any more—the way he beat her—and the way she didn’t cry, just giggled and giggled and giggled—sometimes I think she is a witch—that he made her into a witch—”

II

SAM STEEVER picked up the phone. The ringing had broken the relief of silence after Miss Pall’s hasty departure.

“Hello—that you, Sam?”

He recognized his brother’s voice, somewhat the worse for drink.

“Yes, John.”

“I suppose the old bat came running straight to you to shoot her mouth off.”

“If you mean Miss Pall, I’ve seen her, yes.”

Pay no attention. I can explain everything.”

“Do you want me to stop in? I haven’t paid you a visit in months.”

“Well—not right now. Got an appointment with the doctor this evening.”

“Something wrong?”

“Pain in my arm. Rheumatism or something. Getting a little diathermy. But I’ll call you tomorrow.”

“Right.”

But John Steever did not call the next day. About supper time, Sam called him.

Surprisingly enough, Irma answered the phone. Her thin, squeaky little voice sounded faintly in Sam’s ears.

“Daddy’s upstairs sleeping. He’s been sick.”

“Well, don’t disturb him. What is it—his arm?”

“His back, now. He has to go to the doctor again in a little while.”

“Tell him I’ll call tomorrow, then. Uh—everything all right, Irma? I mean, don’t you miss Miss Pall?”

"No. I'm glad she went away. She's stupid."

"Oh. Yes. I see. But you phone me if you want anything. And I hope your daddy's better."

"Yes. So do I," said Irma, and then she began to giggle, and then she hung up.

There was no giggling the following afternoon when John Steever called Sam at the office. His voice was sober—with the sharp sobriety of pain.

"Sam—for God's sake, get over here. Something's happening to me!"

"There's a client in the office, but I'll get rid of him. Say, wait a minute. Why don't you call the doctor?"

"That quack can't help me. He gave me diathermy for my arm and yesterday he did the same thing for my back."

"Didn't it help?"

"The pain went away, yes. But it's back now. I feel—like I was being crushed. Squeezed, here in the chest. I can't breathe."

"Sounds like pleurisy."

"It isn't pleurisy. He examined me. Said I was sound as a dollar. No, there's nothing organically wrong. And couldn't tell him the real cause."

"Real cause?"

"Yes. The pins. The pins that little fiend is sticking into the doll she made. Into the arm, the back. And now heaven only knows how she's causing this."

"John, you mustn't—"

"Oh, what's the use of talking? It's the doll all right, the one she made with the candle-wax and the hair from my brush. Oh—it hurts to talk—that cursed little witch! Hurry, Sam. Promise me you'll do something—anything—get that doll from her—get that doll—"

III

HALF an hour later, at four-thirty, Sam Steever entered his brother's house. Irma opened the door.

It gave Sam a shock to see her standing there, smiling and unperturbed, pale blonde hair brushed immaculately back from the rosy oval of her face. She looked just like a little doll. A little doll—

"Hello, Uncle Sam."

"Hello, Irma. Your daddy called me, did he tell you? He said he wasn't feeling well—"

"I know. But he's all right now. He's sleeping."

Something happened to Sam Steever; a drop of ice-water trickled down his spine.

"Sleeping?" he croaked. "Upstairs?"

Before she opened her mouth to answer he was bounding up the steps to the second floor, striding down the hall to John's bedroom.

John lay on the bed. He was asleep, and only asleep. Sam Steever noted the regular rise and fall of his chest as he breathed. His face was calm, relaxed.

Then the drop of ice-water evaporated, and Sam could afford to smile and murmur, "Nonsense," under his breath as he turned away.

As he went downstairs he hastily improvised plans. A six-month vacation for his brother; avoid calling it a "cure." An orphanage for Irma; give her a chance to get away from this morbid old house. . . .

He paused halfway down the stairs. Peering over the banister through the twilight he saw Irma on the sofa, cuddled up like a little white ball. She was talking to something she cradled in her arms, rocking it to and fro.

Then there was a doll, after all.

Sam Steever tiptoed very quietly down the stairs and walked over to Irma.

"Hello," he said.

She jumped. Both arms rose to cover completely whatever it was she had been fondling. She squeezed it tightly.

Sam Steever thought of a doll being squeezed across the chest—

“Daddy’s better now, isn’t he?” lisped Irma.

“Yes, much better.”

“I knew he would be.”

“But I’m afraid he’s going to have to go away for a rest. A long rest.”

A smile flittered through the mask. “Good,” said Irma.

“Of course,” Sam went on, “you couldn’t stay here all alone. I was wondering—maybe we could send you off to school, or to some kind of a home—”

Irma giggled. “Oh, you needn’t worry about me,” she said. She shifted about on the sofa as Sam sat down, then sprang up quickly as he came close to her.

HER arms shifted with the movement, and Sam Steever saw a pair of tiny legs dangling down below her elbow. There were trousers on the legs, and little bits of leather for shoes.

“What’s that you have, Irma?” he asked. “Is it a doll?” He extended his hand.

She pulled it back.

“You can’t see it,” she said.

“But I want to. Miss Pall said you made such lovely ones.”

“Miss Pall is stupid. So are you. Go away.”

“Please, Irma. Let me see it.”

But even as he spoke, Sam Steever was staring at the top of the doll, momentarily revealed, when she backed away. It was a head all right, with wisps of hair over a white face. Dusk dimmed the features, but Sam recognized the eyes, die nose, the chin—

He could keep up the pretense no longer. “Give me that doll, Irma!” he snapped. “I know what it is. I know who it is—” For an instant the mask slipped from Irma’s face, and Sam Steever stared into naked fear.

She knew. She knew he knew.

Then, just as quickly, the mask was replaced.

Irma was only a sweet, spoiled, stubborn little girl as she shook her head merrily and smiled with impish mischief in her eyes.

"Oh, Uncle Sam," she giggled. "You're so silly! Why, this isn't a real doll."

Irma giggled once more, raising the figure as she spoke. "Why, it's only —candy!" Irma said.

"Candy?"

Irma nodded. Then, very swiftly, she slipped the tiny head of the image into her mouth.

And bit it off.

There was a single piercing scream from upstairs.

As Sam Steever turned and ran up the steps, little Irma, still gravely munching, skipped out of the front door and into the night beyond.

A Head For His Bier!

Down at Homicide, they said I had a good head on my shoulders. But I wasn’t sure how long I could keep it there after I looked at that bobbing, nodding thing in the alcohol jar, that used to stand on Gustav Myers’ neck!

CHAPTER ONE

Head Start

THERE WERE three of us in the room: Tiny Tim, myself, and the guy without a head.

Tiny Tim talked, I listened, and the guy without a head just sort of took it slow and easy.

“Somewhere in this city,” said Tiny Tim, “a man sits in a little room. It’s a very private sort of a room, and the door is locked to visitors. Visitors just wouldn’t understand about this room.

“They wouldn’t understand about the man, either, because he’s an unusual type. Odd. Secretive. Eccentric. A man with a hobby. You might call him a collector.

“It isn’t stamps he collects, or antiques, or rare jewelry. He collects human heads!”

I opened my mouth, but before I could put my foot in it, Tiny Tim rattled on.

"Think of it, Johnny. He's probably sitting in his room right now, admiring his collection. Most likely he keeps them in jars lined along the walls—his specimens, I mean. Dozens of human heads, floating in alcohol. Bald, shrivelled heads of old men. Heads of young girls, haloed by coils of golden hair. The tiny heads of infants in small jars.

"I can see them bobbing and nodding, see the sightless eyes peering out, bulging and distorted by the glass. I can see him gloating as he caresses his latest trophy, fondling it, feeling its contours before he places it in a jar to float forever in alcohol."

"You're floating in alcohol!" I snapped.

Tiny Timothy Higgins looked hurt. His small features twisted in confusion as he ran a hand through carroty hair.

"I'm only trying to help," he said. "I've got a theory."

"You've got a lot of things," I told the little man. "A persecution complex, a bad hangover, and no darn business in a room where a murder has been committed."

"Take it easy," Tiny Tim begged. "You know I'm not a lush. I wasn't bumped off Homicide for that. Captain Leeds just got a fool notion in his head that I'm too small to make a good detective. After six years on the force, this big ape has to take charge and bounce me out because of a whim."

"Sure, I know, you got a tough break," I agreed. "I was only needling you. And I'd like to help you out. But it's more than your size that's against you. Leeds knows about those wild ideas you get."

"Wild ideas?" Tim yelped. "Such as what?"

"Don't look so innocent," I told him. "Every time some Chinese got run over by a beer truck, you smelled a new Tong war. A dame got knocked off in a bathtub and you wanted to pin the crime on a sea serpent. No wonder you were kicked out. And if Leeds knew you sneaked up here on a case with me, he'd kick me out, too."

"I've got to work with you, Johnny," Tim protested. "Give me a break. Maybe if I can crack this case and you mention it, I can get back on the Department payroll."

I shrugged. "All right, I'm a sucker. Stick around, but don't let any of the other boys see you. And don't feed me those screwey theories. Now you're telling me there's a maniac loose in the city who cuts off human heads for his private collection."

Tiny Tim pointed at the floor. "What more proof do you need?" he asked.

The headless body of a man lay spread-eagled on the rug of the dingy little room. The cheap suit and the soiled carpeting beneath it were drenched with blood from the carotid artery.

"What else can you make of it?" Tim asked. "No friends. No enemies. No clues. No head. Only a mad killer would—"

"Stop that! You see too many movies!"

"All right, you reason it out," Tim suggested. "Here's a guy named Gustav Myers. He's middle-aged, lives all alone in this attic room, comes and goes without a word. Doesn't even speak to the landlord—unless the landlord's lying. No friends, no mail, no phone calls.

"You told me what happened. The landlord hadn't seen him around for a couple of days, the rent was overdue, and Myers didn't answer the door. So the landlord used his pass key and what did he find? Gustav Myers, lying here on the floor with his head chopped off, and taken away. Obviously the work of a fiend."

"Then I come along," I continued for him. "And before I as much as get into the house, you buttonhole me on the street, sneak in, and foul up the whole case with a loony hunch."

"All right," Tim muttered. "You'll see."

"I'm going to see, right now. I want to case this joint before the coroner and his little pals swarm all over the place. We have about five minutes left, and then you'll scram out of here. I don't want anyone else to spot you."

I BEGAN to move around the room, taking care not to stumble over the body and wreck my new shoe-shine. Tim sat down on the bed and regarded me glumly.

"Why look for anything?" he asked. "I already told you there's no clues. This guy Myers must have been a queer old duck. Did you notice how bare the room is? Not a magazine, or a newspaper, or a book in the place. No radio, no deck of cards, no tobacco, no collection of old string, no letters."

"Maybe somebody cleaned the joint out," I said.

"Would he take a pipe? Or cigarettes and ashtrays? Or magazines? No. The whole setup is screwy."

"You're right at that," I told him. "It certainly isn't natural for an old recluse to just sit in a room for two or three months with absolutely nothing around for amusement. Unless that's a clue in itself."

"Maybe the old boy was sick," suggested Tim. "You can tell from the way he's lying on the rug that he was in bed when when he got his. Tumbled right off and the cover is mussed where his body must have pressed on the mattress."

"Fine," I said. "Very fine! A mad fiend knocks on the door. Myers is in bed. 'Who's there?' he calls. 'It's only me, the mad fiend.' 'All right, I'll let you in.' So he gets up, lets the mad fiend in, then lies down on the bed again and waits for the killer to hit him with an axe. Oh, you've got a great theory there."

Tiny Tim looked hurt. Fie was good at that.

"Your five minutes are up," I said. "Get out of here."

"But Johnny—"

"You heard me. The coroner should arrive any minute now, and I've got work to do."

"Don't I get a look-in on the case at all?"

"Tell you what I'll do," I said. "I'll phone you later."

"When?"

"About two weeks after I solve the case. Now beat it—you and your mad fiends!"

It was tough on the little guy but I had to do it. He straggled out forlornly and closed the door.

I took a fast case of the room, but it was absolutely barren of anything that might be considered a hint, let alone a clue.

There was another threadbare suit hanging in the closet, a battered hat, a pair of shoes. A few shirts and some underwear scarcely filled the top drawer of the old bureau. Otherwise the room was empty of personal possessions.

It didn't look lived in at all. With the body on the floor, it merely looked died-in.

"Let me see now," I muttered. "He must have been lying on the bed like this—"

I lay on the bed, like that.

The pillow was hard. Too hard. I took it away. I lifted the grimy sheet beneath.

A black and dog-eared old photograph album rested next to the mattress. I pulled it out and opened the thick old covers.

It was empty. No pages. Maybe he just bought the cover and intended to purchase loose-leaf pages.

That was out, because the binding cords were cut. The pages of the photo album had been removed. Did the killer remove them? If so, why hadn't he carried the entire album away?

Then the realization hit me—the album covers were bulky. And the killer had another bulky burden to carry: His victim's head.

But why had he taken it? Tiny Tim thought he knew. Me, I wasn't so sure. The whole setup was screwy.

Perhaps I should have stayed in the room and kept Gustav Myers company until the coroner's squad arrived, but somehow I didn't feel very sociable.

I eased out and went downstairs to see the landlord. Mr. Rummell's apartment was on the first floor, rear, and I had no trouble finding it—merely followed my nose and allowed it to lead me to the source of one of the foulest odors I've ever sniffed.

Mr. Rummell was going to have boiled cabbage for dinner, and he probably had it for lunch, too. From the odor, he might have eaten it for breakfast, not only today, but every day for the past ten years.

The hallway stunk. His apartment stunk. Mr. Rummell stunk too. I'd like to say something kinder, but I can't.

Mr. Rummell answered the door, then stood aside and permitted me to enter. I managed to squeeze past his stomach and into the room.

"Now who'd you wondt, huh?" he asked. "More snoobping aroundt? You fellers give me a pain in the neck."

"Sorry, Mr. Rummell," I said. "Business, you know. And so far you haven't been of too much help. When you called, you merely said there was a body in your place. We've got to know more about it. Who was this man Myers? You say he came here about three months ago. Surely you found out something about him in all that time."

"I don't findt oudt," Rummell said. "I run boardting house, see? I mindt mine businesses, boardters mindt dere businesses, see? Dot's how it iss."

"Good idea," I told him. "Nice friendly little setup. Is that why you keep a gun on the table all the time? Or were you planning to kill off some of the bedbugs in this dump with it?"

"I godt to prodect mineself," Rummell grumbled, hastily shoving the weapon into a drawer.

"From bedbugs, eh? Well, never mind that now. Let's play like I don't see the gun. Let's play like you're going to tell me all about your boarder, Gustav Myers."

"But I don't know," Rummell protested. "Nobody don't come in. Nobody don't go oudt."

"He had no job," I persisted. "Where did his money come from? Did he pay you in cash? Did he get any checks?"

Rummell looked at me. Suddenly he began to sweat. It stopped me cold to see a big fat man perspire like that, over nothing at all. Or was there something?

Then I got it. Rummell was listening to a noise. A noise, coming from under our feet. It thumped. "What's that?" I asked.

"Huh?"

"That noise. It's coming from the cellar, isn't it?"

"I don't hear no—"

There were footsteps in the cellar. Rummell could play dumb if he wanted to. Let him sit here and sweat. I wanted to find out something on this case. Captain Leeds expected it. I made for the door.

"Here—where you t'ink you going?"

"You know where."

"Wait—come back. I tell you." He got up and tried to grab my shoulder. I wrenched free and bolted. The cellar door was under the hall steps. Down I went, expecting Rummell to follow. He didn't move. I looked over my shoulder once and saw him silhouetted in the doorway. His flabby mouth worked convulsively.

I couldn't find a light, so I took the steps in darkness. Darkness and silence. For as the cellar door clicked open under my hand, the noise ceased.

There was no thumping. There was only darkness, stillness, and a damp, musty odor of decay. It was worse than boiled cabbage.

At the foot of the stairs I groped again for a light switch. None met my fingers. I lit a match and examined the wall. The switch was off to one side. I clicked it. No light. I clicked it again. Still no go.

Burned out? Or turned out? And if so, by whom? Who was thumping around down here? Cellar. Axe. Mad fiend—

Tiny Tim was crazy. Except that there are psycopathic murderers who lurk at the scene of the crime and await new victims.

I pulled out the gun, just for luck. Just for luck, I saw to it that it was loaded. Just for luck I groped my way into the blackness very quietly. All this I did for luck, and what did luck do for me? Absolutely nothing.

Because I hadn't taken ten steps when something came out of the darkness, something that howled and gibbered; howled and gibbered as it struck me over the head and sent me down into a private darkness of my own.

CHAPTER TWO

Headway

"COLLINS—WAKE up! Come on, Johnny, snap out of it."

It was good advice, so I took it. I opened my eyes. The lights were on at last. Captain Leeds bent over me as a couple of the boys propped me up on the cellar steps.

"Lucky we got here," Leeds said. "Otherwise the young moron might have gotten away."

"What young moron?"

"The maniac."

I blinked and stood up, fast. "Maniac?"

"Of course. What other kind of a guy lurks around in dark cellars carrying a butcher knife? He must be the kid who did the job upstairs, too. We were just coming in when we heard the scuffle. We ran down here and found you. The kid was trying to beat it out the back after hitting you with this poker. When we cornered him he had a knife in his hand—must have been a foot long. Funny he hit you with a poker."

"Very funny," I said. "I got a big bang out of it." I rubbed the painful egg on the side of my skull.

"He's upstairs now," Leeds told me. "So far he hasn't admitted killing Myers, but he'll talk downtown."

"Who is he?" I asked.

"The landloard's son. Henry Rummell. Got his mug on file—broke out of reform school last week. Sent up last year for using a knife in a brawl, but there's nothing in his record that would lead anyone to suspect he was a mental case. Still, you never know, do you?"

"Ouch," I remarked. The egg was still swelling.

"So that clears everything up," Leeds told me. "Coroner's upstairs. We'll take the kid downtown and get the confession."

"But why should he kill a harmless old man?"

"Moron," Leeds grumbled. "You don't understand psychology, do you, Collins? Come to think of it, you don't understand enough to keep out of a dark cellar. Didn't do so well on this case. Nearly muffed the whole thing. Maybe Tiny Tim isn't the only one who needs a little vacation from the Department. Remind me to see you later."

Still grumbling, Leeds marched upstairs. I followed, not too happily.

This time the hall was full of squad men. I spotted Henning. "Going back upstairs?" he asked.

I shook my head. It nearly came off. Something told me that the less Captain Leeds saw of me right now, the better it would be.

I headed for the front door. Fresh air helped. For a minute I stood on the stoop, eyeing the empty squad cars at the curb.

"Hey!" whispered a voice.

"What's that?" I looked around. There was no one behind me.

"Hey—down here!"

Peering through the grating under the stoop I gazed into the unlovely little face of Tiny Tim.

"It's me," he explained.

"I figured that out, thanks. But what are you doing under the porch?"

"Hiding. Do you think I wanted Leeds to spot me?"

"Didn't I tell you to clear out of here?" I snapped. "Look, go away. I'm in enough trouble already."

"Look. Come closer. I've found a clue for you."

"Keep it. According to Leeds, the case is solved already. They've found your mad fiend."

"But it wasn't a mad fiend," Tiny Tim said.

"It wasn't?"

"No. I just figured it out. You were right. A mad fiend would never surprise a man in bed with the door locked that way. It must have been somebody who knew Myers. Like the guy who wrote this letter."

"What letter?"

Tiny Tim smiled triumphantly and waved a white envelope under my nose.

"The clue," he announced. "I told you I had one."

"But where did you get it?"

"Just as I was coming out the door a while back, the mailman turned in here. And I had my hunch. I asked if there was anything for Gustav Myers. He gave me this."

I bent closer to the small face peering through the grating.

"Meant to bring it up, but then the boys arrived so I hid here. But I didn't open the letter yet. Saving it for you."

"OK, hand it over," I said. "Probably just an advertisement for trusses."

He extended the envelope. I took the oblong and examined it. No return address. Myer's name and address typed. Precancelled stamp. Mailed in town. I noted these facts and then slit the envelope open. A small sheet fluttered out between my fingers. I unfolded it and wrinkled my nose.

"Wasn't so far off at that," I sighed. "Just a doctor bill."

"Doctor bill?"

"Sure. Ten dollars for treatments, August 4th and 7th. Doctor L. P. Klow. Banker's Building. Old boy probably had a goiter."

"Not on your life!" exclaimed Tiny Tim, climbing up and joining me. "This is a real break. Now we can find out something about our mysterious friend, the late Mr. Myers." He beckoned to me. "Come on."

"To see Dr. Klow?"

Tiny Tim nodded.

"Sorry, pal," I said. "You're not going."

"But it was my idea."

"I know. And I appreciate it. Only Captain Leeds wouldn't, if he found out about it. You'll have to keep out of sight."

"Don't you want to hear about my new theory?"

“Later,” I nodded. “Why don’t you call me up Tuesday. I’m going to Europe Monday.”

It was the brushoff. I knew and Tim knew it; but there was no other way. The whole thing might be a wild goose chase. Leeds thought the landlord’s son had done it. Then, again—

Then, again, I went to call on Dr. Klow.

HE HAD a nice layout in the Banker’s Building, big offices filled with the most modern thing in decor. His tiles were glass, his mahogany was bleached, his Venetians were blind. And his nurse was plenty fast on the curves.

When I finally looked at her face I discovered she had red hair, blue eyes, and a snub nose made for freckles.

“What can I do for you?” she asked.

I said I wanted to see Dr. Klow.

“Have you an appointment?”

“Afraid not. I’m here on business.”

“So sorry. You chose a bad time. Dr. Klow left about an hour ago on a month’s vacation.”

“Would I be able to catch him at his house?”

“That would be impossible. I called him myself just a few minutes ago, and he doesn’t answer.”

It sounded phony. How would any guy go on a month’s vacation without taking a dish like this with him? I gave her about twenty six teeth in a smile.

“Well, perhaps you can help me then. I’m checking up on a patient of yours name of Gustav Myers.”

“I’m not permitted to—”

I showed her the badge. With Leeds on the warpath I might not have it much longer, so I might as well use it now.

She nodded.

“Offhand I don’t recall the name. But I can look it up for you in our files.”

Her red head bent over the cabinet next to the desk. I sat there, staring at the door of the inner office. I wondered what lay behind those doors.

So I pulled the old gag. I raised my hand. Then I asked a personal question.

“It’s in there,” she told me. “Go right through the office. First door to your left.” Thanking her courteously, I bounded to my feet and entered the sacred portals.

Dr. Klow’s private office was disappointing. No bodies lying around, no buckets of blood, no incriminating papers or mysterious notes scribbled in code.

But on top of his desk rested a large package. It was oval—about the size and shape of a human head . . .

I lifted it gingerly. It was heavy, quite heavy. The brown wrapper had a label attached, addressed to Klow. The printed return address bore the name of LELAND CHEMICAL SUPPLY COMPANY and the typed notation: Contents—Plaster-of-Paris.

Disappointed, I turned away. Then I realized there was something underneath the package on the desk. Papers, black papers. No, not papers. Pages from a photograph album. Gustav Myers’ album!

I knew it had to be, just as I knew that the dime-store photographs so carefully pasted into place on the sheets were photographs of Gustav Myers.

For the first time I saw the man who had lost his head. He was gaunt, lantern-jawed, graying. Profile views showed a beak nose. Somehow, the pictures disappointed me. I’d expected an unusual countenance, but Myers seemed fairly ordinary. I registered the features in memory, replaced the pages and the package, and returned to the outer office.

“There you are. I think I’ve found the patient you refer to.”

She read off a list of dates to me extending three or four months back.

“Thanks,” I said. “Now tell me all about him.”

"But there's nothing to tell."

"Don't you have a chart, a case history?"

"No. Dr. Klow must keep it in his private files at home. He sometimes takes cards with him for study and research."

"I see. Well, maybe you can tell me what you know about Myers personally. What does he look like? What kind of a guy is he?"

She shook her head, giving the effect of a small brush fire in action.

"Really, I can't help you. You see, I've never set eyes on the man. He came for his treatments at night when the doctor is here alone." She caught my expression and pouted. "There's nothing unusual in that, you know. Many patients work days and can only visit an office in the evening."

"I understand. It isn't important." I turned away. "Just one thing more. Do you happen to know what Myers was being treated for?"

"Yes, I do. Dr. Klow said he had amnesia. And that's all I know about it."

I blinked. Things were beginning to fit, now. A man with amnesia has no friends, no callers. He wouldn't be in a mental condition to enjoy books, newspapers or the radio. He wouldn't keep a lot of mementoes in his room, either. That was obvious.

But why should a man who loses his memory also lose his head?

I probably could have figured it out in about three years, but I never got the chance.

The door opened, and somebody came in, natch. Somebody was short, dark, ferret-faced. Somebody had a goatee. Somebody had a most peculiar Continental accent.

"Excuse, please. I have come for zee package. You have eet, no?"

"Oh, yes—the doctor told me. I believe it's on his desk in the other office."

Ferret-face gave her a smile, and me a blank look. Then he scuttled into the other room and emerged bearing the plaster-of-paris—and the black pages from the photo album.

"Zhank you so very much." He scuttled out.

A little birdie told me to scuttle after him. “Zhank you so very much,” I murmured to the redhead, and left.

Ferret-face was waiting for the elevator, bulking his package under one arm and stroking his goatee with the free hand.

When he saw me, he gave a little jerk and nearly pulled the goatee off. Then the elevator arrived and we rode down together in silence. He was poised and ready when the door slid open. He slithered out and made for the exit. I had to move fast to catch a glimpse of him outside on the street.

There happened to be a big black sedan moored to the curbing. He headed for it at Constellation cruising speed. Then a tiny figure stepped out of a doorway and hailed the fugitive.

“Benny!” shrilled a familiar voice. “Long time no see!”

Ferret-face whirled. I was startled to see his free hand scrabble at his throat, then realized he was making the sign of the cross.

“Don’t worry, it’s only me!” exclaimed Tiny Tim.

A sickly smile spread across the face of the man called Benny. It didn’t even travel down as far as his beard. “Oh,” he sighed. “ ’Ow are you?”

“In the pink, chum. When’d they spring you?”

“Last week. But I am not wanted for anytheeng. You cannot touch me. So you weel please excuse now, I most go.” Benny turned away, but Tiny Tim blocked his path.

“That was a nice face-lifting job you did a couple years ago,” he commented. “The one they sent you up for, I mean.”

“I do not weesh to discoss the past,” Benny told him. “I am now—how you say?—virtuous. So excuse—”

This was the signal for my majestic entrance. I emerged, giving Tiny Tim the office.

“Johnny!” he yelled. “This is a surprise! Say, I want you to meet a friend of mine from across the pond. This is Benny Konstantine, one of the best little——”

“Nots to you, copper!”

The pronunciation was bad, but the sentiment was there. Benny glared at me. “For why you follow me, copper?”

I played it straight. “Because I want to see Klow.”

“Doctair Klow has gone away.”

“Don’t stall, Benny. I’ve got to see him, but fast. He tipped me off a while back that if it looked like a jam I should get in touch with him.”

“He nevair mentioned thees to me.” Benny was dubious.

I was convincing. “Lots of things he never told you,” I said. “You’ve only been working with him a week. Who do you think he’s been playing with before you came?”

It was a bluff, but I talked fast. Benny tried to figure it out. At last he shrugged.

“Very well. Come along. Bot no funny beezness!”

We walked over to the car. Tiny Tim trailed behind.

“You’re not going,” I told him. “The Doc doesn’t know you. He’ll blow his top if we show up with a stranger.” I slipped him a wink and he nodded.

“All right, Johnny.”

So we climbed in the car and Benny drove off, and I sparred around for an opening to pump him.

Benny turned down a side street and a breeze hit us, and he asked me to please close the window.

So I turned around and started to pull down the window and Benny sapped me over the head.

CHAPTER THREE

Head Man

WHEN YOU get conked on the skull twice within four hours, you don’t feel so good. First of all, it hurts. Secondly, you begin to wonder if you’re not just a little bit of a sucker. Of course, nothing bothers you until you wake up, but then—

I woke up in an alley off Fourteenth Street. No bones broken, except possibly my entire skull. Everything was rosy. Not only rosy, but spinning around. And on top of that, somebody was hollering about a "mad fiend" in my ear.

At first I thought it was Tiny Tim. But he wasn't around. So it had to be a nightmare. That raucous voice, yelling about mad fiends and killing. The rosy spinning, the darkness, the screaming, all nightmare or concussion.

I got up. The voice wasn't yelling right next to me. It came from a distance. It guided me as I groped my way out of the alley, inhaling painfully until some of the rosy fog cleared away and the spinning stopped. But I could still hear the voice on the street.

"Extraaaa! Ree dalla boutit! Mad Fiend Slaying! Extraaa!"

I bought a paper and it plunged me right back into the nightmare again.

It was the Gustav Myers case, all right. I'd expected that. Apparently Captain Leeds hadn't solved it after all. According to the gentlemen of the press, he had taken landlord Rummell's son away and left the scene of the crime around four P.M.

Shortly thereafter a Mr. Hugo Rummell, landlord of the premises, was discovered in the basement. He had nothing to say for publication, owing to the fact that his throat had been cut.

The head hadn't been removed, but in spite of this mitigating circumstance the reported advanced the theory that the killing was the work of a "Mad Fiend".

I reread the hastilly worded lines of the story and it still didn't make sense. Was Tiny Tim right after all? Then where did Dr. KIow fit in? And Benny?

And for that matter, where did I fit in—just horsing around, playing for time until somebody wanted to bop me over the noggin again?

I found a phone booth and put through a fast call. I asked for Henning.

"Give it to me fast," I said. "I've got a date."

He gave it to me, but it didn't help much. There had been a man on the spot, naturally, but he was upstairs in Myers' room all the time. Rummell apparently was preparing to go down to the station and see his son. The man thought Rummell was in his room.

Around four he went down to check up and found the body. No weapon, no signs of struggle. Just a body in the blackness of the cellar.

The filling station attendant across the way said a black sedan had been cruising around the block about 3:30.

“That’s enough!” I yelled, and hung up.

I came out of the phone-booth sweating with excitement. Sure, Benny had bumped the landlord just before he came down to the doctor’s office. But why? That’s what kept biting me. Why? I crumpled the paper and began to shred it. Then I stopped.

A photograph stared up at me from page 7. A very familiar face it was, too. The face of Gustav Myers!

But the story wasn’t about Myers. I had to read it twice before the details sank in. It concerned one Randolph J. Edwards, missing heir to the Edwards estate. Edwards went to Europe in 1933 as a student, was caught in the Middle East in ’44, but managed to sail on a Red Cross ship in ’45 and landed in New York. There he disappeared and for the past two years his whereabouts remained unknown. An intensified search for Edwards was now under way, since he had just inherited the bulk of his father’s estate—valued in excess of $3,000,000. No other surviving relatives . . .

Now everything really began to fit! And I began to fit myself right back in the phone-booth. I got Henning again and asked him to put me through to Brophy—Missing Persons.

“See if the record shows anyone checking on Edwards—Randolph J. Edwards. He’s been listed now about two years.”

I waited patiently until Brophy returned to the phone.

“Only one inquiry.”

“Who was it?” I asked.

“A Dr. L. P. Klow, M.D., 2611 Fairfax Boulevard.”

“What did he want?”

"Just looked at the photograph on file. Then he said it was a mistake, not the party he was looking for."

"Good. Thanks, Brophy."

Now I had everything, including Klow's address. Everything, that is, except a case.

A doctor discovers a missing heir with amnesia. So he kills him. Why? And how could I prove it? And what was Benny doing in the picture? Why was the landlord knocked off?

I could call Captain Leeds and take a squad out to 2611 Fairfax, if the Doc was hiding out there—and it wouldn't mean a thing. Except that I would probably lose my job.

No. There was no alternative. I'd have to follow it up alone.

I TOOK a taxi, carefully sizing up the driver to see if he was likely to give me another rap on the skull. We bounced out through the twilight streets, up the winding hill of Fairfax and landed in front of 2611, a large, tree-shaded house set well back from the road on a hill of its own.

I paid the hackie and started up the path. The house was dark. The grounds were dark. I stumbled.

Something rustled in the bushes behind me as I turned towards the porch. Something slithered closer.

This time I was ready. I took one more step, wheeled, ducked. A flying figure hurtled against my shoulder and sprawled flat on the ground at my feet. I tackled the man, fast.

"All right," I gasped. "Drop it."

A blackjack dropped from limp fingers. "Why does everybody try to conk me on the noggin today? I muttered.

"Johnny—it's you!"

Tiny Tim sat up and rubbed a bruised shoulder.

"What are you doing here?" I asked.

"Rescuing you. After you drove off with Benny I figured he might steer you into a mess of trouble at the Doc's house. So I called Physician's Service Bureau and got the address and hotfooted it over. Never know what you'll run into with all these bad fiends lurking around."

"Shut up and listen to me."

I told him what had happened, every bit of it.

"There's your mad fiend theory knocked to bits," I concluded. "Klow isn't crazy. But I can't figure out why he did it, or what he's up to now."

"Benny knows."

"That's right. He must know. But he won't tell. If I go in there and poke a gun at the two of them, they'll laugh at me. They won't talk."

"Benny'll talk. He's dumb."

"Why should he?"

Tiny Tim's grin shone dimly in the darkness. "I'll tell you why, Johnny. I've got a theory."

He told me why.

"You're crazy," I sighed. "Even if it's true, I still can't make him admit anything."

"Yes you can."

And then Tiny Tim told me what to do. It was screwy. It was as whacky as any idea he'd ever had. It wasn't according to professional ethics. It was dangerous, too.

I should have forgotten the whole thing. Maybe it was the sappings that made me lose my judgment. Maybe I realized there was no other way than this long chance. Maybe it was the idea of Tiny Tim begging me for the one opportunity he'd have to reinstate himself. Maybe I was just a screwball myself at heart. Anyhow—

I left Tiny Tim standing there in the shadows and walked up the drive. The car, Benny's black sedan, was parked next to the porch. He was there, all right, and the doctor must be inside, too. The absence of lights showing meant nothing.

But I didn't bother to knock on the door.

I preferred to do things the hard way.

There was a nice shaky trellis against the side of the house. It had ivy on it, and might have stood the additional weight of a small mouse. I shinnied up it.

Halfway up, the thing began to crack and give. I climbed faster. There was a window ledge above me. If I could make it—

The wood splintered. It gave off a sound no louder than an atomic bomb explosion.

I wriggled up. The trellis began to bend outwards. I clawed air. It was no use. The frame tottered. It was falling. One more hoist, and the wood gave way.

My arms rose over my head. I stepped off, jumped. Then the trellis crashed to the ground, and I hung there, clinging with both hands to the window ledge above my head. I dangled, kicking both feet, striving for purchase, trying in vain to boost myself up.

No use. The ledge splintered my hands as my fingers slid off. I braced myself for the fall.

Then the window opened above me and two pairs of hands grasped my arms and hoisted me into the room.

I stood there and faced the three of them: Benny, Doctor Klow, and the revolver.

CHAPTER FOUR

The Man Without A Head

IT WAS good to feel something firm beneath my feet. It was good to realize that I wasn't going to be sapped again. It was good to see old Benny once more, and to meet Doctor Klow at last. But the revolver, that wasn't good.

Klow held it, and he knew just where to point it. I looked at it while Benny closed the window behind me, and then I turned my attention to my medical friend.

He was tall, thin, with graying hair and the usual rimless glasses sported by prominent M.D.s everywhere, in the best advertisements.

Doctor Klow in no way resembled a mad scientist. And yet the room in which I stood might have come straight off the Universal Pictures lot.

It was large, white-walled, brilliantly lighted by overhead arcs. Curtains and blinds concealed the windows completely now, and they too were white. I saw white cabinets, white tables, and a white leather-covered operating table. Both Benny and the doctor were dressed in keeping: white gowns. Here and there was a touch of silver to relieve the monotony. The revolver, for instance, and knives, scalpels, surgical trays. There were only two incongruous objects in the room.

The first was the plaster-of-paris, now removed from its package and resting on a long table next to the wall.

But it was the other object that sent my scalp crawling back into my spine, the object that was in the jar of alcohol. Directly before me on the table it rested, only it didn't rest, it bobbed and nodded, to and fro.

It was a severed human head. The head of Gustav Myers. The kind of a head Tiny Tim had whispered about.

All of this talk about mad fiends came echoing back to me as I stared at the rolled-back eyes, the gaping mouth, the hideous point where the head just—ended.

"That's heem!" Benny snapped, pointing at me.

Doctor Klow shrugged. "I thought as much," he said. "Go into the storeroom and get me a sack. One of the big white ones."

"Bot he eez a detective."

"I know what he is! You can rely on my medical knowledge when I say a detective dies as easily as anyone else. And if you'll get me that sack, I'm prepared to give you a demonstration."

"Not here, Doctair! Please. We cannot!"

"All right. In the woods, then. Near the stone quarry. But I'll need that sack."

Benny edged out of the room, his beady little eyes blinking in excitement. The doctor stared at me. I stared at the bobbing head in the jar.

Curiosity still kills cats. It led me into this mess, and it affected Doctor Klow, too. He broke first.

“Why did you come here?” he muttered. “How did you find out?”

“I didn’t,” I answered. “Not until I arrived and saw the head. I knew you killed Myers, of course, and that Benny must have killed the landlord. But until I saw this setup, I wasn’t sure why.”

“And now you’re sure. Is that it?”

“Yes. It adds up. You get this guy Myers as a patient, suffering from amnesia. You treat him, and meanwhile you try to check up on him. You discover that he’s really Randolph J. Edwards. But you don’t tell him that, because you start thinking.

“Here’s an unusual setup, a man missing so long that in all probability his own father wouldn’t recognize him. A man without friends or connections. A man, and this is the clincher, who will some day inherit a huge fortune.

“You saw the possibilities, didn’t you? So you nursed him along. And when Edwards’ father died and Benny showed up out of stir at the same time, the rest was obvious.

“You killed Myers and cut off his head. Probably set the deal by giving him sedatives to take, so he’d be drugged when you arrived. Somehow the landlord either saw you or had his suspicions. So you sent Benny back to kill the landlord. And then you were ready to go to work.”

“Was I?” Klow smiled pensively. He looked like a little boy with his hand caught in a cookie jar. Only little boys don’t point revolvers at you.

“Of course. You rigged up your yarn about taking a month’s vacation. Actually, you planned to spend the month here and never show up again. Not as Doctor Klow.

“Because Benny is a plastic surgeon. A good one, with European training. That’s what he was sent up for, wasn’t it—for remodelling gangster’s faces?

"Now he's out and you're all set to give him a refresher course. Using Myer's head for a model and your face for the surgery. In a month, according to the plan, you'd emerge with the face of Randolph J. Edwards and claim the estate. You could back it up with all the information he'd given you while under treatment. And with his face instead of your own."

"Sounds logical," Klow commented. "As a matter of fact, that's just what I'm going to do."

BENNY scurried back into the room dragging a large sack. It looked like a laundry bag but I didn't like the material, or the idea of being taken to the cleaners in it.

Nobody asked me if I liked it. Klow just held the revolver in line with my chest and grinned. "All right," he said. "Climb into the sack."

Benny sidled up. He was sweating. "Yess. Hurry opp, no sense makeeng thobble, eh?"

I stared at the head of Gustav Myers. This was it. I gulped. Then I faced them. I kept talking to Klow, but Benny heard me.

"Listen to me," I said. "Do you think I'd pull a foolish stunt like this unless I had a reason?"

"What do you mean?" Benny asked.

"I wouldn't come here alone and walk into a trap unless I knew it was necessary. I came here to tell you this before it's too late—give yourselves up. I'm warning you!"

"Warneeng?" Benny whispered.

"Sure. Klow didn't tell you that, did he? I suppose he just offered you a split to do this job. He let you think Gustav Myers was just an ordinary man—that he's really dead."

"He ees dead. Hees head ees there, een the jar." Benny scowled. "What you call that, eh?"

"He's waiting," I whispered.

"Waiting?"

Yes. Waiting for his body to come and claim it again."

Klow gestured with the revolver. "Stop that nonsense," he commanded. "Into the sack or I shoot."

"Wait!" Benny stepped forward. I had him, now.

"Never mind," I told him. "You won't listen. Klow won't let me talk, anyway. He's afraid. He knows you wouldn't touch this deal if you know what Myers really was—what he really is—that he cannot die—"

"You are lunatic, no?"

"Read the papers," I said, wearily. "It's in the late extra. We lost the body, Benny. Get that? We lost the body?"

"How do you mean?"

"Remember, I discovered it. I saw them carry it into the meat-wagon. Only it never arrived at the morgue. All we got is the driver, strapped up in the psycho ward, raving about the headless body that got out of the wagon and walked away!"

Benny crossed himself. Klow grunted, but Benny shook his head. "Yes," he said.

"Klow was stringing you." I talked fast, desperately. "Edwards didn't have amnesia. He spent 15 years in Europe and came home under an assumed name because the police were after him there. In Hungary. Transylvania.

"You know what comes from Transylvania, don't you, Benny? Vampires. The undead. The blood drinkers who can't be killed. Edwards was bitten in Europe and became one of them. Klow wasn't treating him for amnesia. He was treating him for vampirism!"

"Don't listen to the fool! He's tricking you!"

But Benny was listening, eyes goggled.

"That's all, Benny. Klow has this scheme going and he cut off Edwards' head and brought it here. But he didn't kill Edwards. You know that. You can't kill a vampire except with a stake through the heart, or a silver bullet. The body is still alive. Deathless, eternal. And it's seeking its head, now.

“It will find the head, Benny. It will come here, thirsting for vengeance. I’m warning you. Give yourself up before that thing comes to claim its own.”

Klow had enough. He threw Benny aside, then clubbed his revolver, ready to swing it against my skull for the third rap of the day.

Then we heard it.

Glass splintered far away, downstairs. Klow wheeled. Benny’s mouth gaped open.

“You’re a lunatic,” he whined. But he wasn’t speaking to me. He was trying to convince himself. Trying to fight against the heritage of centuries of superstition. Trying to fight against the sound we all heard . . .

The sound of heavy footsteps, slowly clumping up the stairs. The sound of footsteps, groping, feeling their way, through the hall.

We faced the door. We all saw the knob turn. And we all saw the door open.

Then it came into the room, walking slowly towards us.

It was tall and gaunt, gaunt as Death. It wore a faded black overcoat, and arms protruded from the ragged sleeves, outstretched to paw at nothingness. It walked towards us, slowly, blindly.

It had no head.

The high, upturned collar of the coat ended in nothingness. It was just a walking, headless corpse, bony fingers scrabbling towards the missing head that bobbed in the jar.

It was the walking dead, the vampire.

Klow wheeled, desperately levelling the revolver.

“Don’t!” screamed Benny. “You can’t kill it!”

Klow threw him aside as the figure loomed.

It was only a gesture, but the interval was all I needed. I lunged, catching up the laundry bag as I moved. Klow turned towards me, aimed and fired.

The shot went wild. But the sack descended squarely over his shoulders, and I bore him to the floor. Benny didn’t bother about us. He had troubles of his own. As the headless corpse bore down upon him he screamed again and raced out of the room.

I sat down hard, using Klow for a sofa. The air was knocked out of him and he didn't make a very good seat, but I needed a rest.

There was no reason to chase after Benny. Voices in the hall below proclaimed that he had run smack into the boys from the squad who were waiting—the boys I had Tiny Tim call for me.

I turned towards the headless man, just in time to see him reach up, unbutton the overcoat, and allow his face to protrude at shoulder level. Tiny Tim's grin emerged triumphantly.

"You see?" he crowed. "Benny's dumb. I told you he'd fall for that gag. The Doc would never have admitted a thing, but Benny will babble the whole story to the boys downstairs right now. Full confession. It worked out like I said it would. I scared him silly."

"Right," I admitted. "You almost had me going for a minute."

"Be sure to tell Captain Leeds," Tiny Tim reminded me. "Tell him this was one case where a short guy really came in handy."

"I will. And I guess we owe you an apology about your crazy theories, too. They cracked the case."

The headless man sat down in the chair. Tiny Tim scowled out at me from under the overcoat.

"What do you mean, crazy theories?" he complained. "Can't you see—all I was doing was using my head!"

THE END

The Mad Scientist

Professor Lippert’s puffballs wore made for one purpose—to kill.

“THE hell you say!” snorted Rick Hanson.

“No.” Professor Lippert raised a pudgy hand in protest. “That isn’t what I said at all. I said that the writer of science-fiction is the world’s most potentially dangerous type.”

Rick Hanson’s eyebrows formed a sardonic hirsute arch.

“You giving me the needles?” he asked. “Just because I write science-fiction, does that mean I’m not human?”

“Probably.” Lippert shook his leonine head until the grey curls dropped over his forehead. “The reactions of a science-fiction writer are not human, in the psychiatrically normal sense of the word.”

Rick Hanson poured another drink. It seemed to help. “All right, pal,” he drawled. “Let’s you and me have a good old drunken and profound discussion about science-fiction writers, huh? Then I’ll remember all the good cracks and stuff ’em into my next yarn. You’re the Professor—go ahead and get brilliant on me.”

Lippert’s buddha-like bulk shook with suppressed mirth. “I mean it,” he protested. “Men like you are dangerous.”

“Lean and hungry, eh?”

Lippert smiled ruefully. “Don’t rub it in. I’ve aged a lot in ten years and you look as fit as ever. But stick to the point. I’m still talking about you as a science-fiction writer."

"And I'm not a human being."

"Right. Not an adult one. Look at it this way. The science-fiction writer is dangerous because his mind knows no barriers. His imagination is not curbed by any normal rules."

Rick Hanson sat up, suddenly interested. "Rave on," he urged.

"Look at it this way. Most children grow up and learn to curb the extravagances of their imaginations. So-called 'imaginative' adults manage to confine their fantasies to recognized art forms or prescribed culture patterns. Even when fantasy is translated into antisocial behavior, it generally follows accepted psychotic lines.

"But the science-fiction writer is an exception to all these rules. He's a grownup with a child's imagination. He's an opium-smoker with a perpetual supply of opium, and no recognizable stigma or deterrant. physical decay to hamper him. He's a super Jack the Ripper with a wide background of knowledge. What in others is regarded as juvenile daydreaming, or hasheesh visions, or sadistic mania is merely the accepted stock-in-trade of the average science-fictioneer.

"Now do you get what I'm driving at? You and your kind are the only ones on earth who can, with perfect safety, indulge in perpetual flight from reality—of the most dangerous sort. You brood on destroying the world, the universe. You hatch fiendish plots, plan gruesome crimes. You create weird monstrosities, actuated by no human emotion or purpose. You cultivate your abnormality as a matter of course, seek to justify the aberrations in your stories—and worse than that, attempt to develop a modus operandi for your death-rays and blastors and disintegrators."

RICK HANSON raised both hands above his head and grinned. "All right, pal—you got me. I admit I'm nuts. I buried the body under the cellar floor. You'll find the head in the furnace."

"Many a true word spoken in jest." Lippert leaned forward, without returning the grin in kind. "I'm glad the army is taking your kind into G.I. units. Better to have your imaginations working for authority than against it.

"But I'm just afraid that when the barricades are built, science-fiction writers will stand on them in the van—armed with deadly weapons of their own creation. Science-fiction writers, if they ever awaken, will stop writing horrible fiction and start making history. Horrible history."

Rick still grinned, but he wasn't listening. He was studying Lippert, in disappointment.

His old school friend wasn't a good professor at all. He was too fat for the part. His pudgy face was too benign. He had no charming eccentricities. He didn't seem to be fanatical. His language was too commonplace, his word-choices too non-technical. And he didn't marshall his arguments with the scholarly logic Rick would employ if he were writing him into a story.

Rick the fantasy-writer examined Professor Lippert and discarded him. No possibilities here.

And then, Sheila walked into the room.

Sheila was something different.

Sheila was young, slim, an angel with a halo of copper hair.

Her eyes sparkled—either in appreciation of her husband's argument, or in admiration of Rick.

Yes, Sheila was definitely in character. Just the type for a heroine. The old Professor's girl-wife in one of those triangle plots.

Rick lost no time in mentally casting himself in the hero's role. Lippert, of course, would be getting the short end of the triangle.

"And another thing." Rick heard the words and realized, with a jolt, that Professor Lippert was still hammering away with his heavy-handed humor.

"And another thing—I've got a personal score to settle with you science-fiction writers. Look what you do to professors like myself in your yarns! According to you, we're all a bunch of crackpots. Either we're elderly eccentrics with a lot of absent-minded mannerism or we're mad scientists. Do I look like a mad scientist? I'll leave it to Sheila to decide."

The girl in the doorway stepped forward and put her arms around Lippert's neck. Rick watched the play of her slim fingers, wondered if they would be warm to the touch or cool and soothing. Rick looked at her sensual mouth as it curved in a smile. No question there—that mouth would be hot. Hot, and clinging.

The words evoked other images in Rick's brain, but he maintained a sardonic smile. Sheila spoke.

"Of course you're not a mad scientist, darling," she giggled. "Except when you lose a collar-button or something."

HER eyes met Rick's. "On the other hand, I've been listening to your little discussion, and I'm inclined to agree with you about science-fiction writers. They are dangerous, I'm sure." She didn't sound very afraid to Rick, and what he read in her eyes was not fear, but a challenge.

"Why would I be dangerous?" Rick asked, calmly. "After all, Lippert and I are good friends. We went to school together ten years ago. He drifted into this and I went into writing. But I think our interests are still similar. I know him and he knows me. Where's the danger?"

"Plagiarism."

"What do you mean?"

"I know you writers," Sheila laughed. "I'm willing to bet you'll try to steal my husband's ideas for your stories."

Rick, gazing at her, knew very well that if he wanted to steal anything of her husband's, it wouldn't be his ideas. But he remained bland.

"Wasn't aware he had any ideas," he said, pitching his voice to mock sarcasm.

"Darling!" Sheila stared at Professor Lippert. "Don't tell me you've been talking to Rick all this time and haven't even mentioned your hydroponics?"

"His what?"

“His hydroponics! You know—water gardening. He’s gone positively dizzy over it. We have the whole lab. rigged up with the apparatus. Usually all he does is buttonhole visitors about his hobby. Perhaps he had a hunch himself that you’d steal his theories.”

“Quit kidding, my dear.” Lippert rose from the chair. “I’m not worried about Rick, here. Hydroponics is a definite science. And there’s no science in Rick’s yarns. Matter of fact, I doubt if he’d understand my work.”

Rick took the ribbing in good grace, returned smile for smile.

“Now I’m interested,” he said. “What’s with your hydro-whatever-it-is?”

“You see?” Lippert smirked triumphantly. “Told you he doesn’t have any real background. Doesn’t even know what hydroponics might be.”

“Of course, I’ve got a few hunches.” Rick stared at Sheila and forced an elaborately casual tone of voice as he drawled on.

“I imagine you are referring to what is known as chemiculture, or water-culture of plant life. This method of growth employs a large tank of metal, wood, glass or concrete—the material does not matter if the tank is watertight. The tank is generally covered with a perforated plate holding a foot or more of sawdust, shavings, excelsior, or peat moss. Above this layer is a rack or frame trellis arrangement to guide the growth of the plant organisms.

“The tank is filled with water, properly aerated by a syringe or pressure pump, and the water contains chemicals and salts of elements, placed there in correct proportions to insure the growth of the seeds used.

“Among common ingredients are auxin, the plant growth hormone; boron, phosphorus, potassium, calcium, magnesium, nitrogen, sulphur—and other forms of nitrates, sulphates and phosphates, depending on the formula required for the growth of a particular variety of plant.

“The seeds arc placed in the shavings on the rack above the tank. Roots, naturally, grow down until they are suspended in the liquid from which they derive nourishment. Growth occurs due to a process of capillary attraction.

“Experiments have been made with electricity, with ultra-violet and infrared rays. Budding and grafting are accepted techniques in the process, and by employing high temperatures and extra chemicals, a number of amazing hybrids and monstrosities can be produced at will.

"But generally, hydroponics merely accelerates speed of growth, size of the plant organism, and stimulates profusion."

Rick stopped and made a mocking bow. "I rest my case," he murmured.

LIPPERT'S mouth formed an astonished oval. Sheila brushed coppery curls from her forehead and giggled.

"I guess he told you that time, honey," she said.

Professor Lippert simulated despair. "After such a lecture, a visit to the laboratory is mere redundancy," he told Rick.

"Like to see it anyway."

"Come on, then." Lippert bustled ahead in a fatherly fashion as Rick and Sheila brought up the rear. At least Rick thought of Lippert's movements as "fatherly." He wondered if the same idea wasn't shared by the girl. Surely, after comparing her husband with himself, she couldn't help but see that Lippert was getting to be an old man. And—

Abruptly, Rick forced the notion away. Lippert was carrying on a running tirade as they moved down the hall towards the laboratory door.

"—must admit you fooled me completely. Never knew you had to have an actual scientific basis of knowledge for those nightmares you dream up. Of course, while you've given the rudimentary explanation of hydroponics, you haven't even touched the theoretical aspect—the really significant points.

"Do you realize what hydroponics will mean to the human race? Right now it's all experimental dabbling, but in a few years, with large-scale development, hydroponics will actually revolutionize our way of living. Matter of fact, it will exercise greater potentialities for change than the invention of the steam-engine."

"Who's dreaming now?" Rick asked.

“It’s no dream, my lad. The essential fact hydroponics brings forth is that plant life can be controlled. Utterly controlled.

“Man has always been chained to the soil. His life pattern, his culture, his basic philosophy has been eternally earth-bound. Hydroponics brings true relief, new freedom to all humanity! Freedom from manual labor, for plants grown hydroponically require only a minimum of care. Freedom from the very laws of Nature—for plants can be grown anywhere, in any climate, all the year round. Hydroponic planting will give you bananas at the North Pole.”

“Don’t say such things,” Sheila chided him. “He’s such a fanatic he might cut your throat.” She pressed Rick’s arm as though in warning, but her slim fingers remained on his left bicep as Lippert unlocked the laboratory door.

“That’s not what I mean,” Lippert answered. “Can’t you see the possibilities? We’ll get better food, more food, cheaper food—for the whole world. Think of the social implications! No longer will four-fifths of the population be reduced to agrarian slavery. The coolie hordes of the east, the peasantry of Europe, freed at last from their earthly bondage, will be able to attain their rightful status as mature human beings. No more hunger, no more want, no more caste system!

“Think of the eugenic possibilities! A proper diet for all! Scientifically-controlled nutrition; with proper nourishment bred into the vegetables and fruit. Disease will be banished—”

“Who writes your stuff—Henry Wallace?” Rick winked at Sheila. She winked back. Rick shook his head in feigned despair. “Don’t understand you, Lippert—you always talk in exclamation points and italics.”

“You always talk,” Lippert rejoined, shortly. “But step in and see for yourself.”

They entered the laboratory proper.

PROFESSOR LIPPERT, when not engaged at the University, had made good use of his time. He had chosen to house his hobby in an actual greenhouse, converted from the left wing of the building.

Here, under a transparent roof, set against the background of glassed-in walls, stood the hydroponic equipment which constituted Lippert's botanical laboratory.

A row of tanks stood against the farther walls, each carefully segregated from its fellows. Rick noted the details; the thermometers, pressure-guages, aeration pumps, and other apparatus. He saw the charting table before each tank, littered with scribbled notes and calculations.

Over against the near wall was a huge rack filled with bottles and stoppered decanters containing liquids and powdered chemicals. The table below it was strewn with utensils for the measurement and treatment of the substances employed.

But a single glance sufficed Rick for the moment. He stared at the plants.

Rising from the tanks in nodding rows, the bulbous heads of gigantic vegetables seemed to peer and stare through the moist heat of the glass-enclosed jungle. Flowers extended petals like the livid lips of huge Ubangis, thrust forth flaming dragon's tongues from ensanguined mouths.

Rick's imagination kindled at the sight. Giant vegetables! Monster plants! Yes, and you could create hybrids at will. Monstrosities.

Something of his thoughts seeped through his intent stare, for Lippert suddenly laughed.

"I know what you're thinking! You're looking at my cabbages and squash and wishing I had human heads growing in their place. You're wondering why I haven't tried to produce mutants and biological sports.

"You're thinking about a plot, aren't you?"

Rick nodded. "Yes," he muttered. "That's one reason I came up for a visit, you know. I wanted to get a plot from you."

He turned to Sheila. The girl stood quite close, and her arm brushed his. He tried to read her smile as Lippert chuckled beside him.

"I know just what you're thinking about, too," Lippert persisted. "What you're cooking up runs something like this.

"Typical mad scientist, interested in hydroponics, gets Venus fly trap or some invented variant of a carnivorous plant, and raises it hydroponically. Result—the plant becomes seven or eight feet tall in short order; just the right size to eat the hero alive when he comes to pay court to the scientist's daughter. In a vicious battle, during which the laboratory is wrecked, the hero feeds the mad scientist to the giant fly trap and runs off with the scientist's daughter. Right?"

Rick shrugged slowly. "Maybe," he said. "You're pretty close." Again he smiled at Sheila.

Lippert was close at that, Rick realized. It was just the plot he'd had in mind, except for one detail. He wasn't thinking about using a scientist's daughter—he was thinking of a scientist's wife.

Now, all he needed was the fly-trap.

RICK put on his slack suit and did things to his black hair. He grinned at his reflection in the mirror. The reflection grinned back.

"Not bad," he said. "Not bad at all."

The verdict covered more than his appearance. He was thinking of the way he was making time with Sheila.

She was taking him on a "picnic" this afternoon—just a little basket lunch affair on the bluff above the river outside of town.

Lippert was up at the University. Faculty meeting had been announced at the last moment, and he'd found it necessary to go. The picnic could have been postponed. But Sheila hadn't postponed it. That meant she was glad to be alone with him.

A nice romantic setting . . . a picnic in the woods . . .

"Ready?"

Sheila stuck her head in the bedroom door with an impudent toss of her curls. In her gingham play suit she looked almost like a little girl. Almost—but not quite. Rick appreciated the differences.

"Uh huh," he said. "Let's go."

They went. Rick carried the basket. Out of the house, down the side street, across a lot to the winding country road leading to the river-bank and the bluff above.

Sheila clasped Rick's free hand as they swung along. It was an artless gesture, deliberately calculated. Both of them were playing the game now; indulging in the most minute of small talk, but losing no nuance of expression, no tactile gradation of bodily contact.

Rick's grin was a permanent fixture now. This was going to be easy—and very pleasant. A casual affair, no harm done. He'd make the proper overtures when they reached the bluff and spread their lunch. Better not use the "I love you" theme. That was much too serious a note. He'd tell her that she was attractive, instead. That he found her stimulating. Yes. That was the cue. Stimulating. An inspiration. The old line. And then—

He was still waiting for the moment as they reached the top of the bluff. Panting slightly from the climb, Rick surveyed the river stretched below. The setting was an idyllic pastoral. It might have been Grecian if the landscape had not been marred by the cluster of University buildings to the left, and the dotted dwellings comprising campus-town that lay within the shadow of the academic halls.

Rick turned his back on civilization and began to contemplate the beauties of nature. Sheila, now, bending on one dimpled knee as she spread out the table-cloth. The flaming aureole of her hair swept forward, and a curl brushed his forehead.

NOW was the time. He'd take her in his arms and make with the hearts and flowers. She'd put on the surprise act, fake a little resistance, and then everything would be rosy. Rick had it all figured out.

So he reached for her, and she closed her eyes and fell into his arms and whispered, "Darling—I love you."

Then she was kissing him, and Rick held her tight and close, and she kept whispering, “Rick, I love you so, I love you so!”

It wasn’t supposed to be this way at all. but Rick didn’t object. After that first kiss he had no resistance left. The second kiss removed scruples as well as resistance. And the third kiss did things to his sanity, so that Rick found himself murmuring, “I love you too—Sheila, darling—”

The dialogue was definitely corny. But somehow, it seemed to carry conviction.

And there was so much to talk about, so much to confess and to confide. Sheila told him about Lippert; how he bored her, how she despised his heavy-handed pleasantries, his pedantic mannerisms, his middle-aged romanticism.

Rick, in return, told her that her hair was a splintered shaft of sunlight, her eyes twin glimpses of a dream, her lips a fountain of eternity. He hoped he’d remember some of the stuff to write down later. But at the moment he was quite content.

He readily agreed that Lippert was a bore, and that he, Rick, was wonderful. In all modesty he admitted that Sheila’s opinion of his charm and talent was wholly justified by the facts.

“I feel as though I’ve always known you,” the girl sighed, nestling in his arms. “I’ve read your stories ever since I can remember. I always wanted to meet you. I knew you’d be like this—clever, and whimsical, and—”

Rick was momentarily irritated when she hesitated. He could have thought of a dozen descriptive words to add.

But irritation faded. Sheila was murmuring on.

“Take me away with you, darling,” she pleaded. “Let’s get out of here, now.”

It was just the type of thing Rick had meant to avoid. No scenes, no dramatics, no rash moves of any kind. And yet—she loved him. And she was a gorgeous armful. Rick hesitated a moment.

“But what about Lippert?”

"He has his work. He doesn't care about me, I swear it! He buries himself in that laboratory of his, with those awful plants. I've tried to understand, but it's no use. Don't you see, Rick? I'm young, I'm like you, I want fun and excitement and—"

It was strictly soap-opera, but Rick ate it up. And loved every word of it.

A momentary flash of common-sense intruded.

"Let's try to think this thing out, darling," said Rick. He sat up and watched Sheila pin up her hair.

"It's all very well to talk about running away and starting a new life. But this isn't the second act of a play. We don't want to start a lot of fuss and unpleasant scandal. Whatever we do, we'll do quietly and sensibly, after planning it out. After all, I'm staying here through the end of the week."

"End of the week? That reminds me." Sheila became abruptly practical. "We're throwing a party for you Saturday evening, you know."

"Party? I didn't know."

"His friends. From the faculty, of course. And their foolish wives. It'll be an awful bore, but we'd planned it before you came. Now we'll have to go through with it, so he won't suspect anything."

Rick helped himself to a hardboiled egg and balanced it delicately on two fingers. When he spoke his voice was low.

"Uh—what do you think he'd do if he—suspected?"

"Darling, don't worry. He's never been the suspicious type, or jealous either. We could be kissing right under his nose and he'd still putter around in that lab of his. But what are we talking about? He isn't going to suspect. The trouble with you is you're thinking of what would happen if you were writing one of your stories. It's just the way you look at things. He was right, you know. You'd picture him as one of those mad scientists. He isn't at all mad—just dull.

"Well, what are you waiting for?"

THERE was only one answer to this last question. As Sheila extended her arms, Rick forgot about the hard-boiled egg and went into love’s old sweet song.

It was some time later that they became aware of the gathering twilight.

“We’ll be late,” Sheila whispered. “Darling, from now on we must be careful. We’ll have to decide what we’re going to do, and meanwhile he can’t be allowed to see that anything is wrong. Let’s think of an excuse for staying out here all this time.”

“Shall we gather some flowers?” Rick suggested.

“No—wait! I’ve got a better idea. Let’s pick some of these mushrooms for dinner.”

The girl indicated a nearby cluster of mushrooms, interspersed with puffballs, fringing the border of the bluff beneath the trees.

Rick glanced at the large redtopped growths and shook his head.

“For a scientist’s wife and a science-fiction writer’s sweetheart you aren’t very well educated,” he chuckled. “If we gather these for dinner he certainly will suspect. You see, honey, these mushrooms are poisonous.”

“How do you know?”

“Simple botany. Note the reddish tops. Aminita muscaria. Most deadly of them all. The poison works peculiarly, destroying the red corpuscles. In a word, it turns your blood to water. Death results in a few days after horrible suffering. There is no antidote.”

Sheila shivered. Then she giggled. “Maybe we’d better pick some anyway.”

Rick stared at her, hard. “That’s not the way,” he murmured. “That’s not the way.”

But as they picked up the lunch basket and descended the slope of the bluff, Rick glanced back. The round, bloated mushroom tops nodded like tiny heads as though in agreement with his secret thoughts . . .

OT your plot yet?”

“G Professor Lippert glanced up absently from his lab table as he decanted a calcium solution.

Rick shrugged. “I don’t know,” he confessed. “I think I’m on the right track.”

“Going to do a yarn about hydroponics?” asked Lippert. “Want any special information?”

“Just asked, I’m expanding, you know.”

“Expanding?”

Lippert swung around on his stool. “Yes. The tanks out here are all filled. I’m putting two new ones in the cellar. Going to try something with puffballs. Be glad to explain my methods as I go along if it will help you to formulate a few ideas.”

Rick shook his head. “I’m not going to write about hydroponics,” he declared.

“Well, I don’t know where else you’ll find any inspiration around here. I admit I’ve been too busy to see much of you these past two days, and I’m sure Sheila’s company is pretty boring. Tells me she’s giving a party Saturday. Well, you might find a few quaint character types in that assemblage. Or have you taken up my suggestion about the mad scientist?”

Lippert chuckled genially and slapped Rick on the back. “Cheer up,” he said. “I think I know what’s troubling you.”

Rick blinked. “What do you mean?”. Lippert’s voice was soft. Sheila. She’s making a play for you, isn’t she, boy?”

“Why—you—I—”

“Don’t bother!” Again the chuckle, a bit self-conscious this time. “I’m not blind, you know. And after being married to the woman for five years, I ought to know something about her. You aren’t the first victim, by any means. She’s bored. Doesn’t seem very interested in my work, or in me, for that matter. So she plays around.

I hope you haven’t taken her seriously.” Rick thought it best to do a little chuckling himself. Inner tumult was stilled as he met Lippert’s level gaze.

"Matter of fact, that's what I meant when I said I was getting an idea for a story. Sheila would make a great character; don't you think so?"

"Perhaps. Though what you want to write about a spoiled, selfish woman for I don't know. And where's your plot? If I were a jealous husband, now —"

"That would help." Rick smiled. "That, and a scientific angle of some sort. But we'll work it out, somehow."

"Yes." Lippert turned to his decanting once more. "Better run along and study your source-material now, Rick. I've got work to do."

"Maybe you're making a mistake," Rick said, softly. "Maybe you ought to be applying your efforts to another field."

"Meaning what?" The pudgy Professor wheeled around on his lab stool.

"Sheila isn't the only character I've studied. I've been watching you.

Don't you think that if you devoted more time to her, developed common interests—"

"Quite the match-maker, aren't you?" Lippert sighed. "It's no use, Rick. She and I are worlds apart." Now was the time. Rick took a deep breath. He hoped desperately that he'd put it over. He had to. He opened his mouth.

"Then why don't you divorce her?" he asked, striving to keep his voice pitched low. "If she's what you say she is, there isn't much hope of salvaging anything from your marriage. You're both intelligent people. Why not lead your own lives without restrictions? You can work without worrying and she can—well, she can find the companionship she needs."

Lippert frowned.

"Quit talking like a writer," he said. "This isn't some cheap love-story plot you're working out. It happens that I don't want to divorce Sheila. I need her to manage the house, take care of social duties here at the University."

HIS frown deepened incongruously as a curious smile creased his lips. "Besides, it amuses me to watch her squirm," he confessed. "I find it relaxing to contemplate her little deceptions. You might just as well forget your sociological impulses, Rick. I'll never divorce Sheila."

"Suit yourself, pal," Rick shrugged. "Merely a suggestion."

Rick left the laboratory. Once outside, inward tumult seethed upwards in boiling rage.

He had thought he was so clever in handling this affair. But Lippert had known all along! He had known, and laughed about it—laughed at him!

And Sheila was probably laughing, too. This wasn't the first time, Lippert said. And he had come along, actually fallen hook line and sinker for that "take me away from it all" line of hers.

Angrily, Rick strode into the living room. Sheila looked up from the davenport as he entered and put down a notebook.

"Darling—what's the matter?" she whispered.

Rick began to tell her, in no uncertain terms.

Then Sheila cried. She cried, wringing her hands like a hurt and pitiful child. Great sobs racked and shook her girl-body.

"The beast!" she sobbed. "And you—believed him! Rick, how could you? I love you—you're the only one I've ever told that to—look at me, Rick—look at me—"

So of course Rick looked at her and of course he took her in his arms and of course the first caress of consolation became an embrace of glowing ardor.

"Let him come in," Sheila murmured. "Let him see us, if he likes. I don't care, as long as you're here. Oh, darling—"

Caution conquered and Rick released the girl as the maid's footsteps sounded in the outer hall.

They were sitting there primly when the maid entered. Rick was lighting a cigarette and Sheila studied the list on her lap.

"Did you finish with the list, m'am?" asked the maid. I'm to order the things for the party this afternoon."

"It's all done, except for the liquor," Sheila said. "I'm running into town to buy that myself. Shaw's is the only place where you can still get gin, and Professor Lippert won’t touch anything but a Tom Collins.”

SHE turned to Rick with a covert smile. “Want to come along?” she asked.

Rick shook his head. “No, I don’t think so. I’m going to take a walk. Want to work out my plot. Yes, that’s it.”

He left the room.

It always happened that way with Rick. A story would take weeks to jell. All the elements had to be arranged subconsciously. And then a single chance word or phrase would resolve the situation and a plot would seemingly spring fullblown into being.

Now, after just three days, it had happened again. Everything had whirled around. The Professor’s ribbing about the scientist and his daughter and the hero. The scene on the bluff. Lippert’s sly admission of his wife’s infidelities. And Rick’s own picture of himself and Sheila as hero and heroine, with Lippert as the villain who must be removed. Then there was that insidious suggestion of Sheila’s about the mushrooms. He had tried to reject the thought, but after Lippert’s mocking he knew what he must do. The great question was—how to do it and get away with it?

Then Sheila had supplied the word necessary to complete the plot. The word and the phrase.

It. echoed now, as Rick toiled up the slope towards the bluff.

“Gin,” was the word. The phrase—“Professor Lippert won’t touch anything but a Tom Collins.”

The aminita muscaria, most deadly of them all. The poison works peculiarly, destroying the red corpuscles. Turns the blood to water. Death results in a few days, after horrible suffering. There is no antidote.

And the poison is . . . undetectable.

You pick the mushrooms and macerate them, decant the poison and place it in a Tom Collins.

Simple. Undetectable.

Rick smiled as he neared the bloated cluster against the edge of the bluff. You pick the mushrooms . . .

WHERE do you macerate the mushrooms? Where do you decant the poison?

Not in the greenhouse laboratory. Anybody might walk in. You must choose a more deserted part of the house, take the chosen bottle of gin along, and make certain that it reaches your intended victim only. Rick had the latter move figured out. He'd hide the bottle, sneak out to the kitchen during the party on Saturday, and mix a special drink for Lippert. If Lippert was ill immediately, the crowd would blame it on over-indulgence.

But this business of macerating the mushrooms, now . . .

He thought about it all the way back to the house, while his bulging jacket-pockets brushed his thighs.

Then, as it always did, inspiration came suddenly as he remembered another phrase.

Lippert had told him he was putting two extra tanks in the cellar. If he had, there would be laboratory apparatus down there, along with the chemicals. He could macerate the mushrooms, decant, fill his bottle, and return undetected. It was unlikely that anyone would look for him in the basement.

Rick hastened into the house. The maid was in the kitchen. Sheila had just returned, left her gin on the hall table, and was upstairs taking a bath. Rick heard the water being drawn. A glance down the hall showed that Lippert was still in his greenhouse lab.

Rick made for the cellar stairs. He groped along a hall, found a light. A large room to the left proved to be the improvised hydroponics laboratory. Rick stared through a glassed-in slit set high in the oak door and saw the empty tanks. There was another lab table with a stock of chemicals and utensils.

He entered hastily, turned on the light. He began to dump the mushrooms from his pockets and hunted around for the necessary apparatus.

Then—almost as if on cue—footsteps sounded on the stairs above. Rick heard the ponderous tread, recognized it.

There was no time to cram the mushrooms back into his jacket-pockets. He could only sweep them under the table. Rick kicked an unopened box of bottles into place, hiding the red-topped mushrooms, just as Lippert entered the chamber.

"So you're taking a look at my new lab after all," Lippert said. "Like it?"

"I don't know. After all, you haven't started to work here yet."

"Well, I ought to be able to show you something in a couple of days," Lippert answered. "I'm going to start experiments tonight. You'll notice this room is heavily insulated. I can control the heat better. Have a separate heating unit—want to get it up to a constant of eighty in here. Ought to work well with some new solutions I've got in mind. You see, I'm taking your advice. Going to dabble with hybrids a bit." Professor Lippert glanced at his watch. "Say, it's nearly dinner time. Let's get going."

He ushered Rick from the room. Rick bit his lip as the Professor stooped and inserted a key in the door. It locked with a sharp click.

ROT there was nothing to do but put a brave face on the matter and go upstairs with the man he meant to kill, eat dinner with his future widow, and chat merrily of other things.

Lippert didn't seem to notice. But Sheila was oddly silent during dinner.

Did she suspect? How could she?

"Must leave you two," the Professor announced, pushing his coffee-cup away. "Going to get started tonight. I imagine you can find something to occupy your time."

The hidden leer in his eyes made Rick wince.

But he had no time to muse. For Sheila held his arm and dragged him out on the porch.

"Rick," she said. "This afternoon—I did something."

"What do you mean?"

"Come here."

She pulled him to the edge of the porch, stooped down and brushed aside a pile of leaves in the shrubbery.

Rick stared down at a handful of red-topped mushrooms. Then he looked at Sheila. After that there was nothing more to say.

ANY interruption in the act of creation is torment for the writer. Rick found the next few days to be nightmares. For the perfect plot was hung suspended in midair. His act of creation—act of destruction, rather—was incomplete.

Here it was, Friday evening, and he hadn't been able to get downstairs to the cellar. In the mornings the door was locked. Afternoons and evenings, Lippert worked down there in the new lab.

Rick was in an agony of suspense. Had Lippert found the mushrooms? Apparently not. And even if he had, he'd never reconstruct Rick's plans.

Luckily, he had thrown Sheila's mushrooms away. Lippert didn't suspect anything, and that was well.

But the other problem, the real problem, still remained to torture Rick. How to get into the downstairs lab, make the poison and mix it with the gin —

He tried everything. He talked to Sheila. Couldn't she fake an excuse to make Lippert go into town? Couldn't a call come from the University? Couldn't she become ill, force him to go for a doctor?

"It won't work, darling," she sighed. "He's arranged for complete freedom the rest of this week. He's working on this new project, and he'll work right through until the cocktail party tomorrow afternoon."

As Rick paced up and down on the sun porch Friday evening he felt as though he had reached the breaking point.

It had all gone so smoothly up to now. The perfect crime, the perfect setting, and now he was helpless to bring his plot to a logical conclusion.

He must depend on that which all writers refuse to consider as a plot element—coincidence.

A wry smile twisted his lips as he remembered Lippert's description of science-fiction writers.

The world's most dangerous individuals, eh?

How smugly the fat Professor had pulled that one off! And here he was, balked by the man's plodding, persistent devotion to a stolid study of hydroponics.

Rick muttered curses, then halted as Sheila joined him.

The girl was pale, shaken.

"Have you found a way?" she whispered. "Tell me, Rick—I can't stand the suspense much longer. You don't know what it means to me now just to see him, feel him near me. That fat, stupid face of his—the way he bumbles around—I'll kill him myself unless we—"

Rick held her close as the tears came.

"Hang on," he whispered.

"I know. But when I think of how an idiot like him can stand between us—not because he's clever, but because he's so stupid—I can't bear it."

"Hold it," Rick muttered. "Here he comes."

Lippert's heavy tread announced his approach. But tonight the tread was not so heavy. The bulky body moved rapidly across the parlor, reached the porch entry.

"Here you are."

THE Professor yawned, then smiled.

"Excuse me. I've been at it too long, I guess."

"Through for the night?" Rick nudged Sheila sharply as he spoke. She caught her cue.

"You do look tired, darling. Why don't you run up and turn in? We've got the party to face tomorrow."

“I will, in a minute.” Lippert lit a cigarette, extended the pack to Rick. “Wait until I calm down, though. Rick, I’ve got to apologize to you.”

“What for?”

“The way I’ve neglected you these past three days. A fine visit, I must say—you come up to see me and I bury myself down in the basement. But I think it’s been worth it.”

“Got something, eh?”

Lippert nodded. “Yes. I think I really have. I’m going make an announcement tomorrow at the party, I believe. Some of the men from the University will be interested. My work has taken a remarkably productive turn.”

“Just what is it you’ve been up to?” Lippert shrugged. “It’s a secret. Tell you tomorrow.”

Rick had a flash of inspiration. “Now wait a minute, pal,” he said. “After all, you just admitted you felt like a heel for neglecting me all week. The least you can do to make amends is to show me what you’ve done.”

“You really want to see it?”

“Of course. In fact, I insist.”

“All right, come on then.”

Lippert turned and walked back into the parlor. Rick hesitated on the threshold until he could whisper into Sheila’s ear as he passed.

“Now’s our chance. We’re going downstairs. When we get in, I’ll pretend to be enthusiastic about his damned plants or whatever they are. You fake an excuse to make him go upstairs for a while. Tell him to celebrate—mix us all a drink for a toast. Then you sneak out, bring a bottle of gin down before he comes. Meanwhile I’ll stay and macerate the mushrooms.”

“What’s keeping you?” Lippert called.

“Just finishing the cigarette,” Rick answered. “We’re coming now.”

The stairway resounded to the thumping of their feet as they descended. Rick noticed that his heart thumped curiously in rhythm.

This was it. Now, in a little while—Lippert unlocked the door, ushered them in as he switched on the light. “Take a look,” he said.

Rick stared. The two tanks against the farther wall were empty no longer. The racks were in place, and both tanks held a greenish liquid that bubbled perceptibly.

BUT the center of attraction consisted of the objects towering from the tanks along the metal framework rising to the ceiling.

Great gossamer blobs waved slowly in midair; blobs of fantastic size. “What are they?” Rick asked. “Puffballs.”

“But the size—”

“Mutation. And special stimulation. A new process I’ve devised. I’ll explain it fully tomorrow. For the first time I pursued lines dear to your melodramatic heart, Rick. Used electric shock treatment and infra-red, the works. Plus a little grafting to produce a totally new variety.”

Sheila twisted a damp coil from her forehead.

“It’s awfully hot,” she sighed.

“I know, dear. Temperature is 90 degrees or thereabouts. It makes for growth, ripens the puffballs. I wanted to do this in time for tomorrow’s party.”

Lippert yawned again. “Well, there it is. Now let’s catch some shut-eye.”

Sheila interrupted quickly.

“Wait, darling. I don’t know what you’ve done, of course, but I’m sure it’s terrifically important and scientific. Don’t you think we ought to have a drink to celebrate?”

“Certainly. Come on upstairs and we’ll mix a round.”

“No. You mix them, darling. Rick wants to look around for a moment, I’m sure. Bring our drinks back down.”

“All right.”

Lippert shuffled out wearily.

As his footsteps receded down the hall, Rick galvanized into activity.

"Get that mortar and pestle out," he snapped. "I'll find the mushrooms. I hid them under the table, behind that box."

He bent down, scrabbled in the welter of boxes and racks.

He was still stooping when the lab door closed. As it banged shut he straightened up.

"Open it," he commanded. "Then run up the back steps and get me the gin."

Sheila tugged at the handle.

"It's locked," she whispered.

Rick made a move towards the door, then halted.

The little glass slit set in the panel now framed a face.

Professor Lippert was peering into the chamber from the cellar outside.

"The door is locked!" Rick called.

Lippert's voice came faintly through the glass.

"I know."

"Open up."

"Not just yet."

"What's the big idea? I—"

"just wanted to give you a little more time."

"Time for what?"

"Time to find the mushrooms. Though I don't think you will, even though they're right before your eyes."

"Mushrooms? What mushrooms?" Sheila's voice cut in shrilly.

"The mushrooms your lover picked to poison me with."

FOR once the gift of improvising dialogue failed Rick. He could only stare at the face in the glass, stare into Lippert's inscrutable eyes.

"I'll save you the trouble, Rick," said Lippert. "You see, I found the mushrooms the other day. They came in very handy for my experiments. Quite so. Matter of fact, I used them in the tanks. You're looking at them now.” Man and girl gazed at the gigantic puffballs that swayed forth from the frames.

“Mushrooms and puffballs are botanically allied,” Lippert called. “Of course, there were difficulties in making a fusion, but I conquered them. I had to conquer them. Because I wanted to surprise you. And you are surprised, aren’t you?”

“Let me out!” Sheila broke, ran to the door, and began to pound with her fists. Lippert waited patiently until she subsided.

“In a little while, darling,” he answered. “But first there is another surprise waiting for you.”

“What do you mean?”

“I needn’t explain about the mushrooms, Rick. You undoubtedly know the effects of aminita muscaria well enough and were prepared to demonstrate them on me. I believe you intended to distill a poison and then arrange for me to swallow it. Of course the result is death—hideous death. The blood dissolves in your veins, you know, and—”

“No! No—” Sheila shrieked until shrill echoes resounded through the locked chamber.

“I thought of another way. A simpler way. Suppose the mushrooms were to become puffballs? Suppose the puffballs were to burst? A single breath of the pollen, in heavily concentrated form, introduces the poison throughout the system. This is the method I selected. And you two are the subjects I have selected.”

“Lippert—stop this—let us out!” Rick shouted.

“In just a moment, now. According to my calculations the puffballs are about ready to burst. After they burst I will release you within five minutes. Yes, in less than five minutes. Because by that time you will have inhaled enough to make the results quite certain. There is no antidote.”

“I’ll go to the police,” Sheila sobbed. “You’ll be hung for this.”

“I doubt it, my dear. In the first place, I could tell them about your little scheme of poisoning me. In the second place, the whole thing is a horrible accident. The door swung shut, I was upstairs. Don't you see? And I was experimenting, I didn't know my hybrids were poisonous.

"But why pretend? The toxic effects will be much stronger this way. By the time I open this door the two of you will be screaming in agony. Your motor reflexes will be affected. You couldn't grasp a telephone in your lovely little hand, Sheila, and if you did so you'd tear it in half."

"Lippert, listen to me—you must listen—" Rick gasped.

"I have listened to you. To your lies about you and Sheila. You think I didn't know? You tried to steal her from me. You plotted to kill me. But I won't die. A posturing, empty-headed writer of cheap fiction and a stupid, cheating woman will die. And I will live. Live to carry on my work, my experiments. I shall rule science with a weapon of life, a weapon of death!" Lippert was silent.

A faint popping sound reverberated through the locked room. Rick and Sheila turned and stared at the huge puffballs. One of the blobs had burst.

Reddish clouds of pollen poured forth with an acrid scent. Rick smelled the odor of death.

It was welling up now. In a moment it would reach their nostrils.

He turned for the last time to stare at Lippert's face in the glass.

With a curious shock he recognized the meaning of the intent eyes, the fixed grin. He should have known it from the first, but he hadn't, and that was his mistake.

Staring at Lippert's face he realized that he was looking at a typically mad scientist.

The Cheaters

Spectacles, you know! Makes you see things better!

1. Joe Henshaw

THE way I got those spectacles, I. bought a blind lot off the City for twenty bucks.

Maggie hollered fit to raise the dead when I told her.

"What you wanna load up on some more junk for? The store's full of it now. Get yourself a lot of raggedy old clothes and some busted furniture, that's what you'll get. Why, that dump's over two hunnert years old! Ain't nobody been inside it since Prohibition, it's padlocked tight shut. And you have to throw away twenty bucks for whatever you find for salvage."

And on and on, about what a bum I was, and why had she ever married me, and who wanted to be stuck away for life in the junk and second-hand business. Same old phonograph record she's played for years. Maggie always had a temper.

Well, I just walked out on her and let her keep right on jawing to Jake. Jake, he's willing to listen to her. He'll sit back of the shop for hours, drinking coffee in the kitchen when he should be working, and let her rave about me.

But I knew what I was doing. Delehanty at the City Hall gave me the tipoff about this old house and told me to get in my bid, he'd take care of it.

They were pulling down this here old dump near the wharf. Must have been a classy dive once, even though they made a speak out of it back in Prohibition days and then slapped a padlock on it since Delehanty told me that upstairs, where nobody ever went while it was a rummy hangout, there was all kinds of old furniture—a dozen bedrooms full of clothes, everything from way back.

Maybe Maggie was right about it being junk, and then maybe she was wrong. You never can tell. Way I figured, there might be some real antique pieces up there. One good haul and I stood to make two-three hundred iron men “selling to a downtown auction house. That’s the way to get ahead in this racket. You got to take a chance once in a while.

So anyhow, I slapped my bid in, and nobody bid against me, so I got the lot City gave me three days to move the stuff out before they started razing. Delehanty slipped me a key.

I walked out on Maggie, climbed in the truck, and went down there. Usual thing, I have Jake drive and help me load, but this time I wanted to case the joint myself. If there really was something valuable in there—well, Jake’s my junior partner, sort of—and he’d want a cut. If he saw the stuff. If I saw it first and moved it out, he’d never know. So let him stay back there and listen to Maggie. Maybe I am a dried-up old jerk like she tells it. And maybe I’m a pretty smart guy. Just because Jake likes to dress up Saturdays and go down to the Bright Spot—

Anyway, I’m not talking about that, I’m talking about these spectacles, these here cheaters I found.

Like I say, I drove down to the wharf on Edison and found the dump. It sure was a crummy-looking pile. Easy two hundred years old. Fancy gables, all rotted; no wrecker would get much out of that heap.

THE lousy padlock was so rusty I almost had to jimmy the door, but the key finally worked and I went inside. Dust fit to choke a pig, all over everything: Downstairs was just rubbish and slats. They must have ripped the bar and fixings out when the Feds raided it. I kind of counted on finding bar stools and maybe some metal laying around, but no soap.

So I tried the stairs. Tried is right. They almost rotted right under my feet, going up. Fancy banister, some kind of mahogany—that was in good shape, but no use to me. Even under all the dirt, I could see that this dump had class, once. About the time George Washington slept there, maybe.

Upstairs was even worse. Eight big rooms, all dust, and broken sticks of furniture. Busted beds. Canopy beds, mostly. Springs all broken. Bedding, just rags. I poked around but didn't find anything unless you count the crockery under the beds.

There were some chairs with nice wood to them, the frame parts, but springs and stuffing were absolutely out. Couple tables around, too, but strictly from lumber.

I WAS beginning to burn up. I'd figured the least there would be was maybe some pictures on the walls; you know, some classy old masters kind of paintings like Rembrandt and so on. But I got rooked, and now I knew it for a fact.

Closets were full of clothes, though. Lucky I hadn't brought Jake because he'd blab to Maggie and then she'd know for sure she'd been right. The clothes were all rotted and raggedy like she said they would be. And stink!

I poked around and got to wondering. You don't run into old clothes much in a deserted house. Or bedding, either. Why had they took a powder in such a hurry, the people? So long ago, too! Why, them clothes was way before the Civil War, the styles of them. Fancy pants for men. Couple rotted shoes with nothing left but buckles.

I picked some up. That was a break. Silver. Silver buckles. I went around the bedroom closets and got maybe, a dozen. That was OK with me. I found a sword, too. Real fancy stuff, in one of those scabbards that was maybe silver, too. I'd find out about that—it sure was a genuine antique piece all right:

Funny about those people having left all this junk. Delehanty tipped me off this was supposed to be a haunted house. Of course in my line that's strictly a gag. I salvaged maybe two hundred haunted houses in my time—every old house is supposed to be haunted. But I never seen a ghost in thirty years, nothing ever alive in those places but maybe some cockroaches.

Then I come to this end room with the big door. All the other bedrooms was open fact, some of the doors was loose on their hinges. But this door wasn't sprung. It was locked. Locked tight.

I had to use a crowbar from the truck on it. Got kind of excited, because you never can tell what a locked door means. Worked and sweated, and finally got it open.

Dust hit me in the face, and a stink. An awful stink. I was carrying a flashlight, of course; wasn't dark out, but the house was gloomy and there wasn't any lights, it being so old and all.

So I coughed and turned on the light and took a look. It was a big room with mounds of dust all over the floor and under that a big rag that was maybe a carpet once upon a time. There was some oak panels in this room too, and the wreckers could maybe get something for that because it was prime lumber still, even under the dust you can tell when a place is really built.

"But I wasn't interested in dust and rags and panels. I wanted to know why the room was locked. And the flashlight told me. It showed me the walls.

Bookshelves.

From the floor to the ceiling, bookshelves, all around the whole lousy room.

There must of been a thousand books in that room, no kidding, a regular library some guy had up there.

I waded through the dirt and pulled out a couple of the nearest books. The bindings were some kind of leather—that is, they was leather once.

Now the things just sort of crumpled in my hands and so did the pages. All yellow and musty, which is why the stink was so bad in here.

I began to swear. I'm no schmoe, I know there's dough in old books. But not unless they're in good condition. And this stuff was rotten.

Then I spotted some stuff in iron bindings. That's right, so help me, iron bindings! Big clasps you had to unbuckle before you opened them. I took one down and got it open. It was some kind of foreign stuff, Greek maybe, I don't know. But I recollect the name on the front page—De Vermis Mysterius. Screwy.

Still you never know, and I decided I would haul all the good ones down to the truck and see what Segall would give me for the lot. Maybe there Was something valuable here after all.

Then I took another look around the room. No furniture. No tables or chairs in here at all, like in the bedrooms. Except over in the corner—

OVER in the corner was this here table.

A sort of a desk-table, for writing, I guess. And right on top of the table, smack in the center, was a skull.

So help me, it was a human skull, all yellow and grinning up at me under the flashlight beam, and for a minute I almost went for that haunted house stuff.

Then I notice how the top is bored out for one of them old-fashioned goose-quill pens. The guy who collected all these foreigner-type books used the skull for an inkwell. That's a screwball for you, hey?

But the table is what interested me, really interested me that is. Because it was antique all right. Solid mahogany, and a job of carving—all kinds of fancy scrollwork and little goofy faces carved in tire wood.

There was a drawer, too, and it wasn't locked. I got excited, figuring you never can tell what you find in such places—maybe a lot of valuable documents, who knows. So I didn't waste much time pulling the drawer open.

Only it was empty. Nothing in it whatsoever.

I was so mad I let out a couple words and kicked the side of the table.

That's how I found them. The cheaters, that is.

Because I hit. one of the little goofy faces and a sort of panel in the side of the table at the left just swung open and there was this drawer.

I readied in and pulled out the spectacles.

Just a pair of glasses, is all, but real funny ones. Little lenses, square shaped, with big heavy ear-pieces—books, I guess is what you call them. And a thick bridge for over the nose; that was silver too.

I didn't get it. Sure, there was silver in the frames, but they couldn't be worth more than a couple bucks. So why hide the cheaters away in a secret drawer?

I held the glasses up and wiped some specks of dust off the lenses, which was yellow glass instead of the regular, clear kind, but not very thick. I noticed little designs in the. silver frames, like engraved lines. And right across the bridge for the nose was a word carved into the silver. I remember that word because I never saw it before.

"Veritas" was the word, in funny square letters. Some more Greek, I guess. Maybe the old guy was Greek. The guy who had the locked library and the skull for an inkpot and the glasses in the secret drawer, I mean.

I had to squint some at the lettering in the gloom there because my eyes weren't too good and—that gave me an. idea.

Get to be my age, you get kind of shortsighted, sometimes. I always figured I'd go down to the opt—to the eye-doctor—but I never got around to it. But looking at the cheaters I said to myself, why not?

So I put them on.

The bows, or stems, whatever you call them, were pretty short for me. And like I said, the lenses were small. But I didn't feel uncomfortable wearing them. Only my eyes hurt.

My eyes hurt. Not hurt, exactly, but something else like hurting inside of me. Like I was being all pulled and twisted.

Sounds screwy? Well, it felt screwy, too. Because the whole room went far away for a minute and then it came up close, and I blinked fast.

After that it was all right, and I could see pretty good. Everything was sharp and clear.

I left the cheaters on and went downstairs, because it was getting dark and I figured on coming back with Jake tomorrow and loading up the truck. No sense in me doing it all by myself. Jake being so much younger, he could lift the heavy stuff.

So I went home.

I come in the shop and everything was OK and, Jake and Maggie were sitting in the back having coffee.

Maggie kind of grinned at me. Then she said:

“How did you make out, Joe, you lousy, old baboon? I’m glad we’re going to kill you.”

No, she didn’t say all that.

She just said, “How did you make out, Joe?”

But she was thinking the rest.

I saw it.

Don’t ask. me to explain. I saw it. Not words, or anything. And I didn’t hear. I saw. I knew, by looking at her, what she was thinking, and planning. Like what was coming next, almost.

“Find a lot of stuff?” Jake asked, and I saw, “I hope you did because it’s all mine as soon as we bump you and we’re gonna bump you for sure tonight.”

“What you look so funny for, Joe, you sick or something?” Maggie said, and she also said, to herself, “Who cares, he’s gonna be a lot sicker soon all right, all right, does he suspect anything, no, of course not, he couldn’t, the old goat never got wise to us for a whole year now, just wait until Jake and I own this place together and his insurance too, it’s all planned.”

“Yeah,” I said. “I was lifting stuff over to the house, and I don’t feel so hot. Guess I better sit down.”

“What you need, you need a little drink to warm you up,” Jake said to me, and to himself he was., saying, “That’s the way, we’ll start it like we figured, get him drunk and then when he gets upstairs I’ll push him down and if that don’t finish him Maggie will with the board, it leaves the same kind of bruise. Everybody knows he drinks, it’s just an accident like and I can swear to it.”

I made myself smile.

“Where’d you get the cheaters?” Maggie asked, saying, “God, what a homely mug on him, I get sick just looking at that face but it won’t be long now.”

“Picked them up over at the house,” I said.

Jake got out a fifth. He opened it and got some water glasses. “Drink up,” he said.

I sat there, trying to figure it out. Why could I read their minds? Why did I know what they were planning? I didn’t know. But I could see what they were up to. I could see it. Gould it be—the cheaters?

Yes, the cheaters. They were the cheaters. Carrying on behind my back. Getting ready to finish me off. Tumble down the stairs. Never mind how I knew. I knew, that was the main thing.

I KNEW what, they were thinking while they sat there drinking with me, laughing with me only really laughing at me and waiting until I got drunk enough so they could kill me. Pretending to drink a lot while they got me loaded, until I made them drink shot for shot with me.

I couldn’t get drunk, not as long as I was seeing them. The thoughts going through their heads, your blood would run cold and no liquor could make you drunk if you knew such things.

Everything turned to ice. it was all cold.

and I knew just what to do. I made them drink with me and they began to get loud, only the thoughts kept getting worse. I listened to them talk, but all the time I saw their thoughts.

"We'll kill him, just a little while now, why doesn't he pass out, he's drinking like a fish, mustn't take too much, got to keep him from suspecting, God how I hate that ugly puss of his. I want to see it smashed open, wait until he's out of the way and I have Maggie all to myself whenever I want to, he's going to die, I could sing it, he's going to die, die, die—"

Everything turned to ice.

I knew just what to do.

They were laughing and singing and it was way after dark when I went out to the truck to put it into the garage for the night. They stayed behind, thinking about how to do it now, how to keep people from suspecting them.

Me, I didn't worry about that. Suspecting, I mean. I was all set.

I put the truck away and then I came back to the kitchen, carrying the crowbar from the truck that I'd used up at the house.

I came into the kitchen and locked the door. They saw me with the crowbar, standing there.

"Hey, Joe—" said Jake.

"Joe, what's wrong?" said Maggie.

When they put the black hood over my head, just before they hung me.

2. Miriam Spencer Olcott

I DISTINCTLY remember it was on Thursday afternoon, because that's when Olive has her bridge club over, and of course she simply must have Miss Tooker help with the. serving.

Olive is much too diplomatic to lock me in my room, and I always wondered why it was that I seemed to get so sleepy on Thursdays, just when I might have a chance to slip out without anyone noticing. Finally I realized that she was putting something into my luncheon—more of Dr. Cramer's work, no doubt.

Well, I'm not a complete fool by any means, and this Thursday I simply made up my mind. When the tray came up I just nibbled a bit at some toast —that seemed safe—and poured the rest down the you-know-what. So Olive was none the wiser, and when I lay down upon the bed and closed my eyes she felt satisfied.

I must have rested about an hour until I heard the front door open and the voices drifted up the stairwell. Then I knew it was safe for me to get up.

I put on my dress and powdered my nose, and then I took ten dollars out of the pincushion where I keep what's left of the cash. After that there was nothing to do but tiptoe down the stairs very quietly and slip away.

Olive and her friends were in the parlor with die door closed. I had to rest a moment at the foot of the stairs because of my heart, you know, and for an instant I had the most peculiar temptation to open the parlor door and stick my tongue out at her.

But that wouldn't have been very ladylike. After all, Olive and her husband Percy had come to live with me and take care of me when Herbert died, and they got Miss Tooker to help when I had my first heart attack. I mustn't be rude.

Besides, I knew Olive would never permit me to go out alone any more. So it would be wiser if I didn't disturb her now.

I went out very quickly and walked north, away from the parlor windows. I turned down Edgewood and decided to take a bus at the corner. It cost a dime, but I couldn't be choosy.

There were several people on the bus and they kept staring at me. People seem so rude nowadays; I can't help but notice. When Herbert was alive we had the electric runabout and I never was forced into contact with the masses, but now I'm old and all alone, and there's no one to protect me.

I know my clothing is not in the latest, style, but it is fresh and neat and there is no call for rude and vulgar curiosity. I wear highbutton shoes for the support they afford my ankles, and if I chose to be sensible regarding draughts, that is my affair. I mean, about the gray muslin stockings and the scarf. My coat is fur and very expensive; it needs relining and possibly some mending, that is true, but for all strangers know I might be quite impoverished. They need not be so rude. Even my bag comes in for its, share of attention on the part of boors. My fine reticule, which Herbert brought back for me from abroad, in '22!

I didn't like the way they stared at my bag. It was almost as if they knew. But how could they know? No one had ever suspected.

I sniffed and sat back. I had to plan, now. I must get off east of the river. Then I could walk either north or south. I wasn't quite sure yet what I planned to do. I had ten dollars, remember.

If I walked north, I needed my bag.

If I walked south, like the last time—

No. I couldn't do that. The last time was frightful. I remember being in that awful place, and the men laughing, and I had been singing, I believe, was still singing when Percy and Olive came for me in the taxicab.

How they found me, I'll never know. Perhaps the tavernkeeper telephoned them. They got me home, and I had one of my attacks and Dr. Cramer told them never to even mention it to me again. So there were no discussions. I hate discussions.

But no. I couldn't walk south again today.

I left the. bus east of the river and walked north X began to get that tingly feeling all over. It frightened me but it felt—nice.

It felt even nicer when I went into Warram's and began to look at the cameos. The clerk was a man. I told him what I wanted and he went, to look for it. He brought back a wide selection and I tried to make up my mind. I told him, about my trip to Baden-Baden in T6, and what Herbert and I had seen in the jewelry stores during the war. abroad. He was very patient and understanding. I thanked him politely for his trouble and walked out, tingling. There was a brooch, a really lovely tiling, in my reticule.

At Slade and Benner's I got a scarf. The girl was an impertinent young snip, and so I felt I really must buy a corsage to distract her attention. They were vulgar things,. and cost 39 cents. Not nearly worth it. But the scarf in my bag was of imported silk.

IT WAS very exciting. I walked in and out of the shops, and the bag began to fill. I bought. One must be very discreet, you know. None of my purchases were extravagant, but I managed to spend over four dollars. Still, I had the little figurine, and the locket, and that perfectly enormous jar of shaving cream. That seemed silly, but the opportunity was there, and perhaps Percy might find a use for it.

Then I started going into these secondhand shops and antique stores near, the City Hall. One never knows. My reticule was almost full, but I could still make purchases.

I saw a lovely escritoire in the window of a place called Henshaw's. Obviously solid mahogany and beautifully carved. There was a slight chance that it might be available for a trifling sum.

The proprietor was a fat man. I smiled at him.

"I noticed that escritoire in your window, Mr. Henshaw," I began.

He shook his head.

"It's sold, madam. Besides, I'm not Henshaw. He's dead. Didn't you read about the case in the papers? Hanged him."

I held up my hand and sniffed.

"Please," I said. "Spare me."

"My name's Burgin. Bought the place out. We got a lot of nice things here, though, besides that writing table."

"I'll glance around a bit, if I may."

"Sure, madam."

I had seen the table with the ceramics, and now I approached it. But he never let his eyes stray from me. I was tingling and felt nervous. There was one piece I simply adored. I had the bag open and it only needed an instant —

He was right behind me. He had seen my hand move.

"How much is this?" I said, very quickly, picking up an object at random from one of the trays.

"Two bits!" he snapped.

I fumbled in my pocket and gave him a quarter. Then I marched out of the store, very quickly, and slammed the door.

It was only when I reached, the street that I stopped and examined the object in my hand.

A pair of spectacles. How in the world had I ever managed to snatch eyeglasses from that tray?

Still, they were rather unusual—quite heavy, and obviously silver.

I held them up to the light and in the sunset I noticed a word etched across the bridge.

"Veritas." Latin. Truth. Strange.

I slipped them into my pocket and walked briskly down the street. I was tired, yes, but I felt the need of leaving this disreputable neighborhood before sunset Besides, Olive would be bidding goodbye to her guests shortly, and I must return before my absence was discovered.

GLANCING at the City Hall clock I was astounded to find out that it was past five. This would never do. I should be found out, and there might be a distressing scene—A taxicab ride to the house costs fifty cents. But this was an emergency. I beckoned to a cab-driver and entered his vehicle.

As we drove, I grew more and more apprehensive. Even the thought of my successful expedition, of what I had in my bag, didn't console me.

Suddenly I remembered something else. Olive and Percy were dining out tonight! And Dr. Cramer was to come over and examine me!

Surely they would have ascertained my absence. How could I explain it?

I fumbled in my pocket for the fare. My hands encountered a cold object.

The spectacles.

That was the solution. I. placed them firmly on the bridge of my nose and adjusted the bows, just as we turned in at the driveway.

When the cab stopped the tingling feeling seemed to rush back, and for a moment I felt that I might have another attack. But I mastered it. Perhaps the glasses were “drawing” on my eyes a bit. In a moment I could see clearly and the tingling drained away.

I paid the driver and walked quickly towards the house, before he had time to comment on the lack of a “tip.” Then I took out my key and opened the door.

The glasses seemed to make it easier. Perhaps I really did need spectacles. Dr. Cramer had once commented upon the fact that I was slightly astigmatic. At any rate, everything seemed clear, quite clear.

Everything was clear.

Let me express myself properly, now, so that you will be sure to understand.

I OPENED the door. Olive and Percy were standing there. Olive so tall and thin and Percy so short and fat. Both of them had pale skins. Like leeches.

Why not? They were leeches. I looked at them, and it seemed to me as though I were meeting them for the first time. They smiled, but they were strangers.

Not quite strangers. Because I knew them. I could see them. The leeches.

Moving info my house when Herbert died. Using my property. Living on my income. Getting Miss Tooker to come and. keep her eye on me. Encouraging Dr. Cramer to make an invalid out of me. Ever since Herbert died. Now they were waiting for me to die.

“Here’s the old one——now.”

I won’t repeat the word.

For a moment I was shocked beyond all belief. To think that mild little Percy would stand there smiling and say such a thing to my face!

Then I realized that he wasn’t saying it. He was thinking it. I was reading his mind.

He said, “Mother, darling, where on earth did you disappear to? We worried so.”

"Yes," said Olive. "We didn't know what, to think. Why you might have been run over." Her tone was the familiar one of daughterly affection. And behind it, the thought, "Why wasn't she run over, the old——"

That word again!

So that is what she thought of me. That's what they both thought of me!

I began to tremble.

"Sit down, dear. Tell us all about it." Percy, smirking. Puffy-mouthed leech. Sucking my blood.

I summoned all my strength.

"Yes, Mother. Where were you?", Olive, smiling. Prim-mouthed leech. Thinking, "Did you go out on another bat, you doddering old fool? Or were you making trouble for us, stealing from the shops again? The times Percy has had to go down and make good on merchandise—"

I caught that thought and blinked behind the spectacles. I hadn't suspected that. Did they know, in the stores, what I. did? And permitted it as long as Percy—?

But then I wasn't profiting at all! They were all against me, I saw it for the first time. Spectacles.

"If you must know," I said, very rapidly. "I went downtown to be fitted for a pair of, glasses."

Before they had time to consider that fully, I marched up the stairs, entered my room, and slammed the door. Not angrily, but quite firmly.

I was really quite upset. Not only by their thoughts, but because, of the fact that I could read their thoughts. They were waiting for me to die. I knew it—but how?

Perhaps it was all my imagination. Maybe. I was really ill. They always said so. Miss Tooker treated me as an invalid. Dr. Cramer came regularly twice a week.

He would be coming tonight. He was very nice. Let him tell me what was wrong.

Because it couldn't be the spectacles. It couldn't be. Such things aren't really possible.

It was only that I was so very tired and so very old—

I took off the glasses and lay down on the bed and suddenly I was crying. I must have fallen, asleep, fox when I awoke it was quite dark.

The door had slammed downstairs. Now footsteps ascended the stairs. Miss Tooker.

She opened the door with one hand. She carried a tray. A teapot and some biscuits. Part of Dr. Cramer’s diet. He knew how I loved to eat and he wouldn’t permit it.

I made a face at Miss Tooker. “Go away,” I said.

She smiled weakly. “Mr. and Mrs. Dean have left for their dinner engagement,” she said. “But they thought you might be wanting your supper now.”

“Go away,” I repeated.

“Are you sure you’re feeling quite yourself?” she asked, setting down the tray on the table beside the bed. “Dr. Cramer should be coming soon, and —”

“Send him up and go to bed,” I snapped. “But keep, out of here.”

HER smile faded and she started for the door. For a moment I had the queerest desire to put on the spectacles and look at her through them. But that was all an illusion, wasn’t it? I watched her depart, then sat up and reached for my bag.

I began to go through my treasures. It took quite some time. I became so engrossed that I was unaware of Dr. Cramer’s arrival.

His knock startled me. I hastily stuffed my collection back into the bag and dropped it at the side of the bed. Then I lay back and called, “Come in.”

Dr. Cramer was always the soul of courtesy. He entered quietly, despite his portliness, and sat down in the “boudoir chair near my dressing table.

“What’s all this I hear about you, young lady?” he chuckled. He always called me “young lady.” It was our private joke.

“What do you mean?” I smiled at him pleasantly.

“I hear you took a little trip this afternoon. Mrs. Dean mentioned something about spectacles—”

I shrugged. He leaned closer.

“And you haven’t been eating. You were crying.”

He sounded so sympathetic. A wonderful personality, Dr. Cramer. One couldn’t help but respond.

just wasn’t hungry. You see, Olive and Percy just don’t understand. I do so enjoy getting out into the air, and I hate to trouble them. I can explain about the glasses.”

He smiled, and winked.

“First, some tea.”

“I’m afraid you’ll find it cooled by now.”

“That’s easily remedied.”

He turned and set the teapot on the little electric hotplate over in the corner. He worked quickly, efficiently, humming under his breath. It was a pleasure to watch him, a pleasure to have him visit. We would sit down now and have a cup of tea together, and I would tell him everything. He knew. He would understand. Everything would be all right.

I sat up. The glasses clicked on the bed beside me. I slipped them on.

Dr. Cramer turned and winked at me.

When he winked I closed my own eyes and felt the glasses pulling on them.

Then I opened my eyes and I knew. I knew that Dr. Cramer was here to kill me.

HE SMILED at me and poured out two cups of tea. He got the second cup from the table where my luncheon tray still rested. I watched him pour. I watched him stoop over the cup to the left and slip the powder into the hot tea.

He brought the tray over to the bed, and I said, “Doctor—a napkin, please.” He got the napkin, sat down next to me, and politely lifted his cup as I raised mine.

We drank.

My hand didn't tremble, even though he watched me. I emptied my cup. He emptied his.

He winked again. "Well, young lady—feel better?"

I winked right back at him. "Much better. And you?"

"First rate! Now, we can talk, eh?"

"Yes," I said. "We can talk."

"You were going to tell me something?"

"That's right," I replied. "I was going to tell you something, Dr. Cramer. I was going to tell you that I know all about it." He blinked again. I kept smiling as I went on.

"Yes. I know just how it is supposed to go. Percy and Olive put you up. to it. They will inherit and give you one-third.

The time was indefinite, but when I came home distraught tonight they thought it a good idea if you acted at once. Miss Tooker knew I might have an attack, anyway, and she would act as a witness. Not that a witness would be needed. You would certify as to the cause of death. My heart, you know."

Dr. Cramer was perspiring. The tea had been quite hot. He raised a hand. "Mrs. Olcott—"

"Please do not interrupt. I am not finished. I was telling you about the plan. In half an hour, or less, I will have a seizure. You will go downstairs and tell Miss Tooker to phone the Deans at their dinner party. Then you will return and endeavor to help me. Naturally, it will be too late. By the time my beloved daughter and her husband arrive, I shall be dead. That's the way it is, isn't it?"

"But—"

I stared at him. "You wonder how I know? So do I. I cannot explain the power I have. It is enough that I possess it. I can read your mind."

"Then—"

I inclined my head. "Please do not trouble yourself to speak. Reading your mind, I know what you meant to say next. You wondered why, knowing these things, I permitted you to poison me. You. wonder why I would trust you, knowing that you are a treacherous, hypocritical——

HERE I used the masculine form of the epithet Percy had thought of in connection with me.

His eyes bulged. Apparently he wasn't used to such language. He had turned red as a beet.

"Yes," I whispered, "You wonder why I allowed you to poison me. And the answer is—I didn't."

He tugged at his collar and half-rose from the chair.

"You didn't?"

"No." I smiled sweetly. "When you brought me the. napkin, I switched our teacups."

I do not know what poison he employed, but it was efficacious.

Of course, his excitement helped speed the process along. He managed to stand erect, but only for an instant, and then sank back into his chair.

He died there.

I watched him die. For fifteen minutes I observed the process of disintegration. His voice failed almost immediately. His head wobbled. He. frothed and retched. His eyes dilated and his face was purple, except around the mouth, where he bit his lips.

I WANTED to read his thoughts, but there were no coherent thoughts any more. Only images. Words of prayer and blasphemy commingled, and images of desperation. Vile things. And then the overpowering mastery of pain blotted out everything. It hurt my head to read his mind, so I took off the glasses and just watched.

It made, me tingle all over to see him die.

At the end he had convulsions. He tried to claw his: own throat out. I stood over him and laughed right down his gaping maw. Not a very ladylike thing to do, I admit, but there was justification. Besides, it made me tingle.

Afterwards I went downstairs. Miss Tooker was sleeping and there was no one to stop me. I deserved a little celebration. I raided the ice-box and took up a tray loaded with turkey and dressing and truffles and kumquats—oh, they feasted well downstairs, my loving daughter and son-in-law! I brought the brandy decanter, too.

I carried everything into my room. It was enough to make me quite giddy, climbing the stairs with that load, but once the door was closed behind me, I felt better.

I filled my teacup with brandy and toasted the figure sprawled in the chair before me. I mocked him silently as I ate. I inquired politely if he cared for a snack, did he want some brandy, it was delicious, and how was his heart behaving these days?

The brandy was strong. I finished all tire food, every last bit of it, and drank again. The tingling was mixed with warmth. I felt like singing, shouting. I did both.

The teacup broke. I drank out of the decanter. No one to see me. I reached out and closed his eyes. Bulging eyes. My own eyes ached. Spectacles. Shouldn't have worn them. But if I hadn't, I'd be dead. Now he was dead. I was alive. Very much alive. Tingling alive.

More brandy. Heartburn. Too much food. The brandy was burning, too. I lay back on the bed. Everything went around and around. Burning. I could see him sprawled there with his mouth open, laughing at me.

Why did. he laugh? He was dead. I was the one who should laugh. He had poison.

I had brandy. "Liquor is poison to you, Mrs. Olcott."

Who said that? Dr. Cramer said that, the last time. But he was dead. I wasn't poisoned. So why did it hurt when I tried to laugh?

Why did it hurt my chest so, and why did the room go around and when I tried to sit up and fell face downwards on the floor why did I tear at the rug until my fingers bent backwards and snapped one by one like pretzel sticks, but I couldn't feel them because the agony in my chest was so much stronger, stronger than anything, stronger than life itself.

Because it was death.

I died at 10:18 p.m.

3. PERCY DEAN

AFTER the whole affair was hushed up, Olive and I went away for a while. We could afford to travel, now, and I made arrangements to have the whole place remodeled while we were gone.

They really did a beautiful job—money was no object. I told him—and the results did us proud. It was about time, too. All those years wasted, sitting, around and waiting for the old lady, to die; yes, it was about time.

Now Olive, and I could really hold our heads up in the community. No more snubs, no more covert insults, no more gossip about, "Mrs. Olcott's. son-in-law . . . parvenu . . . not altogether the sort of person who belongs."

I swore to myself that all this would be changed., Olive and I would take our rightful place in society, at last. We had the background, surely, and now there was ample money to move in the best circles, to entertain.

To entertain. That was the first step.

The costume party was really Olive's idea, although I was the one who tied it in with our "house-warming."

"There's a certain atmosphere of gaiety and informality about a costume party," I told her. "It will distract from the awareness of the guests; so many of them know about the—uh—unfortunate occurence six months ago, and an ordinary dinner party would be strained. But a costume party is just the thing."

"Maybe I could get that little dance troupe to entertain," Olive mused. "The Puerto Ricans, you know. They're all the rage this season. And we could use the garden, too."

IT PLEASED me to see her respond so enthusiastically. We fell to planning, determining whom to invite. Here is where my superior acumen came into play. For years I had been balked, frustrated by my ignominious position as a “hanger-on”; unable to associate on a plane of equality with the business and financial leaders of the community.

I seemed to attend their dinners and parties under sufferance, and was unable to reciprocate with invitations in kind. In consequence I was never able to broach certain ventures I had in mind regarding real estate and bond issues. I knew the key men and my propositions were completely worked out. All I wanted was entree. I could make money in this city; quite a bit of money. Now was the time.

“Thorgesen,” I said, checking off the list. “Definitely yes. “Harker, if he’ll come. And Dr. Cassit. Pfluger. A repulsive person, but I need him. And the Misses Christie. Hattie Rooker. Very good.”

“If we have Hattie we must invite Sebastian Grimm,” Olive reminded.

“Grimm? Who’s he?”

“The novelist. Summering in town here. He’s invited everywhere—simply everywhere!”

“As you wish.”

We planned it all, sent out our invitations, and had a most gratifying response. The week beforehand was filled with endless details which engaged our time. As a matter of fact, it was the day of the party before Olive brought up a highly important matter.

“Our costumes, Percy,” she said.

“Costumes?”

“This is a costume party, silly! And we’ve forgotten to select our own.” She smiled. “You’d go well as a pirate.”

I frowned. I dislike levity. The thought of wearing a costume repelled me.

“But they’ll all be in costume,” Olive told me. “Even dignified old men like Harker. And Mrs. Loomis has spent weeks, simply weeks, on her Watteau shepherdess. The. dressmaker told me.”

"What shall you wear?" I asked.

"Something Spanish; with a mantilla. Then I can wear the earrings." She peered at me quizzically. "But you're going to be a problem. Frankly, Percy, you're too tubby for the usual thing. Unless you choose to dress as a clown."

I almost spoke harshly to her. But it was true. I regarded my portliness in the mirror; my receding hairline, my double chin. She peered over my shoulder.

"Just the thing!" she announced. "Percy, I have it! You shall be Benjamin Franklin."

Benjamin Franklin. I had to admit it wasn't a bad idea. After all, Franklin was a symbol of dignity, stability and wisdom—I am inclined to discount those absurd rumors about his mistresses—and that was the note I was seeking. I depended upon this evening to impress the guests. It was a highly important first step.

The upshot of the matter was that I went down to the costumer, told him my needs, and returned that evening with a Colonial costume, including a partial wig.

Olive was ecstatic over the results. I dressed hastily after dinner, for our guests were expected to arrive early, and Olive merely glanced into the master bedroom and inspected me at the last moment.

"Wonderful!" she said. "But didn't Franklin wear spectacles?"

"So he did. Unfortunately, it's too late now to secure a pair. I trust the guests will forgive me this oversight."

The guests did.

I spent a most enjoyable evening. Everyone arrived, the liquor was good and plentiful, the costumes added the proper note of frivolity, and the entertainment—although vulgar—seemed most well received.

ALTHOUGH a total abstainer myself, I nevertheless saw to it that the proper persons imbibed. Men like Thorgesen of the bank, old man

Harker, Dr. Cassit, and Judge Pfluger. I managed to keep them around the punchbowl and their cordiality increased as the evening progressed.

I was particularly interested in getting Thorgesen's friendship. Through him I could gain membership in the Gentry Club, and sooner or later I'd worm my way into Room 1200—the fabulous "poker club" room where the really big "deals" were decided; millions of dollars in contracts casually assigned as the powers-that-be dealt their cards.

Sebastian Grimm put the thought into my head. "Party seems to be going nicely," he drawled. "Almost think it would be safe to leave the ladies to their own devices for an hour or so. You haven't a poker table available, have you, Dean?"

Poker. The very thing. A game in my house. Wouldn't it be natural to suggest another meeting at the conclusion of this, game? Perhaps Thorgesen would suggest the Gentry Club next time, and I could remind him that I was not a member. "That's easily remedied," he would boom. "Tell you what you do, Dean—"

Perfect!

"There's a big table upstairs," I ventured. "Away from the crowd and the noise. If you gentlemen are interested—" They were. We ascended the stairs.

I hate poker. I dislike all games of chance. I do not regard them as immoral, but. I instinctively dislike a speculative venture where the element of risk is dependent upon chance.

But this was an exception.

I secured chips and cards. Thorgesen, Dr. Cassit, Judge Pfluger, Harker, Grimm and myself were seated around the table. I would have excluded Grimm if possible—the tall, thin sardonic writer was a disturbing element and his presence was of no value to me. But it had been his suggestion, and I couldn't very well shake him off.

Olive tapped on the door before we started our play.

"So there you are," she said. "I wondered where you'd disappeared to, Percy." She smiled at the group. "I see you're in good company, however.

Would anyone care to have a luncheon sent up? We're serving buffet style downstairs in a few moments."

There was an awkward silence. I "felt annoyance.

"Very well, then. I shan't disturb you. Oh, Percy—I found something for you. In—in mother's old room." She came up behind me and slipped something over my ears and nose.

"Spectacles," she giggled. "You remember, we couldn't find them for your costume. But mother had a pair in her drawer. Now." She stood back and surveyed me. "That does it. He really looks like Benjamin Franklin, don't you think?"

I didn't want the spectacles. They hurt my eyes. But I was overcome with embarrassment. I forced a smile and waved her from the room. The men were intent upon distribution of chips. Thorgesen was the banker. I pulled out my wallet and placed a hundred dollar bill on the table. I received a stack of twenty white chips.

They played for "blood." Very well. I smiled. "Now for some reds," I said. I placed five more hundred dollar bills on the table and received twenty red chips.

"That's better," I commented. And it was. For I meant to lose. A thousand dollars or so invested properly tonight in a losing game would almost guarantee that my membership be looked upon with favor by the other players. There was a deal of sound psychology behind my reasoning. I meant to lose, and more than that, to lose gracefully. Amiably. Like a gentleman.

But it didn't work.

I HAVE heard of clairvoyance, of telepathy, of sixth sense, of "card sense." These phenomena I have always discounted. Yet something was at work this evening.

For as I squinted through my spectacles at the cards, I could read the hands of the other players. Not their hands, but their minds.

"Pair of eights under. Raise. Get another. Two queens. Wonder if he's got a straight? Better stay in. Never make an inside with those tens showing. Flush. Raise again. Bluff the others out."

It came to me in a steady stream. I knew when to drop, when to stay, when to raise, when to bluff.

Of course I meant to lose. But when a man knows what to do, he's a fool to drop the advantage. That's logic, isn't it? Sound business. They respected shrewdness, good judgment. How could I help myself?

I do not wish to dwell upon the actual incidents of the game. Suffice to say that I won almost every hand. That I was able to raise, to bluff, to "sandbag" as I believe they call it, and all with this marvelous flow of intuition, this veritable psychic sense which never deserted me.

I was over nine thousand dollars ahead when Harker cheated.

The strain of concentration was terrific. I paid no heed to time, to any extraneous circumstance or thought or movement. It was only the game—reading their minds—calculating my bets.

And then: "I'll keep the ace until the next hand," Harker thought.

I could feel that thought. Feel the strength, the desperate avariciousness behind it. Old man Harker, worth three million, cheating over the poker table.

FOR a moment I was dismayed. The next hand was being dealt. I concentrated. Harker had the ace of spades under his left sleeve on the table. He received a seven and an ace down, and an ace up. Three aces, if he could switch the seven.

I had queens, back to back, the down queen paired with a four. The cards were distributed—the fourth, the fifth. The others had nothing; Grimm a possible straight. Harker kept raising. I got another queen on the fifth card. I raised him back. Grimm stayed. Harker re-raised. He was gloating. The conversation grew animated. This was a vital hand; the pot was large. The sixth card brought me another four. Full house, queens up. A sure winner in almost any seven-card stud game. Harker had his aces. My pair of queens on the board bet—the limit. He raised the limit. I re-raised. Grimm dropped out.

They hung upon our last cards as the deal went out. I got a jack. Harker received the fourth ace. It almost hurt my head to feel the wave of exultation possessing him. He raised, I raised, he raised, I hesitated—and Harker switched cards. The fourth ace went under. The seven slid beneath his sleeve. That was what I had been waiting for.

I raised.

Harker raised.

"Six thousand dollars in the pot!" somebody murmured.

I raised. Harker raised.

Then, very deliberately, I called. I laid down my hand triumphantly.

"Full house. Queens over fours." I started to rake in the chips.

Harker's old man's monkey-face creased into a grin.

"Not so fast, my friend. I have"—he licked his thin lips eagerly—"four aces."

Everybody gasped.

I coughed. "Sorry, Mr. Harker. But has it come to your attention that you also have—eight cards?"

Silence.

"An oversight, no doubt. But if you will be good enough to raise your left arm from the table—there, underneath your sleeve—"

The silence deepened.

And suddenly it was filled with a clamor. Not a clamor of words. A clamor of thoughts.

They weren't thinking about cards any more. But I could still read their minds!

"The cad—the cur—accusing Harker—probably planted the card there himself—cheating—no gentleman—nasty little fat-faced fool—never should have come—barred from decent society—vulgar—moneygrubber—drove her to her grave—"

My head hurt.

I thought if I could talk, the hurting would go away. So I talked and told them what I knew, and what I thought of them, and they only stared. So I thought if I could shout, it might relieve the strain, and I shouted and ordered them out of my house and named them for what they were, but they looked at me as if I were mad. And Harker thought things about me no man could stand. No man could stand such thoughts, even if his head weren't splitting and he didn't know it was all lost, they all hated him, they were laughing and sneering.

So I knocked over the table and I took him by his wizened throat, and then they were all on me at once, and I wouldn't let go until I had squeezed out the hurting, all of it, and my glasses fell off and everything seemed to go dim. I just looked up in time to see Thorgesen, over my shoulder, aiming the water carafe at my head.

I tried to move to one side, but it was too late. The carafe came down and everything went away.

Forever.

4. Sebastian Grimm

THIS will be brief. Very brief.

When I picked up those peculiar yellow-lensed spectacles in antique frames from the floor-slipping them into my pocket, unobserved in the confusion attendant upon calling the doctor and the police—I was motivated by mere curiosity.

That curiosity grew when I chanced to overhear a remark at the inquest regarding the disappearance of the glasses. The widow, Olive Dean, spoke of her mother, and how she had brought the glasses home with her upon the night of her tragic death.

Certain aspects of that poker game and Dean's behavior had piqued my fancy. The statements at the inquest further intrigued me.

The legend, Veritas inscribed. upon the bridge of the spectacles, was also interesting.

I shall not bore you with my researches. Amateur detection is a monotonous, albeit sometimes a rewarding procedure. Sufficient for me to say that I undertook a private inquiry which led me to a second-hand store and eventually to a partially-razed house on Edison Street. Research with the local historical society enabled me to ascertain that the spectacles had originally been the property of Dirk Van Prinn, he of unsavory repute. Legends of his interest in sorcery are common property and can be easily corroborated in any volume dealing with the early history of this city. I need not bother to underscore the obvious.

At any rate, my rather careful investigation bore fruit. I was able, taking certain liberties based upon circumstantial evidence, to “reconstruct” the thoughts and actions of die various persons who had inadvertently worn the spectacles since the time of their discovery in the secret drawer of old Dirk Van Prinn’s escritoire.

These thoughts and actions have formed die basis of this narrative, in which I took die liberty of assuming the characters of Mr. Joseph Henshaw, Mrs. Miriam Spencer Olcott, and Mr. Percy Dean—all deceased.

Unfortunately, a final chapter remains to be written. I had no idea that it would be necessary at the time I opened my investigation. Had. I suspected, I would. have desisted immediately. For I knew, as Dirk Von Prinn knew when he shut the spectacles away in that drawer, that they were objects accursed; that his heritage of wisdom from his ancestor, die infamous Ludwig Prinn, was evil wisdom; that the lenses were, ground, almost literally, in Hell.

Yes, I knew that the truth is not meant for men to see; that knowledge of the thoughts of others leads only to madness and destruction.

I mused upon the triteness and die obviousness of this moral, and not for anything in die world would I have emulated poor Joe Henshaw, or Mrs. Olcott, or Percy Dean, and put on the spectacles to gaze at other men and other minds.

But pride goeth before a fall. And as I wrote of the tragic fate of these poor fools whose search for wisdom ended in disaster, I could not help but reflect upon the actual purpose for which these singular spectacles had been created.

"Veritas."

The truth.

The truth about others brought evil consequences.

But—the truth about one's self?

"Know thyself."

Could it be that this was the secret purpose of the spectacles? To enable the wearer to look inward?

Surely there could be no harm in that. Not in the hands of an intelligent man.

I fancied that I "knew" myself in the ordinary sense of the word; was perhaps more aware, through natural predeliction and introspection, than most men, of my inherent nature.

I fancied, I mused. I believed.

But I had to know.

Yes, I had to know.

And that is why I put them on, just now. Put them on and stared at myself in the hall mirror.

I stared at myself. And I saw myself. And I knew myself. Completely and utterly.

There are things about subliminal intelligence, about the so-called "subconscious," which psychiatry and psychology long to discover. I know these things now, but I shall never speak. And I know a great deal more.

I know that the actual agony undergone by Henshaw and Mrs. Olcott and Percy Dean in reading the minds of others is as nothing compared to that which is born of reading one's own mind.

I stood before the mirror and looked into my mind—seeing there the atavistic memories, the desires, the fears, the self-deceit, the spawning madness, the lurking filth and cruelty, the slimy crawling secret shapes which dare not rise even in dreams; seeing the unutterable foulness beneath all the veneer of consciousness and intellect which is my true nature. Every man's nature. Perhaps it can be suppressed and controlled. But merely to realize that it is there is the supreme horror.

It must not be permitted.

I shall finish this account, presently. Then I shall take the "cheaters," as Joe Henshaw so appropriately called them, and destroy them forever.

The cheaters!

I shall use a revolver for. that purpose; aiming it quite steadily and deliberately at those accursed instruments, and shatter them at a single shot.

And I shall be wearing them at the time. . . .

1948

Strictly From Mars

No such thing could exist! But it did, and it was linked with an eight-year-old child in an orphanage . . . with death.

THERE were three of us in the room—me, Bunny Hartwick, and the pink elephant.

Hartwick and I did all the talking. The pink elephant said nothing. He just sat there and looked at us. I knew that look. I've been drunk with Hartwick before.

We've never had the usual arrangement between editor and author. Bunny wouldn't buy my yarns if he didn't think they stood up, and I wouldn't send them to him if I didn't believe his magazine had something on the ball. But, professional relations aside, Hartwick and I were always good friends, and I looked forward to my trips to town.

Tonight, as we sat in his apartment and held our little session over the Scotch, we'd reached the stage of kidding our own stuff. The pink elephant, not getting any attention, went away.

"You science-fiction hacks are all crazy," Hartwick snorted. "How do you get that way?"

"Associating with editors," I told him. "It's catching."

"I'm sane enough. I work for a living. Get a salary and everything," Hartwick answered. "But you writers—ye gods! Ought to hang out a sign. 'Worlds conquered while you wait—1c a word and up.' " He chuckled.

"Sometimes 2c a word, under a pseudonym." Hartwick raised his angular body from the sofa and strode up and down before the artificial fireplace. I had to shout my rejoinders as he paced.

"What would you s-f editors do without us?" I inquired. "You'd have to go back to digging ditches where you belong."

"That's more than you writers could do," he insinuated. "Ditch-digging is too practical for your kind. A science-fiction writer is a guy who knows everything about interstellar space but hasn't got enough common sense to find his way out of a phone booth."

Hartwick was in rare style. He not only handed me a rib; he barbecued it.

"What crummy specimens you authors are," he chanted. "Petty little introverts, crouching over your typewriters in flight from reality. Achoo!"

"Gesundheit!" I snapped. "What would the fans say if they heard you handing out such a line?"

"They'd probably agree with me. You see, it's not real fantasy or science-fiction itself that gets me down. It's just the type of person writing it. I'm a great believer in science-fiction, but the authors are utterly incredible. Achoo!"

"God bless you and nuts to you," I replied. "Kindly quit walking and talking in circles. You like science-fiction, then, but you don't like the way we write it—is that the argument?"

"No argument about it. Self-evident. What is science-fiction today? A never-never land where all the Martians call their planet 'Mars'. A marijuana nightmare where brains grow big as watermelons and worlds collide in a game of cosmic billiards. That's the sort of thing you authors turn out. While all around us move marvels far greater than your poor concepts.

"I'm serious." Hartwick sat down, facing me with an intent stare. "For example, I recently ran across a woman who runs an orphanage and she told me—"

"Skip it." I stood up, swaying slightly. The pink elephant had suddenly returned, and I had a definite urge to get out of there before it stepped on me. “I’m going back to the hotel,” I announced.

“Don’t go, Dan.” Hartwick was suddenly earnest. “I want to talk to you. Seriously.”

“Not now. You win the argument.

I agree with you. Science and fiction don’t mix. Neither do Scotch and straight gin. I’m going to bed.”

“But—”

“We’ll discuss it tomorrow,” I said. “Goodnight.”

“Achoo!” said Hartwick.

On which remark we parted. I rode back to my hotel in a cab, laughing in a rather inane and befuddled fashion as I thought of our discussion. Of course Hartwick had won the argument. There was nothing to argue about. We science-fiction writers did deal in fairytales. Our situations were incredible, utterly falsified.

“Just a fake,” I mumbled to myself, as I stooped and inserted my key in the lock of the hotel-room door. I walked in, switched the light on in the empty room.

And then the voice rustled forth—the voice, whispering from empty air in my hotel room.

“Mars calling Earth,” it whispered. “Mars—calling—Earth!”

CHAPTER II

YOU know how it is. It just doesn’t happen that way. You write it a hundred times. Sure. There’s only one way to do it. You have a lovable old Professor, see? And he’s sitting in his laboratory with this young jag—a college athlete with a remarkably high I.Q. Boy, what an I.Q. he has! They’re waiting for the Professor’s beautiful daughter, lovely goldenhaired, laughing-eyed Sandra Mefoofsky.

And then the college jag points to the big silver doo-hickey in the corner and naively inquires, “What’s that there stuff, hey?”

The Professor, with a $64 gleam in his eye, replies (in a page and a half of bowdlerized scientific terminology) that it's a receptor-disk communicating with Mars.

So the college jag remembers his I.Q. and says, "Don't hand me none of that stuff," and then the beam goes on and the squeaky voice says, "Mars calling Earth."

Get the old dramatic buildup? That's the way it happens when you write it.

But I wasn't writing it, I was living it.

And the voice was whispering, "Mars calling Earth,"

I heard it. I might have been drunk when I opened the door, but I was sober now. Sober enough to search the room for wires. There was no inlet, no outlet. No concealed amplifier.

I opened the window. Nothing there but the drop to the street below.

So I stopped being sober and was drunk again. I had to be. Now I understood. Up at Hartwick's place it had been a pink elephant. Now it was a whispering voice from Mars.

"Mars calling Earth. Mars calling Dan Kenny."

My name! Why not? Why shouldn't a hallucination know my name? It was my hallucination.

It didn't frighten me a bit. I decided to answer it.

"Sorry. The line is busy."

"Mars calling Dan Kenny."

"You must have the wrong number." The voice was patient. So very patient. "Mars calling—"

"All right! I'm Dan Kenny. What the hell do you want?"

"Your help."

"Help for what?"

"Conquering the world."

I began to wish the pink elephant would show up again. Pink elephants I can handle. I can understand them. But when a corny plot comes to life —"Listen," I said, feeling foolish as I addressed the empty air. "Listen, you cheap practical joker, whoever you are—show your foolish face or I'll call the desk. I'll call the cops."

So far it was all regulation. Strictly formula. Any hero would have said and done the same things.

But from that point on, things went wrong. You see, I didn't call the cops. I didn't move. I stood there, swaying, while the voice whispered to me.

It whispered to me from far away; just a voice buzzing in my brain, telling me secrets; secrets from beyond the stars.

That sounds good, but it wasn't good. It wasn't the sort of thing for a man in my condition. But I had to listen. The voice compelled, even though my head reeled beneath a weightless burden of impalpable evil. For the voice told me things, and when I could understand, when I got a grip on myself again, I listened to the message.

"—from Mars, of course. Just a scouting party, as it were. But we are equipped to transform our activities to those of an advance guard, an engineering corps, and lay the groundwork. Naturally, it is helpful to have spies in the enemy's camp. That's why we thought of you."

"Why me?" I choked.

"Because you have the type of intellect we need. An imaginative temperament. Your work has pre-conditioned you to the alien. You're not hidebound by prejudice, afraid of the seemingly unknown. And your creative ability will be of use in planning our moves. As a writer of science-fiction—"

"Hold on a minute." It seemed silly to be arguing with a nightmare, but what would you do?

"In the first place," I said, "if you think I'm going to be of any help in building disintegrator machines or operating death-ray guns, you've had a bum steer, friend. I'm just a fantasy writer, see? And—"

"We know." The voice rustled on. "And it does not matter. Our plans do not involve any such childish concepts. What we have in mind is definitely within your compass. You have been thoroughly investigated. And you come well recommended."

"Recommended? Who rec—?"

"I cannot say at this time."

"What's all this about an 'investigation' ?"

"We know all there is to be known about you." The voice began to drone, as though reading from a written report. "Daniel J. Kenny, age 29, single, height 6 feet, two inches, weight 182, eyes blue, hair black, complexion—"

THAT was only the beginning. For fully five minutes the voice continued, giving a minute physical description, followed by an accurate and painstaking summary of the circumstances of my birth, childhood, youth, education, career, and present status.

I let the whispering subside and assumed a belligerence I did not feel.

"Wonderful!" I shouted. "You must have been reading my mail!"

"Your mind."

The whisper came. And then the voice began to tell me things. Things I'm ashamed to repeat. About my thoughts . . . my secret thoughts. I don't like to remember that part. I've always hated the idea of psychoanalysis. I've always been afraid to get too drunk, or go under ether, or submit to hypnosis. But this was worse. Much worse.

Let me see if I can explain it, put it across. Because the way the voice talked to me—that was responsible for my subsequent belief in it. When the voice told me everything about my secret self, I knew. Knew it wasn't a dream. Knew that its fantastic hintings had a basis, some kind of basis, in reality. I began to believe that it—and what it represented—could conquer the world. With my help, or without it. And then my dreams crystallized.

The voice from Mars had investigated, all right. It knew that under the drunken masquerade of my conversation with Hartwick lay a real and burning rebellion. A hatred of the world, of its conventions, its smug money-is-power standards.

The voice was subtle, persuasive. It told me of my hidden lust for conquest, for revenge. Revenge against the petty frustrations of existence. Revenge against the real world which I had despised. That's why I had written stories of other, imaginary worlds.

And now a voice from another world—a world I had always regarded as imaginary—was talking to me. Urging me to join with it and take my real revenge.

Why not? I was drunk, reckless. Footloose and fancy-free, with a burning desire for power. Now, miraculously, my chance had come. A voice, greater than the voice of Mephistopheles that tempted Faust, offered me everything.

So I answered. "I'll see you in hell first!" I shouted. "Damn and blast you, wherever and whatever you are! You'll never take earth—get out of here and leave me alone. You—"

I exhausted my self and my vocabulary of profanity until I realized that I was swaying around in a hotel room, cursing the empty air.

There was no reply. I blinked, rubbed my bleary eyes, and realized that it must have been a dream. I reeled over to the open window and gulped the fresh night air.

The swaying beam of the fire-escape above the window caught my eye.

Could some damned practical joker have crept out on that beam and crouched there to whisper through my window?

It had to be that way. Unless it was all a drunken fancy. Or—unless it was real.

But it couldn't have been real.

I went to bed fully convinced of that. Then I fell asleep and began to dream. And the voice came to me again in dreams, and I woke cold with sweat, screaming, "No—I won't—no!"

I was behaving like a science-fiction hero, after all.

CHAPTER III

WHEN Bunny Hartwick called from downstairs I was still in bed. I got up, put on a bathrobe, and had just finished ducking my head in the wash-basin when he came in.

Bunny, immaculate in a summer suit, lifted an eyebrow as he took in my ensemble.

“Hangover?” he inquired.

“Worse than that,” I answered.

“What’s up?”

“Sit down and I’ll tell you,” was my suggestion.

So Bunny Hartwick sat down. So I told him. I told him everything and waited for the explosion.

It never came. Bunny Hartwick leaped forward, gazed at me with baby-blue eyes peering deeply into mine, and said, “Why didn’t you take the offer?”

“Are you kidding?”

“No. But I hope you are. Here’s the biggest opportunity of a lifetime—the biggest opportunity in all history—and you’re throwing it away. Just throwing it away.”

“Listen, pal,” I drawled. “Did you by any chance happen to be hanging outside my hotel-room window, on the fire escape, making like a voice from Mars?”

Hartwick shook his head, gravely. “No.”

“All right. I believe you. But don’t you think that somebody else was? You don’t mean to say that you believe this monkey-business?”

“Of course I believe it,” Hartwick coughed delicately, then sneezed. “As a matter of fact,” he said, “I sent that messenger to you.”

“You did what?”

“I sent the voice from Mars. Or rather, that entity which manifested itself to you as a voice.”

“But—”

“I thought it over very carefully before deciding to do so. I attempted to analyze your personality in the light of your probable reaction. I trust that I haven't misjudged my man."

"You mean, then, that you're actually in league with these things—whatever they are—in an attempt to—"

"Conquer the world? Of course." Hartwick's eyes were no longer baby-blue. The sapphire stare was cold, piercing.

"I'm not the only one, either. There are others waiting; other authors, in particular. The voice came to me, you see, and I sent it to the others. We are laying the groundwork now. And I'd like to see you on our side when the time comes. The time is coming, swiftly; never doubt that! We have plans.

"You will remember our conversation last night. I spoke of the difference between your writer's concept of the incredible and how it pales when contrasted with true incredibility made actual. I wasn't just garbling metaphysics. I meant it. Right now, all around you, our little plans are working. I mean today, this very moment! We are operating, hastening the day when the structure of the world will collapse and the Martians take over." I might have doubted his sanity, but I couldn't doubt his sincerity. He believed it—and for the moment, I believed it, too.

"You'd sell out the world, sell out mankind then, to these monstrosities from outside?" I muttered. I rose to my feet and clenched my fists. The gesture was maudlin but sincere.

Hartwick shrugged, stood up "Why not? They'll need help in running the new world. They'll want some of us, then. And in return, we shall have power. Power undreamt of by a Hitler, a Napoleon. You and I, with minds broad enough to think in ultra-terrestrial terms, with vision encompassing more than the petty scope of earth, can assume our rightful places in the new regime. A few of us, kindred spirits, will rule it all. What you sweated out at a penny a word will become a reality bringing riches beyond compare. And it won't be hard, Dan. We have our plans all laid. Nothing can stop us. It's reached that stage. That's why I wanted to talk to you. Let me explain just what it is we mean to do, how we are going to do it. Let me —"

“You—you—cosmic quisling!” I exploded. “Get out of here. Get out before I break your neck!”

I was really angry, because you don’t talk to editors that way.

“Dan—listen to me. Be sensible. I want you to see this thing, recognize its inevitability. Perhaps if I tell you how it all started, rip away the veil of cheap mystery, you’ll understand.”

“I understand it right now.” I grabbed Hartwick by the collar and backed him across the room. “You’re insane, that’s what I understand. Whether this Martian threat is real or imaginary, you’re insane to consider it. You want to betray mankind, do you?

Perhaps the authorities ought to hear about this.”

A SNEER twisted across his distorted features as he struggled to free himself from my grasp. “What will you tell the authorities?” he mocked. “That you came home drunk last night and heard voices in your room? That a man from Mars asked you to help conquer the earth? You know where that will get you, Dan.”

“Nevertheless, I’m going to try it.” I released Hartwick, turned, strode towards the phone.

Hartwick moved behind me. He passed the writing desk. His hand swooped down, came up with a pointed object. Then he lunged.

I turned just in time. I jerked my head aside as the point of a paper-knife shredded the collar of my pajamas.

Hartwick gasped, struck again. I clawed at his face with my left hand, and gripped his wrist with my right. The hand holding the paper-knife twisted down. We struggled together, as he stabbed out at me. His hatred crawled across his face like a livid flame.

“You won’t tell,” he panted. “You won’t tell!”

I bent his wrist. He kneed me. His free hand sought my jugular. He squeezed my neck. I saw his face blazing up through red haze.

My hand bent his wrist. He had to drop that knife. He had to. And then—his hand was free. The knife rose, slashed down. My elbow went out. I caught his arm, wrenched it. The knife continued in its vicious arc. It stabbed.

But it did not stab me. My blow sent the point of the blade into Hartwick's throat.

Hartwick uttered a little moan. Pink bubbles formed at the corners of his mouth. The paper-knife hung suspended in his neck, moving up and down like a delicate little teeter-totter. I watched it dully, as Hartwick sank to his knees. Then he fell over. The knife stopped quivering. So did Hartwick.

That's when I began to quiver. My eyelids quivered as I knelt beside him and felt for a non-existent pulse. My hand quivered as I picked up the cradle phone. My voice quivered as I croaked to the room clerk, "I'm coming down. There's a dead man in my room."

My legs quivered as I made the trip downstairs in the elevator. I was shaking all over as I told my story to the room clerk. I gasped it out between chattering teeth to the house dick.

"Accident, you understand," I kept saying. "It was an accident." Not very heroic, I must admit. But very, very true to life.

"Let's have a look," grunted the house dick. He peered at the room clerk. "Meanwhile, keep it quiet." The room clerk nodded.

Then the house dick grasped my elbow and we went upstairs.

I began to tell my story again as we went up. I couldn't stop talking. As I poured it out, I realized how unconvincing the whole thing sounded.

That's because my mind was on other things. Little details involving judge, jury, a lawyer, and beyond that, the shadow pattern of bars in a death-house corridor.

The house dick nodded, grunted, led me out of the elevator and down the hall to room 1415.

I had trouble getting my key in the lock. He stooped down, reached for his own key-ring, opened the door.

I walked into the room and he followed.

"There he is," I said. "On the floor. You see—"

"I don't see," said the house dick.

I stared.

There was no body lying on the floor.

CHAPTER IV

YOU'VE seen it in the movies.

I went through the whole routine. I looked for the paper-knife, and it wasn't there. I searched for bloodstains on a rug that held no bloodstains. And all the while I kept muttering, "But I killed him—I killed him, I tell you."

After a while, I stopped muttering and began to yell.

I suppose that's why they took me to Bellevue.

Oh, they were very polite about it, and quite efficient. And I tried to look at it with a sense of humor. But there was nothing funny in the glances they exchanged, the quiet orders dispatched, or the strong-arm methods in smuggling me out of the hotel by the back entrance.

In the ambulance I began to rave a little, and I told my story again at the top of my voice.

Then I was sitting at the doctor's desk, and he was smiling at me and nodding his head and listening in reasonable agreement. Of course I didn't have the d.t.'s. Naturally, somebody must have come in and moved the body while I was downstairs. The doctor could see that, he said. But now, if I'd just lie down and take it easy for a while—

That made me scream again. Or feel like screaming. I was just opening my mouth when an orderly came in and whispered something to the doctor. He, muttered, shrugged. I caught an exchange.

". . . released to his custody. Of course there are no charges. So . . ."

The doctor turned to me. "Mr. Kenny, this whole thing will be straightened out. Meanwhile, there's a friend of yours waiting to take you home. He’s in the outer office.”

I went to the door, opened it.

Then I passed out.

The last image impinging on my consciousness was too vivid to bear.

Sitting in-the outer office, clad in a bright sports-jacket, checkered scarf, and Calcutta straw hat, was Bunny Hartwick!

He was rising to his feet, walking toward me, smiling.

“There you are,” he said. “I was worried about you. I—”

The man I killed caught me in his arms as I pitched forward into a black vortex.

CHAPTER V

AS CONSCIOUSNESS returned, I fought. Fought against it. I wanted to stay down there in the dark, the friendly dark—the dark where there were no voices from Mars, no walking dead men.

I knew we were in a car, but I didn’t want to know where we were going. I knew Bunny was holding me upright in the seat but I didn’t want to open my eyes and see him. I didn’t want to talk to him, because if I heard his voice I’d know. Know that I was crazy. Know it hadn’t happened, except in my head. And when those things start happening in your head—

All the while, Bunny was talking to me in a soft voice. “When I tried to get you this morning, they told me at the desk. I rushed down to the hospital and did some plain and fancy talking. Don’t know what this is all about, but I’m not going to bother you with questions now, Dan.”

That was enough for me.

Hartwick hadn’t been in my room at all this morning. And if he hadn’t been there, I couldn’t have killed him. And that meant I was—

“—a little upset,” Bunny Hartwick was saying. “So I’m taking you up to Doc Anton’s place. You’ll like the Doc. Great character. He runs a little private san—rest home, on the edge of town. I’ve been there myself when the going got tough. I figure a day or two there will put you back in shape. After all, Dan, you're a valuable property. Got to take care of my authors, you know."

I listened, and still I wouldn't allow myself to fully awaken and face him. I sensed vaguely that there was something wrong with Hartwick's attitude. His colloquialisms struck a jarring note. I felt that he was forcing himself to assume a character role.

Then I realized that he must be humoring me.

All right. I was willing to be humored. I was willing to meet lovable old Doc Anton and spend a few days on his nut ranch, recuperating in a soft, downy straitjacket. I was willing to do anything if I could only go down into the black vortex again and forget. Perhaps when I snapped out of it I could figure the score. Something was rotten in Denmark, all right—but at the moment, I wasn't in condition to smell it.

"Here we are. Now pull yourself together, Dan."

The car stopped. I opened my eyes. We were parked at the head of an inner driveway. Behind us, a wide garden, sparkling in the afternoon sunlight. I caught a glimpse of high walls shielding the garden from the street.

Before us was a large, almost imposing brick house; three stories high, modern, but reminiscent of Colonial architecture.

Bunny rang the buzzer. The door opened. A tall man, dressed like an intern in the Dr. Kildare series, ushered us into a hall.

"Wait here," said Hartwick. "I'll talk to Doc."

I had a qualm. Of misgiving, naturally. A hell of a qualm. It made me tremble, jump forward, grab Hartwick by the lapels of the bright sports-coat. That was something, anyway—to feel solid flesh beneath my fingers. He wasn't a phantom.

"Bunny," I gasped. "It's all right, isn't it? You wouldn't kid a guy, would you?"

Hartwick smiled. "Sure it is. Take it easy, Dan." There was a normal light in his eyes, a reassuring smile. Could this be the same man who had whispered of obeying the voice from Mars?

Of course it couldn't. Because he hadn't whispered it—it was a figment of my imagination.

"You'll explain to this Doctor Anton? Tell him I'm not—"

"Sure. I'll stick by you. Just relax, now."

He turned to enter the room off the hall. I clutched his scarf.

"Don't go yet. I want to tell you—"

HE SHRUGGED me off. And I let go. My mouth closed suddenly, and my hands fell limply to my sides. I stared at his retreating figure and I couldn't move for a long time. I must have stood there for five minutes. All the while I was screaming—but I kept the scream inside my head.

I was very calm when the door opened and a soft voice said, "Please come in, Mr. Kenny."

I walked into the office-study of Doctor Anton and sat down. I was calmer than ever.

"You are Doctor Anton?" I asked. "Where is Mr. Hartwick?"

"He left by the other door."

"But—"

I never seemed to get a chance to finish my remarks any more. For Anton cut in. "I advised him to. I felt that it would be better if he did not see you again for a day or so. A painful association, no?" v

The "no?" caused me to look at Doctor Anton, scrutinize him carefully. I might be crazy, but I still was interested in good characters.

My scrutiny was well-rewarded. For Doctor Anton was definitely a type. He was a small, dark-haired little man, with a hyperthyroid bulge to his eyes.

Imagine Peter Lorre in a beard and you have Doctor Anton to the life. The accent, however, was missing. It was just as well. I had enough troubles without working Peter Lorre in on the deal.

"How do you feel?" asked Doctor Anton.

"Lousy," I replied. "It might help if you'd ask me to sit down and offer me a cigarette."

Anton chuckled and bustled around the desk. He indicated an armchair and pulled out a pack of straw-tipped Virginia Rounds.

"Mr. Hartwick has just told me an interesting story," he said, watching my fingers tremble as I lit a match.

"I'll bet he has," I answered.

"Naturally, I should be happy to hear the story in greater detail from your own lips," Doctor Anton told me. "That is, if you feel up to it."

"I'm up to it, all right," I snapped. The screaming had died away inside me. I knew now that I could speak with some conviction. So I did.

I told him. I began at the beginning and worked clear through to the end. Or almost to the end.

He sat there nodding and bobbing. He didn't take notes with a pencil, but my remarks were indelibly inscribed in his eyes. I told him about the drunken argument, the voice in my room, the visit of Hartwick, Hartwick's death, my trip to Bellevue, Hartwick's rescue.

Doctor Anton put his fingers together and pressed his left hand into his right in the best Charles Atlas manner. Dynamic tension and everything.

"I think I have a key to your—hallucinations," he told me. "Have you been working hard lately?"

That was my cue.

I let him have it right between the eyes.

"No. I haven't been working hard. And I haven't had any hallucinations. Throw your key away."

"What do you mean?"

"I thought I had hallucinations, until just a few minutes ago. Everybody wanted me to think I had them. I wanted to, myself.

"But now I know that everything I have told you actually happened. It's all true. About the voice from Mars, Hartwick's visit to me, and the—murder. I tell you, I killed Bunny Hartwick."

Doctor Anton leaned forward. His hand moved towards a buzzer, but I ignored that. Let him ring—I still meant to tell the truth.

“But Mr. Kenny, that’s impossible! Both of us saw Mr. Hartwick alive not fifteen minutes ago. He brought you here!”

“If he’s alive, then he’s a walking dead man,” I whispered.

“What do you mean?”

“He left me in the hall, to come in here. And I grabbed him to pull him back. I grabbed him by the neck, and his scarf came loose. I saw what that scarf concealed, Doctor Anton—Bunny Hartwick’s throat, cut from ear to ear!”

CHAPTER VI

AFTER that, of course, there was nothing left to do but lock me up.

It was a pleasant enough little room, if you don’t mind the bars on the windows. I was glad it was on the second floor. The two attendants had enough trouble dragging me up one flight of steps as it was. I was sorry for them, and sorry for Doctor Anton. Obviously he didn’t like these violent cases.

But he talked to me through the door and promised to bring Mr. Hartwick to see me, and yes, he would notify the authorities, and he himself would be up to see me tomorrow.

I guess I was ticketed for a hypo and the jacket, but a buzzer sounded in the hall and that seemed to mean something to both Anton and the gorillas who were wrestling with me on the bed.

They left in a hurry, and I stared at the twilight through the bars.

The struggle had been refreshing. I didn’t feel jittery any more. Telling the truth had brought emotional catharsis. Even though the truth was incredible.

Or was it? If you accepted the first principle—that a power from another world had entered this sphere—the rest was easy to take.

If Martian entities were indeed operating in a conspiracy to conquer the earth, then these developments were simple enough.

A voice had made me a proposition. Hartwick had vouched for its validity. Both voice and Hartwick told me that the Martian menace was real, unconquerable. I refused to play ball. I killed Hartwick.

Certainly, Martian science, Martian magic, Martian intelligence was probably equal to simple reanimation of the dead.

The invisible entity was in my room when Hartwick came this morning. I'd killed Hartwick, so naturally it upset plans a bit. The body had been removed, revived, and sent after me at Bellevue—for obvious reasons. It did not pay to have even a maniac babbling about a scheme of world conquest; particularly if the babbling could be tied up with the actual disappearance of a man implicated in the story.

Hartwick had to be revived, to make my story completely false. To prove that I was crazy—both to the authorities and to myself.

It was a sound scheme and it had almost worked—until I accidentally saw what was under the scarf.

Now I was here, a prisoner of Doctor Anton. Was he in on the scheme? If so, why hadn't he killed me already? Or—to make it mote interesting—how soon would he kill me?

I had a lot to think about during the next two hours. I thought on my feet, testing the bars on the windows and tugging at the door.

Definitely, I had a growing feeling that I wanted out.

But bars and door were more immovable than my determination.

Well, there I was. Strictly on ice in a private laughing-academy. What to do?

What would one of my heroes do under similar circumstances? Bend the bars, I suppose. But not for me—I couldn't write myself a grip of steel. As for battering down the door with my shoulder, that wouldn't work either. All I had in my shoulders was the padding put there by the tailors.

Besides, there was nothing very heroic about my actions up to now. I'd blundered into this mess like a dumb cluck, and only made it worse by acting without deliberation. If I'd had a brain in my skull, I'd never have told Doctor Anton the truth. On thinking it over, perhaps he wasn't in league with the Martians after all. In which case, if I'd only behave, he might release me after I became "normal" and "rational" again.

That was probably the best out. For me.

But was it the best out for—humanity?

After all, I knew. Perhaps I was the only man alive who did know of the existence of this thing, this threat hanging over the world. The only man alive who wasn't a part of the conspiracy and still had the facts.

IT WAS my hunch that I wouldn't be alive much longer. Moreover, it was my hunch that the "plan", whatever it was would be breaking soon. The blow might fall. If they could reanimate the dead; if they had leagued themselves with the best human brains and were employing human help—then the blow might fall swiftly.

The only way to prevent that was to get out of here.

How?

Maybe I wasn't so hot on the brute force angle, but I could use brains. Heroes sometimes use their brains, don't they? It all depends on editorial requirements, I guess. Hartwick was the kind of an editor who liked his heroes to use brains.

But I didn't care to think about Bunny Hartwick right now.

I began to plot. What about the old gag of luring an attendant in here by some ruse, then overpowering him and stealing the keys?

Out. That took muscles again, and my experience with the two gorillas had taught me I couldn't hope to win. Of course, in the usual story pattern, I'd bop the attendant over the head with a blunt instrument. Only Doctor Anton didn't believe in leaving blunt instruments around in his deep-freeze units for cuckoos. My room contained an iron bed, an iron dresser, and an iron chair, all bolted to the floor. The wash-stand in the corner was also a permanent fixture.

Wait a minute, now!

I bent and examined the washstand carefully. Sure enough, it had one of those gimmicks in the drain-pipe underneath. I've lost my plumber's union card, and I don't know what you call them, but there was a removable section of the drain-pipe which I could unscrew with my fingers. I did so. In a few minute's I was hefting about four inches of hollow steel, thick and heavy enough to dent the close-cropped skull of any attendant I'd seen.

Now to move over to the door and start a-whooping and a-hollering . . .

I moved over to the door, took a deep breath, and opened my mouth.

Then I let the air out with a gasp.

For a key clicked in the lock, the door opened swiftly and silently, then closed quickly.

A girl stood in my room.

"Shhh!" she whispered. "They're after me!"

CHAPTER VII

EVEN in a bedraggled and much-wrinkled housedress, I saw that she was a very pretty blonde.

I wouldn't have cared if she was a Hottentot.

"You're Dan Kenny?" she whispered.

I shook my head, up and down, up and down. It didn't look so good with my mouth open, so I stopped.

"Come away from the door," she murmured. "I want to talk to you."

"It would be a pleasure," I said.

"But why not wait until we get outside?"

"We can't go outside," she told me. "I've only got the key for this floor. Besides, I'm not so sure I want to go outside just yet. Not until I know."

"Know what?"

"That's why I want to talk to you. To find out whether or not I'm crazy."

"You might ask Doctor Anton about that," I suggested.

The blonde began to tremble. She sat down on the bed and her shoulders moved up and down in a hysterical rhythm.

"Not—him. He's a fiend."

I was glad to hear it. It sounded so reassuring.

But there were other things I had to hear.

"How did you get out?" I muttered.

"You mean—escape?" The girl looked up. She had brown eyes, a snub nose, even a few freckles. A sweet kid. In fact, one of the sweetest I'd ever met in a looney-bin.

"I noticed that there's a detachable section of pipe under my washstand," she told me. "So—"

"—you took the pipe, stirred up a rumpus until an attendant came in, and batted him over the head. Then you stole his key."

She almost smiled. "How did you know?" she asked.

"I was going to do it myself," I answered. And I did smile. Maybe she was nuttier than a fruitcake, but I admired her ingenuity. Great minds run in the same channels, and all that sort of thing.

Speaking of great minds—

"How did you know my name?" I asked.

"I heard Doctor Anton talking down the hall," she answered. "He said you had come here with a story about hearing a voice from Mars, and when I heard that I knew I must talk to you. At once. I must warn you, because I think they will try to kill you soon. Don't let him hypnotize you, whatever you do, and if the voice comes again, don't listen to it."

She got this out in about ten seconds flat. I took her arm and squeezed, hard. "Easy does it," I said. "Relax!" She blinked, but her breathing gradually subsided. I listened until the respiration sounded normal, then proceeded gently.

"Let's take it slow," I began. "Why do you think Doctor Anton would try to kill me?"

"Because you've heard the voice."

"Have you heard it too?" I asked. "Yes. I've heard it. Now I know. Up until I learned about you, I thought it was all part of my—symptoms. I thought I was crazy and there was no voice? Don't you see? If we both heard the voice, the same voice telling the same things, then we can't be crazy. And then the rest wasn't a delusion, either. It really happened to me, all of it. And that means—"

"What happened to you?" I asked. "From the beginning, now."

I LISTENED to her with one ear, the other intent for sounds in the hall outside. All was quiet, and her whispered words traced a pattern in the twilight around us. The pattern took shape, grew. I didn't like the shape, or the growth.

But I listened.

"My name is Muriel Esterly. I am—was—superintendent in the Martha Peterson Orphan's Home. It's a private orphanage and school."

Orphanage? Who had told me something about an orphanage? I tried to think, then abandoned my evocative efforts to listen.

"We have about forty boys. It's small. Doctor Parrish is in charge of it, really; I'm just an assistant. And of course, I teach in the school. That's where the trouble started—in class. When they began writing things on the blackboard."

"Who?"

"Some of the boys. It had to be some of the boys. Though where those children—they're only ten or eleven years old, the oldest of them—ever got such ideas—"

"What did they write?"

"I don't know."

"Don't know?"

"I mean, I've never seen things like that. Some kind of picture writing. You won't understand when I tell you, but it frightened me to look at it. Because is wasn't just childish scribbling. It wasn't the stick-arm art that children always attempt with chalk. And it wasn't Egyptian or Indian or anything like that. I know, because I looked it up.

"But I'd come into the classroom in the morning and find those scrawls on the board. Whole series of them—lines and curlicues interspersed with figures. Figures of men with extra arms, and a sun and moon in conjunction, and pictures of animals and knives—I'm not telling this very well, but there was something wrong about those drawings. They were arranged. They formed a definite pattern. You couldn't look at them without knowing that they were a message."

"Message?"

"Yes. A cipher code message, a whole blackboard-full. Written in a language no child's mind could invent, but scrawled in a childish hand. As though one boy were telling all the others something which we grownups were not meant to hear."

"Did you—?"

Muriel Esterly anticipated my question with an impatient twitch of her blonde curls. "Of course. I tried everything. Some of my best boys were called in. I treated it as a game. But they were absolutely adamant. I couldn't get any of them to admit that they knew who did it. And they wouldn't even admit that it had been done! In fact, one of the boys told me that there was simply nothing on the blackboards at all!

"That was the beginning. I asked Doctor Parrish, of course. I invited him to come in with me, on the fifth day, to see for himself.

"He did! And when we entered the classroom that morning, the blackboard was empty!

"They had erased it. I tried to show Doctor Parrish the marks of erasure—but of course it didn't prove that these queer figures had been erased. He looked at me rather strangely and went out.

"And the boys laughed. Later that day I told Mr. Hartwick, and he laughed, too."

Hartwick!

IT CAME back to me, then. That first evening—God, was it only twenty-four hours ago?—he had been trying to talk to me seriously. What was it he had said when I cut him off and announced my departure?

"For example, I recently ran across a woman who runs an orphanage and she told me—"

So Hartwick figured in this matter, too! Whatever Muriel Esterly was about to reveal, I knew she wasn't crazy. I listened intently.

"Mr. Hartwick is a friend of Doctor Parrish. He's an editor of a chain of magazines here in town. You know, those nauseating, lurid blood-and-thunder things."

I knew, and I winced at the description. Sitting here in a madhouse, she was denouncing fantasy magazines to me! Life's little jokes, number 131313.

"He comes to visit Doctor Parrish quite often, and brings stacks of his magazines for the children. Naturally, I don't approve of such literature for the young, but Doctor Parrish doesn't object, so he passes them out regularly. The children are quite fond of him."

I didn't think they'd be so fond of him from now on. A man walking around with his throat cut isn't likely to win many popularity contests. But I kept my ears open and my mouth shut.

"Mr. Hartwick was quite interested. He didn't seem to think it at all odd when I told him about the blackboard writing. So that encouraged me to tell him about the other things I was beginning to notice. The games, for instance.

"During the recess periods and the yard-play after school, I'd happen by and see that some of the boys were playing strange games."

"Strange? How do you mean?" Her hands fluttered helplessly. They didn't flutter like wounded birds. They fluttered like hands, helplessly.

"I can't explain it at all well. Except that when you're around children a lot, you make it your business to know them, you subconsciously come to know the games they play. Hide-and-seek, Red Light, all the others. But now some of them were playing new games. They would squat on all fours and run around the yard while others followed them and kicked at them.

"For a while I suspected that the squatting ones were emulating prisoners-at-war, but I soon discovered my error. Because they were talking queerly, too. Gibberish. Utter gibberish. But gibberish that sounded like those blackboard scribbles looked."

It was a poor sentence, but I caught the thought. Caught it and didn't like it.

"Then, all at once I realized the truth. Realized that whatever they were doing, it wasn't play. They didn't smile or laugh or shout. They were serious, and they whispered. They were learning something."

That's where Muriel broke down.

I consoled her and shook her and listened, all at the same time.

"I can't tell you," she sobbed. "It just got worse and worse. They wouldn't talk to me any more, none of them would. And at night they would whistle and the whistles were signals. Doctor Parrish thought there was something wrong with me. They hid it from him, of course.

"But I told Mr. Hartwick and he seemed to understand. That is, until I came to the part about the voices."

This was what I was waiting for, too. I paid close attention.

"You see, I had to know what was going on. So the night before, I waited until they were all in bed for the night, up in the big dormitory. Then I climbed up to the transom and eavesdropped. You see, I thought that if somebody had introduced a secret society or a 'club' of some kind, they might hold a meeting after lights were out. They might talk then.

"But all I heard was a lot of whispering sounds, and then a sobbing. The sobbing suddenly became a shriek. I looked over the transom and saw them. There were five or six around one bed and they were—they were trying to kill Peter!"

It was the cue for another breakdown, but she controlled herself. Watching her swallow I said to myself, this girl has guts. And answered, inwardly, she'll probably need them!

Aloud, I said, “Peter is one of the boys?”

“Yes. A special favorite of mine. He’s only eight, and the cutest little towhead. But—”

A LOOK came back into her eyes, a quaver came into her voice, and she went on, slowly. “They had him down on the bed, and Tommy, he’s the oldest, almost twelve, was swinging a water-pitcher at his head, and I jumped down and jerked open the door, and they scuttled away and I picked Peter up and—”

She couldn’t stop until I grabbed her shoulders.

“I know,” I whispered. “It must have been pretty dreadful.”

“I carried Peter, still sobbing, into my own room. And he told me about the voice. Doctor Parrish wasn’t in, yet, or he would have heard it, too.

“They were killing Peter because he wouldn’t obey the voice, he said. What voice? The voice that came into the room every night and whispered to them while they were asleep. It was a voice from another world, and it promised them things. Promised them that if they learned certain things now, they would grow up to be big and strong and powerful. The voice told them that it would come down and play with them. But it couldn’t come unless they would go to sleep and let it in.

“I asked Peter what he meant by letting it in, and he said that Tommy and lots of the other boys let it into them, so that when they woke up in the middle of the night, for a little while they would act strange, as though the voice were inside of them. Then they would go down and write on the blackboard and they would wake up the others and tell them about new games to play and teach them to talk in a funny way. After that they wouldn’t remember anything about it—about the voice being part of them, that is.”

Muriel glanced up. “Do you know what he was trying to tell me?” she whispered.

“Yes,” I said. “Demoniac possession. The entrance of another spirit into the body of a small child.”

“Do you understand how I felt then?” the girl panted. “Hearing these things from the lips of an eight-year-old boy? It was mad, it was fantastic—but they’d tried to kill him because he wouldn’t join in.

“He wouldn’t learn the language, or the games, or the signals. He’d threatened to tell me. And so they were going to kill him. Do you understand?”

“I understand.”

“Mr. Hartwick didn’t. He looked at me very strangely. Then he mumbled something and went off to speak to Doctor Parrish. I wanted to see Doctor Parrish myself, before the day’s classwork began. I wanted to tell him about Peter, who had slept the rest of the night in my bed. I don’t know what I expected him to do—but I knew we had to do something.

“So I followed Mr. Hartwick and broke in on his meeting in Doctor Parrish’s study. And I told Doctor Parrish just what I’m telling you, now.

“They kept looking at each other, and then Mr. Hartwick suggested we go and find Peter.

“We did. But Peter wasn’t in my room. He was in class, with the other boys. And when we went in everything was all right. Do you hear me? Peter was smiling and happy, and when I asked him to tell us about last night he laughed, and when I repeated my story in front of him he said I was lying, and Tommy and the other boys all said I was lying. They said there were no games, and no whistles or signals and no blackboard writing or anything.

“So Mr. Hartwick said perhaps I’d better come along here with him and meet Doctor Anton.”

I FROWNED into the darkness. The rest I knew. She had come here and they had convinced her that she was screwy and locked her up. Here we were. Two birds in a gilded cage.

"At first Doctor Anton was very kind and polite. He let me go downstairs to eat with the orderlies—there are three of them here, you know.

"But after I heard the voice, everything changed."

"You actually heard the voice?"

"Yes. It came at night, to my room. It whispered to me a lot of things about Mars."

Right back where I started again. Mars.

"Let me tell you now," I suggested. So I told her that the voice had whispered that her suspicions at the orphanage were correct. Something was talking to the kids, something was even taking temporary possession of their bodies. Entities from Mars were planning to conquer the earth. And part of that plan involved the training of children. Get them while they're young. Get orphans, without family ties. Train them for the new world to come. Teach them the language, the secrets, the elementary principles of the new science, the new magic.

This last was just a guess. But she nodded.

"And it offered you a chance to participate, didn't it?" I asked. "And you refused. So you told Doctor Anton and he locked you up."

"Not just yet." Muriel whispered hoarsely and leaned forward. "First he hypnotized me. When he learned that I had refused, he hypnotized me. At the time I believed him when he said he was trying a psychiatric technique. Now, of course, I know that he was in league with the voices. Because he hypnotized me and made me do something."

"Do what?"

Muriel turned away. "I can't tell you that. But after it was done, he locked me up.

"I thought I was crazy, until I heard him talking about you tonight, in the hall. And now—"

"What's that?"

Footsteps sounded outside. They didn't halt before my door, but padded on down the hall.

"I must go," the girl gasped. "I'll slip the key back in his pocket."

"Leave this door unlocked," I commanded. "I'll come for you after awhile."

She nodded, raced across the room, and whirled out in the darkness. A second later I heard the lock click again. She'd locked me in.

"Muriel!" I whispered. "Come back."

The hall without was utterly silent. The girl was gone. Somewhere up the corridor a voice began to howl. A laughing hyena joined in the chorus from upstairs. In a moment the place was shaking beneath the ululating impact of madness given tongue.

I went back to the iron bed, threw myself down on the sagging mattress, and drifted off to dreamland as my demented companions gibbered their serenade.

CHAPTER VIII

"WAKE up!" The voice barked in my ear. A hand shook my shoulder. I blinked, opened my eyes to the sunlight.

A fine hero I was. Instead of quickening into life at the first intimation of a tread outside my door, I let a heavy-footed attendant lumber into my room and grab me around the neck without even becoming conscious.

I woke up now with a start as the attendant bent over me and mumbled, "How about some breakfast?"

It wasn't a bad idea, at that.

He brought in a tray, propped it up against my knees, then sat down in the iron chair and watched me eat.

I breakfasted, wondering whether or not to reach under my pillow, drag out my pipe, and part his hair with it.

Better not. Muriel had said that they only carried keys for the rooms of a single floor. Somebody would be waiting downstairs, in all probability, to block my exit. Besides, if I left now, what would happen to the girl? More important, what would happen to me?

I'd be free, for a while, but the moment I tried to tell my story I'd get the same reception I received from the hotel dick or the boys at Bellevue.

No, there was only one way out of this mess. I had to get to Doctor Anton and make him sing.

How?

The attendant stood up, scratching a bristly chin. He yawned, blinked, shuffled his feet. An engaging performance all around.

"Come on," he said. "Doctor Anton wants to see you now."

I almost kissed him. Then I remembered the bristly chin and let it go. But I did flash him a great big smile.

"Let's go," I said, climbing out of bed. My clothes were a trifle wrinkled, but he didn't offer any valet service. Doctor Anton would have to endure my sartorial disarray somehow. And a few other things, too.

We took a stroll down the hall. I tried to sneak a look into the other cells as we passed, but I seemed to have mislaid my X-ray vision this morning. I didn't see Muriel, or the hyena boys of last night's concert.

We tripped lightly down the stairs, and there I was, back in Anton's office once more. The attendant closed the door behind me, and locked it. I made a dive for the desk.

Then another door opened, I jammed the desk drawer shut, and dived for a chair. I was sitting very quietly as Doctor Anton stepped into the room.

Anton wore a new white jacket, but he still had the same old beard. He had the same old smile, too, but it didn't impress me so favorably today.

"How do you feel this morning, Mr. Kenny?" asked Anton, as he sat down and went into his finger-pressing exercises.

"Very well, thank you."

The fingers intertwined on the desktop.

"And how did you enjoy your little visit with Miss Esterley?"

I gulped. "Uh—oh, that."

Doctor Anton shrugged. "I'm sorry about that, Mr. Kenny. She wouldn't have bothered you if it hadn't been for a bit of carelessness on the part of one of my orderlies. I have taken steps to see that there will be no more such carelessness."

This I could well imagine. But I said nothing.

"A pitiful case, that girl." Doctor Anton didn't look as though he thought it was so pitiful. Delusions of persecution, you know."

"She sounded sane enough to me," I answered.

"Sane? But my dear sir, she's a murderess, and—"

"Murderess?"

"Oh, didn't she tell you that?" Anton got up and reached around to open the top drawer of a file, labelled A-F.

"It happened after she came here," said Doctor Anton, rummaging around in the files. "She escaped, went back to the orphanage, and killed a little boy named Peter."

I KNEW it was a lie. But at the same time I remembered something Muriel had told me at the last. "He hypnotized me and made me do something."

"Do what?" I had asked. And her answer, "I can't tell you that. But after it was done, he locked me up."

This exchange moved through my memory as Doctor Anton went on talking.

"Fortunately, your friend Hartwick was on hand when the—tragedy—occurred. He understood and showed remarkable presence of mind. Instead of turning her over to the authorities, he brought her back here. You see, she was not responsible, poor girl. Here she can be cured. But the shock of arrest, a trial, and subsequent incarceration in a state asylum would permanently derange her. I do not hold with the methods employed in state institutions."

I was willing to bet he didn't. Doctor Anton had his own methods, and the state institutions wouldn't care for them, either.

"So that's what happened," I said.

"That's what happened." Doctor Anton smiled, sorrowfully, wistfully.

I was just as wistful as I stared at him. “The hell it did,” I told him. “Muriel Esterley never killed anyone in her life. You hypnotized her, allowed her to escape, planted the suggestion in her mind that sent her to the orphanage. She probably believed she was killing somebody—you’d see to that. And Hartwick didn’t just “happen” to show up there and bring her back, either. It was all part of your damned scheming. Nobody died, Doctor Anton.”

“Oh, didn’t they?” He turned from the file, extended a newspaper clipping.

“TRAGEDY AT ORPHANAGE” I read. The story was simple. Peter Ericson, age eight, found strangled in room of Muriel Esterley, former assistant superintendent . . . Miss Esterley had been missing for a week . . . police seeking clue as to her whereabouts . . .

There was a lot of it. And it made me shake.

“You see?” shrugged Doctor Anton.

“Yeah. I see. And it doesn’t prove a thing. If the child died, you killed him. Or Hartwick. Or one of the others. And arranged it so that the police—and Muriel—would believe she had done it. You can stick that newspaper clipping in your files, Doctor Anton. I’ve found out what I wanted to know. You’re in on this Martian deal, like the others.”

Anton sat down. He began his finger-pressing act once more.

“I’m sorry to hear that, Kenny. Yesterday you had some delusions about a voice from Mars and Mr. Hartwick. Another persecution complex. Today your condition seems to be worse. Now I am included in your list of imaginary enemies. I am afraid there is only one thing to do. We must resort to psychotherapeutic technique. A little mild hypnosis—”

“You want me to kill somebody, too?” I grated. “To hell with that noise.”

The answer lacked dignity, but carried conviction.

“You can’t hypnotize me unless I am willing to cooperate,” I told him. “And I’m not cooperating. I’m not going to touch any food, either. You can’t shoot any dope into me. I’m on guard now, Anton. You can’t harm me.”

“Oh no?” The hands stopped playing. A pudgy finger pressed a buzzer. The assistants would be on their way in a moment—

I PULLED a gun out of my pocket and showed it to Doctor Anton. He examined it curiously, noting that the muzzle was directed at his fat little belly.

“Found his in your desk drawer before you came in,” I explained. “It seems to be loaded. When your gang gets here, I’d advise you to shout at them through the door and tell them not to disturb us.”

Anton looked into my eyes, looked into the muzzle of the gun, sighed, nodded, and fell silent. Footsteps echoed outside the door.

“It’s all right,” he called. “I don’t need you.”

The footsteps moved off.

Anton shrugged. “Now what do you intend to do?” he asked.

“You are coming with me,” I ordered. “You will release Miss Esterley and myself. The three of us will step down to police headquarters and I’m going to do the talking.”

Doctor Anton stood up. “Very well. But I must warn you. It isn’t exactly safe for you to enter police headquarters. You forget that you’re a murderer yourself.”

“What do you mean?”

“You killed Mr. Hartwick. Bunny Hartwick.”

I gasped. “Wait a minute. Yesterday you pointed out to me that Hartwick was alive. You said I couldn’t have killed him, because he brought me here. You said it was a delusion. You said—”

“That does not matter. Would you be convinced if I showed you the body?”

“Yes,” I whispered. “But no funny stuff.”

Doctor Anton moved toward the second door. I had the gun ready. I was prepared for any trap lying beyond that doorway. None of these damfool hero blunders for me. I’d written too many to be taken in by one just now.

We entered the room beyond. It was, at first glance, a small laboratory with closets lining the walls. Then, as I stared more closely at the stone slab serving as a table, I revised my judgment. This was no private laboratory—it was a private dissecting room and morgue!

I had been prepared for any trap, but not for this. Not for this, lying cold and stiff on the table, lying cold and stiff in death, with the handle of the paper-knife still buried in the throat.

Rigid with rigor mortis, the body of Bunny Hartwick lay stretched on the stone table, and I met the ghastly grin of the man I killed!

CHAPTER IX

I DIDN'T grin back.

There are limits you know. First I was crazy, then I wasn't crazy—it had been going on this way for thirty hours. The hand holding the gun began to tremble. I looked at it. But I couldn't make it stop trembling. The gun wobbled.

"Put it down," murmured Doctor Anton.

I put it down.

"Look at me," said Anton.

I looked at him.

Now I'd told him myself it couldn't be done. According to all the orthodox tenets of medical science, one human being cannot hypnotize another human being against his will.

I was confident of that. But—

"Look at my eyes," Doctor Anton whispered. "Look into my eyes. Look deeply."

And I looked.

For the first time I really stared at Anton's hyperthyroid eyes, and as he directed, I looked into them.

I saw . . . the voice.

The shell, the body, was Anton. But I saw the voice. And I heard the voice.

Behind those eyes was an incredible emptiness that was not empty, a silence that was not still, an absence that constituted a presence. Enigma, but a chilling, compelling enigma.

I began to understand, now. Doctor Anton was a masquerader. Hartwick must have been one, too. In reality it was the entity, the voice. I began to understand, but went no further.

For the eyes held me, transfixed my gaze, transfixed my thought.

One human being cannot hypnotize another against his will—but what was hypnotizing me was not a human being!

My body fell away. Anton's body fell away. The room fell away. There was only my brain, and those eyes. The eyes of the entity, boring into my being. The roaring around me was the mighty sussuration of empty space through which I plunged.

I felt the weight of a force—a force strong enough to conquer earth—directed against my psyche. And I succumbed. I knew that the voice was speaking, somewhere, and that my body was moving out of the room. We were climbing stairs, walking down the corridor of the second floor. Doctor Anton had the gun and he was leading me—but both Anton and I were just pictures. The real Anton, the real me, were still locked in a battle of eye and brain.

And now we were in a room and there was somebody else there, too, and a hand belonging to Anton's body was putting a gun in a hand belonging to my body, and a voice was telling me to shoot the other occupant of the room, and all the while the eyes and brain hung out there, a million miles away in roaring space. So that it did not matter what my body was doing at all—nothing mattered as long as I was away out there—and I raised the gun—

Empty space split asunder under the echo of the shot. The reeling universe dissolved as the eyes winked out. My brain hurtled back a million miles into my skull.

I opened my eyes.

Muriel Esterley stood at my side. In her hand she held the gun she'd snatched from between my fingers. A wisp of smoke coiled from the muzzle. Muriel was staring at the door.

The white-coated figure of Doctor Anton was stumbling out into the hall. A growing red stain had appeared between the shoulders.

There were little crimson stains on the floor, too—

"Dan! Are you all right?" gasped the girl.

"Yeah. What happened?"

"You came in with him and he gave you a gun. He told you to shoot me. He kept staring at you and you looked as if you were walking in your sleep. You took the gun and pointed it at me. I grabbed it from your hand and pointed it at Doctor Anton, and it went off."

"Hold it!" I grabbed her and shook her shoulders until her eyes opened again. Then I turned. "Come on. He went down the hall."

We followed. How Doctor Anton had ever made it down the stairs I'll never know. When we found him, back in the private morgue, there was a hole in his chest big enough to hold a cannon ball.

He'd slumped down on the floor next to the stone slab, and he was dead, quite dead. In fact, he was a little worse than dead. His skin was blue and cold—blue and cold as if he had been dead for months rather than minutes.

The thought hit me then. "Maybe he has. Maybe he has."

Then I turned away. I had to consider Muriel. Standing there, probably looking at the body of Hartwick up on the table—

I glanced at her. She was quite calm. Good girl. She looked at the stone slab stolidly.

I looked, too. But not stolidly.

For Bunny Hartwick's body was gone!

CHAPTER X

IT WAS lucky I sent her out of the room. “Search the files,” I commanded, hoarsely. “Dig up everything you think will be interesting. I’ll look in here.”

She left.

She could search for documents. I had other things to search for.

Those closets, now. Hartwick’s body must be in one of the closets lining the walls.

I opened the nearest one.

A body fell out.

It wasn’t Hartwick. It was the corpse of a woman in her early forties. She was wearing a tweed suit. She had been dead for perhaps a month. There was a refrigeration unit coil in the closet, and that had helped.

I opened another closet, and another. I found bodies all right. Eight of them. They were propped-up, glassy-eyed, cold as mackerel. Six men and two women. I didn’t recognize any of them. I didn’t care to be introduced, either.

There was a picture running through my brain, leaving its ghastly little footprints behind to scar my sanity. A picture of Doctor Anton standing in this room, with the closet doors open, looking at the bodies lined up against the refrigeration coils. Looking at them, and picking out a choice. The way a man chooses a suit, or a woman selects a hat. “Which body shall I wear today? My business body or my sports body, or just a casual body to lie around in.”

It was like something out of the Oz books. For my money, it could just as well have stayed in them.

But here I was, and here Hartwick wasn’t. I knew, now. The dying shell of Anton had dragged itself down here in order to transfer the entity to Hardwick’s body. Hartwick’s body had gone forth again into the world.

I looked around the room. Cased the joint. Saw that it was built for my purpose. Then I did something, and ran out of there, slamming the door behind me.

Muriel rose from her inspection of files and desk.

"These files are empty, blank," she exclaimed. "Just this—" And she looked away as she held out the orphanage clipping. I took it, crumpled it up. "Never mind. I've seen it. It's a fake." I hoped my voice carried conviction.

"These files are a blind, then," I went on. "He—or it—must carry all the information in his head. But where did he keep the dope on all the patients?"

"There are no patients."

"What?"

"I was the only one. I know. Those attendants told me."

"But last night—I heard them howling—"

"The attendants did that. When I got back, the fellow I'd hit had come to. He tied me down and went out. I could see them down the hall, talking to Anton. Then they went and howled before your door. To fool you. You see, this isn't a real sanatorium at all."

I SAW, all right. I wondered if some of the bodies in the other room had once belonged to actual patients.

"Where are they now?" I snapped.

"The attendants? I think they've gone." Muriel nodded. "The noise would have brought them in long before this."

"Good. Then I won't have to warn anybody, if the joint is empty."

"Warn them about what?"

"I've just set fire to this dump." I pointed at the door. Smoke was already curling out from under it.

I grabbed Muriel's elbow. "Let's go," I said. "We must get out of here."

She grabbed something from the desk.

"What's this?"

"A diary, I think. I found it in the desk drawer. There was nothing else."

"Good. Come on, then."

I stopped once, in the hall, to set fire to some drapes.

Muriel didn’t ask me why I was burning the place down. She didn’t need to.

We managed the lock on the front door and headed down the walk. But the gateway door proved impossible as a means of egress.

Smoke had begun to billow from the windows of the left wing.

“Around the back,” I panted. I led her across the lawn, through the back yard. Weeds choked the lawn. Evidently the grounds had not been tended for a long time.

One patch of earth, down in the corner, was curiously bare. The grass was seared away in a wide swath, and within the swath, ploughed earth was scarred and blackened as though a pit had been dug and a fire built within it. But there was no charcoal. Looking closely, I seemed to see a series of convolutions whorling the sides of the pit, as though something had bored down and into the earth.

Then Muriel hurried me along. We reached a latched gate in the high wall at the back. The gate was locked. The lock was rusty. I was desperate.

The lock broke, and my fingers nearly followed suit. But then we were out, and running down a pathway through a vacant stretch of wooded land. We reached a road and crossed it, ran down another street. Smoke smudged the horizon behind us. The place was burning, and I was glad.

The bodies—the bodies used in a grisly masquerade—were gone forever. But Hartwick still walked . . .

CHAPTER XI

WE SAT there as dawn filtered into the dingy double room of a cheap hotel downtown. Our faces loomed pallid in the sickly light, but we felt no weariness. There was only a gnawing dread and a strange strength born of panic.

Muriel looked at me. “I don’t understand it,” she said. “There’s nothing wrong with that diary. Nothing at all. Doctor Anton talks about his daily work quite openly, and about his patients, too. But we know he had no daily work and no patients. It doesn't add up."

"Yes it does," I said. "The last entry in that diary is dated two months ago."

Muriel's eyes registered blue bewilderment.

"Don't you get it? Two months ago, Doctor Anton died. Two months ago the entity—whatever it is and whenever it came from—killed Anton and entered his body.

"The patients were gotten rid of in a hurry. That private sanatorium became the lair of the voice from Mars. We must presuppose intelligence transcending all mundane order; intelligence great enough immediately to orient itself on earth. The voice in Anton's body passed itself off as human, masqueraded as Anton.

"Now we can gradually see a pattern. This entity's plan—as announced to us—involved the conquest of the earth. He must have contacted Hartwick, and others. At least, Hartwick told me so, when he was still—alive.

"What the plan is, we still cannot guess, but there are hints. Gradually the entity was seeking to build up a group of human allies. Renegades like Hartwick, and weak, susceptible minds—like your orphans."

"You mean?"

I told her about my theory of the orphanage being used as a sort of "training school" for the implantation of alien ideas.

Then I broke down and told her about the bodies I'd found.

She took it calmly.

"Now we can see that it was playing a double game with Hartwick and the others. Trying to make them believe that it was not one, but many creatures. By changing bodies frequently, it gave the illusion of having many human allies already. And probably, wearing the different forms at different times, it approached a number of groups and individuals—just as it tried to approach me.

"What happened to me is intelligible now. The voice must have come from the fire-escape, after all. One of those bodies housed it as it whispered to me in my drunken stupor.

"The next day, when Hartwick visited me, the entity must have accompanied it in a human body, lurking in the background to await the outcome of our interview.

"When I accidentally killed Hartwick, the entity left its other human body and entered his, in order to remove it as evidence from the hotel room.

"When I went to Bellevue, the entity—now posing as Hartwick—brought me to the sanatorium. Remember, I didn't see Hartwick and Anton together. Hartwick went into the office and Anton came out to greet me, saying my friend had left by another door. In reality, the entity switched bodies in the morgue room.

"Obviously, after you escaped and talked to me, both of us were ticketed to die. The entity hypnotised me, and I almost shot you. I suppose I'd have been turned over to the police if it had worked out that way.

"Instead, you killed Anton's body and the entity managed to enter Hartwick's and escape."

I SHUT up, then. I was fully conscious that this was no time to be making with the logical explanations—with the whole outcome of the story in midair.

The outcome of the story, hell! What interested me was a much more vital matter—what was going to happen to us with that thing still loose on the world?

Muriel wasn't helpful.

"But I still don't understand," she sighed. "Where did the entity come from? How did it enter into Anton's body? What plan has it for conquering the world?"

I grunted. "Continued next week," I said. But the questions haunted me. I had the usual visions of the destructions of the earth. The Empire State Building falling down. The blowing up of the White House. An army of rocket-ships descending from Mars, and the warriors of the Red Planet—a bunch of crimson spider-men with goggled eyes—rushing around in the ruins and grabbing up a lot of half-naked women for souvenirs.

I would be somewhere in the background, a damp forelock plastered against my brow as I operated a ray-gun and tried to save Muriel from the clutches of a green monstrosity with three heads—Ex-pectah-Rayt, High Priest of Spitoon.

Such was my vision. But it was blotted out by an uglier reality.

Hartwick. Hartwick's body, gaunt and white, striding about the streets on a mission of death. Killing again and again, until it had many more bodies to enter. Finding a new lair, spinning a new web. Growing and growing, aided by misguided human tools. Gradually finding men in key spots, usurping positions in our highly mechanized world until a few hundred slaves in the right places, throwing the right monkey-wrenches simultaneously into the right machines at the right time, could actually plunge the planet into chaos.

The earth could really be conquered, that way. It was simple—if you transfer bodies at will. And with human help, it could be done soon. In a few weeks, perhaps.

And it would be done, unless—

"We've got to figure this out," I stormed.

"We can't go to the police." Muriel's voice broke. She was thinking of the clipping, of Pete—

"That's out," I snapped, hastily. "No, there's only the two of us, against it. Against whatever is in Hartwick's body."

I stopped. Then I said it again.

"Hartwick's body!"

"Yes?"

"Where would that body go now?"

"Why—"

"To the orphanage, of course. Don't you see? It will go back to the Martha Peterson Orphan's Home and start anew from there. That's its other base, its other lair."

"But why do you think it will go there?"

I stared at Muriel. I had to say it, but the words nearly choked me. "Because it thinks we will go there. And before it can go on, it must dispose of us. It will go to the orphanage to kill us.

"And when it comes—we must be there!"

CHAPTER XII

BRIGHT morning sunshine streamed into Muriel's private office at the Orphan's Home. I sat at the desk, trying to find a gun or a paper-knife, or something. Right now, it looked as though I'd have to fight my battle with a hairpin and two erasers.

"I wish Doctor Parrish were here," said Muriel.

"Lucky he isn't or we'd never have sneaked in," I grunted. "Never mind that. Arrange those flowers. We haven't any time to lose."

"But these flowers—"

"Do as I say," I snapped. "And don't interrupt. I'm thinking out loud. I plot better that way."

Muriel bent over the yellow blooms as I mumbled to, myself.

"One point is definite. There is one, and only one entity, and it's in Hartwick's body. I've got to count on that.

"Secondly, it appears the entity can change bodies only if the corpse it enters is newly dead or preserved in some way.

"Thirdly, and most important—in order to make a change, the two bodies must be in the same room. When Anton's body was shot, the entity had to drag the dying form downstairs until it was in the same room as Hartwick's corpse. Why? Obviously because the entity cannot survive in a bodiless state, and the exchange must be made at once.

"This same example would tend to prove that if you were to kill a dead body housing the entity—kill it again, that is—the entity cannot remain in it. It must seek another corpse at once. That's important.

"Now, when Hartwick comes here—if I only had a gun—"

"What would you do?"

I whirled. Muriel whirled. The room whirled.

The corpse of Bunny Hartwick stood in the doorway. I saw the gun I had been searching for—in Hartwick's hand.

It directed the two of us to the center of the room. We stood posed against the background of yellow blooms.

Hartwick's corpse shut the door. We were trapped. The small room was close, stuffy. A heavy scent filled the air. It came from the flowers—and from the corpse.

I began thinking of all the stories I'd read or written, where the villain holds the hero at bay with a gun. He usually begins to gloat over them and spill his guts about what a clever guy he is. Then the hero pulls a blackjack, or the cops arrive in the nick of time.

Only the cops weren't coming, and I had no blackjack—and the thing in Hartwick's body wasn't willing to play ball. I saw a cold, dead forefinger squeeze against the trigger—

"Wait a minute!" I gasped. If it wouldn't talk, I'd have to. I began to tell it, in a few words, just what I knew; knew and guessed.

The corpse of Hartwick stood there and I talked on, staring into those empty eyes through which blazed the burning essence of the alien entity itself.

"You see," I concluded. "I know it all. There are only two points I don't understand completely. One of them I can guess. You hypnotized Muriel here, and sent her out. When she returned, you told her that she had killed little Peter. But actually, the way I figure it, you had Hartwick kill Peter, to shut him up about the orphanage episodes. Then you planted clues leading to Muriel. Right?"

THE corpse-head bobbed solemnly in agreement. It was hideous to watch, but the smile that came to Muriel's quivering lips repaid me. At least she'd die knowing she was innocent.

The gun came up again—

"One thing more," I panted. The air was sticky, and an odor welled. "Just one thing more. The most important thing. I know you cannot exist without a human body, and I know that you cannot enter a living body. How did you ever take possession of Anton's body?"

The voice came, then.

"When I came from—"

I heard the word. I knew its meaning was "Mars." But the word was not "Mars" nor anything intelligible to human ears.

"You see," the voice hissed, "I was condemned."

"Condemned?"

"Condemned to extinction for a crime. My body was destroyed, but you cannot destroy the essence. We are eternal. So the essence had to be exiled, too. As essence, I was placed in a rocket-tube and catapulted into space.

"What you call 'Chance' caused the rocket to land on earth. In landing, it burst.

"You can guess where it landed, can't you? In the garden back of Doctor Anton's sanatorium. He was in the garden. The force of the explosion, right next to him, caused concussion and death. As I was liberated from my metal shell, I flowed into Anton's dying body. The rest you know."

I knew, now. I remembered our flight through the garden, and the peculiar scarred hole in the earth. That's where the rocket shell must have landed, the rocket shell that had brought the entity from Mars. And now that entity, in Hartwick's body, was—

I saw the finger press, and knew that this time nothing would intervene. The gun was at my breast, the finger squeezed the trigger, and—

"Achoo!"

It had come, and I was ready. I lunged across the room as the creature shuddered in its sneeze. The gun barked, but the bullet went wild. Then I went wild, and wrested the weapon from the corpse-cold fingers, twisted the muzzle towards the sneeze-racked throat, and fired. One, two, three shots blasted into the contorted body at close range. And Hartwick's body fell.

"Look!" gasped Muriel.

CHAPTER XIII

IT WASN'T exactly a sight for sore eyes.

From the riddled body of Hartwick, writhing in a second death, a milky phosphorescence welled in a coalescing stream.

I thought of de Maupassant's Horla.

I thought of screaming, too.

The image wavering in midair looked like a figure on a photographic negative. But what a figure!

There was a central blob, and attached to it, four pseudopods. Two appendages extended from the lower part and two rose from the middle of the trunk—if it was a trunk, and not just a great head. It might have been a head. I saw a huge maw, with serrated edges that were not lips. The eyes hung on twin stalks from the upper pseudopodic arms, and there seemed to be grasping suckers lining the inner surfaces of the lower appendages.

The whole body glimmered before my eyes, and I saw the entity—the voice—the essence from Mars.

It swooped closer to the desk. I saw the milky strands dissolve against its surface, as though seeking to filter into the desk. Then the figure turned and dashed against a chair. It moved sluggishly, but I somehow had the impression of a frantic haste.

The thing was seeking another haven, another shape to enter.

Then it flowed toward Muriel, and she cried out as the phosphorescence enveloped her. But it could not enter inanimate objects, or the living—

The jelly-like blob hung motionless for a moment. Then, abruptly, its transparency increased. The entire form seemed to dissolve into strands, then cobwebs. I saw it fading, breaking up into particles. The particles became motes. The motes became atoms. The atoms disintegrated. The ghost of a smoke-ring floated up towards the ceiling and vanished.

The entity was gone.

It was the cue for Muriel to pass out. It was the cue for me to remember that I was a hero, take her in my arms, and revive her.

We played our parts well.

Until, at last, I was murmuring to her, “It’s all over, baby. Pull yourself together, now. It’s all over.”

Muriel opened her eyes and gave me the business. It should have made me happy, but I scowled.

“What’s the matter, darling?” she whispered.

“I don’t like the ending,” I said.

“What ending?”

“Well, if I was writing this and putting myself in the role of hero, I’d have figured out a slick scientific trick to beat the villain and have the world. But my method was so crude.” I shrugged. “Still, it was the only thing that would have worked, I guess.

“The entity was too clever for us. I couldn’t cope with its ultra-mundane intelligence. But there was one thing it didn’t know that I did know.

“It was wearing Hartwick’s body, and I knew more about Hartwick than it did.

“So that’s where I took a chance. I made you put all this goldenrod around, and stalled here until it sneezed. And just in time, too. Lucky for all of us Hartwick suffered from hay fever.”

I sighed again and shook my head. “As an editor, the real Hartwick would never have approved of it. As I write, I don’t approve of it. But damn it all—hay fever has just saved the world!”

THE END

Catnip

The old woman and the cat, they were both ageless, both evil

I

RONNIE SHIRES stood before the mirror and slicked back his curly hair. He straightened his new sweater and stuck out his chest. Not bad! Had to watch the way he looked, with graduation only two weeks away and that election for class president coming up. If he could get to be class president, then next year, in high school, he'd swing a little weight maybe. Go out for second team or something. But he had to look sharp—"Ronnie! Better hurry or you'll be late!" Ma came out of the kitchen, carrying his lunch. Ronnie wiped the smile off his face. She walked up behind him and put her arms around his waist.

"Darling—I only wish your father were here to see you—"

Ronnie wriggled free. "Yeah, sure. Say, Ma."

"Yes?"

"How's about letting me have another buck, huh? I got to get some things today."

"Well, I suppose. But try to make it last, son. This graduation costs a lot of money, seems to me."

"I'll make it up to you some day, Ma." He watched her as she fumbled in her apron pocket and produced a wadded dollar bill.

“Thanks. Be seeing you.” He picked up his lunch and ran outside. He walked along, smiling and whistling, knowing Ma was watching him from the window.

Then he turned the corner, halted under a tree, and fished out a cigarette. He lit it and sauntered slowly across the street, puffing deeply. Out of the corner of his eye he watched the Ogden house just ahead.

Sure enough, the front screen door banged and Marvin Ogden came down the steps. Marvin was fifteen, one year older than Ronnie, but smaller and skinnier. He wore glasses and stuttered when he got excited, but he was valedictorian of the graduating class.

Ronnie came up behind him, walking fast. “Hello, Snot-face!”

Marvin wheeled. He avoided Ronnie’s glare, but smiled weakly at the pavement.

“I said hello, Snot-face! What’s the matter, don’t you know your own name, jerk?”

“Hello—Ronnie.”

“How’s old Snot-face today?”

“Aw, gee, Ronnie. Why do you have to talk like that? I never did anything to you, did I?”

Ronnie spit in the direction of Marvin’s shoes. “I’d like to see you just try doing something to me, you four-eyed little—” Marvin began to walk away, but Ronnie kept pace.

“Slow down, jag. I wanna talk to you.”

“Wh-what is it, Ronnie? I don’t want to be late.”

“Shut your yap.”

“But—”

“Listen, you. What was the big idea in History exam yesterday when you pulled your paper away?”

“You know, Ronnie. You aren’t supposed to copy somebody else’s answers.”

“You trying to tell me what to do, you sucker?”

"N-no. I mean, I only want to keep you out of trouble. What if Miss Sanders found out, and you want to be elected class president? Why, if anybody knew—"

Ronnie put his hand on Marvin's shoulder. He smiled. "You wouldn't ever tell her about it, would you, Snot-face?" he murmured.

"Of course not! Cross my heart!"

Ronnie continued to smile. He dug his fingers into Marvin's shoulder. With his other hand he swept Marvin's books to the ground. As Marvin bent forward to pick them up, he kicked Marvin as hard as he could, bringing his knee up fast. Marvin sprawled on the sidewalk. He began to cry. Ronnie watched him as he attempted to rise.

"This is just a sample of what you got coming if you squeal," he said. He stepped on the fingers of Marvin's left hand. "Sucker!"

MARVIN'S snivelling faded from his ears as he turned the corner at the end of the block. Mary June was waiting for him under the trees. He came up behind her and slapped her, hard.

"Hello, you!" he said.

Mary June jumped about a foot, her curls bouncing on her shoulders. Then she turned and saw who it was.

"Oh, Ronnie! You oughtn't to—"

"Shut up. I'm in a hurry. Can't be late the day before election. You lining up the girls?"

"Sure, Ronnie. You know, I promised. I had Ellen and Vicky over at the house last night and they said they'd vote for you for sure. All the girls are gonna vote for you."

"Well, they better." Ronnie threw his cigarette butt against a rose-bush in the Eisner's yard.

"Ronnie—you be careful—want to start a fire?"

"Quit bossing me." He scowled.

"I'm not trying to boss you, Ronnie. Only—"

"Aw, you make me sick!" He quickened his pace, and the girl bit her lip as she endeavored to keep step with him. "Ronnie, wait for me!"

"Wait for me!" He mocked her. "What's the matter, you afraid you'll get lost or something?"

"No. You know. I don't like to pass that old Mrs. Mingle's place. She always stares at me and makes faces."

"She's nuts!"

"I'm scared of her, Ronnie. Aren't you?"

"Me scared of that old bat? She can go take a flying leap!"

"Don't talk so loud, she'll hear you."

"Who cares?"

Ronnie marched boldly past the tree-shadowed cottage behind the rusted iron fence. He stared insolently at the girl, who made herself small against his shoulder, eyes averted from the ramshackle edifice. He deliberately slackened his pace as they passed the cottage, with its boarded-up windows, screened-in porch and general air of withdrawal from the world.

Mrs. Mingle herself was not in evidence today. Usually she could be seen in the weed-infested garden at the side of the cottage; a tiny, dried-up old woman, bending over her vines and plants, mumbling incessantly to herself or to the raddled black tomcat which served as her constant companion.

"Old prune-face ain't around!" Ronnie observed, loudly. "Must be off some place on her broomstick."

"Ronnie—please!"

"Who care's?" Ronnie pulled Mary June's curls. "You dames are scared of everything, ain't you?"

"Aren't, Ronnie."

"Don't tell me how to talk!" Ronnie's gaze shifted again to the silent house, huddled in the shadows. A segment of shadow at the side of the cottage seemed to be moving. A black blur detached itself from the end of the porch. Ronnie recognized Mrs. Mingle's cat. It minced down the path towards the gate.

Quickly, Ronnie stooped and found a rock. He grasped it, rose, aimed, and hurled the missile in one continuous movement.

The cat hissed, then squawled in pain as the rock grazed its ribs.

“Oh, Ronnie!”

“Come on, let’s run before she sees us!”

They flew down the street. The school bell drowned out the cat-yowl.

“Here we go,” said Ronnie. “You do my homework for me? Good. Give it here once.”

He snatched the papers from Mary June’s hand and sprinted ahead. The girl stood watching him, smiling her admiration. From behind the fence the cat watched, too, and licked its jaws.

II

IT HAPPENED that afternoon, after school. Ronnie and Joe Gordan and Seymour Higgins were futzing around with a baseball and he was talking about the outfit Ma promised to buy him this-summer if the dressmaking business picked up. Only he made it sound like he was getting the outfit for sure, and that they could all use the mask and mitt. It didn’t hurt to build it up a little, with election tomorrow. He had to stand in good with the whole gang.

He knew if he hung around the school-yard much longer, Mary June would come out and want him to walk her home. He was sick of her. Oh, she was all right for homework and such stuff, but these guys would just laugh at him if he went off with a dame.

So he said how about going down the street to in front of the pool hall and maybe hang around to see if somebody would shoot a game? He’d pay. Besides, they could smoke.

Ronnie knew that these guys didn’t smoke, but it sounded bigshot and that’s what he wanted. They all followed him down the street, pounding their cleats on the sidewalk. It made a lot of noise, because everything was so quiet.

All Ronnie could hear was the cat. They were passing Mrs. Mingle's and there was this cat, rolling around in the garden on its back and on its stomach, playing with some kind of ball. It purred and meeowed and whined.

"Look!" yelled Joe Gordan. "Dizzy cat's havin' a fit 'r something, huh?"

"Lice," said Ronnie. "Damned mangy old thing's fulla lice and fleas and stuff. I socked it a good one this morning."

"Ya did?"

"Sure. With a rock. This big, too." He made a watermelon with his hands.

"Weren't you afraid of old lady Mingle?"

"Afraid? Why, that dried-up old—"

"Catnip," said Seymour Higgins. "That's what she's got. Ball of catnip. Old Mingle buys it for her. My old man says she buys everything for that cat; special food and sardines. Treats it like a baby. Ever see them walk down the street together?"

"Catnip, huh?" Joe peered through the fence. "Wonder why they like it so much. Gets 'em wild, doesn't it? Cats'll do anything for catnip."

The cat squealed, sniffing and clawing at the bail. Ronnie scowled at it. "I hate cats. Somebody oughta drowned that damn thing."

"Better not let Mrs. Mingle hear you talk like that," Seymour cautioned. "She'll put the evil eye on you."

"Bull!"

"Well, she grows them herbs and stuff and my old lady says—"

"Bull!"

"All right. But I wouldn't go monkeying around her or her old cat, either."

"I'll show you."

Before he knew it, Ronnie was opening the gate. He advanced toward the black tomcat as the boys gaped.

The cat crouched over the catnip, eyes flattened against a velveteen skull. Ronnie hesitated a moment, gauging the glitter of claws, the glare of agate eyes. But the gang was watching—

“Scat!” he shouted. He advanced, waving his arms. The cat sidled backwards. Ronnie feinted with his hand and scooped up the catnip ball.

“See? I got it, you guys. I got—”

“Put that down!”

He didn’t see the door open. He didn’t see her walk down the steps. But suddenly she was there. Leaning on her cane, wearing a black dress that fitted tightly over her tiny frame, she seemed hardly any bigger than the cat which crouched at her side. Her hair was gray and wrinkled and dead, her face was gray and wrinkled and dead, but her eyes—

They were agate eyes, like the cat’s. They glowed. And when she talked, she spit the way the cat did.

“Pul that doivn, young man!”

Ronnie began to shake. It was only a chill, everybody gets chills now and then, and could he help it if he shook so hard the catnip just fell out of his hand?

He wasn’t scared. He had to show the gang he wasn’t scared of this skinny little dried-up old woman. It was hard to breathe, he was shaking so, but he managed. He filled his lungs and opened his mouth.

“You—you old witch!” he yelled.

The agate eyes widened. They were bigger than she was. All he could see were the eyes. Witch eyes. Now that he said it, he knew it was true. Witch. She was a witch.

“You insolent puppy. I’ve a good mind to cut out your lying tongue!”

Geez, she wasn’t kidding!

Now she was coming closer, and the cat was inching up on him, and then she raised the cane in the air, she was going to hit him, the witch was after him, oh Ma, no, don’t, oh—

Ronnie ran.

III

COULD he help it? Geez, the guys ran too. They'd run before he did, even. He had to run, the old bat was crazy, anybody could see that. Besides, if he'd stayed she'd of tried to hit him and maybe he'd let her have it. He was only trying to keep out of trouble. That was all.

Ronnie told it to himself over and over at supper time. But that didn't do any good, telling it to himself. It was the guys he had to tell it to, and fast. He had to explain it before election tomorrow—

"Ronnie. What's the matter? You sick?"

"No, Ma."

"Then why don't you answer a person? I declare, you haven't said ten words since you came in the house. And you aren't eating your supper."

"Not hungry."

"Something bothering you, son?"

"No. Leave me alone."

"It's that election tomorrow, isn't it?"

"Leave me alone." Ronnie rose. "I'm goin' out."

"Ronnie!"

"I got to see Joe. Important."

"Back by nine, remember."

"Yeah. Sure."

He went outside. The night was cool. Windy for this time of year. Ronnie shivered a little as he turned the corner. Maybe a cigarette—

He lit a match and a shower of sparks spiralled to the sky. Ronnie began to walk, puffing nervously. He had to. see Joe and the others and explain. Yeah, right now, too. If they told anybody else—

It was dark. The light on the corner was out, and Ogdens weren't home. That made it darker, because Mrs. Mingle never showed a light in her cottage.

Mrs. Mingle. Her cottage was up ahead. He'd better cross the street.

What was the matter with him? Was he getting chicken-guts? Afraid of that damned old woman, that old witch! He puffed, gulped, expanded his chest. Just let her try anything. Just let her be hiding under the trees, waiting to grab out at him with her big claws and hiss—what was he talking about, anyway? That was the cat. Nuts to her cat, and her too. He'd show them!

Ronnie walked past the dark shadow where Mrs. Mingle dwelt. He whistled defiance, and emphasized it by shooting his cigarette butt across the fence. Sparks flew and were swallow by the mouth of the night.

Ronnie paused and peered over the fence. Everything was black and still. There was nothing to be afraid of. Everything was black—

Everything except that flicker. It came from up the path, under the porch. He could see the porch now because there was a light. Not a steady light; a wavering light. Like a fire. A fire—where his cigarette had landed! The cottage was beginning to burn!

Ronnie gulped and clung to the fence. Yes, it was on fire, all right. Mrs. Mingle would come out and the firemen would come and they'd find the butt and see him and then—

He fled down the street. The wind cat-howled behind him, the wind that fanned the flames that burned the cottage—

Ma was in bed. He managed to slow down and walk softly as he slipped into the house, up the stairs. He undressed in the dark and sought sanctuary between the bedsheets. When he got the covers over his head he had another chill. Lying there, trembling, not daring to look out of the window and see the glare from the other side of the block, Ronnie's teeth chattered. He knew he was going to pass out in a minute.

Then he heard the screaming from far away. Fire engines. Somebody had called them. He needn't worry now. Why should the sound frighten him? It was only a siren, it wasn't Mrs. Mingle screaming, it couldn't be. She was all right. He was all right. Nobody knew . . .

Ronnie fell asleep with the wind and the siren wailing in his ears. His slumber was deep and only once was there an interruption. That was along towards morning, when he thought he heard a noise at the window. It was a scraping sound. The wind, of course. And it must have been the wind, too, that sobbed and whined and whimpered beneath the window-sill at dawn. It was only Ronnie's imagination, Ronnie's conscience, that transformed the sound into the wailing of a cat. . . .

IV

"RONNIE!"

It wasn't the wind, it wasn't a cat. Ma was calling him.

"Ronnie! Oh, Ronnie!"

He opened his eyes, shielding them from the sunshafts.

"I declare, you might answer a person." He heard her grumbling to herself downstairs. Then she called again.

"Ronnie!"

"I'm coming, Ma."

He got out of bed, went to the bathroom, and dressed. She was waiting for him in the kitchen.

"Land sakes, you sure slept sound last night. Didn't you hear the fire engines?"

Ronnie dropped a slice of toast. "What engines?"

Ma's voice rose. "Don't you know? Why, boy, it was just awful—Mrs. Mingle's cottage burned down."

"Yeah?" He had trouble picking up the toast again.

"The poor old lady—just think of it—trapped in there—"

He had to shut her up. He couldn't stand what was coming next. But what could he say, how could he stop her?

"Burned alive. The whole place was on fire when they got there. The Ogdens saw it when they came home and Mr. Ogden called the firemen, but it was too late. When I think of that old lady it just makes me—"

Without a word, Ronnie rose from the table and left the room. He didn't wait for his lunch. He didn't bother to examine himself in the mirror. He went outside, before he cried, or screamed, or hauled off and hit Ma in the puss.

The puss—

It was waiting for him on the front walk. The black bundle with the agate eyes. The cat. Mrs. Mingle's cat, waiting for him to come out.

Ronnie took a deep breath before he opened the gate. The cat didn't make a sound, didn't stir. It just hunched up on the sidewalk and stared at him.

He watched it for a moment, then cast about for a stick. There was a hunk of lathe near the porch. He picked it up and swung it. Then he opened the gate.

"Scat!" he said.

The cat retreated. Ronnie walked away. The cat moved after him. Ronnie wheeled, brandishing the stick.

"Scram, before I let you have it!"

The cat stood still. Ronnie stared at it. Why hadn't the damn' thing burned up in the fire? And what was it doing here?

He gripped the lathe. It felt good between his fingers, splinters and all. Just let that mangy tom start anything—

He walked along, not looking back. What was the matter with him? Suppose the cat did follow him. It couldn't hurt him any. Neither could old Mingle. She was dead. The dirty witch. Talking about cutting his tongue out. Well, she got what was coming to her, all right. Too bad her scroungy cat was still around. If it didn't watch out, he'd fix it, too. He should worry now.

Nobody was going to find out about that cigarette. Mrs. Mingle was dead. He ought to be glad, everything was all right, sure, he felt great.

The shadow followed him down the street.

"Get out of here!"

Ronnie turned and heaved the lathe at the cat. It hissed. Ronnie heard the wind hiss, heard his cigarette butt hiss, heard Mrs. Mingle hiss.

He began to run. The cat ran after him.

“Hey, Ronnie!”

Marvin Ogden was calling him. He couldn’t stop now, not even to hit the punk. He ran on. The cat kept pace.

Then he was winded and he slowed down. It was just in time, too. Up ahead was a crowd of kids, standing on the sidewalk in front of a heap of charred, smoking boards.

They were looking at Mingle’s cottage—Ronnie closed his eyes and darted back up the street. The cat followed.

HE HAD to get rid of it before he went to school. What if people saw him with her cat? Maybe they’d start to talk. He had to get rid of it—

Ronnie ran clear down to Sinclair Street. The cat was right behind him. On the corner he picked up a stone and let fly. The cat dodged. Then it sat down on the sidewalk and looked at him. Just looked.

Ronnie couldn’t take his eyes off the cat. It stared so. Mrs. Mingle had stared, too. But she was dead. And this was only a cat. A cat he had to get away from, fast.

The street car came down Sinclair Street. Ronnie found a dime in his pocket and boarded the car. The cat didn’t move. He stood on the platform as the car pulled away and looked back at the cat. It just sat there.

Ronnie rode around the loop, then transferred to the Hollis Avenue car. It brought him over to the school, ten minutes late. He got off and started to hurry across the street.

A shadow crossed the entrance to the building.

Ronnie saw the cat. It squatted there, waiting.

He ran.

That’s all Ronnie remembered of the rest of the morning. He ran. He ran, and the cat followed. He couldn’t go to school, he couldn’t be there for the election, he couldn’t get rid of the cat. He ran.

Up and down the streets, back and forth, all over the whole neighborhood; stopping and dodging and throwing stones and swearing and panting and sweating. But always the running, and always the cat right behind him.

Once it started to chase him and before he knew it he was heading straight for the place where the burned smell filled the air, straight for the ruins of Mrs. Mingle's cottage. The cat wanted him to go there, wanted him to see—

Ronnie began to cry. He sobbed and panted all the way home. The cat didn't make a sound. It followed him. All right, let it. He'd fix it. He'd tell Ma. Ma would get rid of it for him. Ma.

"Ma!"

He yelled as he ran up the steps.

No answer. She was out. Marketing.

And the cat crept up the steps behind him.

Ronnie slammed the door, locked it. Ma had her key. He was safe now. Safe at home. Safe in bed—he wanted to go to bed and pull the covers over his head, wait for Ma to come and make everything all right.

There was a scratching at the door.

"Ma!" His scream echoed through the empty house.

He ran upstairs. The scratching died away.

And then he heard the footsteps on the porch, the slow footsteps; he heard the rattling and turning of the doorknob. It was old lady Mingle, coming from the grave. It was the witch, coming to get him. It was—

"Ma!"

"Ronnie, what's the matter? What you doing home from school?"

He heard her. It was all right. Just in time, Ronnie closed his mouth. He couldn't tell her about the cat. He mustn't ever tell her. Then everything would come out. He had to be careful what he said.

"I got sick to my stomach," he said. "Miss Sanders said I should come home and lay down."

Ronnie lay in bed and dozed as the afternoon shadows ran in long black ribbons across the bedroom floor. He smiled to himself. What a sucker he was! Afraid of a cat. Maybe there wasn't even a cat—all in his mind. Dope!

"Ronnie—you all right?" Ma called up from the foot of the stairs.

"Yes, Ma. I feel lots better."

Sure, he felt better. He could get up now and eat supper if he wanted. In just a minute he'd put his clothes on and go downstairs. He started to push the sheets off. It was dark in the room, now. Just about supper-time—

THEN Ronnie heard it. A scratching. A scurring. From the hall? No. It couldn't be in the hall. Then where?

The window. It was open. And the scratching came from the ledge outside. He had to close it, fast. Ronnie jumped out of bed, barking his shin against a chair as he groped through the dusk. Then he was at the window, slamming it down, tight.

He heard the scratching.

And it came from inside the room!

Ronnie hurled himself upon the bed, clawing the covers up to his chin. His eyes bulged against the darkness.

Where was it?

He saw nothing but shadows. Which shadow moved?

Where was it?

Ronnie didn't know. All he knew was that he lay in bed, waiting, thinking of Mrs. Mingle and her cat and how she was a witch and died because he'd killed her. Or had he killed her? He was all mixed up, he couldn't remember, he didn't know what was real and what wasn't real any more. He couldn't tell which shadow would move next.

And then he could.

The round shadow was moving. The round black ball was inching across the floor from beneath the window. It was the cat, all right, because shadows don't have claws that scrape. Shadows don't leap through the air and perch on the bedpost, grinning at you with yellow eyes and yellow teeth . . . grinning the way Mrs. Mingle grinned.

The cat was big. Its eyes were big. Its teeth were big. It crouched there, hunching to spring.

Ronnie opened his mouth to scream.

Then the shadow was sailing through the air, coming at him, at his face, at his open mouth. The claws were fastened in his cheeks, forcing his jaws apart. And the head dipped—

Far away, under the pain, somebody was calling.

“Ronnie! Oh, Ronnie!”

Everything was fire. Ronnie lashed out, and suddenly the shadow went away.

“Ronnie! What’s the matter with you?”

He sat bolt upright in the bed. His mouth worked, and he opened it to scream, but no sound came out. Nothing came out except that gushing red wetness.

“Ronnie! Why don’t you answer me?”

A horrible guttural sound came from deep within Ronnie’s throat. But no words. There never would be any words.

“Ronnie—what’s the matter? Has the cat got your tongue?”

Change of Heart

It had been the sun, the moon, the stars to me—a whirling planet of silver, held to its orbit by a glittering chain. Uncle Hansi would twirl it before my eyes on those long, faraway Sunday afternoons. Sometimes he let me press the icy surface against my ear, and then I heard from deep within it the music of the spheres.

Now it was only a battered old watch, a keepsake inheritance. The once gleaming case was worn and dented, and a deep scratch crossed the finely etched initials below the stem.

I took it to a jeweller's on the Avenue, for an estimate, and the clerk was frigidly polite. "We've hardly the facilities to handle such repair work here. Perhaps some small shop, a watchmaker of the old school—"

He laid it carelessly on the counter, for he did not know that this was a dying planet, a waning world, a star that flamed in first magnitude in the bygone eons of my childhood.

So I put the world in my pocket and went away from there. I walked home through the Village and came, eventually, to the establishment of Ulrich Klemm.

The basement window was grimy with the dust of years, and the gold lettering had flecked and moted, but the name caught my eye. "ULRICH KLEMM, WATCHMAKER."

I descended five steps, turned the doorknob, and walked into a seething symphony of sound. Whispers, murmurs, frantic titterings. Deep buzzings and shrill cadences. Muted, measured, mechanical rhythms, set in eternal order—the testament of Time.

Against shadowed walls the faces loomed and leered. They were big, they were small, they were round or oval or broad; high and low they hung, these clock-faces in the shop of Ulrich Klemm, ticking and staring at me in darkness.

The white head of the watchmaker was haloed in the light of his workbench. He turned and rose, then shuffled over to the counter, his padding feet weaving in counterpoint to the rhythms of the clockwork on the walls.

"There iss something?" he asked. I stared into his face—the face of a grandfather's clock; weathered, patient, enduring, inscrutable.

"I want you to have a look at this," I said. "My uncle Hansi willed it to me, but the regular jewellers don't seem to know how to put it in working order."

As I put Uncle Hansi's watch on the counter, the face of the grandfather's clock leaned forward. All of the faces on the wall gazed and gaped while I explained.

Ulrich Klemm nodded. His gnarled hands (do all grandfather's clocks have gnarled hands? I wondered) carried the battered old timepiece over to the light above the workbench.

I watched the hands. They did not tremble. The fingers suddenly became instruments. They opened, revealed, pried, probed, delicately dissected.

"Yess. I can repair this, I think." He spoke to me, to all the faces on the wall.

"It will not be easy. These parts—they are no longer made. I shall have to fashion them especially. But it iss a fine watch, yess, and worth the effort."

I opened my mouth, but did not speak. The faces on the wall spoke for me.

For suddenly the sound surged to a crescendo, sharp and shrill. The faces laughed and gurgled and shrieked; a hundred voices, accents, tongues and intonations met and mingled. Six times the voices rose and fell, proclaiming—

"It's six o'clock, Grandfather."

No, it wasn’t my imagination. The voice said that. Not the mechanical voice, but the other one. The one that came from the long, slim, incredibly white throat of the girl who emerged from the rear of the shop.

“Yess, Lisa?” The old man cocked his head.

“Dinner is ready. Oh, excuse me—I thought you were alone.”

I stared at golden hair and silver flesh. Lisa. The granddaughter. The clocks ticked on, and something leapt in rhythm deep in my chest.

She smiled. I smiled. Ulrich introduced her. And I became crafty, persuasive. I leaned over the counter and artfully led the conversation along, encouraging him to talk of the marvels of clockwork, of old days in Switzerland when Ulrich Klemm was a horologist of renown.

It wasn’t difficult. He extended an invitation to share the meal, and soon I was in one of the rooms behind the shop, listening to further reminiscences.

He spoke of the golden days of clockwork, of automata—mechanical chessplayers, birds that sang and flew, soldiers walking and sounding trumpets, angels in belfries chorusing the coming of day and brandishing swords against Evil.

Ulrich Klemm showed me the picture on his wall—the picture he had salvaged ten years ago when he and Lisa fled from Europe to the refuge of this tiny shop in the Village. The picture was a landscape, with railroad tracks running through a mountain pass. He wound a spring at the side of the frame and the train came out and raced through a tunnel, climbed the grade and disappeared again. It was a marvelous picture, and I told him so.

But no picture, however animated, could satisfy me as did the sight of Lisa. And while my tongue responded to the old man, my eyes answered the girl.

We didn’t say much to one another. She cut her finger while serving the meat, and I bandaged it as the blood flowed. We spoke of the weather, of trivial things. But when I departed I had wrung an invitation to come again from Ulrich Klemm. Lisa smiled and nodded as I left, and she smiled and nodded again that night in my dreams.

So it was that I came often to the little shop, even after my watch had been repaired and restored to me. Ulrich Klemm enjoyed an audience—he dreamed and boasted before me for long hours. He told me of the things he had created in the old country; of royal commissions, mechanical marvels, medals and awards.

"There iss nothing I cannot fathom once I turn my hand to it," he often said. "All Nature—just a mechanism. When I wass a young man, my father wished for me to become a surgeon. But the human body iss a poor instrument, full of flaws. A good chronometer, that iss perfection."

I listened and nodded and waited. And in time, I achieved my goal.

Lisa and I became friends, bit by bit. We smiled, we spoke, we went walking together. We went to the park, to the theatre.

It was simple, once the initial barriers were surmounted. For Lisa had no friends, and her schooldays were an alien memory. Ulrich Klemm treasured her with morbid jealousy. She and she alone had never failed him; she responded perfectly to his will. That is what the old man desired—he loved automatons.

But I loved Lisa. Lisa the girl. Lisa the woman. I dreamed of an awakening, an emergence into the world beyond the four walls of the shop. And in time I spoke to her of what I planned.

"No, Dane," she said. "He will never let me go. He is old and all alone. If we can wait, in a few years—"

"Wake up," I said. "This is New York, the twentieth century. You're of age. And I want you to marry me. Now."

"No," she sighed. "We cannot do this to him." And shook her head, like an automaton.

It was like something out of the Dark Ages. It was a world apart from my office uptown, with its talk of surveys and projects and a branch managership opening for me in Detroit.

I told her about the Detroit assignment. I insisted on speaking now. Lisa wept then, and Lisa pleaded, but in the end I went to the old man and told him.

"I'm going to marry Lisa," I said. "I'm going to take her with me. Now."

"No-no-no-no," ticked the clocks on the wall. "NO—NO—NO," boomed the chimes. And, "You cannot take her!" shouted Ulrich Klemm. "She iss all I have left. No one will ever take her from me. Never."

It was useless to argue. And when I pleaded with Lisa to elope, to run away, she turned the blank perfection of a clock-face towards me and ticked, "No." For Lisa was the old man's masterpiece. He had spent years perfecting her pattern of obedient reaction. I saw that I could never tamper with Ulrich Klemm's delicate adjustments.

So I went away, carrying my silver watch on a chain in my pocket; knowing that I could never find a chain that would link Lisa to me. During the months in Detroit I wrote frequently to the shop, but there was no answer.

I instructed a friend of mine to stop by and deliver messages, but I heard no word. The silver watch in my pocket ticked off the days and the weeks and the months, and finally I returned to New York.

Then I heard that Lisa was dead.

My friend had stopped by and found the shop shuttered and deserted. Going around to the rear, he roused Ulrich Klemm from his vigil. The haggard, sleepless old man said that Lisa had suffered a heart attack. She was dying.

Returning several days later, my friend was unable to rouse anyone. But the wreath on the door of the locked shop told its own grim story.

I thanked my informant, sighed, nodded, and went out into the wintry streets.

It was a bitterly cold day. My breath plumed before me, and I stamped the snow from my shoes as I descended the steps to Ulrich Klemm's door. The glass was frosted like a wedding-cake; I could not see into the shop through the sheet of ice.

My gloved hand tugged the doorknob. The door rattled, but did not open. I knocked. The old man was a little deaf, yet he must hear, he must answer. I knocked again.

Quite suddenly the door opened. I stepped over the threshhold, into a vacuum of darkness and silence. No light shone over the workbench, no chimes heralded my entrance. And the clockfaces were invisible, inaudible. The absence of the familiar ticking struck me like a physical blow. It was as though a world had ended.

Everything had stopped. And yet Ulrich Klemm's crazed fanaticism would not permit a stopping, an ending—

"Klemm!" I shouted. "Ulrich Klemm!"

Something stirred in the darkness before me. I heard the tread of light, hesitant footsteps.

"Klemm," I said. "Turn on the lights. It's Dane."

Then I heard the voice, the soft voice murmuring up at me. "You've come back. Oh, I knew you would come back."

"Lisa!"

"Lisa!"

"Yes, dearest. I have been waiting for you here, all alone. So long it has been, I do not know—ever since he died."

"He died? Your grandfather?"

"Did you not know? I was ill, very ill. My heart, the doctor said. It was I who should have died, but Grandfather would not hear of it. He said the doctor was a fool, he would save me himself. And he did. Yes, he did. He nursed and took care of me, even after I was in a coma.

"Then, when at last I was awake again, Grandfather failed. He was so old, you know. Caring for me without thought of himself—going without food or rest—it weakened him. Pneumonia set in and I could do nothing. He died here in the shop. That was a long time ago, it seems."

"How long?"

"I cannot remember. I have not eaten or slept since, but then there is no need, I knew you would come—"

"Let me look at you." I groped through the darkness, found the switch for the lamp over the workbench. The halo of light blossomed against the silent clockfaces on the walls.

Lisa stood there quietly, her face white and waxen, her eyes blank and empty, her body wasted. But she lived. That was enough for me. She lived, and she was free forever of the old man's tyranny.

I wondered what he had done to save her, he who had boasted that nothing would ever take her away from him. Well, he had lavished the last of his skill and genius upon preserving her from death, and it was enough.

I sighed and took Lisa in my arms. Her flesh was cold against mine, and I strove to melt the icy numbness against the heat of my body. I bent my head against her breast, listened to the beating of her heart.

Then I turned and ran screaming from that shop of shadows and silence.

But not before I heard the hellish sound from Lisa's breast—that sound which was not a heartbeat, but a faint, unmistakable licking.

The Indian Spirit Guide

Spook hunting is a peculiar kind of business with peculiar results

ORLANDO CROWN was a spook-hunter.

If you're a reader of magazines and the Sunday supplements of newspapers, you'll remember-his name. Orlando Crown—amateur magician, amateur occultist, and professional ghost-buster. The man who made a standing offer of $25,000 to any medium or mystic producing satisfactory evidence of life beyond the grave. His articles and exposes of fraudulent psychic phenomena are famous.

Accordingly, when I determined to do a book on spiritualism, it was only natural that I take a little trip down to San Diego and seek out Orlando Crown.

"Show me a ghost," I said.

Crown laughed. He threw back his close-cropped gray head and brayed.

"Just like that, eh?" he chuckled. "The man wants me to show him a ghost. Now take it easy, friend—"

I took it easy. I explained everything; who I was, my purpose in coming to him, and the theme of my projected book. He stopped laughing and began to exhibit interest.

"Naturally, I wanted to get my material first hand from an expert," I told him. "So I came to you."

“Naturally,” he agreed. “There is no one else qualified. And I assume you’d credit me with the data?”

That was the key, the clue I needed. I’d always wondered why a wealthy man like Orlando Crown bothered with the pursuit of such a peculiar hobby. The answer was—vanity.

“Credit you?” I said. “Why, if you’ll do me the honor of serving as my instructor, I’ll dedicate the book to you.”

Crown beamed. He stood up and extended the slim, soft elegance of his hand. “Come back tomorrow at two,” he murmured. “I think I’ll have something interesting for you.”

II

CROWN’S roadster turned south, and the afternoon sun smote my eyes. We bumped along an unpaved street that looked like the butt-end of Tobacco Road. Lawns of brown weeds and sand suffered under the sun, unprotected by the withered palmettos which served as attractions only to the local dogs. Houses sagged behind rusted iron fences. On porches sun-blistered and paint-peeled, unlovely women rocked and fanned futilely. Towheaded brats peered from behind phlegm-green window shades. Heatwaves lent a wavering distortion to the flight of myriad flies, but did nothing to cut the stench of shriveled vegetation, rotting wood, sweat, garbage, and the frying odor of garbage soon to be.

“There’s the place,” said Orlando Crown, indicating a house. He might have been a psychic sensitive at that; I couldn’t have distinguished this particular shack from any of the others. It was a wide two-story affair which might once have been painted yellow. The shades were drawn, the door was shut, and the only sign of occupancy was a battered blue coaster wagon which lay on its side against the steps. Its name was SPEEDY, according to the lettering on its frame, but when I stumbled against it I called it something else under my breath.

I fancied I saw the shades move slightly in a window to the left as we ascended the porch stairs, but I may have been mistaken. Orlando Crown pressed the buzzer and a sour whine echoed from within the house.

A sallow-faced Mexican girl opened the door. She brushed the perspiration from her mustache, wiped her hand on a strand of stringy hair, and said, “Yes, please?”

“Mrs. Hubbard. We have an appointment.”

“I tell her. Wait here.” Orlando Crown followed her into the hall, and I followed him. The corridor was dark and narrow, like a closet. And like a closet it smelled of mothballs and mustiness. There were doors on either side of the hallway, and the girl entered the one at our right.

We settled down in wicker chairs and waited. My chair was next to an end-table piled high with tattered magazines. I picked one up. It was a copy of Film Fun for January, 1932.

Orlando Crown smiled at me.

“This looks as if it might be interesting,” he confided in a whisper. “There are usually two kinds of operators, you know. The first is the old-fashioned racketeer—the kind that puts up a big phony front, black drapes and brass gongs and music on the organ. The second group goes in for disarming simplicity; the ‘natural medium’ gag. From this build-up, I guess Mrs. Hubbard belongs to the second group.”

“How did you happen to select her?” I asked.

“Haven’t much choice,” Crown shrugged. “You see, most of the spook workers in this part of the country know me by sight or reputation. Hate me like poison, of course. But this Mrs. Hubbard is a newcomer.”

He found and lit a cigarette. I sat back and looked at “gag” pictures of such current comic celebrities as Harry Langdon, Jimmy Finlayson, Andy Clyde and Slim Summerville.

The silence was emphatic. It grew hotter, mustier. The hall became an oversized coffin. Time passed, but what’s time when you’re inside a casket?

Crown stepped on the butt of his cigarette. I sat there and listened to the worms bore through the woodwork. Then the door opened, we jumped, and the Mexican girl said, “In here, now.”

Beyond the doorway was an ordinary parlor—“sitting-room” in the day when this house was built—filled with the usual scrolled oak furniture unholstered by a contemporary of Queen Anne. The wallpaper was Paris green, obscured in many places by large chromoes of the Saviour in meditation, exaltation and agony.

The center of the room was occupied by a “dining-room suite”; six chairs and a round table. Mrs. Hubbard sat in one of the chairs, her elbows on the table top.

She wasn’t exactly Mrs. Hubbard—“Mother Hubbard” would be a more accurate tag. A fat, blowsy, red-faced woman in her mid-forties, with pork bristles on her arms and chin. Coarse brown hair nestled in a bun against the back of her high-necked black dress. There was something tragic about her deep-set eyes—here, if ever I saw one, was a woman who suffered. From a hangover.

“Greetings.”

Her voice was as big as her body. It bounced off the walls and exploded against our eardrums.

“You are prompt, Mr. Bloch.”

I nodded. Orlando had given my name as a cover-up, of course.

“And you have brought a guest, I see.”

“Yes. I thought you wouldn’t mind. “This is—”

“I know.” Mrs. Hubbard smiled slightly. “Please be seated, and I will endeavor to convince the skeptical Mr. Orlando Crown that I am indeed a psychic sensitive.”

Crown’s eyebrows lifted as his posterior lowered into a chair. He started to reply, but the Mexican girl opened the door again and ushered four more people into the room. We turned and stared at the fat, little-red-faced man with the mustache, the portly matron in the flowered print dress, the pale, bespectacled blonde girl, and the gaunt gray-haired woman who fiddled with her coral beads.

Mrs. Hubbard, unsmiling, waved them to places at the table. They sat down with the ease and assurance of regular customers who had been here many times before. The Mexican girl brought in an extra chair and disappeared again.

NOBODY said a word. Orlando Crown watched Mrs. Hubbard. I watched Orlando Crown. Mrs. Hubbard didn’t appear to be watching anybody. The whole affair had much of the quaint charm and jollity of an old-fashioned inquest.

I waited for something to happen. I waited for the closing of the blinds, the whisperings in the darkened room, the rappings and the wailings, the screech of chalk moving across a slate, the phosphorescent phantom issuing from the mouth of a moaning woman.

Instead, the Mexican girl appeared again. She carried a tablet of cheap, blue-ruled paper, a package of envelopes, and a handful of yellow pencils. This assortment made a nice little mess in the center of Mrs. Hubbard’s dining-room table.

We watched as the girl rotated chunky thighs toward the door. The red-faced man fingered his mustache, the matron played with her purse, the girl with die glasses coughed, the gray-haired woman used her coral beads for a rosary.

“Will everybody take a pencil, a sheet of paper, and an envelope, please?”

Mrs. Hubbard was ready to go into her routine. We all groped for tire props as directed.

“Because our group today is a little larger than usual, and because there is a natural reticence in the presence of strangers, I fee! it best to have you put your problems in writing.” Mrs. Hubbard patted her brown pug and smiled.

“I suggested that each of you write down one question, to begin with. If we have time, I shall be glad to work with your further inquiries personally —and privately, if you wish.

“At the moment, the important thing, frankly, is to gain your confidence. Without it, you will have no faith in my power, nor in my ability to help you. Since some of you are visiting me for the first time today, I’m going to make use of a rather spectacular device to convince you of my extra-liminal perception.”

The deep, intelligent voice rolled smoothly, easily, persuasively, from the coarse mouth of that fat, sweating old woman.

“I’m not much of a showman—I cannot offer you a dark room, table tipping, ghostly presences. But if each one will write a question on a piece of paper, fold it up, and personally seal it in an envelope, perhaps I can demonstrate an interesting psychic phenomenon.”

There was a pause, a shared feeling of hesitation. Mrs. Hubbard didn’t have to be a mystic to sense it.

“Please. It’s very simple. I am going to read your questions back to you as you have written them, without opening the envelopes.”

Mrs. Hubbard smiled. “There will be no trickery. You can examine the paper, the pencils, the envelopes. You won’t find any carbon, or wax, or acid treatments to bring out the writing. There will be no waiting.

I’ll read your questions back to you and then open your envelopes, one at a time. That should serve as convincing proof of the powers that work through me. Then I’ll give you the answers.

“So if you’ll write—please do, and make your questions sincere—whatever is closest to your mind and heart—”

The red-faced man scrawled something on his ruled sheet and folded it carefully four times. The matron licked the tip of her pencil and frowned. I shielded my paper and wrote: “Will my new book be written by fall?”

Mrs. Hubbard couldn’t possibly have read our writing. She had risen and walked over to a small card-table set in. the corner of the room. She drew up the extra chair and sat down behind the table, waiting until we folded the sealed and rustled.

"Bring your envelopes over personally, please," she called. "I don't want to be accused of switching."

We filed past the table and sat down again, all of us watching her as she collected the six envelopes, shuffled them carefully, and then placed them on the corner of the table.

She spread them out fanwise before her and frowned. Our chairs scraped back as we faced her. She switched on a lamp behind her and produced a wire filing basket.

There was no switching, no sleight-of-hand, no wires or buzzers, or gimmicks of any kind. We stared at Mrs. Hubbard and she stared down at the envelopes.

Her forehead corrugated. A fat hand reached out at random and lifted an envelope from the center of the fan. She placed it against the corrugations above her eyes. Her eyes closed.

Then she was speaking, and her voice came from far away—far away inside herself, far away inside the envelope.

"Should I sell my property to the syndicate or hold out for the original figure?" she whispered.

The red-faced, mustached little man popped up like a Jack-in-the-box. "That's it!" he shouted. "By Golly, that's my question!"

Orlando Crown never blinked. Everyone else was leaning forward, tense with excitement.

Mrs. Hubbard, eyes still closed, smiled at us. "Please, control your enthusiasm. It makes it more difficult to concentrate." She opened the envelope now, opened her eyes and glanced carelessly at the sheet, and then placed it in the wicker basket. And all the while she continued to talk.

"As it comes to me, Mr. Rogers, this property that you speak of consists of a bloc of eight lots situated just south of San Juan Capistrano, on 101-A, the coast drive. This syndicate of which you speak, the—"

Rogers opened his mouth and she paused. "Of course, I will not mention names if you prefer. But it is true, isn't it, that they plan to build a hotel on this site? And that yesterday they offered you $18,000 cash for an outright sale, while you are holding out for $25,000? I thought so. It appears that if you refuse, they will offer you $20,000 on Thursday. If you still refuse, on Monday they will meet your price.”

Without pausing, the plump hand sought another envelope, pressed it to the red forehead. Eyes closed and mouth opened.

“Will my new book be written by fall?” She was reading my question without opening the envelope!

I TRIED again to pierce Orlando Crown’s bland stare. I tried to figure it out. There must be an angle, there was some kind of fakery somewhere, but it was too much for me. She had read my question without seeing it.

My mouth dropped open as I watched Mts. Hubbard now carelessly unseal the envelope and slowly withdraw the folded paper. She unraveled it and then—her mouth opened.

Something red fluttered to the table; something bold and brazen, with a picture of a half-naked girl emblazoned on its crimson background.

It was the cover of the Film Fun magazine I’d been reading in the hall!”

Orlando Crown was on his feet, snatching at the cover. “My question, I believe,” he said.

Mrs. Hubbard’s mouth gulped for words. When they came, they sounded in a sweetly audible cadence.

“Why you dirty, stinking, lousy skunk!” said Mrs. Hubbard.

III

SHE couldn’t escape. We crowded around the table and Orlando Crown, inarticulate no longer, held forth.

“You see, it’s very simple. The whole trick is old as the hills. While the audience is looking for mirrors, radio-electronic eyes and all kinds of elaborate devices, the fake mystic merely uses the old ‘one ahead’ system. All she needs for that is a stooge. In this case it was Rogers here.”

The red-faced man who had popped up like a Jack-in-the-box now looked as though he would collapse like one. But the astute Mr. Crown now held his arm firmly.

He held up one of the unopened envelopes.

“This envelope she saves to the last. What she does is call out the stooge’s question, which has been agreed upon in advance. He jumps up and makes a big fuss about hearing his question and she opens the envelope she’s held to her forehead. Naturally, it’s one of the envelopes containing a legitimate question. She reads it and puts it in the basket. While answering Mr. Roger’s question—in convincing detail—she was actually reading Mr. Bloch’s question from the envelope she opened. Then with the next envelope she would answer Mr. Bloch and open mine.

“But when she called Mr. Bloch’s question, she opened my envelope and that was her mistake.”

“You crummy rat,” muttered Mrs. Hubbard. “What do you want from me?” Crown shrugged. “Nothing at all, really, from you—except your promise to quit working a racket on people who are in need of genuine assistance from reputable consultants. I don’t think you’ll be trying these tricks around here very much longer.”

“Why you damned—”

“Careful, now! Watch your language. You aren’t very ladylike, Mrs. Hubbard. Of course, appearances are so deceptive, you folks must all remember that. For example, Mrs. Hubbard here does not use ladylike language, because she really isn’t much of a lady. In fact—”

Orlando Crown’s hand descended to pat Mother Hubbard’s head. It rose again, clutching a brown-burned wig. We gaped down on a fat, bald-headed man who gripped the edge of the table with brawny knuckles and cursed in a hoarse voice that drove us all from the room.

Crown turned to the group as we reached the sidewalk and made a courtly bow. “My friends,” he said. “I think our little session with the supernatural is over.”

“Well, I never!”

“Of all the things—” They spilled across the street, chattering and goggling. All but the old girl with the coral beads. She edged closer as Crown and I headed for our car.

“Pardon me,” she sniffed. “I—I just wanted to thank you for what you did in there.”

“No thanks necessary.” Crown smiled and opened the car door.

“Oh, but you helped me a great deal. That horrid woman—person, I mean—had me almost convinced. I’d been coming to her for weeks for advice and she had nearly taken me away from Mrs. Prinn.”

“Mrs. Prinn?”

“Yes. She’s a real medium. I mean a genuine one, not a fake.”

Crown winked at me, but the look he offered the woman was grave.

“Madam, if you will permit me to say so, all mediums are fakes.”

“Oh, no!” The old lady put her hand to her cheek. “Maybe there are a lot of frauds like this one here, but not Mrs. Prinn! She doesn’t try to fool you with tricks—she just summons up the spirits of the departed. She has a spirit guide, you know.”

CROWN glanced impatiently at his watch.

“Very interesting,” he said. “But I assure you, as an investigator of long standing, that I have never encountered a genuine medium, a genuine apparition, or a spirit guide.”

“You ought to meet Little Hatchet,” the woman told him. “He’s an Indian.”

“An Indian spirit guide?” I asked. “You know, I’ve always wondered about that. Why do all the mediums seem to work through Indian spirit guides?”

Orlando Crown coughed. “We must be running along,” he said. Then, to the woman, “We’re going back downtown. If you’d care for a lift—”

“Thank you.” The old lady made a prim little obeisance and opened the rear door of the roadster. “I think, under the circumstances, an introduction is warranted. I am Mrs. Celia Brewster.”

We gave our names. Crown did the honors as he drove.

“No,” said Mrs. Brewster. “Not really! I should have recognized you from your pictures in the paper—Orlando Crown! Why, everybody knows about you.”

The Achilles’ heel again. Crown positively smirked with pleasure.

“Yes, even Mrs. Prinn has spoken of you to us.”

“Not favorably, I trust.”

“Well—” The old lady had an embarrassed session with her beads. “Naturally, being a true medium, she rather resents some of the statements you’ve made about spiritualism.”

“I shouldn’t imagine so,” I murmured. “But if you could only see what she does, I’m sure you’d take back all of those remarks about fakery,” Mrs. Brewster continued. She paused. “Come to think of it, why can’t you see what she does? Yes, why don’t you visit Mrs. Prinn as my guest?”

“Dear lady—” Crown began.

“It would be such an honor,” the dear lady rattled on. “Such a distinct honor to have a great investigator present at one of her seances.”

She had found the right note again. Crown glanced at me. “Well, I’m not really very interested. But Bloch here is looking for some material and I promised to take him around. What do you say? Would you like to see one of the old-fashioned spook sessions, with table-tipping and skeletons and musical trumpets, the works?” He wanted me to say yes. I said yes. “Very well. Of course, you mustn’t let my name out to Mrs. Prinn. I don’t know her and she wouldn’t care to meet me.”

"Just as you say, Mr. Crown. It will be a rewarding experience for both of us, I'm sure. I know you'll be Convinced, once and for all, of the genuineness of communication from beyond."

"Or you will be convinced, once aid for all, that it's a stupid fake," Crown retorted. "Indian spirit guides, eh? Chief Wahoo, is that it?"

"Little Hatchet." Mrs. Brewster corrected him with a dour smile. "He was an Oglalla Sioux, in mundane life. He first manifested himself to Mrs. Prinn in 1924, when she was just a girl. Since that time he has served as her spirit guide, bringing messages from those who have passed over—"

"At so much per message," Crown interrupted. "By the way, how much is the old fraud into you for?"

"Why several thou—oh, please, Mi. Crown, I wish you wouldn't talk like that! Can't you at least suspend judgment until you meet Mrs. Prinn?"

"Sorry. By the way, when do you plan this excursion?"

"Why, I have an appointment tomorrow evening at nine. Would that be convenient?"

"Certainly." Crown slid the car over to the curb and opened the door. "We park here, if that's convenient. Suppose I pick you up at eight-thirty, tomorrow evening. Where can I find you?"

Mrs. Brewster gave an address and Crown nodded as she stepped out of the car.

"Goodbye, now," she said, waving her beads.

"Goodbye," Crown called. And muttered, under his breath, "Don't take any wooden Indians."

IV

CROWN was in fine form the following evening. As we drove over to pick up Mrs. Brewster he regaled me at length with accounts of fake apports, telekinesis involving magnets, and the use of reaching-rods. Nor did he moderate his remarks when Mrs. Brewster joined us and we headed for the medium's apartments.

"You were asking me about Chief Running Nose—"

"Little Hatchet," Mrs. Brewster interjected, patiently.

"Whatever you call him, then. Anyway, Bloch here raised the question of why most mediums seem to have Indian spirit guides."

"It bothers me," I said. "Why pick on the poor Indians all the time?"

Mrs. Brewster sniffed, but subsided as Crown answered with a grin devoid of malice.

"Years and years ago, when spiritualism first flourished commercially on the Continent, mediums hit upon the Noble Red Man as an ideal personification. To begin with, the Europeans were infatuated with the works of Cooper; later generations avidly devoured the lurid thrillers built around the exploits of Buffalo Bill. Indians were exotic to Europeans, just as Hindus would be to us. And weren't all Indians pictured as 'guides' in western romances of the day? The reasoning was simple—if Chief Hot Foot could find his way through the trackless wastes of Waukegan, surely he could lead the path through the realms of the spirit world.

"Besides, when the Indian guide spoke through the mouth of a medium, he could converse in gibberish. Nobody understood Indian languages, so the medium could bark out almost anything and sound authentic.

"So you see, it's just an old ghostly custom to use an Indian spirit guide. Nobody seems to wonder why good Indians—dead ones, that is—want to hang around fat old ladies and help them get through to spookville."

"But Mrs. Prinn's guide isn't an invention," Mrs. Brewster said, softly. "Little Hatchet really lived. If you've read anything on Indian ethnology, or the history of the Sioux, you'll find his name. He passed over at the Battle of the Little Big Horn. Custer's Massacre, you know. He can give you details, absolutely authentic proofs that—"

"That your Mrs. Prinn read about in books at the public library," Orlando Crown finished for her.

“I wish you’d refrain from condemning Mrs. Prinn in advance,” said the old woman, rattling her coral beads in nervous earnestness. “Because I know you are going to be pleasantly surprised.”

“I think she’ll be surprised,” answered Orlando Crown, grimly. “And I doubt if she’ll find it pleasant.”

“I haven’t told her your name, but even if she finds out, it won’t matter. Mrs. Prinn welcomes tests of her mediumship. If you only knew what she’s told me about those who have passed over! And the very first time she knew all about me without my saying anything; she told me things that I’d never revealed to anyone. Oh, this is going to be a wonderful experience for a skeptic like yourself, Mr. Crown!”

“Apparently it begins now,” he observed, as the car entered the driveway of an ornate apartment building. An attendant took the wheel and parked the roadster as we headed for the chromium-splashed foyer and took an elevator to the seventh floor.

“What have you got there?” I whispered, indicating the small black satchel Crown carried in one hand.

“You’ll see,” Crown answered. “It’s all part of that wonderful experience we’re going to have. I don’t think Mrs. Prinn will go for it, and I know Little Hatchet will be mad as hell.”

The elevator dumped us in front of a modernistic blonde oak door. Mrs. Brewster rang the bell and got chimes; the expensive, eight-tone kind. The sound alone told me that this seance would be quite a contrast to the sordid session of yesterday.

My assumption was correct. From the moment that the turbaned servant opened the door and bade us enter, we moved in an exotic world.

ONLY a Hollywood extremist could have designed that parlor. Everything was black. Black velvet drapes covering the walls, black mohair covering the low, modernistic furniture with the ebony frames, black velour rugs covering the black-tiled floor. There were niches set in the walls at intervals, and they housed statuettes—black, of course—which I recognized as coming straight from primitive mythology or an Oriental art jobber. Dim light illumined the forms of many-armed Kali, grinning Bast, and a goggling Tibetan thunder god. I smelled incense and perfume. I also smelled money, and a rat.

Crown winked at me in the gloom, but Mrs. Brewster was properly impressed. We sat there and fidgeted as the chimes rang again, the Hindu opened the door, and several other seekers after Mystery entered the parlor. They eyed us nervously, but no one spoke.

Kali waved. Bast grinned. The Tibetan figure goggled. And the incense sent sinuous strands of scent through the draped darkness.

Drugs, hypnosis, auto-suggestion? Perhaps all played a part, but after a little while I forgot that this was all a phony stage setting, I forgot that I was sweating under the arms, I forgot that there are no supernatural manifestations. I closed my eyes and then the music came stealing from far away, the gong sonorously sounded, and I was walking with the rest into another parlor, where the spider waited.

She sat behind the gigantic octagonal table, a wooden web spun to ensnare foolish flies. She sat there, dressed in darkness, and as she bowed her black head I saw a white part that curved like an eternal question mark.

Her eyes were deep pools, and her voice seemed to issue from them rather than from her mouth. Her hands made strange, Sybilline gestures as she greeted us and urged us to take our places around the table. Eight places, eight people.

I came out of it long enough to look at Crown. Orlando Crown was obviously immune to exotic influences. His little eyes toured the room and blinked acknowledgment of all they saw. He noted the drapes, the candle-light, the deep recess at the far end of the chamber, the thick rug on the floor, the high ceiling with its beams set so as to obscure the faint, flickering flame of the candles.

Then he looked at Mrs. Prinn. He inspected her black velvet gown, eyeing the long, puffed sleeves. He glanced at her full skirt and at the loose slippers she wore And then he jostled against me as the others took their places and managed to whisper, “This is going to be a pushover! Why, she’s got the whole joint rigged up, you can see that—just an old-fashioned spook worker with enough props in her clothes to supply a whole tribe of Indians.”

I nodded and then, as Mrs. Prinn glanced at us, sat down nest to Crown.

There was a moment of coughing, a moment of rustling, a moment of settling back. Then came a long minute of complete silence. No organ music now, no gong, no chimes. Nothing but the soundless stirring of shadows in a room that was out of this world.

Mrs. Prinn sat there. Her gown was ebony, her flesh carved of marble. We waited for the statue to speak.

“Greetings. There are strangers amongst us this evening.”

Mrs. Brewster opened her mouth, but a glance from the medium sufficed to still her.

“That does not matter. We welcome the presence of new converts. Even the presence of disbelievers does not disconcert us. There is no greater good for the Cause than the conversion of a skeptic to the truth.

“I see that the gentleman on the end”—she nodded at Orlando Crown—“has taken the liberty of bringing a black bag. From previous experience, I assume that he has some test in mind.” She stared at Crown with a bleak smile.

“Oh, I’m sorry about this, Miss Prinn. Perhaps I should have told you. These gentleman—”

“No need to explain, Mrs. Brewster. The fact that they are your guests is enough for me.” The smile was less bleak. “If our skeptical friends wish to test this seance in any way, I shall be only too happy to cooperate.”

Crown placed his satchel on the table.

Everybody gaped.

“What is it you wish?” purred Mrs. Prinn. “Do you want to tape the doors, seal them? Sprinkle the floor with powder? String ropes across the room, or nets? Would you like to bind my hands and feet? Consider me a willing martyr at the altar of Science."

THERE was a subtle mockery in her tone, and Orlando Crown responded.

"Nothing so elaborate, I assure you. I merely thought it might be interesting to vary the usual procedure—the joining of hands customary at a seance."

"What do you propose instead?"

"These."

Orlando Crown dumped a pile of gleaming silver onto the table top.

"Handcuffs!" breathed Mrs. Brewster. "Oh, you aren't going to handcuff her, are you?"

"Not only her, but all of us. You see, I brought a dozen pair; enough and to spare."

"But—"

"Quite all right," said Mrs. Prinn. "We welcome tests. I assume you wish to place them upon our wrists at once. So if there are no objections, I'll ask Chardur to oblige."

"I'd rather see to it myself," Crown murmured.

"As you wish."

Orlando Crown was a fast man with a pair of cuffs. He passed around the table, linking wrist to wrist, trying and testing each set of cuffs and locking them into place quite securely. We sat chained to one another with but a single missing link.

"Now call Chardur, if you please." Crown sat down. "He can put the bracelets on me and complete the circle."

Chardur appeared, handcuffing Crown into place between Mrs. Brewster and myself.

"Does sahib wish me to keep the key?" inquired the Hindu.

"Not on your life! Sahib wishes you to put the key in his mouth."

"In his—?"

"You got me, brother! Put it in my mouth; I want to know where it is when the lights go out."

Orlando Crown grinned widely, and the key slipped into the grin.

"You may leave and lock the door, Chardur," called Mrs. Prinn. "But please extinguish the candles before you go."

"And after that," Crown called, "have die goodness to show yourself in the doorway as you go out. Just for the sake of skeptics."

THE candles went out. So did Chardur.

Eight of us sat in darkness around a table, handcuffed together like prisoners in the black hull of a slave ship.

I don't know what it's like inside the hold of a slave ship, but I imagine the air is filled with squeaks and groans, with hoarse breathing and the creaking of wind and sea and the forces outside.

The forces outside—

We weren't in a slave ship, but there were forces outside. Creaks, Groans. A chill wind, sighing and swirling. And Mrs. Prinn's voice from far away. A deep voice, in deeper darkness.

"Can you hear me? Can you hear me? I'm calling . . . calling . . . can you hear?"

Silence.

"I'm trying to make you hear . . . we are waiting. . . . I'm trying to lose . . . hard to fight against . . . lose my . . ."

Silence.

"I come."

It wasn't her voice. I've heard imitators, ventriloquists, and drunken sluts in taverns—but no woman can truly mimic the deep bass of a man.

This was a man's voice, guttural and strained through black barriers.

"Hard to find way. Someone fighting Someone evil."

It spoke like an Indian. It sounded like an Indian. And then—it looked like an Indian!

The whitness gathered over Mrs. Prinn's head. It wasn't phosphorescent, or filmy;, it gave forth no glow to light up a single inch of surrounding space. It was merely a formless whiteness that assumed form. I saw a man's head and arms emerge as though from a hole in the darkness—a hole that might have been Mrs. Prinn's open mouth.

Indian? I couldn't be sure, even when I saw the single braid on the shaven skull, th? single plums surmounting the dangling lock. The beaked nose emerged, and then the scarred or painted cheeks.

"Me Little Hatchet."

I was waiting for that, and I expected it to be corny. But it wasn't. Because I saw the face, emerging from nowhere; heard the voice emerging from nowhere. Or from somewhere not in this world.

"I come to warn. Evil here. Heap plenty. Enemy."

The handcuffed wrist attached to my own left hand now moved slowly. Crown was jerking my arm upwards.

"I see him. Gray-haired man. make trouble. I know name. Orlando Crown."

A great sigh went up, and this time I could recognize it as coming from Mrs. Prinn's mouth. The others were breathing hard. I listened, but at the same time I felt Crown's wrist moving mine up, up toward his mouth. Suddenly I understood his plan. He kept the key in his mouth for a purpose.

He now intended to unlock his own wrists from the handcuffs and creep over to investigate the Indian spirit guide. A clever man, Orlando Crown.

But apparently Little Hatchet didn't share my sentiments towards him. For the guttural voice droned on.

"He no believe. He no want truth. He want to make trouble, boast and lie. Spirits know. Spirits bate. Spirits send me to warn."

Fake or not, Mrs. Prinn knew Crown's name, all right. But how could she possibly know that—?

"He take off handcuffs now!"

The guttural voice was a triumphant shout.

"He come to find me. Must not do. Stay back!"

Crown had slipped away from my side at the table. There was a muffled murmur of movement in the darkness. The white blur swirled and swooped.

"Back! No—it is forbidden!"

I heard Crown gasp, knew that he was retreating to his chair again as the white figure of Little Hatchet soared forward, forcing him. The guttural voice was almost in my ear.

"Spirits command vengeance!"

THOSE were the last words I heard. But not the last sounds.

I heard a scream, and then something else—a sound I am sure that has not been uttered for over half a century on the face of the earth.

There was another scream, a groan, and then shrieks rose from all around the table. The white blur hovered over Crown; I tried to clutch at it, but felt nothing save the wave of ice that slithered up my arm, down my spine.

The first scream came from Crown, the shrieks came from the rest of the sitters, and now Mrs. Prinn was shouting in a normal voice.

"Lights! Hurry—lights!"

The shocking shape wavered into nothingness. There was a moment of darkness, and then Chardur entered the room and snapped a switch.

I've told it just the way it happened, or just the way I thought it happened there in the darkness with the distraction of phantom shape, phantom voice, and the final moment of madness to blot out all reasonable remembrance.

I've told it just the way I told it to the police, and nothing anyone else can say that; added to the story. Mrs. Brewster knows more, Mrs. Prinn cannot explain.

The police do not wish to believe that the seance was genuine. The police do not wish to believe in the existence of an Indian Spirit Guide. But there is nothing else to account for what happened—for that final ghastly sound which I identify as a war-whoop, and for what we saw when the lights went on. . . .

Yes, the lights went on and I saw Orlando Crown sitting in his chair once more. I stared at his head, which was like a bucket of blood and brains that had overflowed.

Maybe there is an Indian Spirit Guide and maybe there isn't. But as I stared at the red ruin of Orlando Crown's head, I believed at last.

For Orlando Crown had been scalped!

Satan's Servants

> "Satan's prevalencie of this Age is most clear in the marvellous number of Witches abounding in all places. Now hundreds are discovered in one Shire; and, if Fame deceives us not, in a village of Fourteen Houses in the North, are found so many of this Damned Brood

IT WAS QUITE evident that the inhabitants of Roodsford(1) did not come over in the Mayflower or any of her sister ships; that, indeed, they had not sailed from an English port at all. Nor is there a known and reputable record of their coming to that barren region of the north coast They simply entered the land unnoticed and without charter, permission or proviso, set up their simple dwellings.

They were let alone because their haven lay beyond the Massachusetts Bay's officious reach—in Maine, where the Puritan's autocratic hand did not descend till 1663. The first mention of the place occurs in the Chronicles of Captain Elias Codworthy, His Trips & Explorations upon the Continent of North America, printed by Haverstock in London, in 1672.(2) He describes it as "a fishing Towne of fourteen Houses, the Inhabitants of which wear doleful, ungodly Look in Keeping with Their meagre Dwellings.(3)

The good Captain had made but a cursory inspection whilst passing up the coast in a sloop bound for Nova Scotian shores, and evidently no one cared to follow up his testimony, for the name of Roodsford does not recur in Colonial history until the atrocious witchcraft days of ‘92. Then came investigation with a vengeance.

So for a time the people and the ways of Roodsford were to the outer world very largely unknown. Even in Portsmouth they were only an unsavoury legend, while at York all mention of them was avoided by common consent.

How Gideon Godfrey of Boston gleaned his story is as yet undetermined. Perhaps he had heard some of the queer hints and furtive, whispered rumors circulated by the savages or traders(4) who made occasional trips down the coast with supplied of furs, or perhaps something had come out in the closer surveys of Maine which accompanied its fusion with the Massachusetts Bay in 1690. Whatever the source, Gideon must have known or suspected a great deal—for only the most urgent contingency could have caused this man of God to do what he subsequently did.

In the early autumn of 1693 he moved lock, stock and barrel to a dirty little village of foreigners, in a barren wilderness seventy miles up the coast as the crow flies and fully ten miles more by the winding, ferry-broken land route. He left behind him a wife, two children, and a goodly Boston pulpit to ride, univited and unannounced, to Roodsford.

Gideon was a pillar of the Church. His fiery sermons, fanatical devotion to the cause of the Puritans, and stoical stamina under the rigors and hardships of a new land were belied, however, in his ascetic countenance and asthenic physique, which gave him the outward appearance of a gangling parson. Only in his fiery, unflinching eyes was there a hint of the ardour which made him the veritable embodiment of the Orthodox Church of the Massachusetts Bay(5) asherode into the wilderness to do battle with the heathen.

His going caused much comment. Although he had gained the approval of his superiors, most folk deemed it a rash venture. Gideon, the wise ones declared, was a Fool. And in the minds of the elders there was more of apprehension than approbation.

Nevertheless, Gideon Godfrey left Boston on horseback one morning in late September, 1693, amidst the lamentations of Friends and Family. Before departure he had outlined his route of travel to the Pasquanlog sachems who knew something of the region through which he would journey. His plan was to ride to Newbury and spend the night, then go on to Portsmouth the following day before turning west. After that, save for a brief pause at the little village of York, Gideon would be riding straight through the unblazed forest byways feared by settlers and savages alike.

When Gideon thus charted his journey, the Indians shook their heads. Strange horror, they whispered, crept through those ancient woods and leered down from the brooding hills. They warned him of the perils of riding alone, or venturing into certain secluded forest byways after the coming of night. They counseled him to keep to the coast and stay within a circle of fire if forced to stop between towns betwixt dusk and dawn.

Gideon was most eager to secure more details concerning his destination, but when he asked the Pasquantogs what they knew of Roodsford they shook their heads and pretended not to understand his questionings. Wakimis, the elder sachem, begged him to abandon his journey, and finally proferred the services of two guides who would travel on foot.

Thus they started out, and for the first two days their schedule was maintained with fair ease—Newbury was reached, then Portsmouth, then York.

The next day they plunged at dawn into an unknown world. There was a blue mist over the western hills and a grey fog on the sea. The chill of autumn lay light upon the air, and russet leaves would soon carpet the ground(6). After Kittery and York were left behind they turned inland, though the guides again echoed the warnings of Wakimis when they contemplated the blackly wooded route before them. The sea was soon lost to view, and the booming voice of its waters was stilled in their ears.

They journeyed now in forest twilight. Blue shadows hung athwart the twisted pathway, or lurked beside the boles of immemorially ancient trees. Strange rustlings echoed from far-off tangled byways, bringing to Gideon's mind the sachem's tales of fabled presences in the forest. Once there came the remote evil laughter of a trickling brook, whereat the guides drew back, and Gideon's horse whinnied piteously; but Godfrey himself gave no sign of having heard.

Their way led them through a wood forever denser, vet with deceptive suggestions of brandling paths which gave rise to temporary loss of bearings. Again and again time was lost, till at length Gideon's carefully arranged daylight travelling schedule seemed likely to prove of no avail.(7)

Fording a swiftly-charging stream shortly after midday, they came upon a still more forbidding expanse of forest where the path was merely a vague outline in shrouding gloom. Here all was silent amidst the darkness, and the small familiar voices of bird and animal were unnaturally mute. Indeed, bird and animal life seemed singularly absent, nor were there the usual insects. Even the vegetation was oddly altered; they saw neither leaves, grass, nor ordinary shrubbery—only the great black shadows of old and withered trees.

One of the savages whispered that the woods were known in Pasquantog lore; he spoke of fissures and seams in the earth near certain of the denser swamps, and of queer voices that answered when the medicine-men called. Tribal legend hinted at these beings, half-animal and halfhuman, who held conclaves in the grottoes and glibbered rituals deep in the earth. The White Ice—by which he meant the glaciers—had done away with many of these things, but surviving presences existed still, hidden and waiting in the forest fastness.(8) That was why the animals and birds had fled to safer preserves in the north, where the tribe usually hunted.

“Turn back now,” the guide counselled. “Soon conies night, and we shall be lost. We are brave men, and you carry mighty medicine in your Black Book, I know. But what good is the White God’s magic against the demons that thunder in the earth?”

The other guide eagerly assented and urged that they at least cut across to the coast if they could not reach Kittery or York before darkness.

Gideon listened, tightlipped and Silent, and his hand searched out the great Bible in his left saddle-pack.

He clutched the book to his bosom and sat erect in the saddle.

“Hear me out,” he said. “It is in my mind that much truth lies in your heathen wisdom, for we dwell in an unknown and unhallowed land. Have not Increase and Cotton Mather, as well as other godly and eminent divines, affirmed that ibis America is the Devil’s paradise? Have not we discovered witchcraft in the very centers of civilization, hanging(9) the wizards in Boston and Salem? And are not these self-same witches and warlocks the minions of Satan who is lately be-stirred the entire continent of Europe?

“I have had some slight experience in these matters. I was present at the trial of the notorious Mary Wright and talked to a pious and famous witch-finder, Jeremy Edmunds; he who has told us in his sermons of the geography of Hell—finding it to be exactly four thousand, three hundred and twenty-seven miles in circumference. It was he who urged me to dedicate myself to this journey.”

As he spoke, Gideon was conscious of his inability to translate and transmit Edmunds’ message to these simple savages. The great man had indeed spoken at length of the witchcraft menace; of the foul plague of sorcery which was even now ravaging Europe as well as the colonies. He told Gideon of the damage these creatures had wrought—of storms conjured up at sea, of children deranged, of cattle ravaged by disease. He spoke of the witches and their familiars; bats, mice, ousels, cats and animals unknown to any Bestiary, creatures of evil in animal form bestowed upon witches as counselors and protectors by the Devil. Edmunds mentioned the various tests then in fashion whereby witches might be detected—trial by water, the search for witch-marks, and other scientific means of determining guilt.

“Since I learned of the extent of Satan’s hold over this land, I have sought unceasingly to discover the source of this peril to our people,” Godfrey continued. The Indians listened stolidly enough, but their shifting feet and the sidelong covert glances they bestowed upon the forest’s surrounding shadows gave token of their unease.

Gideon tried to explain his mission—how he had preached his sermon against the Adversary and corresponded extensively with witch-finders in England, meanwhile meeting with brother parsons in Salem, Plymouth, Newport and the inland towns. All references in the Bible had been most assiduously studied, and from obscure sources he had secured dogeared and decaying copies of strange and terrible books. He had read the blasphemous accounts in the cryptic Necronomicon and the queer verse-sequence of Heber’s Daemonic Presences with its sly hints and subtle allusions to the Fable of the Tree and the Fruit. In a manner befitting the true scholar, he endeavored to lay hands on all that had been written concerning the subject at hand, and he listened, as well.

Gradually, Gideon’s interest had shitted to the direct study of those about him. He traced down rumors, sought the sources of stories told by isolated farmers in the far-off hills. There were the Indian myths to ponder upon as well; incredible legends of creatures who had lurked in the lands to the west and fled at the coming of the whites. The Pasquantogs held ancient beliefs concerning presences who had come to the earth from the sky or crawled out of caverns upon suitable evocation.

Many of these legends were far too fantastic for credence, but others ominously paralleled normal Christian dogma.

Horned entities—creatures with wings and hoofs—cloven footprints found in swamps—giant stags speaking in the voices of men—black beings dancing in forest glens to the sound of drums deep within the earth—these things the savages feared even as Christians did. Such stories fired Gideon with fresh zeal, and more momentous still were the actual reports of specific instances which he gleaned from visitors and hunters who dealt with isolated and half-for gotten settlements.

Here in New England whole villages had mysteriously disappeared, not through famine or Indian attack, but by the simple process of evaporation. One day they existed and the next day nothing remained but a cluster of empty houses. Other communities held dark communion under midnight moons, and children of neighboring villages were known to have vanished mysteriously just before such occasions. Sometimes a minister reached a neighboring town with an account of his rejection by parishioners in favor of new and secret ways of worship. There was talk of ceremonies in which both white men and savages adored a common altar; of isolated, towns grown suddenly and amazingly prosperous in barren wilds.

More dreadful still were the mumbled accounts of strange happenings in isolated graveyards; of open graves, of coffins seemingly burst from within, of graves that were not deep enough for their purpose and of graves there were far too deep, leading to tunnels beneath the earth.

These tales and others of like nature, together with the written testimony he gathered, increased steadily during the year or more of Gideon’s investigation. But appeals to authority for the commissioning of a crusade into the hinterlands met with no success. The courts were overburdened with local witchcraft trials. Storm as he would that the evil must be stamped out at its source, Gideon’s sermons and appeals fell upon deaf ears. Slowly he realized that he could look for no outside aid in his battle with the Adversary.

“I have but one ally,” he concluded, to the Pasquantog guides. “The Almighty attends me in this mission.

“For whilst the courts labor against a few aged men and women who practise sorcery in Salem or Boston Town, the gravest source of Evil still testers here in the wilds, crouches in the forest and broods on these silent and secret hills. Gallows Hill(10) cannot accommodate all the minions of Satan. This I have long since concluded.

“It has been in my mind that even as the godly have their houses of worship in which to gather and to spread the Gospel unto all, so must the spawn of Satan have budded an unsanctilied sanctuary of their own. If this could be found, reached, and destroyed, then the forces of Evil could he dissipated and the hand of the Devil lifted from the land.

“Lately there came to me news of the lone village where the black northern forest pressed down on a desolate coast—this Roodsford. And it was as though revelation were made; surely, I thought, this must be the very center of sin I seek!

“I have ridden forth to destroy it, and I shall not turn hack. For the Lord is with me, and with you, and there is nothing to fear. No, my friends, we shall go on and do what must be done. Let us not speak again of returning until our task is accomplished.”

So saving, Gideon lifted his Bible in a blessing, and with his left hand he cocked a pistol which he pointed at the guides for added emphasis. Thus assured of his earnest conviction, the guides offered no further protest when Gideon hid them move forward down the trail into the gathering night.

Gideon, despite his outward show of assurance, felt his stomach quake with trepidation, for he knew full well the dangers amongst which he placed himself. He feared the aspect of this night-wood almost as mightily as did the guides, and he was not reassured to sense the body of his horse trembling as if taken with a sudden fever. But he still had his Bible and his prayers, plus the small comfort of a new lantern which he now lit and tendered to one of the Pasquantogs who led the way.

Unexpectedly, they came upon an open glade in the midst of the forest. Here, beneath a turbulent sky, dimly illumined by a cloud-choked moon, Godfrey and his two companions prepared to spend the night. Reaching Roodsford this evening was obviously out of the question, and the savages seemed oddly relieved when Gideon called a hall and tethered his horse.

Silently the Pasquantogs gathered dry wood for afire and kindled it, Indian fashion, at the base of a cairn in the center of the clearing. There followed a brief repast of salt pork and-corn bread(11) taken from one of Gideon's capacious saddlebags. The horse was fed and watered—for one of the guides discovered a brook that crawled in sluggish murk along one side of the clearing—then tethered again to a sapling at the edge of the glade.

There was little conversation, for the spoken word seemed to sling to the vast, silent pool of the surrounding night The Pasquantogs lay down upon their blankets and gave themselves up to uneasy prayers to the guiding Manitou. Gideon paid them no heed, but sat lone by the lantern-light, his pistol across his lap and his Bible in hand, reading aloud softly and steadfastly from the tale of Jehu the witch-hunter.

After a time he closed the book and placed it beneath his head for a pillow. Then he extinguished the lantern and the night came down. He lay there for long moments in the darkness, fighting the panic which came with the baleful blanketing of blackness. Steadfastly, Gideon prayed himself to sleep. So the long night passed, and slowly the flame of dawn kindled the heads of the giant trees.

As Gideon awoke from dream-bedazzled sleep, he stared about the clearing with new comprehension. In last night's gloom he had not taken cognizance of the unnatural and artificial aspects of the glade. Now for the first time he noticed how smooth was the turf surrounding the great triad of white stones at its center. He regarded the peculiar geometrical conformation of the rocks themselves; the carefully chipped and pointed angles which bore such a calculated relation to the positions of certain of the major stars upon summer nights. There were a few grotesque carvings at the base of the stones which were obviously the product of human handicraft; crude designs which resembled the signs and symbols Gideon had seen in some of the mouldering books of elder lore.

Could he have unwittingly chosen to pass the night in one of the meeting-places the Indians had spoken of with such dread? If so, perhaps it was only his prayers which had protected him.

Thus Gideon mused, his eyes roving the glade. Then he sat bolt upright with a sudden start, as he realized that he was now the sole occupant of the clearing.

His horse and the two guides were gone.

II

ALONE IN THE WILDERNESS, Gideon Godfrey took counsel with himself. He had but two possible alternatives; the first being to retrace his foot-steps and endeavor to overtake the Pasquantogs and his horse and either reclaim his property by force or join them on the trip back to civilization. The second alternative, obviously, was to continue on to Roodsford alone.

To a man of sense, the first course was undoubtedly advisable. But Gideon was not a man of sense—lie was a man of God. As such, he determined, he would complete his mission. Without food, water, steed or guide he meant to travel today through the forest and reach Roodsford before nightfall. He still had his pistol and his Bible but these were as nothing compared to his faith.

He drank and washed at the brook, then rose, gave one last parting glance to the singular altar-stones within the clearing, and turned his eyes resolutely forward to woods.

As Gideon tried the cryptic byways of the lonely fastness, his thoughts were far away. He was endeavoring now to formulate a new plan of procedure. It had been his original intention to ride into Roodsford on horseback and proceed immediately to go about the business of exorcising the spot with certain efficacious incantations as he had gleaned from the forbidden volumes over which he had pored so diligently. He was confident that he had transcribed spells of fearsome potency which would dispel the evil-doers before they could overcome him either physically or through magical means. Now all this must be abandoned, for the copies of the runes reposed in one of the saddlebags on the back of the missing horse.

Gideon's faith in the righteousness of his cause remained unshaken, even though hunger grew in his belly with the rising sun. His stride lengthened as he passed through a grove of bearded trees that muttered in the morning breeze like sage elders in some secret council. Then he emerged upon the bank of a goodly river which he must wade, then swim across, wetting himself to the skin and all but perishing in the turbulent concourse of waters. The tidal margin was high, but Gideon managed to clamber through, holding Bible and pistol alike aloft, at no small peril to his own safety.

He did not pause to dry his garments, but walked briskly along the opposite bank, for an empty stomach makes for haste. He covered several miles—many, however, on side-trails on which he had to backtrack his way(12)—before the shortened rays of the sun betokened the approach of late afternoon. It was then that he came upon the jutting peak of a lone hill, rising out of the encircling forest like a newly-emerged island from the green waves of the sea. This was the place where he turned in a northeasterly direction to the coast, and he quickened his pace so that he might come to his destination well before nightfall. But there were other mistakes made without the service of a guide, and he wandered again and again from the path, so that night descended all too soon.

Strange shadows haunted the New England dusk. The drowsy hum of autumn was in the air, and the landscape shimmered in a wan mist, borne on a moaning night wind from the waters to the east.

It was dark when Gideon saw a deep inlet of the sea. A gibbous moon hung over the fog-wreathed waters, and by the pallid light above the high bluff, Gideon Godfrey first beheld the village of Roodsford.

At first glance there was nothing extraordinary about the sight of the little community set against the background of ancient forest. Fourteen tiny two story frame houses(13) stood huddled about the needle-like spire of a crude church in prosaic and orthodox fashion. Gideon peered at them and wondered what there was about their aspect and setting which was awry. Perhaps it was the crazy slant of their gables to the sea; mayhap he sensed the strangeness in the absence of friendly lights in the gaping windows and upon the jutting wharf below the bluff. But all this was commonplace enough. Gideon stared and pondered at the spectacle.

Then it came to him that no road wound cheerily away amongst the hills; no figures moved along the single street. The town was silent, desolate and lone.

Gideon stood for long moments contemplating the scene, and for longer moments contemplating his own plight. Enter Roodsford he must, but neither Bible nor pistol would serve to rout any evil he might encounter there. No; this was a situation which called for cunning and stratagem; one must fight fire with fire and Gideon knew he was face to face with the Adversary, the Father of Lies.

Gideon Godfrey, servant of the Lord, would not be welcome in Roodsford, if rumor and repute held truth. But a stranger, lost in the forest, might find shelter. He might be given an opportunity to spend some time in the village; to observe and overhear, to plan a strategy.

Yes, that was now the only way. Gideon walked a few paces until he found a large stone beside the path. Here he knelt and scrabbled at the hard earth, hollowing out a place of concealment for his Bible. He rose, gripping his pistol, then made a wry face as he considered its uselessness. He might fire it once, but he lacked powder and ball for any further use. With a sigh, he placed the pistol alongside the Bible and then covered the hiding-place with loose earth, replacing the rock. He noted the spot well, before striding down toward the village in the gloom of night.

No dogs howled at his coming, but the wind whispered strangely as he approached the end of the little crooked street between the huddled dwelling-places. The first house loomed ahead in shrouded darkness to his left, far back from the dusty, unpaved street. Gideon paused and considered whether or not to continue his progress, then shrugged. For his purpose, one house was as good as another; as a lone wanderer, lost In the forest, he would be most apt to seek shelter at the first door along his path.

Gideon walked up to the black, iron-knockered door set between two shuttered windows. He plied the knocker against the timbers until a booming resonation filled the brooding stillness of the street(14) For a long moment he stood there, sensing naught but the diminution of the echoes, and then, with a screech and a shudder, the door swung open.

“Welcome,” said a voice from the inner gloom. “Welcome to Roodsford.”

Gideon stepped over the threshold and into another world.

III

FOR A MOMENT GIDEON STOOD engulfed in darkness and silence, then started violently as the darkness was broken by lantern-light and the silence shattered by the screech of the closing door.

Eyes and ears affrighted by sudden sensation, Gideon steeled himself against any revelation. Yet nothing he might have imagined was comparable to the shock of actuality—for he now beheld himself standing in a room that was utterly normal in its aspect.

It was the low-raftered parlor of a typical New England farmhouse, complete with stone fireplaces, hand-hewn furniture, rough flooring covered by the skins of animals. Gideon’s gaze encountered naught but the familiar fixtures of family existence in die wilderness; he even noted a spinning-wheel near the window alcove to his right.

Nor was he able to detect anything unusual in the aspect of his host, who turned now, lantern in hand, to confront him with a welcoming smile. The man before him was stooped and bent, with lined face and grizzled beard. He squinted up at Gideon with a cheerful grin and extended a gnarled hand in greeting.

"I fear you roused me from slumber," he said. "I am alone here and it is my custom to retire early, for It is not often that visitors honor me with their presence." He glanced self-consciously at his homespun shirt and breeches. "I must make shift with what garment I possess," he continued, "for there is no one to tend to my needs. You will excuse my appearance."

Gideon nodded, then cleared his throat. "It is I who must apologize. I have gone astray in my journeyings, I fear."

"We see few travelers here," the old man observed, eyeing Gideon closely. "You must have strayed far indeed."

Gideon met his stare and smiled. "I would gladly tell you of my journey. At the moment I am somewhat tired and more than a little hungry—"

The hint did not pass unnoticed.

"Of course. You are welcome to sup and spend the night here."

Thus prosaically began Gideon's stay in Roodsford; as the house guest of old Dorcas Frye. Dorcas was a widower who had come here in 74; he lived alone, hunted and fished, kept his own household. This Gideon learned during the serving of a simple repast—this, and nothing more, although he attempted to draw out his host with remitting patience. But Dorcas Frye proved taciturn and evasive by turns.

Ordinarily, Gideon would have accepted stich reticence as normal and natural—for it was not the way of the Puritan to be overly friendly with casual strangers. But suspecting what he did, Gideon read a baleful meaning into his host's unwillingness to talk about himself.

Yet there was nothing to justify any suggestion of hidden secrets or closely-guarded mysteries. The house looked typical, Dorcas seemed a harmless enough elderly settler, and there wasn't even a hint of abnormality, until—

There came a scratching and scrabbling. Gideon's spoon clashed against the pewter bowl as he started erect, but his trepidation was as naught compared to that of his host. At the sound, old Dorcas seemed transfixed with terror. And yet, even in the brief moment of awareness, Gideon sensed that the terror was not directed towards the scratching noise, or what might produce it—the old man was afraid because Gideon heard the sound.

A scratching and a scrabbling. Gideon turned towards the door, noting that his host made no move to open it. At the same time he realized the reason; the very nature of the sound itself told him that it did not come from the direction of the door. Whatever person, or animal, or demon of the night might be rasping nail or claw to produce the noise, the resultant product was not caused by a scraping against wood. This was the sound of scraping against metal, or against stone—and it did not come from the direction of the door.

Gideon Godfrey's gaze encompassed the room. Was there a panel, a compartment? But how could there be, and of stone or metal? Then he noted Dorcas Frye's stare. The old man was peering at the floor under the table.

The scraping sound grew louder, became a tangible presence in the room. It was no longer possible for one to pretend not to hear, and in a moment it became impossible to pretend not to see.

For the floor rose.

A portion of the hardpacked earthern floor beneath the table was moving upwards. Gideon's glance pierced into the shadows, noted for the first time that there was a solid stone surface, a moving surface; recognized the rectangular outline of a trapdoor.

Dorcas was on his feel, and a moment later Gideon stood up—stood up and retreated to the wall as the trapdoor continued to rise.

Without a glance at his guest, the old man stooped and tugged the edge of the door. Gideon saw a black, well-like opening, from which issued further blackness; a moving, tangible blackness that was alive.

The blackness had a red mouth and yellow fangs, red eyes and grey, pointed claws; it was too large for a cat and too small for a wolf, and most men would have identified it as a hound. But Gideon knew that this was no ordinary black dog—anyone well-versed in the ways of witchcraft could recognize a familiar.

The beast emerged from the cistern-like opening in the earth and squatted, panting and slavering, blinking in the candlelight. For a moment it seemed unaware of Gideon's presence, and then a low growl issued from the crimson cavern of its throat. Dorcas instantly grasped it by its forepaws and restrained it, but the growling increased in volume and accelerated in tempo.

Gideon continued to press against the wall. He stood there, staring at man and beast squatting before him, stood there listening to the baying of the hound, stood there sensing the wrongness of it all. For unless he were completely bemused, something was hideously awry. The cadence of the growling was almost conversational, and Dorcas bent his head in a pose that could only be construed as that of a listener. The great dog growled, and the old man listened, and then they both sat and stared at Gideon.

He knew, then. There was no longer room for any possibility of doubt. Each witch, each wizard or warlock dedicated to the Devil, is assigned a familiar; an imp or sprite or evil spirit sent by Satan in the guise of an animal to counsel and advise, to assist and abet, to watch and to warn. Nourished by blood from the body of the master, the creature serves and protects always. This was Dorcas Frye's familiar—the hound of Hell.

Gideon Godfrey knew, and they knew that he knew. The moment for pretense was past for all of them. Nothing remained but to act. If Dorcas acted, it would be to release the great beast, release it to tear at Gideon's throat. And in a moment he Would act, unless—

Gideon spoke.

"I see I have indeed found sanctuary," he said.

"Sanctuary?" The echoed reply was an incredulous curse in Dorcas Frye's mouth, but he held the hound still.

"Until I saw the trapdoor I was not sure, but now I know." Gideon forced a smile to his lips, but Dorcas averted his gaze in confusion.

"I do not understand," he said. "I am but a simple Farmer. As you see, the beast is ill-trained; he is of use to me in hunting but I find I must keep him in restraint at other times. Hence I digged this pit—"

Gideon saw his host’s hesitancy displayed in his gnarled hands. Gradually they were loosing their grip about the dog’s neck. In an instant, should hesitancy give way to decision, he would let the creature spring. Gideon moved quickly.

“Come,” he said. “There is no need to deceive me. I know, else I would not have come at this time. I should like to see what lies beneath the house.” Unhesitatingly, he walked towards the table, pushed it back, and knelt by the rim of the pit.

As he had surmised, crude footholds had been fashioned in the slanting earth beneath. Gideon was prepared for the domination of the darkness, but the waft of mephitic fetor from below was almost unbearable. Still he smiled as he glanced over his shoulder at Dorcas and the hound.

“Light my way,” he urged. “Can it be that you are afraid to accompany me?”

The taunt was sufficient. Dorcas gripped a candle with one hand and held the dog by the scruff of the neck with his other hand. Slowly, he knelt and placed his feet gingerly, dragging the black beast behind him. Gideon prepared to follow.

For a moment he felt an irresistable impulse to take flight. It would be simple now to slam down the stone covering to the pit, place the stout table squarely upon the trapdoor and flee into the night. The night was dark and foreboding, but a deeper darkness lurked here below. It would be simple, it would be easy—but Gideon had a mission.

He breathed deeply, then lowered himself into the pit.

They clambered down; the wrinkled wizard, the hound of Hell, and the man of God, descending into the blackness of the bourne. The candle cast shadows on the earthen walls; shadows that crept and capered their way towards inner depths. Gideon counted fifty footholds, then felt solid shale beneath his feet.

Now they were in a corridor; now they walked silently along until they reached a large chamber carved out of the solid stone. The air was cleaner, moistly cool, and Gideon surmised they must be close to the inlet of the sea.

Dorcas led the way, tugging the hound behind him, and Gideon followed, followed until they rounded a corner of the cavern and emerged into the great dazzling center of light.

The huge chamber was empty, or seemed so at first glance. Gideon saw a vast circular expanse, an underground grotto of stone, with perhaps a dozen lesser entrances spaced at intervals around the walls—entrances similar to the one in which they stood, and undoubtedly reached from other houses in the street above by the same means; trapdoor and tunnel. He saw the carvings on the walls and recognized them, then turned his gaze to the center of the cavern and saw the altar, which he likewise recognized as similar to the stone in the forest clearing.

There were two figures lying across the top of the altar stone.

Gideon moved forward, peering, eyes dazzled by the light which he now perceived came from tapers set in niches along the grotto walls. He moved forward, Dorcas and the hound at his heels, watching, waiting, hesitating. There was something about the figures on the altar which Gideon wanted to verify.

Half-way across the stone floor of the cavern he halted. A sudden rush of sound assailed his ears, coming from behind and below the other side of the altar. It was a noise composed of many individual noises; rustlings, cheepings, chitterings, cachinnations in cacophony. And then the sound became a sight; a sight rising over the rim of the altar. Again, the sight was composed of many things.

A black, arched furry back . . . a flaring of leathery wings . . . a lashing, tiny tail . . . a fanged grimace . . . a diadem of yellow eyes . . . an arc of curving claw . . .

They crawled atop the altar in a wave; the cat, the bat, the ousel, the rat, the grinning grimalkin risen from haunted dreams. They spat and snarled and leered and mocked at Gideon as he recognized them for what they were—brothers of the dog behind him, minions of the pit, the familiars of the witches of Roodsford. They squatted on the altar, clawing at the two all-too familiar figures that lay silently there. They squatted and they stared at Gideon, as if daring his further approach. They hissed at him and threatened with eyes and teeth and paws.

Dorcas and the hound were very close behind. Gideon could hear the rasp of the old man’s breath, the deep panting of the black beast. Still there was nothing to do but peer at the altar; peer and finally recognize the truth.

The two atop the altar were dead, but Gideon knew them now. He saw the two Indian guides who had deserted him in the forest.

How stalked, how slain, how brought here for sacrifice? How prepared now to shock him into admission of identity?

Gideon could not ponder. His every move was studied as he stood within a circle of yellow eyes.

Then the voice of Dorcas Frye croaked out, echoing through the vaulted arch of the pit.

“You have seen. Have you naught to say?”

Gideon stood silent a moment. This was the crisis. He thought of invocation and of prayer, cast the thought aside. It was not the time. But there never would be a time unless he spoke and spoke aright. Inwardly, he prayed for guidance.

They watched him for a long moment, watched him as he turned to Dorcas Frye and smiled.

“Everything is as I would desire,” he said. “You have slain the two Pasquantogs and disposed of the horse as well, I note. That is good. No one could possibly have noted my coming. I shall stay with you now until the Sabbat. You are a wise and faithful servant.”

Dorcas Frye’s eyes widened as Gideon spoke. The mention of the horse was an inspiration on Gideon’s part—and at the utterance of the words “Sabbat” and “servant,” the old man’s mouth gaped.

“Who—who are you?” he whispered. There was silence in the cavern as he bent forward for a reply; silence as the creatures of the night peered up at Gideon and awaited an answer.

Gideon smiled and shrugged. His hands signed the cross in reverse.

“Do you not recognize me?” he asked. “I am the Messenger of the Master, sent to prepare the way for his coming. I am Asmodeus—Prince of Hell!”

IV

LATER—MUCH LATER—Gideon slept, in the chambers alcove, upon a couch of deerskin. But not before he explained that his coming was but a test of Dorcas Fry’s fidelity to Satan; not before he had perjured his way into complete acceptance; not before the fawning hound had licked his fingers.

The seventy-odd inhabitants of Roodsford had been summoned to the dark chamber to greet him, and toasts were drunk in a strange wine. Gideon chose to be silent in his new role, and to play the listener. His choice was accepted, nor did the strangers he met find it unusual or unseemly that a demon in human form should be reserved and demanding.

He spoke only enough to convey the pretense that all he heard was already known to him, but inwardly he quaked, and when finally he sought slumber he found only a delirium of dreams.

The days that followed seemed but a continuation of initial nightmare. Gideon deemed it wise to remain, as Dorcas Frye’s guest although he came and went as he chose, as befitted a Prince of Hell. None durst question him closely, although he asked questions in plenty. Ready respect and ready answers were accorded him always.

He learned of the growth of Roodsford, of the initial coming to these bleak and barren shores at a date which sounded incredible to his ears. Still, that alone could explain the mouldering antiquity of their houses—so seemingly decrepit and poorly-fashioned on the exterior, but possessed of the labyrinthian passageways to the secret vaults beneath.

Gideon was told why the Indians had fled, but why the hunting and fishing were so good despite the fears of the animals who wisely shunned the spot; he learned, too, why crops grew lushly in rocky soil, and from whence came the exotic herbs used in charm and philtre.

There were those who spoke to him of the storms raised at sea, so that two stout and goodly ships had foundered off these shores. These had been salvaged, and some of the passengers saved, only to be given later in sacrifice. Food and luxuries had been procured from the vessels, but his informants were most pleased that some of the bodies of the drowned had been delivered from the sea.

When told of the uses to which these corpses had been put, Gideon's mask slipped badly, but there was worse to come.

He learned, gradually, why there were no children amongst the inhabitants of Roodsford, and he wondered at the absence of a common graveyard.

And then, one night, he learned—

" 'Tis good you came," Dorcas Frye told him, between gulps of the dark, heavy rum he'd been consuming throughout the early evening.

"For as your Master knows, our plans are near completion. Long have we bided on this bleak coast, abuilding for the future; living in hovels mean and small to avoid suspicion, and conducting our worship under ground. And now the time of reckoning draws nigh."

Gideon nodded as the old man poured a brimming beaker.

"I'm the leader, you might say, of the Coven. As such, I owe responsibility to none but the Master himself. I'm honored that you were sent to help me plan the Sabbat, for it means we are ready. Ready at last! Ready to rise and rule."

Ready to rise and rule. Gideon was on the track at last, and he drew his host out at length. Nor was the drunken oldster reluctant to babble freely.

The domain of Satan must expand, he said. Cotton Mather had not been far wrong when he said America was the witches' paradise. But it could never be held by ignorant old women or queer rural wizards. It was true that some thousands of these folk resided in New England, but they were for the most part isolated and unorganized. They limited their activities to clumsy attempts at brewing potions, or casting minor spells and afflictions on their enemies. Even the flying trips through the wild and smoke-crowned hills resulted in naught but nocturnal revels and a few meaningless ceremonies which could bring naught of pleasure to Satan the All-Lowest.

Besides, the persecution of witches had resulted in a sad diminution of worship. It was time for Roodsford to act, and to this end had its people builded and abided.

Once let an organized band of believers fall upon the cities and claim them for the Master—then all would give way before them. There was unrest in the Colonies today; many people were tired of the restrictions of the Church and the taxes of the King. They would rise if given encouragement. For the others, there would be plague and pestilence, storm and famine, with the Devil's help.

It needed only bold action. A foray on a village, a descent upon a town, a gradual encroachment and engulfment, and within a year or two the country would be won. It was unlikely that Mother England would take much note of her recalcitrant colonial possessions, and if so, there were always storms and mistrials, and strange creatures awaited a summoning from sea-slimed depths.

Then would America become truly the land of Satan! The Antichrist would overcome the Kingdom of Heaven, and the unholy federation of the new world might even in time rise and smite the churches of the old.

"But there are so few of you," Gideon objected, knowing as he spoke that there was some mystery unrevealed.

"Yet as you realize, we cannot be harmed," Dorcas Frye chuckled in reply. "In that lies our strength. Once our enemies in town and village realize this, they will flee before us. Surely, you understand how it will be."

"Surely," Gideon nodded.

"And now we must prepare for the Sabbat, prepare for the coming of the Master. He will proclaim the day of his rule, order and instruct us from the Great Hill."

They could not be harmed.

Gideon pondered that as Dorcas droned oil Soon would come All-Hallows Eve and the night of Sacrifice. Then would(15) they strike and with a vengeance.

They had come here over a hundred years ago and there were no children.

Gideon pieced together the hints, and Dorcas told him of the coming festival, of the sacrifices of cattle awaiting, of the children to be taken from the village of Wells.

They could not be harmed and there were no graveyards in Roodsford,

Gideon gazed as Dorcas, who spoke like a man, drank like a man, looked like a man, but who was more, or less, than any man alive.

Alive The people of Roodsford were living dead.

That was the secret. For this they had sold their souls to Satan, so they could live past their appointed time without harm. In a flash Gideon recalled not only the absence of children, but the predominance of oldsters. He recalled the glee with which they told of the recovery of drowned bodies—new habitations for the lost souls, the damned souls. Soon as army of undead would be abroad in the land, striking terror and bringing death to the godly. Soon. Very soon.

“We’ll learn on Sabbat-Even,” Dorcas droned.

Gideon knew that Sabbat-Eve was but three nights distant.

He excused himself, shortly thereafter, but not until the moon was high over the domed hills.(16) He already knew that he had been assigned the seventh place in the Coven(17) upon the coming night, but there yet remained the problem of what to do about it.

As he slipped through the darkness towards the trees that loomed beyond Roodsford, Gideon remembered only one thing.

There were only three nights until the Sabbat . . .

V

THE SUN SANK SULLENLY in the hovering western hills, and murky darkness fell upon New England. Prayers were muttered in ten thousand homes, services offered up in a hundred hamlets, charms recited and spells inscribed upon amulets, doors barred and churches bolted.

Was it not Hallow-Mass, the Night of the Mack Lord? It was the night of the eldritch vision, of mildewed magic, of the flying ointment, of the heart torn bloody and dripping from the breast, of the black bullock of sacrifice, of the whimpering child ravished from the home, of the horned moon, of the fire of sacrifice.(18)

The Pasquantogs offered up strange prayers, and the squaws jumbled knowingly in the wigwam darkness. Old crones and hoary grand-sires were absent from their hovels, and heifers and cats alike seemed to have disappeared. As for the great Cotton Mather, he was sick abed with a colic, devil-sent.

It was Hallow-Mass, and drums thundered on the northern hills, throbbing and pulsing, chanting of the Sabbat. Sometimes they whispered of secrets buried beneath stark New England crags that were old when man was young and others shambled through the blackness and howled worship in the autumn night. Sometimes they roared out a challenge of defiance to all sanity. Sometimes they beat out messages to listeners from Beyond, invitations to attend the revels to come.

Roodsford lay deserted beneath the gloating moon, but beyond the forest, at the Great Hill, all had assembled. The women leading the bullocks, the men smeared with the unguents of evil, the celebrants from afar had gathered to squat upon the mildewed turf within the circle of stones. Crouching and nestling beside them were pawing, furry hordes of night; the familiars, imp-spawn of Abaddon.

Gideon Godfrey stood beside the altar-stone, staring into the blackness ringing the circling hills. His was a signal honor, for he was one of the three appointed to lead the bullocks unto sacrifice. The tethered beasts lowed dolorously, shaking their massive heads. Black candles had been attached to their horns and scent sprinkled over their glossy bodies. Their hooves were gilded, manes braided, and they stood now inhaling the reek of Sabbat ointment rising from the half-naked throng of celebrants below the altar mound.

Gideon was grateful for his place apart with the bullocks, for the revels had started in earnest. Nameless bayers yammered through the echoing hills. The throng milled and shrilled and clamored, dancing and shrieking in honor of Lucifer as the drums beat on, shaking the firmament with their promise of greater abandon to come.

Wine was passed, wine was drunk, wine was spilled and mingled with blood. Torches flared and faded through tableau after tableau of obscene celebration. Gideon stood impassive beside the bullocks, and at his side was Dorcas Frye, face enmasked with a hooded cowl from which goat-horns rose to signify his priesthood in the Sabbat ritual.

Neither spoke. Gideon had avoided Frye for three days now, and lie wondered if the old man suspected what it was he had done here in the forest when he stole away at midnight. Gideon wondered if he had a plan of his own—and Gideon waited, glancing from time to time at the altar-stone, on which a black cloth had been placed to hold the silver bowl and the silver knife of sacrifice.

But there would be no time for waiting, no time for wondering. The drums were building something in the darkness; something that throbbed and vibrated, something that soared and summoned. And now Dorcas was stepping up to the altar, wearing the Crown of Horns, and the first bullock was led forward, lowing, to kneel beneath the knife. The deed was done, the bowl was passed, and the drums thundered a litany to the Elder Shepherd.

Dorcas Frye stood alone now on the altar-top. Before the sacrifice of the other bullocks, the Summons would be made.

Dorcas held aloft the silver knife and the silver bowl. He signalled to the drummers in darkness and they fell silent.

Silently the celebrants moved forward, to gather below the altar mound and the altar stone. Dorcas bowed before the black cloth and began to chant.

Gideon recognized words, recognized syllables, recognized Latin cadence. But he did not recognize the response. The response was a drumming not made by drummers, a thunder not created by clouds. It was a roaring from beneath the very hills encircling them. And it rose, as Dorcas Frye's voice rose, as the faces of the Coven rose in expectation of the Coming. In a moment now—

Dorcas Frye's voice faltered. The thundering cadence missed a beat. He stared at the black altar-cloth in puzzlement. Gideon knew it was the time. He stepped forward, walked to the altar, stooped and came up in a single gesture with the silver knife. It Hashed out, ripping at Frye's chest.

The oldster recoiled in sudden amazement, and a howl arose from the throng. As they hesitated, Gideon stabbed again, but saw no stain of blood appear. It was as he had dreaded.—Dorcas Frye was dead, yet alive.

There was one other way. He snatched the black covering from the altar and grasped the bulk beneath it—the bulk he had placed there three nights before. He raised, it aloft and brought it down on Frye's horned head. There was a crunching sound, the sound made by the splinter of rotted bones.

Frye fell, and the cowling brushed from his face, revealed the wormy countenance of a thing long dead.

The crowd screamed, not only at the act but at the sight of Gideon Godfrey's weapon—the bulk of the great Bible he had rescued from its burial place beneath the stones and put on Satan's altar.

"Yes!" Gideon's voice rose exultant above their cries. "It's the Holy Bible, the Word of the Living God. And I am His Messenger, whom none may harm!"

Thunder echoed—true thunder, this lime, from the clouds above. Out of the swirling sky came the blinding bolt, followed by the torrential tempest of sudden rain. And Gideon, crying the name of his God, descended from the altar, smiting and laying about him with the Bible for a weapon—and none that he touched could either flee or withstand him.

Only corpses remained to litter the altar-base, to lie rotting in the rain. Gideon fought the fiends in a frenzy, fought them in darkness, touching them with God's word, muttering prayers that were curses and curses that were prayers. And in the end it was all over. He stood alone upon the field as the torrent washed away all but the foul odor of decay.

Then he fell upon his knees and gave thanks before setting out on the trail that led to the south. In die morning there would be clean light over the peaceful spires of Portsmouth and he would tell the good folk there that he had wandered lost in the wilderness these long weeks past.

Of Roodsford and its ways, of the peril just averted, Gideon would never speak. He knew that the village had fallen with its people and that birds and beasts would soon return there to claim as their own a land made free from the shadows of a fearsome blight. Soon Roodsford's very memory would be forgotten.

And that was as it should be, for come what may, witchcraft was now forever broken in New England. Satan's Servants were gone forever.

Index of Lovecraft's footnotes

(AUTHOR'S NOTE: This is necessarily only a partial listing of HPL's notations. Some of them exist in the form of addenda and sentences which he inserted in the text of the story. Others are indications for word-changes, insertions or deletions, all of which have been made in the text and are therefore unnecessary to repeat here. And true to form, HPL also added marginal comments of praise from time to time. The notations listed here are sufficient indication of the Lovecraft scholarship, passion for exactitude, and virtual omniscience.)

[1] The original mss. gives the name as Rood-ford. HPL suggests "Roodsford" saying, "The hyphenated place name would not have occurred in early New England."

[2] HPL says “Be careful about your archaisms. Certain antique spelling had vanished by 1672. Nouns were chiefly capitalized in ordinary text.”

[3] HPL noted that the book was printed in Boston in my original mss. and changed it to London, saying, “I doubt if Salem had a printing press as early as 1672. Nor were works of a general, non-theological character printed so early anywhere in the colonies.”

[4] The “or traders” was added by HPL who comments, “Savages didn’t do much coastal navigation. Whites traded considerably.”

[5] HPL noted that I spoke of the “Church of New England” and altered it, saying, “There was no officially recognized Church of N. E. The two fully Puritan colonies-Mass, and Conn.-supported the orthodox church known eventually as the Congregational. R. I. represents a revolt against and a repudiation of this theocratic dominance.”

[6] HPL-“There would not be fallen leaves even in Southern Maine till well over the line in October. The height of autumn foliage in central New England is about Oct. 10 to 15.”

[7] The previous sentence was inserted by HIM, with comment. Travel was very slow in 1690.” And on the obverse side of the mss. page, he lists four ferry passages by name, followed by such estimates as “on horseback-av, 5 MPH. With guides on foot-av. 3 MPH. Boston-Newb.—40M. Newb.-Ports.-20 M. Ports-Roodf.—20 M. Time from Ports, to Roodf. should be 8 or 9 h., allowing for rest, delays. Starling 6 AM, intending to arrive at 3 PM, delays add 5 to 6 hours mor—hence twilight or nocturnal advent would be correct.” This is an excellent ex ample of HPL’s perfectionist approach to his own work.

[8] HIM, comments, “Probably no Indians in America before the post-glacial era—but let imagination-have free scope!”

[9] HIM, reminds me of what I had forgotten and hence miswritten when he changes a word and says, “No witchcraft suspects were ever burned in North America”

[10] HPL—“Gallows Hill, Salem, not so named till 1692 witchcraft.” Since I revised chronology of story, it is now correct to refer to it.

[11] Mss. originally spoke of venison and dried pemmican, but HPL changed, saying, “Venison not so common, and journey not long enough for pemmican.”

[12] HPL—“We have to be careful about geography, picking a part of the coast not thickly settled in 1690.”

[13] I spoke of log houses, but HPL—“Log houses not used in New England and never any cross on Puritan churches.”

[14] “Panels” in ms. HPL—“No panelled doors at this period in small cottages.”

[15] I wrote "wouldst" but HPL struck it out, explaining, "Wouldst is second person singular. Beware of false archaisms, lest you fall into the misleading patios of some of Hodgson's stuff."

[16] Orig. "Merrimack hills." But: "Merrimack too far south, or, in upper reaches, west, unless long-distance flights are intended."

[17] HPL inserted "place in," saying, "A coven is a whole local unit of the cult. Roodsford would have but one."

[18] HPL asks, "How local do you assume the Roodsford celebration to be? Is it a Sabbat confined to the one village coven or do others come from afar to participate? If the latter, insert on the evil travellers abroad in the night."

The Sorcerer's Apprentice

He was more than just a magician; he had the Power

I WISH you would turn off the lights. They hurt my eyes. You don't need the lights. I'll tell you anything you want to know. I'll tell you all about it, everything.

But turn off the lights.

And please don't stare at me. How can a man think, with all of you crowding around and asking questions, questions, questions—

All right, I'll be calm. I'll be very calm. I didn't mean to shout. It is not like me to lose my temper. I am a gentle man. You know I'd never hurt anyone.

Why are you laughing? There is nothing to laugh about. It was all an accident., yon know that. I lost the Power.

But you don't know about the Power, do you? You don't know about Sadini and how he sold his soul to Satan for a black gift.

No, I'm not raving. That is the truth) gentlemen. I can prove it. "Here, listen to me. I'm going to tell you all about it, from the very beginning. If only you'll turn off the lights—

My name is Hugo. No, just Hugo. That's all they ever called me at the Home. I lived at the Home ever since I can remember, and the Sisters were very kind to me. The other children, they would not play with me because of my back and my squint, but the Sister's were kind. They didn't call me

"Crazy Hugo" and make fun of me because I couldn't recite. They didn't get me in the corner and hit me and make me cry.

No, I'm all right. You'll see. I was telling you about the Home, but it's not important. It all started after I ran away.

You see, I was getting too old, the Sisters, told me. They wanted me to go with the Doctor to another place, a County place. But Fred—he was one of the boys who didn't hit me—he told me that I mustn't go with the Doctor. He said the County place was bad arid the Doctor was bad. They had rooms, with bars on the windows in this place, and the Doctor would tie me to a table and cut out my brain. He wanted to operate on my brain, Fred said, and then I would die.

So I could see that the Sisters really thought I was crazy too, and the Doctor was coming for me the very next day. That's why I ran away, sneaking out of my room and over the wall that night.

But you're not interested in what happened after, that, are you? I mean, about when. I was living under the bridge and selling newspapers and in winter it was so cold—

Sadini? Yes, but that's part of it; the winter and the cold, I mean. Because it was the cold that made me faint in that alley behind the theatre, and that's how Sadini found me.

I remember the snow in the alley and how it came up and hit me in the face, the icy, icy snow just smothering me in cold, and I sank down in it forever.

Then, when I woke up, I was in this warm place inside the theatre, in the dressing-room, and there was an angel looking at me.

I thought she was an angel, anyway. Her hair was long, like golden harp strings, and I reached up to feel it and she smiled.

"Feeling better?" she asked. "Here, drink this."

She gave me something nice, and warm to drink. I was lying on a couch and she held my head while I drank.

"How did I get here," I asked. "Am I dead?"

"I thought you were when Victor carried you in. But you'll be all right now, I guess."

"Victor?"

"Victor Sadini. Don't tell me you haven't heard of the Great Sadini?"

I shook my head.

"He's a magician. He's on now. Good heavens, that reminds me, I'll have to change!" She took the cup away and stood up. "You just rest until I get back."

I smiled at her. It was very hard to talk, because everything was going round and round.

"Who are you?" I whispered.

"Isobel."

"Isobel," I said. It was a pretty name. I whispered it over and over again until I went to sleep.

I don't know how long it was until I woke up again—I mean, until I woke up and felt all right. In between times I would be sort of half-awake, and sometimes I. could see and hear for a little while.

ONCE I saw a tall man with black hair and a mustache bending over me. He was dressed all in black, too, and he had black eyes. I thought maybe it was the Devil coming to carry me down to Hell. The Sisters used to tell us about the Devil. I was so frightened I just fainted again.

Another time I could hear voices talking, and I opened my eyes again and saw the man in black and Isobel sitting over on the side of the room. I guess they didn't know I was awake, because they were talking about me.

"How much longer do you think I'm going to put up with this, Vic?" she was saying. "I am sick and tired of playing nursemaid to a lousy tramp. What's the big idea? You don't know him from Adam, anyway."

"But we can't just throw him out in the snow to die, can we?" The man in black was walking up and down, pulling on the ends of his mustache.

“Be reasonable, darling. The poor kid’s been starving to death, can’t you tell? No identification, nothing; he’s in trouble and needs help.”

“Nuts to that noise! Call the wagon—there’s charity hospitals, aren’t there? If you expect me to spend all my time between shows cooped up with a mangy—”

I couldn’t understand what she meant, what she was saying. She was so beautiful, you see. I knew she must be kind, and it was-all a mistake, maybe I was too sick to hear right.

Then I fell asleep again, and when I woke up I felt better, different, and I knew it was a mistake. Because she was there, and she smiled at me again.

“How are you?” she asked. “Ready to eat something now?”

I could only stare at her and smile. She was wearing a long green cloak all covered with silver stars, and now I know she must be an angel for sure.

Then the Devil came in.

“He’s conscious, Vic,” said Isobel.

The Devil looked at me and grinned.

“Hi, pal! Glad to have you with us. For a day or so there, I didn’t think we’d have the pleasure of your company much longer.”

I just stared at him.

“What’s the matter, my makeup frighten you? That’s right, you don’t even know who I am, do you? My name’s Victor Sadini. The Great Sadini—magic act, you know.”

Isobel was smiling at me, too, so I guessed it was all right. I nodded. “My name is Hugo,” I whispered. “You saved my life, didn’t you?”

“Skip it. Leave the talking till later. Right now, you’ve got to eat something and get some more rest. You’ve been camping here on the sofa for three days now, chum. Better get some strength, because the act closes here Wednesday and we jump to Toledo.”

On Wednesday the act closed, and we jumped to Toledo. Only we didn’t really jump, we took a train. Oh yes, I went along. Because I was Sadini’s new assistant.

This was before I knew he was a servant of the Devil. I just thought he was a kind man who had saved my life. He sat there in the dressing-room and explained everything to me; how he grew the mustache and combed his hair that way and wore black just because that's the way stage magicians are supposed to look.

He did tricks for me; wonderful tricks with cards and coins and handkerchiefs that he pulled out of my ears and colored water he poured from my pockets. He could make things vanish too, and I was afraid of him until he told me it was all a trick.

ON THE last day he let me get up and stand behind the stage while he went out in front of the people and did what he called his "act" and then I saw wonderful things.

He made Isobel stretch out on a table and then he waved a wand and she floated up in the air with nothing to hold her. Then he lowered her down and she didn't fall, just smiled while all the people clapped. Then she would hand him things to do tricks with, and he would point his magic wand at them and make them vanish, or explode, or change. He made a big tree grow out of a little plant right before my eyes. And then he put Isabel into a box and some men wheeled out a huge steel blade, with teeth in it, and he said he was going to saw her in half. He tied her down, too.

I almost ran out on the stage then, to stop him, but she wasn't afraid, and the men-who pulled the curtains behind the scenes were laughing too, and so I guessed it must be another trick.

But when he turned on the electric current, and began to saw into the box I stood there with the sweat popping out all over me because I could see him cutting into her. Only she smiled, even when he sawed right through her. She smiled, and she wasn't dead at all!

THEN he covered her up and took the saw away and waved his magic wand and she jumped up, all in one piece again. It was the most wonderful thing I'd ever heard of, and I guess it was seeing the show that made me decide I'd have to go with him.

So after that I talked to him, about how he'd saved my life and who I was, and not having any place to go, and how I'd work for him for nothing, do anything, if only. I could come along. I didn't tell him I wanted to go just so I could see Isobel, because I guessed he wouldn't like that. And I didn't think she'd like it either. She was his wife, I knew that now.

It didn't make much sense, what I told him, but he seemed to understand.

"Maybe you can make yourself useful at that," he said. "We have to have someone to look after the props, and it would save time for me. Besides, you could set them up and pack them again."

"Ixnay," said Isobel. "Utsnay." I didn't understand her, but Sadini did. Maybe it was magic talk.

"Hugo's going to be all right," he said. "I need somebody, Isobel. Somebody I can really depend on—if you know what I mean."

"Listen, you cheap ham—"

"Take it easy, Isobel." She was scowling, but when he looked at her she just sort of wilted and tried to smile.

"All right,-Vic. Whatever you say. But remember, it's your headache, not mine."

"Right." Sadini came over to me. "You can come along," he said. "From now on you're my assistant."

That's how it was.

That's how it was for a long, long time. We went to Toledo, and to Detroit and Indianapolis and Chicago and Milwaukee and St. Paul—oh, a lot of places. But they were all alike to me. We would ride on a train and then Sadini and Isobel would go to a hotel and I would stay behind and watch them unload the baggage car. I would get the trunks filled with props (that's what Sadini called the things he used in his act) and hand a slip of paper to a truck driver. We would go to the theatre then, and the truck driver took the props into the alley where I'd haul them up to the dressing-room and backstage. Then I unloaded props and that's how it went.

I slept in the theatre, in the dressing-room most of the time, and I'd eat with Sadini and Isobel. Not often with Isobel, though. She liked to sleep late at the hotel, and I guess she was ashamed of me at first.

I didn't blame her, the way I looked, with my clothes and my eyes and back.

Of. course Sadini bought me new clothes after a while. He was good to me, Sadini was. He talked a lot about his tricks and his act, and he even talked about Isobel. I didn't understand how such a nice man could say such things about her.

Even though she didn't seem to like me, and kept away from. Sadini too, I knew she was an angel. She was beautiful the way the angels were in the books the Sisters showed me. Of course, Isobel wouldn't be interested in ugly people like myself or Sadini, with his black eyes and his black mustache. I don't know why she ever married him in the first place when she could find handsome men like George Wallace.

She saw George Wallace all the time, because he had another act in the same show we traveled with. He was tall, and he had blonde hair arid blue eyes, and he was a singer and dancer in the show. Isobel used to stand in the wings (that's the part on the side of the stage) when he was singing, and look at him. Sometimes they would talk together and laugh, and once when Isobel said she was going to the hotel because she had a headache, I saw her and George Wallace walk into his dressing-room.

MAYBE I shouldn't have told Sadini about that, but it just came out before I could stop it. He got very angry, and he asked me questions, and then he told me to keep my mouth shut and my eyes open.

It was wrong for me to say yes, I know that now; but all I could think of then was that Sadini had been kind to me. So I watched Isobel and George Wallace, and one day when Sadini was downtown between shows, I saw them again in Wallace's dressing-room. It was on the balcony, and I tiptoed up to the door and looked through the keyhole. Nobody else was around, and nobody could see me blushing.

Because Isabel was kissing George Wallace and he was saying, "Come on, darling—let's not stall any longer. When the show closes, it's you and me. We'll blow out of here together, head for the coast and—

"Quit talking like a schmoe!" Isobel sounded mad. "I'm nuts about you, Georgie-boy, but I know a good deal when I see it. Vic's a headliner; he'll be pulling in his grand a week when you're doing a single for smokers. Fun's fun, but there's no percentage in such a deal for me."

"Vic!" George Wallace made a face. "What's that phony got, anyway? A couple of trunks full of props and a mustache. Anybody can do a magic act—I could myself, if I had the stake for the gimmicks. Why, hell, you know all his routines. You and I could build our own act, baby. How's that for any angle? The Great Wallace and Company—"

"Georgie!"

She said it so fast and she moved so fast, I didn't have time to get away. Isobel walked right over to the door and yanked it open, and there I was.

"What the—"

George Wallace came up behind her and when he saw me he started to reach out, but she slapped his hands down.

"Can it!" she said. "I'll handle this." Then she smiled at me, and I knew she wasn't angry. "Come on downstairs, Hugo," she said. "Let's you and I have a little talk."

I'll never forget that little talk.

WE SAT there in the dressing-room, just Isobel and me, all alone. And she held my hand—she had such soft, sweet hands—and looked into my eyes, and talked with her low voice that-was like singing and stars and sunshine.

"So you found out," she said. "And that means I'll have to tell you the rest. I—I didn't want you to know, Hugo. Not ever. But now I'm afraid there's no other way."

I nodded. I didn't trust myself to look at her, so I just stared at the dressing-table. Sadini's wand was lying there—his long black wand with the golden tip. It glittered and shone and dazzled my eyes.

"Yes, it's true, "Hugo. George Wallace and I are in love. He wants me to go away."

"B-but Sadini is such a nice man," I told her. "Even if he does look that way."

"How do you mean?"

"Well, when I first saw him, I thought he was the Devil, but now—"

She sort of caught her breath. "You thought he looked like the Devil, Hugo?"

I laughed. "Yes. You know, the Sisters, they said I wasn't very bright. And they wanted to operate on my head because I couldn't understand things. But I'm all right. You know that. I just thought Sadini might be the Devil until he told me everything was a trick. It wasn't really a magic wand and he didn't really saw you in half—"

"And you believed him!"

I LOOKED at her now. She was sitting up straight, and her eyes were shining. "Oh, Hugo, if I'd only known! You see, I was the same way, once. When I first met him, I trusted him. And now I'm his slave. That's why I can't run away, because I'm his slave. Just as he is the slave of—the Devil."

My eyes must have bugged out, because she kept looking at me funny as she went on.

"You didn't know that, did you? You believed him when he said he just did tricks, and that he sawed me in half on the stage for an illusion, using mirrors."

“But he does use mirrors,” I said. “Don’t I pack them and unpack them and set them up just so?”

“That’s only to fool the stagehands,” she said. “If they knew he was really a sorcerer, they’d lock him up. Didn’t the Sisters tell you about the Devil and selling your soul?”

“Yes, I have heard stories, but I thought—”

“You believe me, don’t you, Hugo?” She took my hand again and looked right at me. “When he takes me out on the stage and raises me from the ground, that’s sorcery. One word and I would fall to my death. When he saws me in half, it’s real. That’s why I can’t run away, that’s why I’m his slave.”

“Then it must have been the Devil who gave him the magic wand that does the tricks.”

She nodded, watching me.

I looked at the wand. It was glittering away, and her hair glittered, and her eyes glittered.

“Why can’t I steal the wand?” I asked.

She shook her head. “It wouldn’t help. Not as long as he’s alive.”

“Not as long as he’s alive,” I repeated.

“But if he were to—oh, Hugo, you must help me! There’s only one way, and it wouldn’t be a sin, not when he’s sold his soul to the Devil. Oh, Hugo, you must help me, you will help me—”

She kissed me.

She kissed me. Yes, she put her arms around my back, and her golden hair wound round and round me, and her lips were soft and her eyes were like glory, and she told me what to do, how to do it, and it wouldn’t be a sin, he was sold to the Devil, no one would ever know.

So I said yes, I would do it.

She told me how.

And she made me promise never to tell anyone, no matter what happened, even if things went wrong and they asked questions of me.

I promised.

And then I waited. I waited for Sadini to come back that night. I waited until after the show, when everyone went home. Isobel left, and she told Sadini to stay behind and help me pack because I was sick, and he said he would. It all worked just as she promised it would.

We started packing, and there was nobody, left in the theatre but the doorman, and he was way downstairs in the room next to the alley. I went out into the hall while Sadini was packing, and saw how dark and still it was. Then I came into the dressing-room again and watched Sadini putting away his props.

He hadn't touched the wand, though. It glittered and glittered, and I wanted to pick it up and feel the magic of the Power the Devil had given him.

BUT there was no time for that, now. Because I had to walk up behind Sadini as he bent over the trunk. I had to take the piece of iron pipe out of my pocket and raise it over his head and bring it down once, twice, three times.

There was an awful cracking sound, and then a thump, when he fell to the floor.

Now all I had to do was lift him into the trunk and—

There was another sound.

Somebody knocked on the door.

Somebody rattled the doorknob as I dragged Sadini's body over to the corner and tried to find a place to hide it. But it was no use. The knocking came again and I heard a voice calling, "Hugo—open up! I know you're there!"

So I opened the door, holding the pipe behind my back. George Wallace came in.

I guess he was drunk. Anyway, he didn't seem to notice Sadini lying on the floor at first. He just looked at me and waved his arms.

“Hugo, I gotta talk t’you.” He was drunk all right, I could smell the liquor now. “She told me,” he whispered. “She told me what was up. Tried to get me drunk, but I’m wise to herr I sneaked away. Gotta talk t’you ‘before you do ’nything foolish.

“She. told me. Gonna frame you, that’s what. You kill Sadini, she’ll tell the cops, deny everything. You’re supposed t’be—well, kinda soft in the head. ’N when you spill that hooey about the Devil they’ll figure you’re crazy for sure, lock you up. Then she wanted us to run away, take the act. I hadda come back here, warn you before—”

Then he saw Sadini. He just sort of froze up, standing there stiff as a board with his mouth open. That made it easy for me to come up behind him and hit him with the ‘pipe; hit him and hit him and hit him.

Because Y knew he lied, he was lying about her, he couldn’t have her, he couldn’t run away, I wouldn’t permit it. I knew what he really wanted—he wanted the wand of Power, the Devil’s wand; And it was now all mine.

I walked over and took it up in-my hands, felt the Power surging along my arm as I looked at the glittering tip. I was still holding it in my hand when she came in.

She must have followed him, but she was too late now. She could tell, when she saw him lying there on the floor with the bade of his head laughing up like a big red mouth.

She was frozen for a moment, too, but then before I could say anything, Isobel slid to the floor. She just fainted.

I stood there, holding the wand of Power, looking down at her and feeling sorry. Sorry for Sadini, burning in Hell. Sorry for George Wallace because he had come here. Sorry for her, because all the plans had gone wrong.

Then I looked at the wand, and I got this wonderful idea. Sadini was dead, and George was dead, but she still had me. She wasn’t afraid of me—she had even kissed me.

And I had the wand. That was the secret of the magic. Now, while she was still asleep, I could find out if it was true. And then when she woke up, what a surprise for her! I would tell her, “You were right, Isobel. It does work. And from now on, you and I will do. the act. I have the wand and you need never be afraid again. Because I can do it. I already did it when you were asleep.”

THERE was nothing to interfere. I carried her out to the stage. I carried the props, too. I even turned on the spotlight, because I knew where it was. It felt funny, standing there all alone in the empty theatre, bowing into the blackness.

But I was wearing Sadini’s cloak, and I stood there for a moment with Isobel lying before me. With the magic wand in my hand I felt like a new person like Hugo the Great.

And I was Hugo the Great.

That night, in the empty theatre, I was Hugo the Great. I knew just what to do, how to do it. There were no Stagehands so I didn’t need to bother with the mirrors, and I had to strap her and turn on the electric current myself. The blade didn’t seem to turn so fast, either, when I put it right up against the board box covering her, but I made it work.

It buzzed away and buzzed away, and then she opened her eyes and screamed, but I had her strapped down, and besides there was nothing to be afraid of. I showed her the magic wand, but she just screamed and screamed until the buzzing drowned out her voice and the blade came through.

The blade was red. Dripping red.

It made me sick to look at it, so I closed my eyes and waved the magic wand of Power very quickly.

Then I looked down.

Everything was—the same.

I waved the wand again.

Still nothing happened.

Something had gone wrong.

Then I was screaming, and the doorman finally heard and ran in, and then you came and took me away.

So, you see, it was just an accident. The wand didn't work. Maybe the Devil took the power away when Sadini died. I don't know. All I know is that I'm very tired.

Will you turn off the lights now, please?

I want to go to sleep. . . .

The Unspeakable Betrothal

Robert Bloch, whose first serious novel The Scarf is now available in a popular thirty-five cent Avon edition, has rung up a remarkable record for a young writer. It is with pleasure that we state that "The Unspeakable Betrothal" is a brand-new story, here published for the first time. The tale of a beautiful girl marked by the stars for an outré destiny, it will be a find for the army of Bloch fans. It was written originally for an Avon pocket-size anthology of new fantastic stories . . . from which space restrictions were to bar it. This new anthology, entitled The Girl with the Hungry Eyes, edited by the editor of the Avon Fantasy Reader, is now available on newsstands—or it may be purchased direct from us for a quarter, plus five cents handling charges. It features really excellent original fantasy stories by Fritz Leiber, Jr., Manly Wade Wellman, William Tenn, P. Schuyler Miller, Stephen Grendon, and Frank Belknap Long. Look for it.

"Not far thence is the secret garden in which grow like strange flowers the kinds of sleep, so different one from the other . . . the sleep induced by datura, by the multiple extracts of ether, the sleep of belladonna, of opium, of valerian; flowers whose petals remain shut until the day when the predestined visitor shall come and, touching them, bid them open, and for long hours inhale the aroma of their peculiar dreams into a marvelling and bewildered being."

Proust: Remembrance of Things Past

AVIS knew she wasn't really as sick as Doctor Clegg had said. She was merely bored with living. The death-impulse, perhaps; then again, it might have been nothing more than her distaste for clever young men who persisted in addressing her as "O rara Avis."

She felt better now, though. The fever had settled until it was no more than one of the white blankets which covered her—something she could toss aside with a gesture, if it weren't so pleasant just to burrow into it, to snuggle deeply within its confining warmth.

Avis smiled as she realized the truth; monotony was the one thing that didn't bore her. The sterility of excitement was the really jading routine, after all. This quiet, uneventful feeling of restfulness seemed rich and fertile by comparison. Rich and fertile—creative—womb.

The words linked. Back to the womb. Dark room, warm bed, lying doubled up in the restful, nourishing . . . lethargy of fever . . .

It wasn't the womb, exactly; she hadn't gone back that far, she knew. But it did remind her of the days when she was a little girl. Just a little girl with big round eyes, mirroring the curiosity that lay behind them. Just a little girl, living all alone in a huge old house, like a fairy princess in an enchanted castle.

Of course her aunt and uncle had lived here too, and it wasn't a really truly castle, and nobody else knew that she was a princess. Except Marvin Mason, that is.

Marvin had lived next door and sometimes he'd come over and play with her. They would come up to her room and look out of the high window—the little round window that bordered on the sky.

Marvin knew that she was a sure enough princess, and he knew that her room was an ivory tower. The window was an enchanted window, and when they stood on a chair and peeked out they could see the world behind the sky.

Sometimes she wasn't quite sure if Marvin Mason honest and truly saw the world beyond the window; maybe he just said he did because he was stuck on her.

But he listened very quietly while she told him stories about that world. Sometimes she told him stories she had read in books, and other times she made them up out of her very own head. It was only later that the dreams came, and she told him those stories, too.

That is, she always started to, but somehow the words would go wrong. She didn't always know the words for what she saw in those dreams. They were, very special dreams; they came only on those nights when Aunt May left the window open, and there was no moon. She would lie in the bed, all curled up in a little ball, and wait for the wind to come through the high, round window. It came quietly, and she would feel it on her forehead and neck, like fingers stroking. Cool, soft fingers, stroking her face; soothing fingers that made her uncurl and stretch out so that the shadows could cover her body.

Even then she slept in the big bed, and the shadows would pour down from the window in a path. She wasn't asleep when the shadows came, so she knew they were real. They came on the breeze, from the window, and covered her up. Maybe it was the shadows that were cool and not the wind; maybe the shadows stroked her hair until she fell asleep.

But she would sleep then, and the dreams always came. They followed the same path as the wind and the shadows; they poured down from the sky, through the window. There were voices she heard but could not understand; colors she saw but could not name; shapes she glimpsed but which never seemed to resemble any figures she found in picture books.

Sometimes the same voices and colors and shapes came again and again, until she learned to recognize them, in a way. There was the deep, buzzing voice that seemed to come from right inside her own head, although she knew it really issued from the black, shiny pyramid-thing that had the arms with eyes in it. It didn't look slimy or nasty, and there was nothing to be afraid of—Avis could never understand why Marvin Mason made her shut up when she started telling about those dreams.

But he was only a little boy, and he got scared and ran home to his Mommy. Avis didn't have any Mommy, only Aunt May; but she would never tell Aunt May such things. Besides, why should she? The dreams didn't frighten her, and they were so very real and interesting. Sometimes, on gray, rainy days when there was nothing to do but play with dolls or cut out pictures to paste in her album, she wished that night would hurry up and come. Then she could dream and make everything real again.

She got so she liked to stay in bed, and would pretend to have a cold so she didn't have to go to school. Avis would look up at the window and wait for the dreams to come—but they never came in the daytime; only at night.

Often she wondered what it was like up there.

The dreams must come from the sky; she knew that. The voices and shapes lived way up, somewhere beyond the window. Aunt May said that dreams came from tummy-aches, but she knew that wasn't so.

Aunt May was always worried about tummy-aches, and she scolded Avis for not going outside to play; said she was getting pale and puny.

But Avis felt fine, and she had her secret to think of. Now she scarcely ever saw Marvin Mason any more, and she didn't bother to read. It wasn't much fun to pretend she was a princess, either. Because the dreams were ever so much realer, and she could talk to the voices and ask them to take her with them when they went away.

She got so she could almost understand what they were saying. The shiny thing that just hung through the window now—the one that looked like it had so much more to it she couldn't see—it made music inside her head that she recognized. Not a real tune; more like words in a rhyme. In her dreams she asked it to take her away. She would crawl up on its back and let it fly with her up over the stars. That was funny, asking it to fly; but she knew that the part beyond the window had wings. Wings as big as the world.

She begged and pleaded, but the voices made her understand that they couldn't take little girls back with them. That is, not entirely. Because it was too cold and too far, and something would change her.

She said she didn’t care how she changed; she wanted to go. She would let them do anything they wanted if only they would take her: It would be nice to be able to talk to them all the time and feel that cool softness; to dream forever.

One night they came to her and there were more things than she had ever seen before. They hung through the window and in the air all over the room—they were so funny, some of them; you could see through them and sometimes one was partly inside another. She knew she giggled in her sleep, but she couldn’t help it. Then she was quiet and listening to them.

They told her it was all right. They would carry her away. Only she mustn’t tell anyone and she mustn’t be frightened; they would come for her soon. They couldn’t take her as she was, and she must be willing to change.

Avis said yes, and they all hummed a sort of music together, and went away.

The next morning Avis was really and truly sick and didn’t want to get up. She could hardly breathe, she was so warm—and when Aunt May brought in a tray she wouldn’t eat a bite.

That night she didn’t dream. Her head ached, and she tossed all night long. But there was a moon out, so the dreams couldn’t get through anyway. She knew they would come back when the moon was gone again, so she waited. Besides, she hurt so that she didn’t really care. She had to feel better before she was ready to go anywhere.

The next day Dr. Clegg came to see her. Dr. Clegg was a good friend of Aunt May’s and he was always visiting her because he was her guardian.

Dr. Clegg held her hand and asked her what seemed to be the matter with his young lady today?

Avis was too smart to say anything, and besides there was a shiny thing in her mouth. Dr. Clegg took it out and looked at it and shook his head. After a while he went away and then Aunt May and Uncle Roscoe came in. They made her swallow some medicine that tasted just awful.

By this time it was getting dark and there was a storm coming outside. Avis wasn’t able to talk much, and when they shut the round window she couldn’t ask them to please leave it open tonight because there was no moon and they were coming for her.

But everything kept going round and round, and when Aunt May walked past the bed she seemed to flatten out like a shadow, or one of the things, only she made a loud noise which was really the thunder outside and now she was sleeping really and truly even though she heard the thunder but the thunder wasn’t real nothing was real except the things that was it nothing was real any more but the things.

And they came through the window it wasn’t closed after all because she opened it and she was crawling out high up there where she had never crawled before but it was easy without a body and soon she would have a new body they wanted the old one because they carried it but she didn’t care because she didn’t need it and now they would carry her ulnagr Yuggoth farnomi ilyaa. . . .

That was when Aunt Mary and Uncle Roscoe found her and pulled her down from the window. They said later she had screamed at the top of her voice, or else she would have gone over without anyone noticing.

After that Dr. Clegg took her away to the hospital where there were no high windows and they came in to see her all night long. The dreams stopped.

When at last she was well enough to go back home, she found that the window was gone, too.

Aunt May and Uncle Roscoe had boarded it up, because she was a somnambulist. She didn’t know what a somnambulist was, but guessed it had something to do with her being sick and the dreams not coming any more.

For the dreams stopped, then. There was no way of making them come back, and she really didn’t want them any more. It was fun to play outside with Marvin Mason now, and she went back to school when the new semester began.

Now, without the window to look at, she just slept at night. Aunt May and Uncle Roscoe were glad, and Dr. Clegg said she was turning out to be a mighty fine little specimen.

Avis could remember it all now as though it were yesterday. Or today. Or tomorrow.

How she grew up. Flow Marvin Mason fell in love with her. How she went to college and they became engaged. How she felt the night Aunt May and Uncle Roscoe were killed in the crash at Leedsvilie. That was a bad time.

An even worse time was when Marvin Mason had gone away. He was in service now, overseas. She had stayed on all alone in the house, for it was her house now.

Reba came in days to do the housework, and Dr. Clegg dropped around, even after she turned 21 and officially inherited her estate.

He didn't seem to approve of her present mode of living. He asked her several times why she didn't shut up the house and move into a small apartment downtown. He was concerned because she showed no desire to keep up the friendships she had made in college; Avis was curiously reminded of the solicitude he had exhibited during her childhood.

But Avis was no longer a child. She proved that by removing what had always seemed to her a symbol of adult domination; she had the high round window in her room unboarded once more.

It was a silly gesture. She knew it at the time, but somehow it held a curious significance for her. For one thing it re-established a linkage with her childhood, and more and more childhood came to epitomize happiness for her.

With Marvin Mason gone, and Aunt May and Uncle Roscoe dead, there was little enough to fill the present. Avis would sit up in her bedroom and pore over the scrapbooks she had so assiduously pasted up as a girl. She had kept her dolls and the old fairy tale books; she spent drowsy afternoons examining them.

It was almost possible to lose one's time-sense in such pastimes. Her surroundings were unchanged. Of course, Avis was larger now and the bed wasn't quite as massive nor the window as high.

But both were there, waiting for the little girl that she became when, at nightfall, she curled up into a ball and snuggled under the sheets—snuggled and stared up at the high, round window that bordered the sky.

Avis wanted to dream again.

At first, she couldn't.

After all, she was a grown woman, engaged to be married; she wasn't a character out of Peter Ibbetson. And those dreams of her childhood had been silly.

But they were nice. Yes, even when she had been ill and nearly fallen out of the window that time, it had been pleasant to dream. Of course those voices and shapes were nothing but Freudian fantasies—everyone knew that.

Or did they?

Suppose it was all real? Suppose dreams are not just subconscious manifestations; caused by indigestion and gas pressure.

What if dreams are really a product of electronic impulse—or planetary radiations—attuned to the wave-length of the sleeping mind? Thought is an electrical impulse. Life itself is an electrical impulse. Perhaps a dreamer is like a spiritualist medium; placed in a receptive state during sleep. Instead of ghosts, the creatures of another world or another dimension can come through, if the sleeper is granted the rare gift of acting as a filter. What if the dreams feed on the dreamer for substance, just as spirits attain ectoplasmic being by draining the medium of energy?

Avis thought and thought about it, and when she had evolved this theory, everything seemed to fit. Not that she would ever tell anyone about her attitude. Dr. Clegg would only laugh at her, or still worse, shake his head. Marvin Mason didn't approve either. Nobody wanted her to dream. They still treated her like a little girl.

Very well, she would be a little girl; a little girl who could do as she pleased, now. She would dream.

It was shortly after reaching this decision that the dreams began again; almost as though they had been waiting until she would fully accept them in terms of their own reality.

Yes, they came back, slowly, a bit at a time. Avis found that it helped to concentrate on the past during the. day; to strive to remember her childhood. To this end she spent more and more time in her room, leaving Reba to tend to housework downstairs. As for fresh air, she always could look out of her window. It was high and small, but she would climb on a stool and gaze up at the sky through the round aperture; watching the clouds that veiled the blue beyond, and waiting for night to come.

Then she would sleep in the big bed and wait for the wind. The wind soothed and the darkness slithered, and soon she could hear the buzzing, burring voices. At first only the voices came back, and they were faint and far away. Gradually they increased in intensity and once more she was able to discriminate, to recognize individual intonations.

Timidly, hesitantly, the figures re-emerged. Each night they grew stronger. Avis Long (little girl with big round eyes in big bed below round window) welcomed their presence.

She wasn't alone any more. No need to see her friends, or talk to that silly old Dr. Clegg. No need to waste much time gossiping with Reba, or fussing over meals. No need to dress or venture out. There was the window by day and the dreams by night.

Then all at once she was curiously weak, and this illness came. But it was all false, somehow; this physical change.

Her mind was untouched. She knew that. No matter, how often Dr. Clegg pursed his lips and hinted about calling in a "specialist", she wasn't afraid. Of course Avis knew he really wanted her to see a psychiatrist. The doddering fool was filled with glib patter about "retreat from reality" and "escape mechanisms".

But he didn't understand about the dreams. She wouldn't tell him, either. He'd never know the richness, the fullness, the sense of completion that came from experiencing contact with other worlds.

Avis knew that now. The voices and shapes that came in the window were from other worlds. As a naive child she had invited them by her very unsophistication. Now, striving consciously to return to the childlike attitude, she again admitted them.

They were from other worlds; worlds of wonder and splendor. Now they could meet only on the plane of dreams, but someday; someday soon, she would bridge the gap.

They whispered about her body. Something about the trip, making the "change". It couldn't be explained in their words. But she trusted them, and after all, a physical change was of slight importance contrasted with the opportunity.

Soon she would be well again, strong again. Strong enough to say "yes." And then they would come for her when the moon was right. Until then, she could strengthen the determination, and the dream.

Avis Long lay in the great bed and basked in the blackness; the blackness that poured palpably through the open window. The shapes filtered down, wriggling through the warps, feeding upon the night; growing, pulsing, encompassing all.

They reassured her about the body but she didn't care and she told them she didn't care because the body was unimportant and yes, she would gladly consider it an exchange if only she could go and she knew she belonged.

Not beyond the rim of the stars but between it and amongst substance dwells that which is blackness in blackness for Yuggoth is only a symbol no that is wrong there are no symbols for all is reality and only perception is limited ch'yar ul'nyar shaggornyth . . .

It is hard for us to make you understand but I do understand you can not fight it I will not fight it they will try to stop you nothing shall stop me for I belong yes you belong will it be soon yes it will be soon very soon yes very soon . . .

Marvin Mason was unprepared for this sort of reception. Of course, Avis hadn't written, and she wasn't at the station to meet him—but the possibility of her being seriously ill had never occurred to him.

He had come out to the house at once, and it was a shock when Dr. Clegg met him at the door.

The old man's face was grim, and the tenor of his opening remarks still grimmer.

They faced each other in the library downstairs; Mason self-consciously diffident in khaki, the older man a bit too professionally brusque.

"Just what is it, Doctor?" Mason asked.

"I don't know. Slight, recurrent fever. Listlessness. I've checked everything. No TB, no trace of lowgrade infection. Her trouble isn't—organic."

"You mean something's wrong with her mind?"

Dr. Clegg slumped into an armchair and lowered his head.

"Mason, I could say many things to you; about the psychosomatic theory of medicine, about the benefits of psychiatry, about—but never mind. It would be sheer hypocrisy.

"I've talked to Avis; rather, I've tried to talk to her. She won't say much, but what she does say disturbs me. Her actions disturb me even more.

"You can guess what I'm driving at, I think, when I tell you that she is leading the life of an eight-year-old girl. The life she did lead at that age."

Mason scowled. "Don't tell me she sits in her room again and looks out of that window?"

Dr. Clegg nodded.

"But I thought it was boarded up long ago, because she's a somnambulist and—

"She had it unboarded, several months ago. And she is not, never was, a somnambulist."

"What do you mean?"

"Avis Long never walked in her sleep. I remember the night she was found on that window's edge; not ledge, for there is no ledge. She was perched on the edge of the open window, already halfway out; a little tyke hanging through a high window.

“But there was no chair beneath her, no ladder. No way for her to climb up. She was simply there.”

Dr. Clegg looked away before continuing.

“Don’t ask me what it means. I can’t explain, and I wouldn’t want to. I’d have to talk about the things she talks about—the dreams, and the presences that come to her; the presences that want her to go away.

“Mason, it’s up to you. I can’t honestly move to have her committed on the basis of material evidence. Confinement means nothing to them; you can’t build a wall to keep out dreams.

“But you love her. You can save her. You can make her well, make her take an interest in reality. Oh, I know it sounds mawkish and stupid, just as the other sounds wild and fantastic.

“Yet it’s true. It’s happening right now, to her. She’s asleep up in her room at this very moment. She’s hearing the voices—I know that much. Let her hear your voice.”

Mason walked out of the room and started up the stairs.

“But what do you mean, you can’t marry me?”

Mason, stared at the huddled figure in the swirl of bedclothes. He tried to avoid the direct stare of Avis Long’s curiously childlike eyes; just as he avoided gazing up at the black, ominous aperture of the round window.

“I can’t, that’s all,” Avis answered. Even her voice seemed to hold a childlike quality. The high, piercing tones might well have emanated from the throat of a little girl; a tired little girl, half-asleep and a bit petulant about being abruptly awakened.

“But our plans—your letters—”

“I’m sorry, dear. I can’t talk about it. You know I haven’t been well. Dr. Clegg is downstairs, he must have told you.”

“But you’re getting better,” Mason pleaded. “You’ll be up and around again in a few days.”

Avis shook her head. A smile—the secret smile of a naughty child—clung to the corners of her mouth.

"You can't understand, Marvin. You never could understand. That's because you belong here." A gesture indicated the room. "I belong somewhere else." Her finger stabbed, unconsciously, towards the window.

Marvin looked at the window now. He couldn't help it. The round black hole that led to nothingness. Or—something. The sky outside was dark, moonless. A cold wind curled about the bed.

"Let me close the window for you, dear," he said, striving to keep his voice even and gentle.

"No."

"But you're ill—you'll catch cold."

"That isn't why you want to close it." Even in accusation, the voice was curiously piping. Avis sat bolt upright and confronted him.

"You're jealous, Marvin. Jealous of me. Jealous of them. You would never let me dream. You would never let me go. And I want to go. They're coming for me.

"I know why Dr. Clegg sent you up here. He wants you to persuade me to go away. He'd like to shut me up, just as he wants to shut the window. He wants to keep me here because he's afraid. You're all afraid of what lies—out there.

"Well, it's no use. You can't stop me. You can't stop them!"

"Take it easy, darling—"

"Never mind. Do you think I care what they do to me, if only I can go? I'm not afraid. I know I can't go as I am now. I know they must alter me.

"There are certain parts they want for reasons of their own. You'd be frightened if I told you. But I'm not afraid. You say I'm sick and insane; don't deny it. Yet I'm healthy enough, sane enough to face them and their world. It's you who are too morbid to endure it all."

Avis Long was wailing now.; a thin, high-pitched wail of a little girl in a tantrum.

"You and I are leaving this house tomorrow," Mason said. "We're going away. We'll be married and live happily ever after—in good old storybook style. The trouble with you, young lady, is that you’ve never had to grow up. All this nonsense about goblins and other worlds—”

Avis screamed.

Mason ignored her.

“Right now I’m going to shut that window,” he declared.

Avis continued to scream. The shrill ululation echoed on a sustained note as Mason reached up and closed the round pane of glass over the black aperture. The wind resisted his efforts, but he shut the window and secured the latch.

Then her fingers were digging into his throat from the rear, and her scream was pouring down his ear.

“I’ll kill you!” she wailed. It was the wail of an enraged child.

But there was nothing of the child, or the invalid, in the strength behind her clawing fingers. He fought her off, panting.

Then, suddenly, Dr. Clegg was in the room. A hypodermic needle flashed and gleamed in an arc of plunging silver.

They carried her back to the bed, tucked her in. The blankets nestled about the weary face of a child in sleep.

The window was closed tightly now.

Everything was in order as the two men turned out the light and tiptoed from the room.

Neither of them said a word until they stood downstairs once again.

Facing the fireplace, Mason sighed.

“Somehow I’ll get her out of here tomorrow,” he promised. “Perhaps it was too abrupt—my coming back tonight and waking her. I wasn’t very tactful.

“But something about her; something about that room, frightened me.”

Dr. Clegg lit his pipe. “I know,” he said. “That’s why I couldn’t pretend to you that I completely understand. There’s more to it than mere hallucination.”

“I’m going to sit up here tonight,” Mason continued. “Just in case something might happen.”

"She'll sleep," Dr. Clegg assured him. "No need to worry."

"I'll feel better if I stay. I'm beginning to get a theory about all this talk—other worlds, and changes in her body before a trip. It ties in with the window, somehow. And it sounds like a fantasy on suicide."

"The death-impulse? Perhaps. I should have thought of that possibility. Dreams foreshadowing death—on second thought, Mason, I may stay with you. We can make ourselves comfortable here before the fire, I suppose."

Silence settled.

It must have been well after midnight before either of them moved from their place before the fire.

Then a sharp splinter of sound crashed from above. Before the tinkling echo died away, both men were on their feet and moving towards the stairway.

There was no further noise from above, and neither of them exchanged a single word. Only the thud of their running footsteps on the stairs broke the silence. And as they paused outside Avis Long's room, the silence seemed to deepen in intensity. It was a silence palpable, complete, accomplished.

Dr. Clegg's hand darted to the doorknob, wrenched it ineffectually.

"Locked!" he muttered. "She must have gotten up and locked it."

Mason scowled.

"The window—do you think she could have—?"

Dr. Clegg refused to meet his glance. Instead he turned and put his massive shoulder to the door panel. A bulge of muscle ridged his neck.

Then the panel splintered and gave way. Mason reached around and opened the door from inside.

They entered the darkened room, Dr. Clegg, in the lead, fumbling for the light-switch. The harsh, electric glare flooded the scene.

It was a tribute to the power of suggestion that both men glanced, not at the patient in the bed, but at the round window high up on the wall.

Cold night air streamed through a jagged aperture, where the glass had been shattered, as though by the blow of a gigantic fist.

Fragments of glass littered the floor beneath, but there was no trace of any missile. And obviously, the glass had been broken from the outer side of the pane.

“The wind,” Mason murmured, weakly, but he could not look at Dr. Clegg as he spoke. For there was no wind, only the cold, soft breeze that billowed ever so gently from the nighted sky above. Only the cold, soft breeze, rustling the curtains and prompting a sarabande of shadows on the wall; shadows that danced in silence over the great bed in the corner.

The breeze and the silence and the shadows enveloped them as they stared now at the bed.

Avis Long’s head was turned towards them on the pillow. They could see her face quite plainly, and Dr. Clegg realized on the basis of experience what Mason knew instinctively—Avis Long’s eyes were closed in death.

But that is not what made Mason gasp and shudder—nor did the sight of death alone cause Dr. Clegg to scream aloud.

There was nothing whatsoever to frighten the beholder of the placid countenance turned towards them in death. They did not scream at the sight of Avis Long’s face.

Lying on the pillow of the huge bed, Avis Long’s face bore a look of perfect peace.

But Avis Long’s body was . . . gone.

The Strange Island of Doctor Nork

Where do nightmares come from? Take a look

I

BETWEEN the Greater Antilles and the Lesser Antilles rises a little group of islands generally known as the Medium-Sized Antilles.

Mere pimples on the smiling face of the Caribbean, they remain unsqueezed by the hands of man.

Far off the usual trade routes, their shores are only infrequently desecrated by a banana peeling washed off a United Fruit Lines boat.

It was here that I came on the fateful day in August, my monoplane circling until it descended upon the broad, sandy beach of the central island—the strange island of Doctor Nork.

II

HOW Sidney Dearborn ever heard of Doctor Nork, I cannot say. The old dingbat, doddering around the confines of his palatial estate, seldom pays much attention to his news magazine, let alone interesting himself in the doings of a mere individual.

But probably even a man like Dearborn, who is devoting most of his time to becoming an octogenarian—has been for the past eighty years—occasionally pauses and reads the papers.

Quite possibly, Dearborn read an article about Doctor Nork in one of his own magazines. I can see him calling my editor in New York.

“Hello—this is Dearborn. Get me an exclusive feature interview on Nork.

“Nork. Nork! No, I’m not sick. Fella’s name. N-o-r-k. Big scientist. Lives all alone on an island someplace, doing experiments.

“How do I know what kind of experiments? Find out for me. Tell our readers. That’s what I’m paying you fifty grand a year for—to find out facts.

“This story on Nork is drivel. Pure drivel. No facts. It says he’s endowed by a lot of foundations. Endowed for what? Can he split an atom? Get me all the dope.

“Know what I think? I smell Communism, that’s what I smell. What would a big scientist want to hide out on an island for if he wasn’t afraid? The American people deserve to know.

“Well, send a man down to see him. Interview him. I want a complete writeup on Nork within ten days. And say—hello, hello—I want you to be sure and find out where he stands on the oleomargarine tax!”

That’s the way the conversation probably went. I can only guess. All I know is that the managing editor called me into the front office and gave me the assignment.

“Charter a plane,” he said. “Get there, get the yarn, and get back. Get it?”

I got it, but good.

III

THE smooth yellow beach on which my monoplane had landed evidently girdled the island, which was approximately a mile in diameter. Inland, palmettos clustered thickly in a dense jungle that ended abruptly at the foot of a gigantic cliff occupying the island’s center. Monkeys, macaws, toucans and parakeets set up a Disney-like clatter as I toted my suitcase and portable typewriter across the sands, but there was no evidence of human life—not even a Burma-Shave sign.

For a moment I wondered if I had made a mistake. I felt like Robinson Crusoe, and remembered the stirring episode where he discovers in the sand the imprint of a naked human foot.

Then I gasped. I was Robinson Crusoe. For there, before me in the golden sand, was the symbol of life itself! Not the raw imprint of savage life, but the very essence of civilization.

It was an old Pepsi-Cola bottle.

I stooped down to pick it up and then noted, with a sudden shock, that the bottle was not empty.

A SOGGY, crumpled sheet of paper had been stuffed down the neck, which was sealed with a battered cap. I pried it loose, then fished out the parchment and unfolded the sheet. The message was written in a childish scrawl.

To Whom It May Concern:

Doctor Nork is a mean, nasty old thing, so there!

(Signed) A True Friend

So I was on the right island, after all.

My elation subsided as I realized “A True Friend’s” warning about my future host. Well, it was no concern of mine. For all I knew, “A True Friend” might be a far meaner and nastier old thing than Doctor Nork.

At any rate, I wasn’t here to sit in judgment; I was here to get a story on the mysterious medico.

Resealing the message in the bottle, I tossed it into the water. Apparently that had been “A True Friend’s” intention, but his aim was bad.

I toted my luggage towards the palmetto forest as the macaws formed a screaming rainbow round my head.

Oh, those living flames of beauty! Oh, those lovely, lambent—"Oh, for crying out loud!"

I muttered.

Apparently it was safer to walk under the shelter of the trees.

IV

I WAS still wiping my pith helmet when I felt a hand tap my shoulder. I wheeled, then recoiled in horror. It hadn't been a hand on my shoulder, after all. I beheld a paw.

Crouching, confronting me, was the shaggy, shambling figure of a gigantic great ape. Gorilla-eyes glared, and a tusked maw gaped wide in slavering dread. A growl rumbled up into the threatening throat. "You want handkerchief?" said the ape. The intonation was bestial, but the words were human, intelligible. I stared, gulped, and shook my head in amazement.

"Who you fella?" the ape demanded. "You fella come safari?"

I shook my head again, but the hallucination didn't disappear.

"You come in jungle, hunt for diamonds, gold, no? You seek Elephant's Graveyard, maybe, heap much ivory?"

I could only goggle.

"You bwana search for White Goddess?" I shrugged my heart back out of my mouth and down to where it belonged. Then I found my voice again. "You—you can actually talk!" I gasped. "I—I never thought I'd live to hear a gorilla talk like that."

The ape grimaced dreadfully.

"Sounds pretty corny, eh, Jack? I think so, too—all that pidgin English and fake native lingo. Strictly from hunger. But you know how It is with the Doc—he makes me talk that way, says it's what they want to hear.

Sometimes I get pretty ashamed when I think that an anthropoid of my education has to go around making like a schmoe, but I got my orders. Like I say, you know the Doc."

"But I don't know the Doc," I answered. "That's just what I came down here for; I want to meet him."

"You from the publishers?" asked the gorilla.

"News magazine," I replied. "I'm here for an interview."

"Might have known it," the ape muttered. "You don't have a mustache. Thought you were a villain at first; but the villains all have mustaches, don't they?"

I was getting confused again.

The anthropoid ignored my bewilderment and courteously relieved me of my luggage. "Come on," he growled. "Follow me."

He led a path through the palmettos. "Reporter, eh?" he mused. "What do you do evenings?"

"How do you mean?"

"Fly, hurtle, sail, batter, flame, or blast?"

"I don't understand," I confessed. "You must have me mixed up with somebody else. Evenings, I go home. Sometimes I look up a friend and play a little Gin Rummy."

"Tell you what you do," the gorilla suggested. "When you get done with the Doc, look me up and I'll take you on for a few hands."

V

THE cliff-top was a broad, flat plateau overlooking the beach and sea below. The wind blew cold and clear across the treeless expanse, and borne upon its eddies the seagulls wheeled and circled.

Remembering the macaws, I made an instinctive grab for my solar topee and jammed it down over my forehead. Then I peered out under its brim at the domicile of Doctor Nork.

Nork's residence sprawled across the plateau like some gigantic concrete wheel. A white-domed central structure acted as the hub, from which extended a half-dozen radii in the shape of wings attached to the main building. The outer circumference was rimmed by a high stone fence, broken by a single gate. The ape led me towards it while I stared up and marveled at the elaborate structure set upon a lonely tropical isle.

Then we were standing before the gate, which apparently served as a front door. I noted a neatly lettered sign reading:

ERASMUS NORK, M.D.
Doctor is in—Please be Seated

I had nothing to sit on but my valise. The gorilla opened the front door and bid me enter. He shambled into a spacious white hallway, its antiseptic decor reminiscent of an old Doctor Kildare movie. I followed him as we walked along the corridor, passing half a dozen closed doors in succession.

Finally we paused before a large double-door at the end of the hall.

"I'll announce you," the ape suggested. "Doctor Nork is conducting an experiment."

He slipped through the half-open doorway and disappeared. I stood in the hall and listened to the drone of a faraway dynamo. It accented the eeriness of this white palace set in the heart of a tropical jungle. Weird scientific experiments and talking apes—

"Come right in, my friend!" The booming voice resounded from the room behind the door. "Welcome to the Island!" I stepped forward into the laboratory of Doctor Nork.

A great arc-light glared from the domed roof, glared down upon a scene of horror. A huge steel operating table occupied the center of the room, and it was in use. Strapped securely to its surface with a half-clad girl, hair streaming, mouth contorted, eyes wide with terror.

Towering above her was a tall, thin, red-bearded man with a beaked nose and slanted eyes. Like a surgeon, he wore a white gown. Like a surgeon, he brandished a glittering knife. Even as I watched, he raised the cruel blade and his arm swooped down to the girl's bare white bosom.

The red-bearded man grinned exultantly. “How’s tricks?” he whispered. The knife came down—

“Stop!”

I plunged forward frantically. Hairy arms pinioned me from behind. The ape held me fast.

“Hold it!” snarled the red-bearded man. “There—got it?”

“Swell, Boss!” squeaked an unfamiliar voice from the corner of the room. I twisted my head and saw a little man with a smock standing before an easel. Even as I watched, he did things to the tripod stand, folding it under his arm, and gathering the board up, scuttled from the room.

The tall man dropped the knife and fumbled with the cords binding the girl.

“Curse these knots!” he grumbled. “Ought to use the disintegrator. There you are, Toots.”

The girl stood up and fluffed out her hair. She smiled at me—no, past me, over my shoulder where the ape stood.

“How’s for a little Gin?” she said.

The gorilla nodded and released me. Linked arm in arm, girl and gorilla ambled from the room. And the tall, red-bearded man gestured towards me with his knife.

“Sit down, my friend,” he said. “You must be tired after your trip. Maybe you’d prefer to lie down—how about right here, on the operating table?”

“No thanks,” I gulped. “You’re Doctor Nork, I presume?”

“Of course. Glad to see you. It isn’t often we get a chance to converse with a representative of civilization. You must tell me all that’s happening in the world. Has the atomic bomb blown up any continent’s lately?”

“I don’t know—I left New York yesterday,” I answered.

Nork shrugged. “So you came all the way down here just for an interview, eh? I suppose you want to discuss the new slants we worked out?”

“Slants?” I fumbled for his meaning. “I was sent here to find out something about your experiments. I hear you are conducting some mysterious investigations.”

“Mysterious investigations? Experiments? My dear sir, you’ve been badly misled. I’m a business man. This is a business office,” Doctor Nork took out a strop and began to sharpen his knife, splitting hairs from his beard to test the keen edge of the blade.

“But I heard—”

“You were mistaken.” Nork spoke curtly.

At that moment the door opened and the gorilla entered.

“Hey, Doc, those guys are here for the experiments,” he announced.

Nork blushed and avoided my accusing stare.

“Tell them I’m busy,” he barked. “Tell them they’ll have to wait.”

“But the subject is already strapped down. The stenographer is ready. Everything is set up.”

“Confound it!” muttered the Doctor. “Oh, very well!”

“You don’t have to come down, Doc,” the ape said. “Just give me the equipment and I’ll take it to them.”

Doctor Nork shrugged and stepped over to one of the blank, gleaming white laboratory walls. He pressed a tile and something clicked. A section of the wall slid back and revealed a long rack. Objects hung from thongs, dangled from hooks.

I stared at the display. There were long black whips, short cats-of-nine-tails, blackjacks, bludgeons, truncheons, clubs, assegais, knobkerries, shillelaghs.

The gorilla lumbered over and selected an armful at random.

“This oughta do the trick, eh, Doc?”

Nork nodded. Another click and the wall slid back into place. He pressed a second tile. A grating wheeze echoed through the room as a portion of the floor moved to disclose a secret stairway descending into black depths below. The ape clambered down the steps, bearing his homicidal burden. With a loud clang, the floor closed behind him.

I reeled, bewildered. Whips, weapons, concealed passages, and a nameless experiment—what did it mean?

Nork feigned nonchalance as he faced me.

"Come on," I said. "Quit stalling. My editor sent me down here for a feature story and I intend to get it. Now I—"

My words were cut short, then drowned out by a ghastly shriek. It came from beneath my very feet; rising in a weird wail, an ululation of utter agony.

"What's that?" I gasped.

"I didn't hear anything," purred Nork.

Again the dreadful scream tore the air to ribbons.

"What's going on here?" I panted. "What does it all mean? What kind of experiment needs whips and bludgeons? What are they doing down there?"

"Oh, all right, I suppose I'll have to tell you," Nork sighed. "But it's really nothing at all. They're just beating the living hell out of a guy."

VI

I MADE a dive for the Doctor's Bearded throat. "You fiend!" I shrieked. "Now I know what you are—a mad scientist!"

"Hey, cut it out!" yelled Nork. "You're tearing my beard!"

Indeed, the red beard came loose in my hands, revealing a smaller black beard beneath it.

"Don't touch the black beard—that's genuine!" warned the scientist. "I just wear the red for sketches. Red seems to be all the thing this season. Wait, let me explain things to you."

"Explain things? While you're torturing that poor devil down there in the cellar?"

"What poor devil He's a volunteer. Also a confirmed masochist; he likes to be beaten up. Besides, I'm paying him five hundred dollars for his trouble."

"You're paying him five hundred dollars—?"

"Didn't I tell you this was business? Come on, I'll let you see for yourself."

The Doctor pressed the wall, the steps below were revealed, and I followed him down into the noisome darkness. As we passed into the nighted depths, the screams and groans rose hideously. The hair on my scalp followed suit.

We groped along a damp stone corridor until we reached a dimly lit room. It was a sight I never expected to see—a sight no man of the twentieth century should see—a medieval dungeon.

Torchlight flared on rack and strappado, on boot and Iron Maiden and wheel. Torchlight flickered down on the table where the groaning man writhed beneath the blows of two gigantic blackamoors.

The ape stood by silently, hand resting on the shoulders of a small man who sat perched on a high stool. Head cocked attentatively as though listening, the little man was frantically scribbling down shorthand jottings.

Thuds, curses, screeches, blows, moans and gasps filled the air—but they faded into a sort of background noise as the little man beamed ecstatically and babbled at each fresh sound.

"WHUUP!" he yelled. "OOFFLE!"

"Huh?" I murmured.

"GUTCH! Boy, didja hear dat one, hey? GUTCH; Tha's a new one, huh, Doc?" He peered over his spectacles and addressed the blackamoors. "Hey, how's fer usin' the brass knucks now? We ain't had no brass knucks lately."

"OK," grunted the biggest of the Negroes. "Dat is, if'n it's OK wid de victim."

"OK, don't mind me," piped the man on the table, grinning up through the black-and-blue blur of his ravaged face. "I can take it." Surprisingly, he giggled. "Lay on, MacDuff!"

The Negroes began to assail his midriff with brass knuckles. He howled and granted at every blow.

"SPLATT!" yapped the stenographer on the stool. "Oh, Boy, lissen to him! URRK! BLIPP! WHIZZLE! Hey, you witha lead pipe—rap him onna noggin again, I did’n catch it the firs’ time. There! SPOOOIIINNNGGG!!!”

Doctor Nork tapped me on the shoulder. “Had enough?” he whispered. I nodded.

“Let’s go.” He led the way back to the stairs, calling over his shoulder, “Don’t overdo it, boys, and be careful how you hit him. Last time you broke three whips and a truncheon. Those things cost money, you know.”

“BOING!” yelled the stenographer. “BOINGA-BOINGA-BOINGA!”

As we plodded up the steps, Nork sighed. “There’s so much to worry about,” he confided. “So much to do. It isn’t easy, being the mastermind of all the comic books.”

VII

WE SAT in another chamber, now—Doctor Nork’s spacious and imposing library. A hundred shelves, rising to the dizzying height of the ceiling, encircled us on all sides. Every shelf was packed, crammed, jammed full of paperbound books with lurid covers. Nork reached over to an end-table and selected one at random, riffling the pages as he spoke.

“Of course, you can understand what we’re doing down there, now,” he said. “Just setting our blurbs, that’s all. Filling the old balloons.”

“Filling the what?”

“The balloons. You know—the things coming out of the characters’ mouths in comic books. When a crook gets hit by the hero, he makes a noise. Or the weapon makes a noise. Sometimes they both make noises.”

“Like BANG and OUCH?”

“There—you see?” Doctor Nork beamed. “We can’t use BANG and OUCH all the time. Or WHAM and ZOWIE and POW. They’re corny. Besides, the Flushing Chain of Comic Books covers about twenty titles a month—that means roughly five thousand separate panels or drawings. Now you figure that at least four thousand of those panels in every comic book represent somebody getting hit, lashed, flayed, burned, punched, beaten, shot, stabbed, or run over with a steamroller—that takes a lot of different noises and sounds for balloons.

“We strive for variety, understand? But variety alone is not enough. My boss, the publisher, Bloodengore Flushing, is a stickler for realism. He wants accurate sounds. So that’s why we hold experiments. We beat up a victim and take down the noises for our balloons. Get it?”

I got it, but couldn’t handle it. “You mean to say your comic books are drawn from real life?”

“More or less. That’s where I come in. Mr. Flushing pays me a fortune, my dear sir, to mastermind the Flushing Chain. He endowed this laboratory, set up a fund for research, took me under contract for that purpose alone—to make sure that the sixty million readers of such famous comics as Captain Torture and Hatchet Man get only the finest and most realistic literature.

“Why, would you believe it, when I took over he only published three comic books and two of them were actually funny?

“It was ridiculous, and I told him so. Everybody knows that there’s no point in a comic book that’s funny! Why, people will laugh at it! What they want is thrills; girls with big busts and men with big muscles.”

“I don’t know much about comic books,” I confessed. “I had rather a sketchy education. I thought people just wrote and drew them into some kind of an office.”

“That’s the old-fashioned way,” Nork laughed. “Since I went to work for Flushing, we’ve changed all that. Ours is a great humanitarian enterprise; catering to sixty million readers as we do, bringing them romance; adventure, murder, arson, insanity, fratricide, bestiality. That’s a great responsibility, my boy, and I am keenly aware of it.

“When I went to work for the Chain, I was just a broken-down old Nobel Prize winner, puttering around in a laboratory. I smashed a few atoms, that’s just about all I did. Now I am engaged in a great crusade to bring comic-book culture to the masses.

“That’s why Flushing hired me. Up to the time I came here, comic books were put out just about the way you said they were: in offices, by artists and writers who worked solely with their imaginations. They kept thinking up new variants of Superman and that’s about all they could do—occasionally they did a sort of Tatzan takeoff or a Dick Tracy imitation. But it was stale, flat, repetitious.

“You see, the trouble was that they lacked facts to go by. They went stale because they didn’t know anything about their subject matter. None of them had ever been to the jungle, let alone lived with gorillas. None of them had ever used a ray-gun or split a Jap spy’s head open with a butcher’s cleaver. None of them could walk through walls, or put on a suit of red underwear and fly through the air.

“That’s where I came in. I brought the scientific method to bear, the experimental approach. Now all the artists and writers work from rough sketches and material supplied by me, here in my laboratory. Everything you see in Flushing Comics has been pre-tested and is guaranted accurate.”

“You mean you’ve created a comic book world?” I gasped.

“More or less. Who do you think taught that gorilla to talk? I worked with him ever since he was a tiny rhesus; made him listen to Linguaphone records, everything. And why do you think our drawings are so accurate? Because I have an artist here sketching night and day; you saw me posing as the Mad Doctor with that girl when you came in. That’s why I wore the false red beard—it looks better in color reproduction. Many people have been kind enough to tell me that I make tire best and most convincing Mad Doctor they’ve ever seen.”

“I’m sure you do,” I said, politely.

“Take those fellows downstairs—they’re working on the sound effects, as I told you. All over this great laboratory experiments are going on concurrently, and trained observers are noting the results; roughing out sketches, transcribing bits of dialogue, thinking up plots. The result is obvious—Flushing Comics today are beyond all doubt the most realistically gruesome, hideous, ghastly, sanguinary and horrible comics in the world;”

“But what about all those super-characters?” I asked. “You can teach gorillas to talk and pose for pictures and beat people up, but where do you get the ideas for those invincible heroes with the wonderful powers?”

“I give them the powers,” purred Doctor Nork. “My experiments in nuclear physics, chemo-biology, endocrinology and mopery have borne fruit. Strange fruit. As you shall presently see. Speaking of fruit, it’s time for luncheon. And now you’ll have an opportunity to meet some of the actual characters I have created for Flushing Comics.”

VIII

DOCTOR NORK and I dined in palatial splendor. For the first few minutes after our entry into the huge hall, we were alone, save for the silent servants; tall, white-faced men who stared straight ahead in impassive obeisance as they offered us our choice of delicacies.

“How well trained they are,” I whispered, as one of the black-liveried footman served me with a helping of jugged flamingo and pickled eland tongues. “They never say a word, do they?”

“Not remarkable at all,” said Doctor Nork, as he carved the piece de resistance—a huge baked wildebeeste head with an enormous apple in its mouth. “How can they say anything? Some of them are zombies and the rest of them are dead. I reanimated them myself, you know.”

“I didn’t know,” I gulped. “And I’m not so sure I want to. You actually raised corpses up to be your servants?”

“Sure. Don’t you read the comics? Scientists are always going into their laboratories and shooting a lot of electrical arcs through bodies. Had to try it myself just for the sake of accuracy. It worked. And after I had these cadavers animated again, and I had no other use for them except as servants. Still it worries me.”

“Worried me, too,” I agreed. “I don’t like their looks.”

"Oh, that doesn't matter, Nork replied. "I just don't want the Waiter's Union to find out." He gnawed a yak-leg and offered me some jellied eel.

"Where are the other I was supposed to meet?" I asked.

"Others? They'll be along, I'm sure. Matter of fact, here they come now."

His remark was unnecessary. My bursting eardrums and bulging eyes attested to the arrival of some exceedingly strange strangers.

The first one to enter wasn't so bad—he was obviously human, despite his red cloak and the helmet he wore, which resembled an inverted commode. The only tiling that disconcerted me in the least was the fact that he didn't walk in. He flew.

Behind him was a hopping figure. It might have been a gigantic frog with a human face. It might have been a gigantic human with a frog's body. Whatever it was, I didn't care for it.

Right behind the batrachian being stalked a tall man who displayed remarkable stoicism, in so far as his hair seemed to be on fire.

Even as I stared, my attention was arrested, tried, and condemned by another gentleman whose exceedingly long neck seemed to be made of wood. This neck was surmounted by a most unconventional head—flat on top, hooked in the rear, and round in front. There were no features visible in the round surface, which was shiny and metallic.

My eyes were still fighting the battle of the bulge when the girl came in. She was tall, slim, alluring; her. body a pale shaft of moonlight and her hair a shimmering simulacrum of the sun. She wore a combination of leopard-skin bra and shorts that was very pretty, in spots.

I saw no reason why she needed to also wear a large boa-constrictor for a scarf—but she did. One would also assume that a wench with such long, lithe, lovely limbs might be satisfied to walk; but no, she had to ride on the back of a lion.

"Greetings!" said the girl, as the lion halted before us and began to slaver over my shoes.

“Hi,” chirped Doctor Nork. He beamed at me. “Meet my daughter, Albino—the White Goddess of the Jungle.”

“Your daughter?”

“Brought her up among the animals to be useful in my work. Decided to make a female Tarzan out of her at an early age, when she showed signs of inheriting my own fondness for wild game. You may not know it, but I used to be quite a sportsman myself. Earned quite a reputation as a deer-hunter in my youth—I was a fast man with a buck.”

Albino sat down, unwound her snake, and replaced it with a napkin. She began to feed her lion from m) plate.

“Pass the salt,” she said.

I did so, trembling—a human salt-shaker. She noticed my tremor and sniffed disdainfully.

“Where’d you find this jerk, Pa?” she asked. “You know I don’t like sissies.”

I was all set to give her a snappy comeback, but something choked off my flow of conversation. That something was the boa-constrictor, which now began to twine around my neck. I removed it hastily and wiped my hands on what I thought was a napkin. But napkins don’t roar.

I took my hands out of the lion’s mane and turned to Doctor Nork. “What an aggregation,” I murmured.

“All normal people,” he assured me. “At least, they were until I got to work on them. You see before you, my dear sir, the results of years of experiments. My daughter was just a plain, ordinary little girl until I taught her how to behave like a monkey. In her case, all that was required was a little child psychology. Instead of giving her a doll to play with, I gave her a talking gorilla. The rest followed easily.

“In some of the other cases, surgery was necessary. Take Water Boy, for example.”

“Who?”

HE INDICATED the frog-man. “One of Flushing Comics’ most popular characters. I made him; raised him from a tadpole, as it were. As a result of a unique series of experiments, he’s now more frog than human. It was a risky business to turn a man into a frog—more than once I thought he’d croak. But you can see for yourself how successful I’ve been.” Nork pointed at the man with the flaming hair. “That’s Fire-Bug,” he told me. “The Human Torch. Goes around giving criminals the hot-foot. I developed his metabolism to the point where he can actually live on fire.”

“That’s why he’s eating coal, eh?”

“Precisely. And as for our flying man, Rogers—”

“Buck Rogers?”

“No. Two-Dollar Rogers, we call him. He’s twice as good as Buck.”

I turned away in bewilderment. “Let me get this straight once and for all,” I said. “You experiment on people and develop superhuman or unusual characteristics. Then you watch their actions and use what you see as the basis for plot-material in comic books.”

“Right. Now—”

A violent pounding interrupted him. The strange being with the long wooden neck and the metallic head was using the blank spot where his face should be—using it as a walnut-cracker.

“Hammerhead,” explained the Doctor. “Our readers get a bang out of him.” He giggled. “Did you see our last issue featuring him? Had a sequence where he uses his head as an atom-smasher.”

I tried to ignore the scientist’s remarks and make a little time with Albino. But she obviously despised me for a weakling; just a poor coward who was probably secretly afraid of rhinocerii.

“Ow!”

THE shout came from down at the end of the table. Hammerhead had accidentally banged the fingers of Fire-Bug.

“Look what you’re doing, clumsy!” he yelled.

“Don’t get hot under the collar,” retorted Hammerhead.

For answer, Fire-Bug opened his mouth, but no remarks came out. Instead, a six-foot tongue of living flame belched forth. Hammerhead ducked just in time, but Two-Dollar Rogers got smoke in his eyes. Rising, cloak whirling about him in red fury, the superhuman flier whipped out a strange, gleaming weapon and leveled it at the human torch.

“I’ll blast you!” he yelled. Lightning crackled from the muzzle, and Fire-Bug ducked as an atomic beam disintegrated the chair in which he had been sitting. At the same time, he let go with another burst of flame.

Water Boy opened his frog-mouth and extinguished the blaze, inelegantly but effectively.

“Wet smack!” screamed Rogers, leveling his weapon. Fire-Bug turned toward him, ready to blaze away. Hammerhead poised himself to pound him down.

“Quiet!” screamed Doctor Nork. “Cut it out—get out of here, all of you. If you can’t learn to behave and get along with one another, I’ll—I’ll turn the Faceless Fiend loose on you!”

There was a deathly silence.

“There,” said the Doctor. “That’s telling them, eh? But where are you?”

“Here,” I gasped. “Right here—“under the table.”

Albino sniffed.

“I—uh—dropped my fork,” I said.

“You’re scared,” she accused. “I can tell by the way your hand trembles.”

“What hand?”

“The one on my ankle. Take it off.”

I ROSE and took my place again. “All right,” I said. “I am scared. Who wouldn’t be with all this blasting and firing and pounding going on?”

“If you think these characters are bad, you ought to see the Faceless Fiend,” she told me.

“Who is he? I noticed everybody shut up when his name was mentioned.

Nork’s face clouded. He sighed heavily and reached for a platter of breaded horse-kidneys. “One of my few failures,” he murmured. “Some of my agents spirited away a mass-murderer from the penal colony in French Guiana. That’s where I get most of my subjects—you’ll find that comic book characters are best when they have criminal minds.

“Anyhow, this time I intended to create a super-criminal for a new book. The man was frightfully disfigured, and as a first step I attempted to remedy his condition with plastic surgery. At the same time, I began psychiatric treatment with deep hypnosis; my aim was to uncondition all his reflexes and hibit all his inhibitions. This I did, while working on his face to remove the scars.

“ALAS, I did my work too well. I had him in a state of complete abandon, psychically, long before his features were rebuilt by plastic surgery. As a matter of fact, I had just finished removing his old features and hadn’t gotten around to building new ones when he—escaped. Ran away.

“Of course, when the poor fellow removed the bandages, he found that he had no face left at all. This, coupled with his mental unbalance, resulted in the creation of the perfect super-criminal: the Faceless Fiend.

“Nobody knows what he looks like, because he doesn’t look like anyone. He has no scruples—just hatred of society. Gifted with superhuman cunning, he has managed to evade capture and even now is lurking somewhere on this island. I’ve sent my staff out time and time again to comb the jungles for him. I imported several beachcombers just to comb the beaches. But he eludes me.

“Meanwhile he swears vengeance on me and all my work. He threatens me in a million ways. I am convinced it is he who writes letters to the press denouncing comic books.”

“Say, wait a minute,” I said. “I wonder if he wrote that note?”

I told him about the message I'd found in a bottle on the beach.

"That's his work," Nork nodded. "A dangerous adversary, my friend."

The gorilla shuffled into the room and tapped the Doctor on the shoulder.

"Sorry to interrupt," he said, "but it's time for you to come down to the crocodile pits.

We're getting ready to draw that sequence where Wonder Child ties their tails into Boy Scout knots. If we get that out of the way this afternoon, we can go right on to the scene where he strangles his grandmother—right?"

"Right." Nork rose. "Excuse me," he said. "The press of business affairs. Perhaps you're tired. I'll ask Albino to see you to your room."

"Follow me," the girl urged. "Do you want to ride my lion?"

"No thanks, I'll walk."

We left the banquet hall and ascended a spiral staircase. The blonde girl led me into a handsomely furnished bedroom.

"Maybe a little sleep will quiet your nerves," she observed. The scorn in her voice was evident.

"I'll be all right, thanks," I said. "Gh—what's that?"

A rumbling rose, and the air was suddenly suffused with blue flame.

"Nothing at all, scaredy-cat," she snickered. "Just a little hurricane coming up, I suppose."

"Hurricane?"

I stared out of the window and saw that she spoke the truth.

IX

THE storm was gathering over the tropical isle. Water boiled lake lava across the beach. The palmettos prostrated themselves before the fury of the storm. Wind roared from all points of the compass, and the currents clashed overhead to tear the very air to ribbons.

A kaleidoscopic cloud of macaws blew across the island, followed by a white cumulus of seagulls—borne ruthlessly away by the violence of the elements.

“Quit shaking, you coward!” taunted the girl. “I’ll turn on the the lights.” She did so. I collapsed across the bed, watching the onslaught of the storm. The walls trembled and I followed suit.

“Oh, you’re impossible,” she told me, “Just like all the other men I’ve ever met—afraid of everything.”

“You can’t blame me,” I replied. “After all, not everybody has had your advantages. Being brought up by a gorilla, and all that.”

“Never mind the excuses,” Albino said. “It doesn’t matter. I’ve been the White Goddess of the Jungle here for five years, and I’m getting pretty darn sick of it, too. Always waiting for some strong, handsome, virile he-man to come along and woo me, like they do in the comic books. And what do I get? A bunch of weaklings, namby-pamby characters who are afraid of everything—lions, snakes, hurricanes.”

“And you’re not afraid of anything?”

“Of course not.”

“You’re sure?”

There was a crash overhead and suddenly the lights went out. The room was black—an inky vacuum in the dark womb of storm.

I winced, but the girl’s voice rose strong and clear in the darkness.

“I fear nothing,” she told me. Not even the Faceless Fiend himself.”

“That’s very good to hear. I’d hate to have caused you any discomfort.”

“What’s that?” I yelled. “Who said that?”

“Me. The Faceless Fiend.”

“You’re here—in this room?”

“Just came in through a secret staircase,” the slow voice hissed. “I’ve been waiting to get my hands on you ever since you arrived.”

“You don’t say,” I answered, hurling myself in the direction of the door. Thunder boomed and wind howled.

“Don’t try to escape,” chuckled the unseen presence. “You can’t see in the dark, but I can. And I’m going to get you.”

“Help!” I yelled. “Albino—save me!”

“Stay where you are,” the girl commanded. “I’m coming.”

“So am I!” cackled the menacing voice.

I whirled, then cried out.

“Ouch!” I yelled. Something hit me in She back of my neck.

It was the ceiling.

X

WHEN I opened my eyes, I was lying strapped to a table in a long, narrow underground chamber. Blue light flickered in mephitic gloom. Crouching above me was a cloaked figure. I stared up and was rewarded only by a blank look. This creature, this monster, this being with an empty gap between neck and hairline, was something not to be countenanced. It was beyond all doubt the Faceless Fiend. His chuckle sounded out of emptiness, slithering off the slimy walls.

“Don’t look so unhappy, my friend,” he purred. “You ought to thank me for rescuing you. Here you are, safe and sound in a nice, comfortable sewer, while above us the entire laboratory has collapsed.”

“Collapsed? Was it lightning?”

“No, just rain. The place just melted away.”

“How could that be?”

“Simple,” explained my captor. “Doctor Nork built it all out of guano. Apparently he didn’t feed the seagulls enough cement. At any rate, the entire structure has been demolished—and your friends have all perished. No one is left but the two of us.”

“Dead?” I cried. “All of them—you’re sure?”

“Beyond a doubt. It’s an end to the whole insane scheme; the comic books will go out of existence, and Doctor Nork will no longer be free to perpetrate his wicked experiments in the name of science.”

“But the girl,” I persisted. “Albino, she was in the room with us—”

"I snatched you through the trapdoor and down the secret staircase just in time. I'm afraid you'll have to face it. We're alone. And now, speaking of facing it—"

The cloaked figure stooped to the side of the table and rose again. One hand clutched a small saw. "Speaking of facing it," he continued, "I am about to perform a small experiment of my own. Ever since I lost my face, I've waited for a chance to find another. I hid down here in the sewers under the laboratory and bided my time. I didn't want to take a stupid mug like Nork's and I certainly wouldn't appropriate the visage of any of his monsters.

"But when you flew in to the island this morning, I knew my long vigil was over. Sorry, I cannot offer you any anesthetic, but time is short."

"You—you mean you're going to steal my face?" I screamed.

"I prefer to think of it as a little facelifting job," answered my captor. "Please now; just relax."

The Faceless Fiend bent forward, saw in hand. It was a typical scene from a comic book story—as such, it probably would have delighted ten million dear little kiddies throughout the land. But it didn't amuse me in the least.

The saw grazed my neck—

A roar shattered the walls. A tawny blur bore the cloaked figure backwards into the shadows. There were screams, and growls, and other less pleasant noises generally heard only at presidential conventions or in zoos.

"Good work!"

Albino was at my side, using the saw on the ropes that bound me. She gestured towards the shadows of the sewer beyond, where the lion was now creating a Bodiless Fiend.

"We got through the trapdoor in time, just behind you. Then part of the walls gave, and we were delayed—but not too long."

"Then it's true," I said. "The laboratory is destroyed?"

“Everything’s gone,” she sighed. “Even this sewer isn’t safe much longer. Let’s get out of here.”

A crash accented her words. Turning, I saw that the shadowed portion of the sewer had disappeared, hiding both the lion and the Faceless Fiend from view forever beneath fresh debris.

“This way,” Albino urged, pulling me along the corridor. “There should be a sewer outlet to the beach.”

“Thanks for rescuing me,” I panted.

“Think nothing of it,” the girl answered. “That’s just a reflex action, you know. Been rescuing people for years now for the comics.”

The damp walls of the sewer twisted and turned. We raced along, Albino taking a lithe-limbed lead. She rounded a curve ahead of me and I blundered forward.

Suddenly she screamed.

I turned the corner and grasped her arm.

“What’s tire matter?” I said.

The girl stood there shaking in a frenzy of fear.

“Eeeeeh!” she shrieked. “Take it away!”

“Huh?” I said.

For answer, she clung to me and threw herself forward and upward into my arms. I held her close.

“Look!” she sobbed. “Down there—make it go away!”

“Where?” I asked.

“There.”

“But—it’s only a mouse,” I said.

She began to cry. I stepped forward, carrying her in my arms, and the mouse retreated to its burrow with a shrill squeak.

Albino was weeping hysterically, and the more she cried the more I grinned.

“There, there,” I said. “Don’t you worry. I’ll protect you.”

There isn’t much more to tell. By the time we emerged upon the broad expanse of the beach, the hurricane had blown away and only a gentle rain fell upon the ruins of the big laboratory on the cliff.

Despite my fears, I found the plane quite undamaged, save for a minor accident that had crumpled part of the landing gear. As it was, I managed a takeoff and a subsequent landing some hours later in the airport at Jamaica.

Within a day Albino and I were back in civilization. I managed to sell her on the notion, while en route, that her brand of courage was of no value in New York.

“People seldom encounter lions and tigers in the city,” I told her, “but the place is simply lousy with mice. What you need is someone like me to protect you.”

She agreed, meekly enough. And that’s why we were married, even before I reported to my editor with the story.

That episode is still painful in my memory. Being called a liar and a drunkard is bad enough, but when he accused me of opium-smoking, there was only one course left open to me.

“I resign!” I shouted, as he booted me down the stairs.

Still, it’s all over now, and Albino doesn’t mind. I have a new job—bought a little newsstand over on Seventh Avenue. I don’t make much money selling newspapers, but there’s always enough to buy a few mousetraps for the house.

Besides, I manage to sell quite a lot of comic books. . . .

Floral Tribute

There's one sure place where old kin and friends can get together—forever

THEY always had fresh flowers on the table at Grandma's house. That's because Grandma lived right in back of the cemetery.

"Nothing like flowers to brighten up a room," Grandma used to say. "Ed, be a good boy and take a run over. Fetch me back something pretty. Seems to me there was doings yesterday afternoon near the big Weaver Vault—you know where I mean. Pick out some nice ones and, mind you, no lilies."

So Ed would scamper off, climbing the fence in the back yard and jumping down over the old Putnam grave and its leaning headstone. He'd race down the paths, taking shortcuts through bushes and behind statues. Ed knew every inch of the cemetery long before he was seven—he learned it playing hide-and-seek there with the gang, after dark.

Ed liked the cemetery. It was better than the back yard, better than the rickety old house where Grandma and he lived; and by the time he was four, he played among the tombs every day. There were big trees and bushes everywhere; lots of nice green grass, and fascinating paths that wound off endlessly into a maze of mounds and white stones. Birds were forever singing or darting down over the flowers. It was pretty there, and quiet, and there was nobody to watch, or bother, or scold—as long as Ed remembered to stay out of the way of Old Sourpuss, the caretaker. But Old Sourpuss lived in another house; a big stone one, over on the other end, at the big cemetery entrance.

Grandma told Ed all about Old Sourpuss, and warned him against letting the caretaker catch him inside the grounds.

"He doesn't like to have little boys playing in there," she said. "Especially when there's a funeral going on. Way he acts, a body'd think he owned the place. Where's nobody's got a better right to use it as they see fit than we have, if the truth were known.

"So you go ahead and play there all you want, Ed, only don't let him see you. After all, a body's only young once, I always say."

Grandma was swell. Just plain swell. She even let him stay up late at night, and play hide-and-seek with Susie and Joe, behind the headstones.

Of course, she didn't really care, because at night was when Grandma had her company over.

Almost nobody came to see Grandma in the daytime any more. There was just the ice-man and the grocery boy and sometimes the mailman—usually he just came about once a month with Grandma's pension check. Most days there was nobody in the house except Grandma and Ed.

But at night, she had company. They never came before supper, but along about eight o'clock, when it got dark, they started drifting in. Sometimes there were only one or two, sometimes a whole bunch. Most always, Mr. Willis was there, and Mrs. Cassidy, and Sam Gates. There were others, too, but Ed remembered these three the best.

Mr. Willis was a funny man. He was always grumbling and complaining about the cold, and quarreling with Grandma about what he called "my property."

"You have no idea how cold it gets," he used to say, sitting over in the corner next to the fireplace and rubbing his hands. "Day after day it seems to get colder and colder. Not that I'm complaining too much, mind you. It's nothing as bad as the rheumatism I used to have. But you'd think that they'd at least have given me a decent lining. After all the money I left them, to pick out a cheap pine job like that, with some kind of shiny cotton stuff that didn't even last through the first winter—"

Oh, he was a grumbler, that Mr. Willis. He had a long, pale old man's face that seemed to be all wrinkles and scowl. Ed never really got a good look at him, because right after supper when they went into the parlor, Grandma would turn out all the lights and just keep the fire going in the fireplace. "We got to cut down on bills," she used to tell Ed. "This little widow's mite of mine is hardly enough to keep body and soul together for one, let alone an orphan, too."

Ed was an orphan; he knew that, but it never bothered him. Nothing seemed to bother him, the way things bothered people like old Mr. Willis.

"To think I'd come to this in the end," Mr. Willis would sigh. "Why, my family owned this place. Fifty years ago it was just a pasture—nothing but meadowland. You know that, Hannah."

Hannah was Grandma's name; Hannah Morse. And Grandpa's name had been Robert Morse. Grandpa had died a long time ago in a war and Grandma never even knew where he was buried. But first he had built this house for Grandma. That's what made Mr. Willis so mad, Ed guessed.

"When Robert built this house, I gave him the land," Mr. Willis complained. "That was fair and square. But when the city came in and took over—made me take a price for the whole shooting-match—there was nothing fair and square about that. Bunch of crooked lawyers, cheating a man out of his rightful property, with all their gib-gab about forced sales and condemning. Way I see it, I still got a moral right. A moral right. Not just to that itty-bitty little plot where they planted me, but to the whole shebang."

"What do you plan to do," Mrs. Cassidy would say, "Evict us?"

THEN she would laugh, real soft, because all of Grandma's friends sounded soft no matter how happy or mad they got. Ed liked to watch Mrs. Cassidy laugh, because she was a big woman and she laughed all over.

Mrs. Cassidy wore a lovely black dress, always the same one, and she was all powdered and rouged and painted up. She talked to Grandma a lot about something called “perpetual care.”

“I’ll always be. grateful for one thing,” Ed remembered her saying. “And that’s my perpetual care. The flowers are so pretty—I picked out the design for the blanket myself. And they keep the trim so nice, even in winter. I wish you could see the scrollwork on the box, too; all that handcarving in mahogany. They certainly spared no expense, let me tell you, and I’m mighty grateful. Mighty grateful. Why, if I hadn’t forbid it in the will, I’ll bet they’d have put up a monument. As it is, I think the plain Vermont granite has a little more restraint—you know, dignity.”

Ed didn’t understand Mrs. Cassidy very well, and besides, it was more interesting to listen to Sam Gates. Sam was the only one who paid much attention to Ed.

“Hi, sonny,” he would say. “Come over and sit by me. Want to hear about the battles, sonny?”

Sam Gates was a young-looking man, always smiling. He’d sit there in front of the fire, with Ed sprawled out at his feet, and then there would be wonderful stories to hear. Like the time Sam Gates met Abe Lincoln—not President Lincoln, but just plain Abe, the lawyer from down in Springfield, Illinois. Then there was the story about General Grant and the story about something called the Bloody Corner, where the boys in blue really gave ’em the cold steel.

“Wisht I could have lasted out to see the finish,” Sam Gates would sigh. “Course, by ’64 wasn’t one of us on either side didn’t know how it would end. After Gettysburg we had ’em on the run. And maybe it’s just as well I didn’t have to go through all that messing around with Reconstruction, or whatever they called it. Nosiree, sonny, I guess I was lucky in a way at that. Leastways, I never had to grow old, like Willis here. Never had to marry and settle down and raise a family and end up mumbling in the corner, trying to gum my porkchops. I’d have come to the same thing at the last, anyhow—isn’t that so, friends?”

And Sam Gates would look around the room and wink. Sometimes Grandma got mad at him.

"Wish you wouldn't carry on that way," she said. "Watch your language, please. Little pitchers have big ears. Just because you're all sociable and come around on account of this house being more or less a part of the property—so to speak—that's no reason you got to go putting ideas in the head of a six year old. It ain't decent."

That was a sure sign Grandma was mad; when she said "ain't." And at such times Ed usually got up and went out to play with Susie and Joe.

Thinking back, years later, Ed couldn't remember the first time he played with Susie and Joe. The moments they spent together were quite fresh in his memory, but other details escaped him; where they lived, who their parents were, why they only came around at night, calling under the kitchen window.

"Oh Ed-deeee! C'mon out and play!"

Joe was a black-haired, quiet kid of about nine. Susie was Ed's age or even a little younger; she had curly, taffy-colored hair and always wore a ruffled dress which she was careful not to stain or dirty, no matter what games they-played.

Ed had a crush on her.

They played hide-and-seek all over the cool, dark graveyard, night after night; calling faintly and giggling quietly at one another. Even now, Ed recalled how quiet the children were. He tried vainly to remember other games they played, like tag, where they'd touch each other. He was sure, somehow, that he had touched them, but no single instance came in recollection. Mainly he remembered Susie's face, her smile, and the way she called in her little-girl voice.

"Oh Ed-deeee!"

ED NEVER told anyone what he remembered, afterwards. Because afterwards was when the trouble started. It began when the people from the school came and asked Grandma why he wasn't attending first grade.

They got to talking with her, and then they talked to Ed. There was a lot of confusion—he remembered Grandma crying, and a big man with a blue suit on came in and showed her a lot of papers.

Ed didn't like to think about these things, because they marked the end of everything. After the man came there were no more evenings around the fireplace, no more games in the cemetery, no more glimpses of Joe or Susie.

The man made Grandma cry, and talked about incompetence and neglect, and something called a sanity hearing, just because Ed had been dumb enough to tell him about playing in the graveyard, and about Grandma's friends.

"You mean to tell me you got this poor kid so mixed up that he thinks he sees them too?" the man had asked Grandma. "That can't go on, Mrs. Morse; filling a child's head with morbid nonsense about the dead."

"They ain't dead!" snapped Grandma, and Ed had never seen her quite so mad, even though she'd been crying. "Not to me they ain't, and not to him, nor anyone who's friendly. I've lived in this house nigh all my life; ever since Robert was taken from me in that foreign war in the Philippines, and this is about the first time a stranger ever marched into it. What you and your kind would call a living stranger, that is. But the owners—they come around regular. Seeing as how we share the same property, so to speak. They ain't dead, Mister; they're just neighborly, is all. And to Ed and me they're a darn sight more real than your kind ever was!"

But the man didn't listen to Grandma, even though he stopped asking questions and began treating her nice and polite. Everybody was nice and polite from then on; the other men that came, and the lady who took Ed away on the train to the orphanage in the city.

That was the end. There were no fresh flowers every day at the orphanage, and while Ed met plenty of kids, he never saw anyone like Joe or Susie.

Not that everyone, kids and grownups alike, weren't nice to him. They treated him just so, and Mrs. Ward, the Matron, told him that she wanted Ed to think of her as his own mother—that being the least she could do, after his harrowing experience.

Ed didn't know what she meant by harrowing experience and she wouldn't explain. She wouldn't tell him what had happened to Grandma, either, or why she never came to visit him. In fact, any time he asked any questions about the past she had nothing to say except that it was best to try and forget all that had happened before he came to the orphanage.

Gradually, Ed forgot. In the score of years that followed, he forgot almost completely—that was why it was so hard to remember, now. And Ed wanted to remember, very badly.

DURING the two years in the hospital at Honolulu, Ed spent most of his time trying to remember. There was nothing else for him to do, lying flat on his back that way, and besides, he knew that if he ever got out of there he'd want to go back.

Just before he went into the Service, after getting out of the orphanage, he'd received a letter from Grandma. It was one of the few letters Ed ever received in his lonely lifetime and at first the return address on the envelope and the name, "Mrs. Hannah Morse," had meant nothing to him.

But the letter itself—just a few scrawled and spidery lines written on ruled notebook paper—brought a rush of confused memories.

Grandma had been away, in a "sanotarium," as she put it, but she was back home, now, and had found out all about the "put-up job they worked to get you into their clutches." And if Ed would like to come back home—

Ed wanted very desperately to come back home. But he was already in uniform and waiting orders when the letter came. He wrote, of course. He wrote all the while he was overseas, and sent her an allotment, besides.

Sometimes Grandma's answers reached him. She was waiting for his leave to come. She was reading the papers. Sam Gates said it was a horrible thing, this war.

Sam Gates—

Ed told himself that he was a grown man now. Sam Gates was a figment of the imagination. But Grandma kept writing about her figments; about Mr. Willis and Mrs. Cassidy, and even some "new friends" who came to the house.

"Lots of fresh flowers these days, Ed boy," Grandma wrote. "Scarcely a day goes by without them blowing taps over yonder. Of course a body isn't so spry any more—I'm pushing seventy-seven, you know, but I still get over for flowers same as always."

The letters stopped coming when Ed got hit. For a long while, everything stopped, for Ed. There was only the bed and the doctors and the nurses and the hypo every three hours and the pain. That was Ed's life—that, and trying to remember.

Once Ed nearly told a skull doctor about the whole deal, but he caught himself in time. It was nothing you could talk about and hope to be understood, and Ed had enough trouble without bucking for a Section Eight.

When he was able to, he wrote again. Nearly two years had passed and the war was long since over. So many things had happened that Ed didn't even dare to hope very much. For Hannah Morse would be "pushing eighty" by now, if—

He got an answer to his letter a few days before his medical discharge came through.

"Dear Ed." The same spidery scrawl, probably a sheet from the same ruled notebook. Nothing had changed. Grandma was still waiting and she'd just known that he hadn't given up. But there was a funny thing she wanted him to know about. Did he remember old Sourpuss, the caretaker? Well, old Sourpuss was hit by a truck last winter, and ever since then he'd taken to dropping in with the rest of them evenings, and now he was friendly as could be, nice as pie. They'd have so much to talk about when Ed came back—

So Ed came back.

AFTER twenty years, after a new lifetime, Ed came back. There was a long month in Honolulu, waiting for sailing—a month filled with unreal people and events. There were nights in a barroom, there was a girl named Peggy and a nurse named Linda, and there was a hospital buddy of Ed's who talked about going into business with the dough they'd saved up.

But the barroom was never as real as the parlor back in Grandma's house, and Peggy and Linda weren't in the least like Susie, and Ed knew he would never go into business.

On the boat, everybody seemed to be talking about Russia and inflation and housing. Ed listened and nodded and tried to remember some of the phrases Sam Gates used to use when he told about Old Abe down in Springfield-Illinois.

Ed took a plane from Frisco, wiring ahead to Mrs. Hannah Morse. He got in at the airport in mid-afternoon, but he couldn't catch a bus for the last forty-mile ride until just before supper. He grabbed a bite to eat at the station and then jolted into town along about twilight.

A cab took him over to Grandma's. Ed was trembling when he got out in front of the house on the edge of the cemetery. He handed the driver a five and told him to keep the change. Then he stood there until the cab drove away, before he got up enough nerve to knock on the door.

He took a long, deep breath. Then the door opened and he was home. He knew he was home because nothing had changed. Nothing at all.

Grandma was still Grandma. She stood there in the doorway and she was little and wrinkled and beautiful. An old, old woman, peering up at him in the dimness of the firelight, and saying, "Ed, boy—I declare! It is you, isn't it? Land, what tricks a body's mind can play. I thought I'd still be seeing a little shaver. But come in, boy, come in. Wipe your feet first."

Ed wiped his feet on the mat, same as always, and walked into the parlor. The fire was going in the fireplace and Ed put on another log before he sat down.

"Hard to keep it up, boy," Grandma said. "Woman gets to be my age." She sat down opposite him and smiled.

“You shouldn’t be alone like this,” Ed told her.

“Alone? But I’m not alone! Don’t you remember Mr. Willis and all the others? They sure enough haven’t forgotten you, I can tell you that. Hardly talk about another thing except when you were coming back. They’ll be over, later.”

“Will they?” Ed said, softly, staring into the fire.

“Of course they will. You know that, Ed.”

“Sure. Only I thought—”

Grandma smiled. “I understand, all right. You’ve been letting the other folks fool you; the ones who don’t know. I met a lot of them up to the sanotarium; they kept me there for nigh ten years before I caught on to how to handle them. Talking about ghosts and spirits and deelusions. Finally I just gave up and allowed they were right and in a little while they let me come home. Guess you went through the same thing, more or less, only right now you don’t know what to believe.”

“That’s right, Grandma,” Ed said. “I don’t.”

“Well, boy, you needn’t worry about it. Or about your chest, either.”

“My chest? How did you—”

“They sent a letter,” Grandma answered. “Maybe it’s right, what they said, and maybe its wrong. But it doesn’t matter, either way. I know you aren’t afraid. You wouldn’t have come back if you were afraid, would you, Ed?”

“That’s right, Grandma. I figured that even if time was short, I belonged here. Besides, I wanted to know, once and for all, if—”

He was silent, waiting for her to speak. But she merely nodded, face bowed and dim in the shadows. At last she replied.

“You’ll find out, soon enough.” Her smile flashed up at him, and Ed caught himself remembering a dozen familiar gestures, mannerisms, intonations. Come what may, that was something nobody could take away from him—he was home.

“Land, I wonder what’s keeping them?” Grandma said, rising abruptly and crossing over to the side window. “Seems to me they’re pretty late.”

"Are you sure they're coming?" Ed could have bitten his tongue off a moment after he uttered the question, but it was too late then.

Grandma turned stiffly. "I'm sure," she said. "But maybe I was wrong about you. Maybe you ain't sure."

"Don't be mad, Grandma—"

"I ain't mad! Oh, Ed, have they really fooled you after all? Did you go so far away that you can't even remember?"

"Of course I remember. I remember everything; even about Susie and Joe and the fresh flowers every day, but—"

"The flowers." Grandma looked at him. "Yes, you do remember, and I'm glad. You used to get fresh flowers for me every day, didn't you?"

She glanced at the table. An empty bowl rested on the center.

"Maybe that will help," she said. "If you'd go get some flowers. Now. Before they come."

"Now?"

"Please, Ed."

WITHOUT a word, he walked out into the kitchen and opened the back door. The moon was up, and there was enough light to guide him along the path to the fence. Beyond, the cemetery lay in silver splendor.

Ed didn't feel afraid, he didn't feel strange, he felt nothing at all. He boosted himself over the fence, ignoring the sharp, sudden pain below his ribs. He set his feet upon the gravel path between the headstones and he walked a little ways, letting memory guide him.

Flowers. Fresh flowers. Fresh flowers from fresh graves. It was all wrong, it was Section Eight for sure, but at the same time it was all right. It had to be.

He saw the mound over at the side of the bill, near the end of the fence. Potter's field, bat there were flowers on one grave; the single bouquet rested against a wooden marker.

Ed stooped down, scenting the freshness, feeling the damp firmness of the cut stems as he lifted the cluster from the marker. The moon was bright.

The moon was bright, and he read the plain block-letters.

HANNAH MORSE
1870-1949

Hannah Morse was Grandma. The flowers were fresh. The grave wasn't more than a day old—

Ed walked back along the path very slowly. He found it very hard to get back over the fence without dropping the bouquet, but he made it, pain and all. He opened the kitchen door and walked into the parlor where the fire had burned very low.

Grandma wasn't there. Ed put the flowers in the bowl anyway. Grandma wasn't there, and her friends weren't there, either. But Ed didn't worry any more.

She'd be back. And so would Mr. Willis and Mrs. Cassidy and Sam Gates, all of them. In a little while, Ed knew, he might even hear the faint, faraway voices under the kitchen window, calling.

Oh, Ed-deeee!"

He might not be able to go out tonight, the way his chest was acting up. But sooner or later, he'd go. Meanwhile, they would be coming, soon.

Ed smiled and leaned back in the chair before the fire, just making himself at home and waiting.

All Else Is Dust

Nobody quarrels particularly with the idea that the dead turn to dust. But what if it starts to happen BEFORE you die?

THEY HAD taken the cover off the target box preparatory to making a new run and the beam from the cyclotron was spurting into the air. Through the periscope in the control room, the beam looked like a death ray. In the control room, graduate research assistant Nick Zehr waited for Ed Freuhoff's entrance into the chamber that housed the cyclotron. A frown puckered Nick's forehead. In this place of transition, in this place of hurtling change, a frown was no new sight. Every man who worked here habitually wore one. But Nick Zehr's frown was something special.

Once before he had seen this thing happen, when the target box was disconnected and the beam was spurting into the air, and he had simply refused to believe his eyes. Even in this place of high magic where a new world was in the making—or an old one being destroyed—even in this place where almost anything might happen, there were limits to what one was willing to believe he had seen. Pink elephants, yes. Green diamonds, yes. But this—No!

Freuhoff entered the operating chamber. In the control room, Nick Zehr, aware of the big man's entrance, glued his eyes to the periscope and held his breath.

Freuhoff shambled as he walked. Slow of speech and slow of movement, he looked a little like an ape that had decided to become a man and then had changed his mind about the whole business when he discovered what being a man meant—but could not quite make up his mind to go back to apehood again. Not too keen, not too alert, what Freuhoff lacked in native intelligence, he made up by plodding work. Day and night, the man worked.

He walked across the operating chamber. As he moved past the purple beam from the cyclotron, the beam curved in an arc and snapped at his back.

In the control room, Nick Zehr froze.

The beam didn't touch Freuhoff. It snapped out behind him and seemed to follow him from the space of inches. When he started to turn his head, it promptly snapped back into its normal position. By the time he got his head around far enough to see it, the beam was again a purple glow of ionized air exploding outward from the open target box.

In the control room Nick Zehr said, "This beats the hell out of me!" There was shock and surprise and wonder and awe in his words. And in him was fear.

"The beam snapped at him. But when he turned around to look at it, it jumped back into place."

This was the impression he had gotten. The beam seemed to have taken intelligent action, whether to strike at Freuhoff or to examine him, out of curiosity, Nick Zehr couldn't determine.

Nor could he understand how the beam could take intelligent action. The glow was simple ionization, the beam itself was composed of accelerated particles. Neither the beam nor any part of it was intelligent. Not if man really knew anything about the universe! Therefore the beam could not, like a turtle, become curious about a man and stick its head out from under its shell for another look, jerking back under the shell when it was about to be caught in the act of looking.

Nick Zehr shivered and a cold wave seemed to pass over his body. He had seen the beam lick at Freuhoff, not once but twice! What did it mean?

Here in this laboratory they were exploring the fringes of the universe. This cyclotron had been part of the Manhattan Project, it had helped produce the hell that had exploded over Hiroshima and Nagasaki: the atom bomb. But the bomb was not important, not really. At best, it could only be considered a gadget, important only in the fact that it was a landmark on the new voyage of discovery, a signboard pointing the way to new lands that lay afar, a compass to guide a new Columbus. Compared to the things that might follow it, the atom bomb was about as important and breathtaking as the operation of a mechanical cigarette lighter, the scrape of steel on flint.

The beam licking at Freuhoff could mean anything. Or nothing. But one thing was certain—Ed Freuhoff and everybody else who worked this lab, had to be warned. Nick Zehr reached for the toggle switch on the squawk box, but before his fingers reached it, the telephone buzzed on his desk. He picked up the telephone—and forgot all about Freuhoff and the erratic purple beam spurting from the cyclotron.

HIS WIFE'S voice sounded in his ear. "Nick! Nick! Come home quickly! Oh, Nick—" The voice was suddenly muffled and choked. "Something terrible is happening! Nick—" A clatter came over the wire. Then silence.

"Nancy, what on earth is wrong with you?"

No answer. The line hummed softly to itself, a chorus of drowsy elfin voices humming unknown songs.

"Nancy!" His voice was a shout echoing through the control room. Frantically he jiggled the receiver on the hook. "Nancy! Nancy! Operator, what's wrong with this connection? You cut me off! Operator!"

"I'll check the connection for you," came the cool voice of the operator. The receiver clicked and hummed. "The connection is all right, sir. The trouble seems to be at the other end; the receiver is off the hook."

"Nancy!" Nick Zehr screamed.

There was no answer.

“Shall I try again for you?” the operator asked.

“No. No. I’ll go see.” He flung the telephone back on its cradle and paused just long enough on his way out to yell at Ray Schmidt to take over the control panel. Nick’s shift was almost over anyhow and Schmidt was just coming on duty.

Nick and Nancy Zehr lived in an efficiency apartment with a pulldown bed. They considered themselves lucky to have even that. Both worked, he as a graduate assistant while he completed the dissertation for his Ph. B., Nancy as a lab assistant in the biology department. As members of the staff of Gilbert University, both enjoyed their work and the way they lived. Until now, there had been no shadow between them and nothing had ever threatened the even tenor of their life together. He could not begin to guess what might have happened to Nancy to force her desperate call to him. “Something terrible is happening!” Her words rang in his ears. He tried to imagine what might have happened to her but his imagination failed him.

Their apartment was on the third floor of a 30-unit building. He almost ran the wheels off his ancient jalopy reaching it. The thought had come to him that perhaps the building might be on fire, but when he reached it he saw with relief that there was no sign of smoke. So far as he could tell, everything was normal in the building. He went up the stairs three at a time.

As he went by on the run, Mrs. Keeney was bringing her baby buggy out of her apartment. She stared at him as if wondering what on earth was the matter. Fuller, the musician, was practicing on his violin. In one of the apartments a child was yelling and in another a dog was barking. The smell of hamburger being fried with onions was in the air. The building, the people, the sounds, even the smells, were normal. In this place where completely sane people led completely sane lives, what could have happened to Nancy?

Unlocking the door, he yelled for her.

There was no answer.

The room, he thought, was strangely full of dust. It struck in his throat, threatening to choke him, and he coughed. He expected to find his wife slumped down fey the telephone in the dressing alcove just off the bathroom. She wasn't there. The bathroom door was open, revealing a tub half filled with soapy water. The telephone, uttering burping squawks, hung from the top of the dresser. Dust covered the floor, dust hung in the air. It spurted up around his feet as he moved. Choking, he opened a window. "Nancy!" he screamed.

The echo of his own voice answered him.

CHAPTER II

HIS WIFE was not in the apartment. He ran into the hall, hoping to find someone who might have seen her. Mrs. Keeney was down at the far end of the hall, waiting patiently for the self-service elevator.

"Mr. Zehr, is something wrong?"

"Have you seen Mrs. Zehr?"

"No. No, I haven't." The elevator arrived. She began automatically to open the doors. The sound of Fuller's violin caught Nick's ears. He knocked on the musician's door. Fuller, in his socks and shirt sleeves, said: "Hello, Zehr. What? No, I haven't seen her." He called over his shoulder. "Honey, have you seen Mrs. Zehr?"

Mrs. Fuller was a bosomy blonde, calendar type. No, she hadn't seen Mrs. Zehr. Was anything wrong?

"I don't know," he admitted. He explained what had happened. They followed him back to his apartment. "Dinner's cooking," Mrs. Fuller said, pointing to the electric roaster in the kitchenette. "Maybe she stepped out for a salad or for a dessert."

"And maybe she didn't. You don't scream that something terrible is happening and then go trotting off to get a dessert for dinner."

"Maybe—" Mrs. Fuller's breast heaved at the thought. "Maybe—well—maybe she was attacked."

"She wouldn't call up about it," her husband said. He coughed. "Where the hell did all this dust come from, Zehr?"

"I don't know and don't give a damn."

"You better call the police," Fuller said. "If there's nothing wrong, you won't lose anything."

Notified by radio, the police cruiser needed less than ten minutes to reach the building. A sergeant and a corporal came through the open door of the apartment. "Woman missing?" the sergeant said. His attitude indicated that this was an old story. In his days on the force he had heard hundreds of husbands report missing wives, or vice versa. Usually it meant that the little woman had overstayed her time in the local gin mill or in the horse parlor or had stepped out with some lad with wavy hair. If the husband was missing, it might mean a sympathetic blonde or it might mean that he had simply gotten sick and tired of looking at the same woman all the time. Men walked away, so did women. Usually nobody really gave a damn, including the other spouse and the police. Sometimes the walkers stop over at their lawyers' office and go on to the divorce court, sometimes they don't even bother about the lawyer.

All of this was included in the sergeant's attitude and in his voice when he said, "Woman missing? Your wife, huh? Let me have the name and description, please."

His attitude changed a trifle when Nick Zehr told him about the telephone call. "Something was happening to her, huh? She calls you and tells you its happening? But when you get here, she's gone?"

"That's right."

"Did she say what was happening?"

"No."

The sergeant sneezed violently. "Lot of dust in here." He searched the apartment. "Well, she ain't here, that's a cinch. Anything else missing?"

"Not so far as I can tell."

"All of her clothes here?"

Nick searched. “A tan suit seems to be gone but she might have taken it to the cleaners.”

“Uh—” The sergeant hesitated. “She—uh—have any boy friends?”

“Listen—”

“Skip it,” the sergeant said. “I got to ask questions. Did she have any boy friends?”

“No,” Nick said hotly.

THE SERGEANT scratched his head. “Well, she ain’t here and I don’t see any evidence to prove anything is wrong. Except for all the dust, the place is in order, nothing missing, no sign of a scrap. What kind of a housekeeper was she, to leave all this dust around?”

“She worked. I guess she hadn’t had time to clean it up.”

“Okay.” The sergeant moved toward the door.

“Is this all you’re going to do?” Nick demanded.

Taking the photograph Nick gave him, he went out the door.

“Well, if this don’t beat anything I ever heard of!” Mrs. Fuller said. Her breasts heaved. “Why, she could have been killed—” She broke off quickly, glancing at Nick. “I shouldn’t have said that. I’m sorry. I’m sure nothing has happened to her. I mean—there may have been somebody she liked—I mean—”

“Madge, you talk too much,” her husband said.

Nick took a firm grip on his temper. “She may have run off with another man,” he said. “But I don’t believe it. She wouldn’t have called me. She wouldn’t have left her things. There’s her purse on the dresser, dinner was cooking, her clothes are here, except for one suit—I just don’t believe it. I don’t. I don’t.” He was almost in hysterics.

"She'll turn up all right," Fuller said soothingly "Mix yourself a big drink and eat your dinner. If there's anything we can do to help, give us a call. Come on, Madge." They left.

"I must be calm," Nick told himself. "I'm just worrying about nothing. She stepped out for a little while. Maybe some friend called and asked her to come over, maybe Jean had an accident, or Helen, and they called her. Maybe that's what she meant when she said something terrible had happened—"

Maybe!

By midnight the maybe had become a frightened voice whimpering in the far corners of his mind. He had covered the neighborhood, he had called all the hospitals, he had called her boss who had said she had complained of a headache and had left early, he had called her friends and had gotten negative answers. For the hundredth time, he had searched the apartment.

Under the dresser, he found something he had missed in his previous searches—a ball about a quarter of an inch in diameter, apparently made of brass. It looked a little like a ball bearing except that bearings were usually made of steel. He rolled it in the palm of his hand, noting its extreme lightness. "Must be hollow," he thought.

A knock sounded on the door. Thinking it might be Nancy, he almost broke a leg getting to the door to open it. "Nancy—"

But it wasn't Nancy. It was Ed Freuhoff.

"Hello, Nick. I couldn't sleep." The man seemed dazed or maybe a little drunk. "May I come in? I—" He put his hand on the back of his head and rubbed his scalp as if something pained there. His eyes were a little out of focus and Nick had the impression that Freuhoff looked at him and through him to worlds far away. He was pathetically glad to see Freuhoff, he would have been glad to see the devil himself. "Come in, Ed."

"Thanks. Uh—" The vacant gaze went around the apartment. "Where's Mrs. Zehr?"

"I wish to hell I knew!" Nick brought glasses and whiskey and told the story. Freuhoff's face showed amazement. "That's too bad," he said. He sipped at his drink. His eyes went over the apartment seeking something, came to rest on the little brass ball which Nick had laid on the end table. He picked-it up. “What—what is this?”

NICK ZEHR was silent. And cold.

The impression of cold seemed to come from some well inside of him. He felt like a blind man who has been dropped into a den of snakes and dares not move hand or foot for fear he will be struck. “How—how did you happen to come over, Ed?” he blurted out.

Freuhoff’s eyes were on the little brass ball. “I—I couldn’t sleep,” he said. He turned the ball in his fingers. “An odd thing.” His voice was thick and heavy. He glanced sideways at Nick and Nick again had the impression he was a blind man in a den of snakes. The wrong move, the wrong word, and anything might happen. He lit a cigarette and drew smoke into his lungs, wondering why he was scared. He had no reason to be afraid of this big ape. Or did he have a reason? How much did he actually know about this man?

“Do you want to keep this?” Freuhoff asked. He turned the ball in his fingers.

“No,” Nick answered. He shrugged, forced a casual note into his voice. “I found it on the floor. It’s a ball bearing, or something. It isn’t important.”

He suspected the moment he spoke that he had betrayed himself, that he had somehow overplayed his casual indifference, that, like the blind man among the snakes, he had not been able to sit completely still. He had moved, he had made a sound, the wrong sound.

But he didn’t know where he had failed or how or what difference it made. Some center of his brain, shouted a warning to him.

The snake struck.

Very gently Freuhoff laid the brass ball back on the end table. His ham-sized fist moved in a short arc and jammed savagely home against the base of Nick Zehr’s jaw.

CHAPTER III

NICK ZEHR regained consciousness to find himself lying on the floor of his apartment. A bronzed face he had never seen before was looking down at him. “Feeling better?” the mouth in the bronze face asked.

Nick sat up. Two men, strangers, were in the room. One was quietly phoning from the dressing nook. The other was looking down at him.

Freuhoff, a slow writhing passing through his heavy body, was lying on the floor. His hands were caught in an odd position behind his back. As Freuhoff twisted trying to get free, Nick caught the glint of steel on the man’s wrists. Handcuffs!

“Zehr? Nicholas Zehr?” the bronze faced man asked.

Nick nodded.

“Joswell. FBI.” He held a cupped hand in front of Nick’s eyes. A badge was visible in the palm. “FBI,” Nick muttered. “What—what do you want?” His eyes went to Freuhoff, sitting up now and staring vacantly at him. “He—he slugged me,” he said.

Joswell nodded. “We heard it,” he said.

“Heard it?”

“Uh-huh. How would you like to take a little ride?”

“Huh?” The situation was somehow moving too fast for Nick to grasp it. Where had these men come from? What were they doing here? What did they want? “Am I—under arrest?”

The agent pursed his lips. “That depends on how you want it. Right now you are not under arrest. We want to talk to you and we can arrest you for questioning, but actually we don’t want to arrest you at all. If it will make you feel any better, you’re not the fish we’re trying to fry, but you may—or may not—know something important about those fish. So we want to talk to you. Okay?”

“Sure. I guess so. But—my wife—”

Joswell nodded, as if he understood exactly what Nick wanted to say. “We know she’s gone. She is one of the people we want to talk to you about.”

“Huh? What—?”

“We’ll talk later,” the agent said.

At headquarters, the agent Joswell took Nick to a plainly furnished office. Freuhoff was taken elsewhere. “Sit down, Mr. Zehr,” Joswell said. Nick slid into the chair. “First of all, where is your wife?”

“I wish to hell I knew. I’ve been going crazy—” Remembering who this man was, he caught himself. “Do you think I know where she is?” Anger sounded in his voice.

With his hands, Joswell made little apologetic gestures. “Take it easy, Zehr. I’m trying to find out something. When did you see her last?”

“This morning. What difference—”

“When did you talk to her last?”

“This afternoon about four-thirty.”

“You haven’t seen her since this morning, you haven’t talked to her since four-thirty?”

“That’s right.”

“Has she, in the past few months, dropped any hints that she might be leaving?”

“No. What are you getting at?”

“I wish I knew.” The agent sighed. “Has she seemed in any way unusual to you during recent months?”

“No. Look—”

“Take it easy, Mr. Zehr.”

“My wife is missing. You seem to know something about her. At any rate, you’re damned curious. If you have any information about her, I want it. Right now.”

Joswell was silent, the bronze face impassive and quietly sympathetic.

The agent took a deep breath. “I don’t know where your wife is. I wish I did. I’m trying to find her. She’s a spy.”

“A WHAT?” Nick Zehr gasped. The word hit him harder than had Freuhoff’s ham-sized fist. As a worker in atomic energy, he knew the care and caution exercised to keep new discoveries from reaching improper sources. There was no secret of the bomb, maybe not even any secrets of the know-how, but there was a chance that new discoveries were being made. Hence—spies. No intelligent person doubted that spies existed. But Nancy was not an enemy agent. He would bet his soul on her innocence. “You’re crazy as a loon! You’re talking like a man with his head under water! You’re—” Rising from the chair, he shook his fist in Joswell’s face.

“Take it easy,” the agent said. “It is barely possible that I know what I am talking about. For three months, we have been watching your wife. If you thought it strange that we turned up so quickly after Freuhoff slugged you, it might interest you to know that we’ve had a hidden mike planted in your apartment for the past six weeks. We were in an apartment in the building. When Freuhoff hit you, I thought it was time to move in; otherwise we might lose an important witness.”

His tone left no doubt that the identity of that witness was Nick Zehr.

“You’ve had our apartment wired? You’ve been spying!”

The bronze face showed traces of an embarrassed red. “Counter-spying is a better word.” From his pocket he took a bright object which he laid on the desk. “Did you ever see this before?” he asked.

Nick stared at the object. “Sure. It’s one of Nancy’s compacts.” She loved compacts and bought a new one almost every month, it seemed. But this one she had kept longer than usual. “Where did you get it?”

“From her purse before you regained consciousness,” Joswell said. “Did you ever see her set this compact, open, on the end table beside the sofa and read aloud her notes on the day’s work?”

Nick nodded. “Many times. But what has that got to do with—”

Joswell shrugged. “It’s not a compact, it’s a miniature radio transmitter,” he said.

"What?" Cold shock waves passed up Nick Zehr's back. "Are you certain of that?"

"Dead certain. It's a short range ultra high frequency transmitter of an unusual design. And if you doubt that it is a transmitter and that it has been used as such, we have recordings of your wife's voice sent out over this gadget." His finger tapped the brilliant vanity case.

Nick Zehr was past the stage at which his emotional equipment could respond to additional shock. Or as he thought. "Who was she communicating with?"

"We don't know," Joswell answered.

"Where did she get this transmitter? I didn't pay much attention to the compact but I thought she had Drought it."

"She didn't buy it," the agent said. "She got it from Freuhoff."

"What?" Nick discovered that his emotional equipment was still capable of registering additional shock. "Are you sure about that?"

"Certain. We saw him slip it to her."

Nick was silent. "I find all of this hard to believe," he said.

JOSWELL'S EYES regarded him with sympathy and compassion. "I'm sorry it has to be this way," he said, and meant it.

"Do you know where she is?" The agent shook his head. He swore fretfully under his breath. "The part I can't understand is how she knew we were going to arrest her."

"What?"

"If she hadn't skipped out on us, we would have arrested her within the next fifteen minutes. Somehow she got wind of it and pulled the neatest, most successful job of skipping I've ever seen. We heard her make a call to you. Then we heard you arrive and start yelling for her. Right then and there I started five men looking for her. Not one of them got a trace of her. Between the time she called you and the time you arrived, she managed to vanish, not only from you but from us."

"It doesn't make sense!" Nick Zehr whispered.

"You weren't the only one looking for her," Joswell said. "Right now I've got a dragnet out over the whole city. By tomorrow, if we don't find her, the net will go out over the whole country."

"What about Freuhoff?" Nick interrupted. "You've got him. He gave her the radio. Ask him where she is."

"We are asking him," the agent answered. "Right this minute he is being asked—" He broke off as a knock sounded on the door. "Come in."

The man who entered glanced at Nick Zehr. Joswell nodded. "Okay, Wilkinson. It's all right to talk. Has he begun to open up yet?"

Wilkinson said, "He has admitted he gave the radio to Mrs. Zehr. That's enough to hang both of them—" Behind him the door was thrust open.

The man who entered had not bothered to knock. "Chief, come quick!" he gasped.

Like a shot out of a gun, Joswell leaped from the chair. He went through the door. The two agents followed him. Nick Zehr brought up the rear. There was something strange about the man who had entered last, he saw, but in the emotional storm already swirling within him he had difficulty in isolating that strangeness. Then he saw what it was.

From head to toes, the man was covered with golden dust.

At a run, Joswell went down the hallway. From an open door ahead of him, a man looked out, beckoning. His face, his clothes, his hands, were covered with golden dust. He was trying to brush it from his clothes, mechanically, his mind obviously entirely on something else. He stepped aside and they passed through the door.

IT WAS a plain room, with four stiff chairs, a high barred window, and a single ceiling light so bright it hurt the eyes—a room such as countless law breakers know, not as a place of torture, but as a room where a prisoner may be kept and grilled until the hours turn into days and the days turn into nightmares.

The bright light shining from the ceiling was hazed with golden dust. The room seemed filled with a fog, this too was dust. Nick Zehr was aware of men coughing and sneezing, felt a familiar tickle grow in his own throat.

Lying on the floor in front of one of the chairs were two shoes. Lying across the chair and on the floor were a shirt and trousers. Dust-covered, the clothing gave the impression of being riddled with some kind of fast-spreading dry rot so that now it would crumble at a touch.

"What is it, Kilgore?" Joswell said to the man who had beckoned to them from the door.

Kilgore left off the mechanical brushing of his clothes. He pointed to the chair. His voice rasped mechanically, like a robot reapeating to its master the things its eyes had seen. "He was sitting in that chair. Suddenly it looked like dust was spurting out all over him." He stopped speaking and licked dry lips with a nervous tongue.

"Go on," Joswell said.

"By God, right in front of my eyes, he turned to dust!" Kilgore blurted out the words. "It looked like he had turned to dust and then somebody had punched the switch on a million little electric fans inside of him. The fans started turning and blew him away. By God, Chief, that's exactly what it looked like!"

CHAPTER IV

ON KILGORE'S face sweat was turning the yellow dust into mud. He rubbed his hands over his cheeks, stared at the smear on his palms. "This damned stuff, Chief, this is Freuhoff—all that's left of him."

"Damn it, that's not humanly possible!" Joswell said and stopped as Nick Zehr spoke without realizing he was speaking.

"But maybe it's inhumanly possible."

Eyes turned toward him as the words left his lips. The room was silent. Again he felt like a blind man in a snake pit. He stood very still, hardly daring to breathe and not daring to move. Yellow dust swirled through the room. Joswell looked at him. “I was thinking that,” the agent said. “I didn’t dare say it.”

Joswell’s face was gray. A vein throbbed visibly in his forehead. His gaze went around the room as if he was looking for something he suspected might be here, yet afraid he would find it. “All the time I’ve thought we were chasing a bunch of spies trying to crack our atomic set-up. What a mistake that was!”

Outside was the night, the distant honk of a taxicab. Somewhere tires screeched on asphalt. Again Nick Zehr found himself thinking of alien intelligences using human beings to probe the secrets of a world they could not investigate directly. Human robots! Had Freuhoff been such a robot? Had Nancy—He couldn’t even think it.

He had loved her, he had held her in his arms, he had lived with her. He knew everything about her. Or he thought he had known everything.

Joswell’s eyes searched the room for something invisible, something intangible, something hidden from the senses, for some alien creature present here invisibly. Knots formed at the corners of his jaw. “Kilgore, set a guard on this room. Roust the chemists out of bed and get ’em up here. I want an analysis of this dust. I want this room searched, walls, ceiling, floor, door, chairs, lights. Don’t miss a thing. Move!”

Kilgore was gone.

“Wilkinson, bring all the records on Freuhoff to my office. Move.” Wilkinson moved.

Nick Zehr followed Joswell back to the agent’s office. “You saw the room, you heard what happened,” the agent said. “What do you think?”

“I don’t think. I can’t think. It’s not possible.”

“I know it’s not possible. But it happened. Why did Freuhoff come to your apartment?”

“He said he couldn’t sleep.”

“Why did he slug you?”

“I have no idea. It was completely unexpected.”

Joswell's bronze face had a gray pallor. His eyes were hard and cold. "You and he weren't very friendly, were you?"

"As a matter of fact, we weren't. But we weren't unfriendly either."

"Do you have any information that might help?"

"So far as I know—none."

"Why did you say it might be inhumanly possible for a man to be turned to dust?" Joswell's stare was unwinking.

"I had no reason. The thought just popped into my mind."

For a moment Joswell watched him, then the cold eyes were hooded and the gaze was turned away. "Well, there's no use trying to lick this thing in an hour or two. If I get the job done during the rest of my life, I'll figure I'm lucky. Zehr, where do you want to stay, here or at a hotel? We've got some rooms fitted up with bunks here. You can use one of them if you wish."

Apparently he was giving Nick complete freedom of choice. "Can't I go home instead?" Nick asked.

"That's out," the agent answered. "Personally, if I were in your shoes, I wouldn't go back to that apartment for a million dollars—though I'm damned if I can suggest any other place that's much safer."

"I'll stay here," Nick said.

"Good. You'll at least have somebody within calling distance."

JOSWELL personally took Nick to the room he was to occupy. It was fitted with a double-decker bunk. Lying down, Nick sank instantly into a deep, drugged slumber through which, like phantoms out of a nightmare, writhed the impossible shapes of alien monsters. At ten o'clock the next morning, Nick was back in the agent's office. "Got anything yet?" he asked.

Joswell looked like a man who has not had much sleep. "A lot of nothing," he said. "I've got two chemists at work on that dust. I had three at first but when I told them what the dust was, the third quit on me. I think he figured the day of Judgment was at hand." Joswell shook his head. "I don't know that he's not right. I've been talking to doctors, physicists, chemists, to any scientist who would hold still long enough to listen to me, and they all say there is no known force—ray, radiation, disease, or what have you—that will turn a man into dust within the space of minutes."

"Did you tell them you had seen it happen?"

"Hell, no!" the agent answered. "I'm not likely to tell that to anybody yet. If the story got around that there is something loose in this town that is turning people into dust we'd have the damnedest panic on our hands you ever saw. People are already scared, of the atom bomb, of bacteriological warfare, of the next depression, of this, that, and something else. I haven't got anything except this, and I don't know what it is."

From his desk drawer he took a small box. Opened, it revealed a brass ball. "I know what that is," Nick said. "I found it under the dresser in my apartment. I didn't know you had brought it with you."

"I didn't."

"No? Then where did you get it?"

"Found it in Freuhoff's clothes."

"The devil! Say he had been looking at that just before he slugged me. I got the idea he thought it was important, though I don't know why. Maybe he brought it along."

"And maybe he didn't," the agent mused. He picked up the phone on his desk, gave a number to the switchboard operator.

"That's my number you just called," Nick spoke.

"Uh-huh. I've got a man staked out in your place. He doesn't much like being there, either." The receiver rattled and he spoke rapidly into the mouthpiece. He listened, then hung up. "There's another one of these balls at your place," he said.

"Well—" Nick said. He picked up the little brass ball and held it between his thumb and forefinger. Twist and turn it as he might, he could see no importance that could be attached to it. "I don't know. I don't understand. I—" His voice trailed off. His hunch was that the ball was important. But how? He did not know. "What do you want me to do?" he said.

"There are two things I don't want you to do. One is to go back to your apartment, the other is to go back to your job."

"But—" Nick twisted uncomfortably. There was a thought in his mind, a thought he had been trying to avoid. "My wife—"

Joswell nodded. "I know," he said. His voice dropped a notch. "As I recall it, there was a lot of dust in your apartment."

Nick Zehr was on his feet. "No! No! No!"

"So far as my chemists can tell, it is essentially the same as the dust that came from Freuhoff," Joswell said quietly.

"Do you think that Nancy—" But Nick got no farther. His mind blanked out on him and refused to function. He had been trying to avoid this thought, had been trying to avoid it ever since he had seen the dust in the room where Freuhoff had been questioned. He could avoid it no longer.

"Here's a number," Joswell said. "Call it if you think of something."

He scribbled something on a piece of paper. Nick Zehr took it, turned and walked dumbly from the room.

"Keep in touch with me," Joswell said.

WITH JOSWELL'S words lingering in his ears, he walked out of the gray stone Federal building. Nancy—dust. Nancy—gone. Nancy—dead. Why did he want to stay alive if Nancy was gone? There was nothing left, not even his work. He knew enough about the functioning of security to know that he would not be allowed near a radiation laboratory until Joswell had cleared him. Joswell wasn't going to clear him until the agent was sure of his ground. It was not that Joswell suspected him of being a spy—apparently he was convinced of his innocence—but he had been too close to a woman who operated an illegal transmitter for him to be entirely clear of suspicion. Joswell wouldn't take any chances.

Joswell was a badly scared man. He had seen the equivalent of a ghost and he walked in terror. Somewhere in this city there was an alien creature and Joswell knew it. But where? Or was the alien somewhere else, in some other space-time, manipulating his controls across the gulf of chaos? Who knew? Were the people passing along the street, driving automobiles, riding in street cars, were they walking robots controlled by some creature hiding in another space? Not all of them certainly, but perhaps some of them were such robots. Who knew which was which? Were they real people, controlled by an alien intelligence, or were they imitations of real people? Nick Zehr had always thought his wife was a real woman but now he was not certain. There had always been something mechanical about Freuhoff's actions. Seen in the light of his new knowledge, Nick realized that Freuhoff had always acted as if he was under the control of some other power. But where was this power hiding? And was he in danger from it?

Inside his mind he was aware of groping pressures. Then a voice whispered far away, "I am your friend. I will help you."

"What?" he said automatically. It was in his mind that someone near him had spoken.

"I am the alien," the whisper said.

A shudder passed over Nick Zehr. He jerked his head around to look behind him. He was on the steps of the Federal building. Story on story, the tall structure rose above him. Pigeons fluttered around the roof. A flag drooped languidly in the still mid-morning air. Cars passed on the street, their tires singing against the asphalt. A man was sniping for cigarette butts along the gutter.

The whole scene looked completely commonplace. There was no person and no thing in sight that could have spoken to him. He reached the immediately obvious decision. "I'm nuts," he thought.

"You are not insane," the prompt answer came. "I exist. I am speaking to you."

"Where are you?"

A WILD light had appeared in Nick Zehr's eyes. He began walking along the street. Somewhere ahead of him a police whistle shrilled and traffic moved in response. He bumped into a woman and got a curt, “Why don’t you look where you’re going?” and did not hear a word she said. He was listening to the voice speaking to him.

It was a calm, soothing voice. It said, “I am very near you but you cannot see or feel me. You can hear me speak in your mind. That is all.”

Nick Zehr stumbled. The police whistle shrilled again, sharp and indignant. Rubber screamed and a horn blared. He caught a glimpse of a bright chromium bumper swerving to avoid him, the face of the frightened and indignant driver glaring at him from behind the wheel. A hand grabbed his shoulder.

“God damn it, are you trying to commit suicide?” It was the traffic cop. “Watch where you’re going!”

Without noticing what he was doing, Nick had walked into the flow of traffic. “I’m sorry—”

“What the hell’s the matter with ya? Ya drunk?”

“No. I was thinking. I—wasn’t noticing.”

“Ya better notice! Get on now. And look where you’re going!”

Nick crossed the street. He had scarcely heard the policeman. In his mind a far-away voice was screaming. “You idiot! You almost got yourself killed just the minute I established contact!”

Nick walked on. He kept his eyes rigidly to the front. All over his body, the flesh crawled. He had the impression he was being followed, he was being watched. There was a drug store on the corner. Joswell had said to call him if anything happened. Something certainly had happened. He turned into the drug store to call the Federal agent.

“What are you going to do?” the voice snapped at him.

“Uh—I’m going to make a phone call. It’s something I have to do.”

“You’re going to call that Joswell!” As the agent’s name flowed into his mind, there came with it a blast of burning hate.

“No. That is—”

“You fool, I can read your thoughts! You were going to call Joswell and tell him about me.”

"I sure as hell am!" Nick thought. "Try it and see!"

Nick started toward the phone booths at the rear. In mid-stride, he halted. Something seemed to reach into his mind and seize his will. Desperately he tried to move toward the phone booths. His heart beat climbed, he panted from the effort he was exerting but he didn't move an inch closer to the phones. From her cage, a girl cashier stared wonderingly at him.

"Turn around and walk out of here," the voice said.

He found himself turning around and walking out of the drug store. The far-away voice chuckled—the alien gloating over him. "Call a cab," the voice ordered. "That man Joswell is dangerous. He has to be stopped, quickly. Stopping him is your job and you are going to do it."

CHAPTER V

TWENTY minutes after he hailed the cab and gave the address to the driver, the cab stopped in an old section of the city. All during the ride the alien had been silent. Now Nick hoped that somehow contact had been broken.

It was a frail hope. As soon as the car stopped moving, the voice spoke again. "Get out of the cab."

Nick paid the driver. Completely lost, he stared around him. To his left was a warehouse, apparently abandoned. Directly in front of him was a small stucco house with a No

Trespassing sign in front of it.

"Go down the alley beside the warehouse and enter by the side door," the voice said. Nick obeyed. "How—how can you speak my language?" he asked.

"I learned it from you," was the reply.

Nick reached the door of the warehouse, rattled the knob in his hands. The door was locked.

"Unlock it," the voice said.

"How?"

"You have the key on your key ring. It's the same as the key to your apartment. It was made that way, in case you or anybody else got curious. An extra key that seemed to fit nothing might have been hard to explain to Joswell, or to somebody like him, but a key to your own apartment needed no explanation."

Nick fitted the key in the lock. The bolt moved back.

"To the basement," he was ordered.

"This is as far as I am going," Nick said. He planted both feet firmly, intending to move no farther. To his surprise he found himself walking down the basement stairs while a shrill voice like the screaming of an angry bird scolded him. "You utter fool! I can force you to obey me. I can block off your conscious mind so that you will never remember you have obeyed me. You are a robot, a slave. I am your master."

Slave! Robot! The words echoed in his mind. He walked into the basement of the warehouse, unlocked a door that seemed to lead into the furnace room. He was not surprised to discover that the key to the cyclotron lab fitted the furnace room door. Nor was he surprised to discover a well-concealed opening that looked to be a part of the wall of the coal bin across the big room.

He was now in the basement of a small stucco house next door to the warehouse, in what looked to be a completely equipped laboratory.

"Whose lab is this?" he asked.

"Freuhoff's," the answer came. "And yours."

"Mine?" he gasped. "But I've never been here before. I know nothing of this."

"Consciously you know nothing," the voice said. "But you rented this house and the warehouse, under my control, fitted the locks on the doors and set up the equipment here."

"When was this?" he gasped.

"You did it last summer when Nancy went home to visit her mother," the voice said. "Remember, you had a vacation then but you said you couldn't go with her because you were busy at the lab. This is the lab you were working on. Freuhoff joined you later, after you had completed setting up the equipment here. After Freuhoff joined you, he did all the work and you did not come near the place again, until now." Far away a laugh sounded, not a laugh really, but a feeling of mirth flowing into his brain.

His eyes went around the laboratory seeking the laughter.

"There is no point in trying to find me," the voice whispered in his ear. "If you live a thousand years, you will never find me."

"Where are you?" he whispered hoarsely.

"You will never know."

"Are you in this room?"

"Yes."

"Were you in the cab with me?"

"Certainly."

"Were you with me yesterday?"

"I have been with you for over four of your years. I have watched from your eyes, heard from your ears, puzzled out the language that you use, studied your emotions and feelings until I know you better than you know yourself."

"Are you matter as we know matter?"

"Perhaps." A cautious note was creeping into the voice.

"Then why can't I see yon? Why can't I feel you?"

"For two reasons—because I am hidden, and because I don't want yon to see me. In fact, your seeing me would be disastrous for both of us."

Nick Zehr took a deep breath. "Where are you hidden?" he demanded.

"You asked that once before," the answer came. The voice changed. "This is enough talk. There is work to be done."

"What kind of work?"

"We have to stop Joswell. He knows more than he has hinted to you."

"Maybe you have to stop him, but I don't," Nick Zehr thought. The idea flashed across his mind and was instantly gone as he tried to control his thinking. He was too slow. The alien had caught the thought impression.

"You will obey orders," the cold voice said. "Or else! Turn the current into that generator."

THE GENERATOR was a complicated apparatus that looked something like a high frequency, high power radio transmitter. "I don't understand this thing," Nick Zehr muttered.

"You ought to understand it: you built it." The alien laughed. "Of course, you have no memories of building it."

If he had done this, what else had he done? He didn't know and couldn't think. "What does it do?"

"It projects control spheres into the brain of any person I wish to control," the alien explained.

"Control spheres?" Nick Zehr muttered. Something floated up from his subconscious mind, a description of the control spheres, a mental picture of them. He shivered. "The little brass balls," the alien said. "I see some of your memories are becoming conscious. You found two of them. One came from Freuhoff, after he was disintegrated; the other came from your wife."

A hard core of pain throbbed in Nick Zehr's heart. "Don't be concerned about her," the voice said. "You can get another woman, a hundred if you wish. All you have to do is project a control sphere into their minds and they will come to you, under my direction."

"What?" Nick whispered. The potentialities of this thing were horrifying.

"I needed to use your wife for experimental purposes," the voice went on. "She was the only person whom I could seize that I could also observe, regularly, through your eyes. She was the first person I seized by the control spheres. After her came Freuhoff. Also, I wanted to use her to test the effectiveness of the radio transmitter. The transmissions that the agent detected were actually messages to me, from her. It was an experiment, and a mistake. If those transmissions had not been detected, Joswell would never have known I existed."

“These brass balls are actually placed inside a person’s brain? How can you do that?”

“They are synthesized there. A mild anaesthetic is also synthesized at the same time so that no pain is felt. Through the spheres I establish direct contact with the brain of the person I wish to seize. He has no idea that I am controlling him, reading his mind, ordering his actions. In the case of Freuhoff, I went a little wrong somewhere.” Worry crept into the voice. “You noticed the beam of the cyclotron flick toward him as he walked past it. Actually the beam was attracted in some unknown way to the control sphere. When he turned his head, the sphere was out of focus and the beam snapped back into place. I don’t understand how this happened but in some ways Freuhoff was a failure. He actually succeeded in thinking in a way that I could not detect, though his thinking led him to the wrong conclusion. He thought you were his enemy and he came to your apartment, determined to kill you. This was the wrong conclusion he had reached, that you had caused something to happen to him.”

For a moment, Nick Zehr felt a wild sympathy for Ed Freuhoff. How the man must have struggled, first to grasp the idea that something had happened to him, then to find out what had happened, then to do something about it! Actually he was trying to detect the existence of a control sphere inside his brain. “Was that why he slugged me?” he whispered.

“He meant to do more than slug you,” the answer came. “Somehow the control sphere that had come from your wife gave him the final clue he needed.”

“And you killed him?”

“I disintegrated him, through the control sphere. He was telling the agents too much and he was about to betray his suspicions of you.”

“You sound as if you really want to protect me,” Nick said.

“I do,” the voice answered.

“And these control spheres, I assume that I—” His voice and his thoughts faltered. “That I—I have one in my brain, too?”

“What do you think?” the answer came.

NICK KNEW what he thought.

What else could he think? He had been seized, he was a robot, a slave. He did not know how it had happened, only that it had happened. Like a sick dog creeping away to die, desperation moved through his mind. Meanwhile his fingers worked at the generator, largely without conscious direction from him. In effect, he seemed to stand off and watch his fingers work, to see himself as another, different person doing violence against his will. He closed switches. The tubes in the generator warmed to life. In the center of a special tube that seemed to be the heart of the apparatus—caught and held in a vortex of radiation that seemed to pour in on it from a separate source—a tiny brass ball began to take shape—a control sphere in the process of synthesization. The voice was silent. The alien seemed to withdraw from him and to concentrate its attention on the functioning of the generator.

What was this alien that rode him like the Old Man of the sea? Where had it come from? Where was it hidden? He did not know. He had imagined that some humans were robots probing his space-time continuum for information to be radiated back to masters located in other universes. He was familiar with the theory of plural universes, of the fourth, and higher, dimension. Perhaps the alien that controlled him came from some such universe.

How could he seek out and find an alien who might be hidden in some lost infinity? How could he destroy such a creature? He did not know how, all he knew was that there was in him the fierce desire for destruction. This alien had killed Nancy. Between Nick Zehr and the alien there would never be anything except deadly enmity. He kept such thoughts out of his conscious mind but under the surface they boiled with hurricane violence. Hidden below the threshold of perception, the hate in him was as violent as a miniature atom bomb. Freuhoff must have felt something like this, when he detected that something—he probably never knew exactly what—had seized control of him.

As to what would happen to him, eventually, Nick Zehr had no doubts. He would die. Deep in his mind was the knowledge that he wanted to die.

Inside the tube, the brass ball began to grow to proper size. Nick was aware of irritation. The alien was irked, maybe worried. Something had gone wrong somewhere. The ball stopped growing. Held in the vortex out of which it grew, it remained a waiting bronze ball.

“What is it?” Nick whispered.

The alien spoke. “Joswell is not in his office.”

How the alien knew this, Nick did not know. Nor was it explained to him. Perhaps a form of telepathy or clairvoyance was involved. “It is best done when the subject is asleep,” the alien spoke. “But asleep or awake, I have to know where the subject is.”

“And you don’t know where Joswell is?”

“No.”

“Too bad,” Nick said. Inwardly he was thoroughly glad but he kept his gladness, like his hate, below the surface of his mind. Freuhoff must have operated in this manner, keeping his real thoughts and his real feelings well hidden.

“We will have to wait until I can find him,” the alien said.

From behind Nick Zehr came a soft creak, the sound of an opening door. He spun around.

JOSWELL stood in the door. He had a .45 automatic in his hand. Behind Joswell came two other men, both with drawn guns.

“Get your hands up,” Joswell said quietly. He came into the room.

“You—you found me?” Nick Zehr whispered.

“We found this, too,” Joswell answered. His glance took in the basement laboratory. “We knew this had to exist somewhere and we suspected you knew where. We thought, if we turned you loose, you would lead us to it.”

“Me?” Nick said. He saw that Joswell did not understand. Finding him here in this place, Joswell had assumed he had come here of his own free will. Joswell thought him guilty. He was caught here in this lab. No amount of persuasion would ever offset the fact of his being here.

Nick Zehr knew the consequences of being caught here. Years in prison would be the best he could hope for. It was a fate he could not face. Not now. Somewhere in his soul he found the courage to smile. He knew what he was going to do.

“To hell with you!” he said to Joswell. “You haven’t got me yet!” From the workbench he snatched a pair of pliers. With all his strength, he flung them at the agent.

Joswell dodged.

In Nick Zehr’s mind the voice of the alien screamed. “Stop it, you fool. You idiot, you will get both of us killed!” He felt the controls in his mind reach for his will.

“You’ll never get me alive,” he shouted, and flung himself straight at Joswell.

In the lab, a gun thundered. Nick felt the bullet hit him. It was not Joswell who had fired. Joswell wanted him alive, for questioning. It was Wilkinson who pulled the trigger of the gun. The heavy bullet struck him, spun him backwards, knocked him down. Blood spurted from his chest.

In his mind a frantic voice screamed: “You fool! I could have saved you!”

Nick Zehr answered, “To hell with you!” Here in these last few seconds he had discovered the hiding place of the alien. Its identity he did not know but he knew its hiding place and had horrible suspicions of its real nature. “To hell with you! I got you anyhow!”

Joswell was bending over him. “What?” he asked.

“Not me—” Nick Zehr gasped. “Not me who did this, but something else.” The feeble gesture of his hand indicated the equipment in the laboratory. “I found him, Joswell.” Something of triumph sounded in his voice. “I found him—the alien—and did all I could.”

In the back of his mind the raging voice of the alien was shouting at him. It was growing weaker. Nick knew what that meant. He had licked his enemy. If he had to lose his own life doing it, at least the sacrifice was worth while. In his mind a feeling of triumph came, grew stronger.

"I—I finished the job," he whispered to Joswell. Inside of him the feeling of triumph built up to a paen of victory. As he died, a smile formed on his lips.

CHAPTER VI

IN HIS OFFICE, the amazed agent fumbled sheets of paper. The whole record of Nick Zehr was here before him, complete in every detail. His birth, the names of his parents, his high school and college records, a photostat of his army service record, the circumstances under which he had met and married his wife—everything. It was as complete and as careful a dossier as could be compiled on any man. There was no hint of disloyalty in it.

Reading the record, Joswell reluctantly let go of the idea that Nick Zehr had been a spy. Whatever he was, whatever he had been, he had hot been that. Nor had his wife.

Then what was he?

Again and again the agent read over a single sheet of paper. It was the report of the medical examiner giving the results of the autopsy. The examiner had thoughtfully stripped it of its technical language. One line held Joswell's complete attention.

"Subject was revealed to have been suffering from cancer of the brain. Exploration revealed a mass of extraneous brain tissue big enough to have filled a tea cup."

Nick Zehr had worked in a radiation laboratory and cancer was sometimes known to result from exposure to excessive amounts of radiation. There was nothing in the case history to indicate that Nick Zehr had known he had cancer, which proved nothing. Many people do not know they have cancer.

In effect, this cancer, this extraneous growth, could have been the equivalent of an extra brain. It had formed within the other brain, which meant that normal brain cells had begun to multiply excessively. Therefore the growth was abnormal brain tissue, possibly capable of thought, of rationalization, of other activities.

"I wonder—" Joswell thought. In this moment he was very close to making the discovery that Nick Zehr had made just before he died—the hiding place of the alien. The agent knew nothing of the voice that had spoken to Nick Zehr but be suspected that something inhuman had been involved in this case. Remembering what had happened to Freuhoff, he felt chill waves pass over his body, as if some alien monster from another universe had paused for a moment, opened his brain and peeped in before passing on into the mysterious void that gave it birth.

Rising from his chair, he strode to the window and stood looking out over the roof tops of the city. "He said he had got the job done," he thought. "Did he deliberately throw himself at me, hoping I would kill him? Was that the way—the only way—he could destroy the thing that seemed to control him?"

Joswell did not know the answer. If it were true, then Nick Zehr had been a brave man, one of the bravest. Dying, he had taken his enemy down to death with him. Somehow or other, Joswell thought that this was the true solution. If it was true, then his job was complete. Thinking this, he, and a lot of other people could sleep sounder of nights. Abruptly, he turned back to his desk to begin the task of writing his report.

THE END

Girl From Mars

"THE WILD Man from Borneo—he eats 'em dive . . . he eats 'em alive —"

Ace Clawson leaned against the side of the platform and listened to Lou, the spieler. Somebody had to listen to him, and there was no crowd in this lousy drizzle.

The rain was letting up now as it got dark, but the afternoon storm had made mudpies in the Midway. Ace stared up the deserted carny street as the lights came on over the soggy tents and the drooping banners of the world of wonder shows. He shivered. This was a stinking climate—no wonder these Georgia crackers got malaria.

Maybe it would stop raining soon. Maybe the marks would come down after supper. They'd better. Only two days left to play here and Ace wasn't off the nut yet. Well, that's the way some seasons went, just one bad break after another.

Ace scratched his chin. Better shave. Ah, phooey on that. And phooey for Lou, too—blatting his brains out for nothing up there. He looked at the gawky spieler on the platform and grinned. Punk kid, his first season out, and he needed practice. Ace cocked his head and called.

"Hey, Lou!"

"Yeah?"

"Shut up!"

Lou shut up and climbed down. He tossed his head and Ace ducked the spray of raindrops. "You damn' fool, barking at nobody! Stuff it. Go inside and take the gang over to Sweeney for chow. We won’t see a sucker around here for an hour yet.”

“Sure, Ace.”

Lou went inside and rounded up the Strange People. They came out single file; Fat Phyllis waddling along with little Captain Atom, Hassan the fire-eater puffing on one of his rancid shoe pegs, Joe the Alligator Boy wearing a raincoat, Eddie in his wild man outfit.

Ace stood behind the ticket stand. He didn’t feel like talking to them. Somebody was bound to make a crack about Mitzie and Rajah. Nuts to that noise!

He watched them plod through the red clay of the Midway, then squinted up at the banners behind the platform. All the Strange People squinted back with their painted eyes—Phyllis, Captain Atom, the World’s Smallest Man, the Mighty Hassan, the Alligator Boy, the Wild Man from Borneo, Rajah the Magician and the Girl from Mars.

Rajah the Magician, dressed in evening clothes and wearing a turban on his head, was sawing a woman in half. The Girl from Mars spread her batwings over the sky. Ace scowled at them and cursed.

They had to take a powder on him, did they? Had to run out—and together! That’s what hurt. They ran off together. Rajah and Mitzie. It was probably her idea, the tramp. Just giving him the old double-X behind his back. Laughing at him. Bad weather, a poor take, and on top of it she had to run out on him too!

Ace bit into his lower lip. That was all the supper he needed. That and a drink.

HE SAT down on the edge of the platform and pulled out his pint. Almost full. He pulled out the cork and threw it away. It wouldn’t be needed again for this bottle.

Tilting his head back, he swallowed. One swig for the rain. One swig for the lousy Georgia crackers. One swig for Rajah and Mitzie. Yes, and one swig for what he'd do to that broad if he ever caught up with her.

Out of the comer of his eye he noticed that the rain had stopped. And then, he saw the girl.

She came wandering up the Midway, walking very slow. She was wearing some kind of grey playsuit, but he could tell it was a girl all right, even from far away, because the lights showed off her blonde hair.

Blonde hell, she was platinum; as she got closer he saw the bush on her head was almost white. Her eyebrows, too. Like one of those—what did they call 'em—albinos. Only her eyes weren't pink. They were kind of platinum too. Starey eyes. She gawked at everything as she went past the pitches.

Ace watched her coming; he had nothing else to do. Besides, she was worth watching. Even with that outfit on, he could see that she was really stacked. But built! Long legs, and plenty of meat on the torso. A disheroo.

He slicked back his hair. When she passed the tent he'd step out and walk over, sort of smiling. Then—

Ace hesitated. Because the girl wasn't passing the tent. She came up to the end of the platform and stopped. She looked up and began to read the banners, moving her lips. She stood kind of funny, swaying a little as if she had a load. Maybe she did, at that. Anyhow, she rocked on her heels and stared up. She kept looking at one banner and mumbling to herself.

Ace turned his head. She was staring at the Girl from Mars. Yes, and that's what she was mumbling out loud, too; he could hear it.

"The Girl from Mars," she kept saying. She had a kind of a foreign accent. Blondie. Maybe a Swede or something.

"Something I can do for you?"

Ace swung over and came up behind her. She jumped about a foot.

"Teker—"

Swede all right. But built. She didn't wear any makeup. She didn't need to. Ace smiled at her.

"I'm Ace Clawson. Own this show. What can I do for you, sister?"

She sized him up and then looked back at the banner.

"The Girl from Mars," she said. "Is that truth?"

"Truth?"

"There is such a one? Inside there?"

"Uh—no. Not now. She scrammed."

"Kep?" The girl swallowed quickly. "I mean—what do you say?"

"She ran away. What's the matter, you don't talk English so good, huh?"

"English? Oh. Speech. Yes, I talk it." She spoke slowly, frowning. At least her eyebrows frowned, but her forehead didn't wrinkle. Her skin was grey, like the playsuit. No buttons on the suit and she wasn't carrying a purse. Foreigner.

"She did not po—possess wings?"

Ace grinned. "No. Fakeroo." She was beginning her frown act again and he remembered she was probably drunk. "It was a gag, see? There is no Girl from Mars."

"But I am from Rekk."

"What?"

"I am from Re—from Mars."

She was lushed to the gills. Ace stepped back. "Oh, yeah. Sure. You're from Mars, huh?"

"I came today."

"Well, well. Just like that, huh? Pleasure or business?"

"Kep?"

"Skip it. I mean, what's on your mind? What can I do for you?"

"Hungry."

Not only a lush, but a mooch, yet. But she was built. And when Ace put his hand on her shoulder, she didn't move away. Her shoulder was warm. The heat just poured off her. Hot stuff. And she was hungry—

ACE GLANCED at the tent flap behind him. He was beginning to get an idea. It came to him when he put his hand on her shoulder. To hell with Mitzie. This was just what the doctor ordered. And the Midway was deserted. The gang wouldn't be back from Sweeney's for forty-five minutes yet.

"Hungry," the girl repeated.

"Sure. We'll get you something to eat. But let's talk first. Come on inside." Ace got another grip on her shoulder. Warm. Soft. Good stuff.

The lights inside were dim. Lou had switched off when he left. The flaps were down over the platforms against the tent walls, as they were during the grind when only one freak performed at a time. Ace led her over to the Girl from Mars platform. There was a cot inside and he could lower the flap. Take it easy first though.

She walked on her heels until he held her still and pushed her down on the steps on the side of the platform. Touching her made him want to hurry it up, even though he knew he had to be careful. The heat came off her in waves, and he was warm from the whisky.

"So you're from Mars," he said, huskily, bending over her but remembering to keep a grin on his face. "How did you get here?"

"Ertells. The—machine. With the others. Hydron, very swift. Until we land. Then this, we did not expect. In the atmosphere. Electric."

"The storm? Lightning?"

She nodded, expressionless. "You understand. The kor—the machine split. Broken. All flerk. All but I. I fell. And then I did not know. Because I had no orders. Pre was ended. You understand?"

Ace nodded. She was hot. God, she was hot. And built. He stepped back, still nodding. Let her finish. Maybe she'd sober up a little.

"So I walked. Nothing. Nobody. Dark. Then I saw light. This place. And the words. And you. I read the words."

"And here you are." Humor them. You got to humor them, dames and drunks. "How come you read English, and talk?"

"Pre did it. Education. Because he—planned we must come. Much I cannot know. I will understand. Now hungry."

There was no expression on her face. Lushes always twist their faces a lot. She didn't stagger, just walked on her heels was all. And there was no liquor smell from her. So—she wasn't drunk!

Ace stared.

He stared at the expressionless face, at the platinum hair and eyebrows. He stared at the sandals she wore, at the grey suit without any pockets, without any buttons. No buttons. That was it. She didn't have all her buttons.

Yeah. Sure. She was a whack. She came here this afternoon, all right. Busted out of the county nuthouse in the storm. No wonder she didn't carry a purse or anything. Just a lousy whack on the lam from the san.

Wouldn't that have to be the kind of break he got? A screwball with an empty gut and an empty noggin. That's all he needed. But she was built. And that's all he needed—

Why not?

ACE FIGURED fast. Half an hour, maybe. Long enough. He'd hustle her out of here right away. Nobody would know. It was a dirty trick, maybe. What the hell, he'd been getting the dirty end long enough himself; rain, no take, that damned Mitzie running out on him, no woman. He needed a change of luck. And besides, it wouldn't hurt her, maybe do her good. Nobody would find out anything and even if they did, she was a whack. Didn't know what she was saying, even. Why not?

"Hungry."

"Wait a minute, sister. I got a great idea. Come on back here for a second."

He motioned her to her feet, led the way up the steps, and lifted the flap. It was dark on the platform behind the canvas curtain. He groped for the couch, found it.

"Sit down here." He made his voice soft. She stood right next to him, not backing away, and when he pulled her down, pulled down all that heat and softness, she came without a sound.

He made himself wait, kept talking first.

“Yeah, I got a great idea. Why not? You’re from Mars, ain’tcha?”

“Yes. From Rekk.”

“Sure. And my Girl from Mars skipped. So the way I figure it, why don’t you come along with the show? You can have the same setup, sixty a week and chow, travel around and see the country. Nobody to tell you what to do or when to do it, see? Your own boss. Free. Get it—free?”

He wanted it to sound good. Sort of subtle, about being free. Even if she was a whack, she had enough sense to bust out and probably knew she’d have to keep moving. Not that he’d let her tie up with the show, that was all con, but he wanted her to go for the deal. Then he could start.

“But that is not what you speak. Hungry—”

Ah, to hell with it! You don’t waste your breath on a screwball. And here in the dark she wasn’t a screwball. She was a disheroo, a tall blonde, hot, better than Mitzie, damn Mitzie anyhow, she was here and he could feel her, feel the warmth just busting out of her—

Ace put his hands on her shoulders.

“Hungry, huh? Well, don’t you worry about that, sister. I’ll take care of you. All you gotta do is co-operate.”

Damn it! He heard the mumbling now, the gang was coming back, filing into the tent, climbing up on platforms and scraping chairs. He wouldn’t have time.

But what the hell, he was behind the curtain, it was dark, he’d keep quiet and make her keep quiet and they could sneak out later. Besides, his hands were on her shoulders. Ace felt her lean against him, felt those curves, solid. Instead of drawing back, she kept coming in, she wasn’t whacky, she knew what she was doing, this was all right.

SOMEBODY in the outer tent flicked up the lights, and a thin glow filtereed through the canvas curtain. He grinned at her upturned face. Her eyes were wide, shining. He ran his hands down her back. She was strong, eager.

"Don't you worry about being hungry, baby," he whispered. "I'll take care of you."

The heat poured out of her as she pressed his shoulders. He bent his head to kiss her. She opened her mouth, wide, and in the dim light he saw her teeth. They were platinum-colored, too.

Then he wanted to draw back, but something about the heat pouring off her made him feel dizzy. Besides, she held on to him so tight, and she kept whispering "hungry" over and over again, and now she was drawing him down on the cot and he saw the teeth coming at him. They were long and pointed. He couldn't move, she held him, the heat came out of her eyes to blind him, and the long, sharp teeth were coming closer and closer—

Ace hardly felt any pain. Everything turned to heat and whirled away. Somewhere in the distance a voice began to chant. It was Lou, standing outside, standing under the Girl from Mars banner and beginning his chant. That was the last thing Ace heard or knew. The chant, the spiel.

"The Wild Man From Borneo—he eats 'em alive—he eats 'em alive—"

Tell Your Fortune

THE scales aren't here any more.

Look, Buster, I don't want any trouble. I run a nice quiet little place here, no rough stuff. I'm telling you—the scales aren't here. You must be the twentieth guy this week who come in looking for those scales. But they're gone. Damned good thing, too, if you ask me.

No, I'm not the bouncer. I'm the manager. So help me, I am. If you're looking for Big Pete Mosko, he's gone. Tarelli's gone too, and the girl.

Didn't you read about it in the papers? I thought everybody knew it by now, but like I said, guys keep coming in. The heat was on here for a month before I bought the place and made the fix. Now I run it strictly on the percentages; I level with the customers. Not like Mosko, with his crooked wheels and the phoney cubes. Look the house over. No wires, no gimmicks. You want to make a fast buck at the table, you get your chance. But the sucker stuff is out. And I wouldn't be caught dead with those scales in here, after what has happened.

No, I don't think you're nosey. I'll take that drink, sure. Might as well tell you about it. Like I say, it was in the papers—but only part of it. Screwiest thing you ever heard of. Matter of fact, a guy needs a drink or two if he wants to finish the story.

If you come in here in the old days, then you probably remember Big Pete Mosko all right. Six feet four, three hundred pounds, built like a brick backhouse, with that Polack haircut and the bashed-in nose. Don't like to give anyone the finger, but it looks like Pete Mosko had to be that big to hold all the meanness in him. Kind of a guy they'd have to bury with a corkscrew, too. But a very smart apple.

He come here about three years ago when this pitch was nothing but a combination tavern and bowling alley. A Mom and Pop setup, strictly for Saturday nights and a beer license. He made his deal with tire county boys and tore out the bowling alley. Put in this layout downstairs here and hired a couple of sticks to rua tables. Crap games only, at first. A fast operation.

But Mosko was a smart apple, like I say. The suckers come downstairs here and dropped their bundles one-two-three. Mosko, he stayed upstairs in the bar and made like your genial host. Used to sit there in a big chair with a ten-dollar smile plastered all over his ugly mush. Offering everybody drinks on the house when they come up from die cleaners. Let everybody kid him about how fat he was and how ugly he was and how dumb he was. Mosko dumb? Let me tell you, he knew what he was doing.

Way he worked it, he didn't even need to keep a bouncer on the job. Never any strong-arm stuff, even though business got good and some of the Country Club gang used to come out here and drop maybe a G or so at a time on Saturdays. Mosko saw to that. He was the buffer. A guy got a rimming on Mosko's tables, but he never got sore at Mosko. Mosko stayed upstairs and kidded him along.

Show you how smart he was, Mosko played up his fatness. Played it up so he could be ribbed. Did it on purpose—wearing those big baggy suits to make him look even, heavier—and putting that free lunch in front of himself when he sat in his chair at the end of the bar. Mosko wasn't really what you call a big eater, but he kept nibbling away at the food all evening, whenever somebody was around to look. Suffered something awful from indigestion, and he used to complain in private, but he put on a good show for the marks.

That's why he got a scale put in the tavern, to begin with. All a part of Mosko's smart act. He used to weigh himself in front of the suckers. Made little bets—fin or a sawbuck—on what he weighed. Lost them on purpose, too, just to make the marks feel good.

But that was an ordinary scale, understand. And Mosko was running an ordinary place, too—until Tarelli came.

Seems like Mosko wasn't content just to rim suckers on the dice tables. If his appetite for food wasn't so good, he made up for it in his appetite for a fast buck. Anyhow, when he had the bowling alleys ripped out downstairs, the carpenters built him a couple of little rooms, way in back. Rooms to live in.

Of course Mosko himself lived upstairs, over the tavern. These rooms weren't for him. They were for any of Mosko's private pals.

He had a lot of private pals. Old buddies from Division Street in Chi. Fraternity brothers from Joliet. Any lamster was a pal of Mosko's when the heat was on—if he had the moola to pay for hiding out in one of those private rooms downstairs. Mosko picked up a nice hunk of pocket money hiding hot items—and I guess he had visitors from all over the country staying a week or a month in his place. Never asked about it; you didn't ask Mosko about such things if you wanted to keep being a good insurance risk.

Anyhow, it was on account of those rooms that Tarelli come here. He was out of Havana—illegal entry, of course—but he wasn't a Cuban. Eytie, maybe, from the looks of him. Little dark customer with gray hair and big brown eyes, always grinning and mumbling to himself. Funny to see a squirt like him standing next to a big tub of lard like Mosko.

I saw him the day he arrived. I was working for Big Pete Mosko then, bouncing and keeping the customers quiet. Mosko never talked about his little private deals handling hot characters in the back room, and I clammed up whenever I was with him—it was strictly business between us. But even though I kept my mouth shut, I kept my eyes open, and I saw plenty.

Like I say, I saw Tarelli arrive. He got off the five-spot bus right in front of the tavern, just at twilight. I was out front switching on the neon when he ambled up, tapped me on the shoulder, and said, "Pardon. Can you inform me if this is the establishment of Signor Mosko?"

I give him a checkup, a fastie. Funny little guy, about the size of a watch-charm, wearing a set of checkered threads. He carried a big black suitcase, holding it stiffarmed in a way that made it easy to tell he had a full load. He wasn't wearing a hat, and his gray hair was plastered down on his head with some kind of perfume or tonic on it which smelled like DDT and was probably just as deadly.

"Inside, Buster," I told him.

"Pardon?"

"Mosko's inside. Wait, I'll take you." I steered him towards the door.

"Thank you." He gave me the big grin—full 32-tooth salute—and lugged the keister inside after me, mumbling to himself.

WHAT he could possibly want with Mosko I didn't know, but I wasn't being paid to figure it out. I just led him up to Big Pete behind the bar and pointed. Then I went outside again.

Of course, I couldn't help hearing some stuff through the screen door. Mosko had a voice that could kill horse-flies at five hundred feet. He talked and Tarelli mumbled. Something like this:

"Finally made it, huh? Rico fly you in?"

"Mumble-mumble-mumble."

"All set. Where's the cash?"

"Mumble-mumble."

"Okay. Stay as long as you want. Rico tells me you can do a few jobs for me, too."

"Mumble-mumble-mumble."

"Brought your own equipment, eh? That's fine. We'll see how good you are, then. Come on, I'll show you where you'll bunk, But remember, Tarelli—you stay out of sight wheel customers are here. Don't want you to show your profile to any strangers. Just stick downstairs and do what you're told and we'll get along fine."

That told me all I needed to know, except what Tarelli was going to do for Big Pete Mosko while he hid out from the law in the basement back rooms. But I found out the rest soon enough.

Couple of days later, I'm downstairs stashing liquor in the storage room and I come back through the crap table layout. First thing I see is a couple of roulette wheels, some big new tables, and little Tarelli.

Tarelli is sitting on an orange crate, right in the middle of the wheels and furniture, and he's having himself a ball. Got a mess of tools laying around, and a heap more in his big black suitcase. He's wiring the undersides of the tables and using instruments on the wheels, squatting on this crate and grinning like a gnome in Santy Claus's workshop. I hear him mumbling to himself, and I figure it's only sociable I should stop by and maybe case the job a little.

He pays me no attention at all, just keeps right on with his waring, soldering connections and putting some small batteries under the wheels. Even though he grins and mumbles, I can tell when I watch his hands that Tarelli knows what he is doing. The little foreign character is a first-class mechanic.

I watch him slip some weights under the rims of the three roulette wheels and it's easy to see that he's bored holes through them for an electric magnet below the Zero and Double-Zero, and then—wham!

Something smacks me in the back of the neck and I hear Big Pete Mosko yelling, "Whaddya think you're doing here? Get out before I break your lousy neck!"

I took the hint and ducked, but I learned something, again. Big Pete Mosko was putting in three crooked roulette wheels, and business was picking up.

Sure enough, less than a week later the tables were installed and ready for action.

I kept out of the basement as much as possible, because I could see Mosko didn't want anybody around or asking questions.

I made it my business to steer shy of Tarelli, too. There was no sense asking for trouble.

MUST have been all of ten days before I saw him again. This was just after the wheels were operating. Mosko brought in two more sharpies to run them, and he was taking them into town one afternoon, leaving me and the day bartender on duty. I went downstairs to clean up, and I swear I wasn't getting my nose dirty. It was Tarelli who started it.

He heard me walking around, and he come out from his room. "Pardon," he said. "Pardon, signor."

"Sure," I said. "What's the pitch?"

"Ees no pitch. Ees only that I weesh to explain that I am sorry I make trouble between you and Signor Mosko."

"You mean when he caught me watching you? That's all right, Tarelli. He loses his temper—I'm used to it. Guess I shouldn't have butted into his business."

"Ees dirty business. Dirty."

I stared at him. He was grinning and nodding, but he wasn't kidding.

"Feelthy!" He grinned harder. "I hate of myself that I do thees for Signor Mosko. For cheating people. Ees feelthy! That I, Antonio Tarelli, would come to such an end—"

"Take it easy, Buster. We all gotta live."

"You call thees living?" He shrugged at me, at the tables, at the cellar, at the whole damned world. "I come to thees country to make new life. Rico, he tells me I can do good here. Signor Mosko, I pay him the monies, he weel arrange. Ees no good. I am—how you say?—without help. I must do as Signor Mosko tells. He discovers I am craftsman, he makes me do thees dirty work."

"Why don't you blow out of here, then? I mean, it's none of my business, but why don't you just scram right this afternoon? Even if Mosko plays it below the belt and hollers copper, you can get away into town and take a room. Nobody would find you. Lotsa guys in this country on illegal entry; they make out. Like I say, Tarelli, I'm not trying to advise you. But if you don't like crooked dealing, better leave and leave fast. How about it?"

TARELLI cocked his head up at me and grinned again. Then he squeezed my arm.

"You know sometheeng? I like you. You are honest man."

That was a laugh. But who was I to argue with a dumb foreigner? I just grinned back.

"Look," he mumbled. "Come, I show you why I not leave here right away now."

He took me down to his little room—an ordinary little room, with a rickety old bed, a straight chair, a second-hand dresser, and a dirty rug on the floor. "Come een," he said, and I stepped inside.

I wish somebody had cut my legs off, instead.

Tarelli went to the closet and dragged out his big black suitcase. He opened it up and pulled something out—a little picture, in a frame.

"Look," he said, and I looked.

I wish somebody had torn my eyes out, instead.

"Rosa," he mumbled. "Ees my daughter. Eighteen years. You like?"

I liked, and I said so.

I wish somebody had cut my tongue off, instead.

But I walked into his little room and looked at the girl with the black hair and the black eyes, and I told him she was beautiful and I sat there staring at her and he grinned and he spilled it all out to me. Everything.

I can remember almost every word, just as I can remember almost everything that happened from that afternoon on until the end.

Yeah, I learned a lot. Too much.

Let me boil it down, though. About Tarelli—he wasn't a lamster, in the old country. He was a Professor. Sounds screwy, but the way he pitched it, I knew he was levelling with me. He was a Professor in some big college over there, university, I don't know what they call it. Had to blow during the war, got as far as Cuba, got mixed up in some mess down there, and then met Big Pete Mesko's pal, Rico. Rico got him into this country, which is what he wanted, and now he was looking for a way to latch onto a bundle.

"I am what you call financial embarrass," he said. "Rico, for breenging me here take all I have save up."

This I could understand. Any pal of Big Pete Mosko would be apt to be like that. A grabber.

"So now I work. Mosko employs the physicist, the most eminent of metaphysicians, to—rig, they say it?—games of chance. Ha! But I weel do anytheeng to earn money, to have Rosa here."

The deal was all set, I gathered. All Tarelli needed to do was scrape together a G-note and Rico would fetch Rosa on the plane. Easy as goniffing candy from a brat.

"So you're saving your pennies, huh?" I said, taking another look at Rosa's picture. "What's Mosko paying you for this machine job?"

"Twenty dollar."

Twenty dollars for a piece of work Mosko would have to pay easy two-three grind for if he got it done by any professional. Twenty dollars for three crooked wheels that would pay off maybe a grand or more a week clear profit. Big-hearted guy, Mister Mosko. And at that rate, Tarelli would have his Rosa over here just in time to collect on her old-age pension.

I took another look at Rosa's picture and decided it wasn't fair to make poor old Tarelli wait that long. Matter of fact, I didn't want to wait that long, either.

It wouldn't do much good to tell Tarelli that Mosko was playing him for a sucker. The thing to. do was figure an angle, and fast.

I put Rosa's picture away. "We'll work something out," I said. "We got to."

"Thank you," said Tarelli.

Which was a funny thing for him to say, because I was talking to the picture.

II

I DIDN'T have much time to talk to pictures the next couple weeks. Because Mosko had his roulette wheels operating, and the take was good. I kept busy quieting the squawkers, hustling out the phonies, and handling the guys who were sauced up. The two hotshots he hired to handle the wheels kept rolling.

Mosko was busy, too—just sitting in his office and counting the take. Must have been about two-three weeks after the wheels went in that I happened to pass his little private back office when Tarelli went in and gave him a pitch.

I couldn't help but hear what they were saying, because both of them were yelling pretty loud.

"But you promise," Tarelli was saying. "Rosa, she ees all alone. Ees not good for young girl to be alone. She must come here."

"That's your worry. Blow now, I got things to do."

"Theengs to do like counteeng monies? Monies you make from the crooked wheels I feex?"

"Never mind. Get outta here before I lose my temper."

"Ees worth plenty, thees job I do for you. Get Rosa for me. I pay you back. I work long, hard. Anytheeng you say."

"Blow."

"You must do sometheeng. You must!" Tarelli was almost bawling, now. "How you like, I tell somebody about crooked wheels?"

"Listen. One peep outta you and I tell somebody," said Big Pete Mosko. "I tell somebody about a guy who sneaked into this country without a passport. Get me?"

"You would not do thees!"

"Wait and see."

Everything was quiet for a minute. Way I figured it, things would stay quiet. Mosko had Tarelli, but good. If the little guy didn't watch his step, Mosko could turn him over to the Feds. There was nothing anybody could do about it. Except—

"One theeng more—" Tarelli said.

"Blow."

"No. Leesten. Suppose I construct for you something very special?"

"How special?"

"Sometheeng—how can I tell you?—no one ever has before."

"Gambling device?"

"Perhaps."

"Cost money to make?"

"A few pennies."

"New, huh?"

"Special."

"All right, go ahead. We'll see."

"Then you weel send for Rosa?"

"We'll see."

Mosko let it go at that, and I didn't butt in. I was willing to see, too. And in another couple of weeks, I saw.

I was there the morning Tarelli took the wraps off his big secret. It was on a Sunday, and Mosko and the four sharpies who worked his wheels for him were downstairs, divvying up the take from the big Saturday night play.

Me and Al, the bartender, were sitting around in the tavern upstairs all alone, chopping the heads off a couple glasses of beer. There weren't any customers—never were on Sunday—so Al looked kind of surprised when he saw this little truck drive up and stop outside.

"We got company," he said.

"Company? Why, it's Tarelli," I told him.

SURE enough, little Tarelli hopped out of the truck and made some motions to the big lug who was driving it. The lug went around back and then he and Tarelli lifted down a big weighing machine. Before I knew what was happening, they dragged it into the tavern and set it up right in the corner.

"Hey," says Al. "Whatsa big idea?"

“Ees no idea. Ees scales. For weighing,” Tarelli said, turning on his grin.

“Who ordered scales around here?”

Al come around the bar and we walked up to the weighing machine.

“I order,” Tarelli told him. “I promise Mistair Mosko to find sometheeng wonderful.”

“Don’t see anything wonderful about a penny scale machine,” I said, giving it a fast case.

And there wasn’t anything wonderful to see. It was just a regular weighing machine with a round clock-face glass front, and a pointer that spun up to 400 pounds, depending on who stood on it and dropped a penny in the slot. It was made by the Universal Scale Company of Waterville, Indiana, and the decal on the back said, “This machine property of Acme Coin Machine Distributors.”

I NOTICED all this stuff kind of quick, without paying too much attention—but later, I memorized it. Checked up on it, too, when the time came, and it was all true. Just an ordinary weighing machine, made at the factory and rented out to Mosko for ten bucks a month plus 30 per cent of the take in pennies.

Oh, one other thing. Besides the big glass front over the dial showing the weight, there was another little hunk of glass and a spinner knob you turned when you dropped your penny. This knob turned about 20 slides up, for fortune-telling. You know, the regular questions you always find on scales. Like, “WILL I MARRY RICH?” Then when you dropped your penny, out comes a card with a gag answer on it, like “NO, YOU WONT MARRY RICH. YOU’LL MARRY EDDIE.” Corny stuff. And on top of the machine it said, “TELL YOUR FORTUNE—1¢. HONEST WEIGHT, NO SPRINGS.”

Al and I looked at the scales and the guy driving the truck went away from there. Tarelli kept grinning up at us and at last he said, “How you like?”

"Phooey!" said Al. "Whatsa matter with you, Tarelli? You oughtta know better'n to louse up the joint with a penny machine. We got customers come in here to drop a big wad at the tables; you think they gonna fish out pennies to get their weight told?"

"Yeah," I said. "Does Mosko know you ordered this?"

"No," Tarelli answered. "But he find out fast."

"And he'll get sore faster," I told him. "No he don't. You see."

"I'm gonna hate to see, Tarelli. When Big Pete sees this phoney fortune-telling gimmick he'll go through the roof. He thought you were coming through with something big."

"Right. Thees ees of the most wonderful. Wait until I feex."

Tarelli waved at me and went downstairs. Al and I got back to our beers. Every once in a while Al would look ever at the big, ugly white scales in the corner and shake his head. Neither of us said anything, though.

In a little while Tarelli come upstairs again. This time he was lugging his suitcase and a big canvas tarp. He set his suitcase down right next to the scales and then he got out a hammer and nailed up the tarp, right across the corner. It hid the scales and it hid Tarelli and his suitcase.

"Hey, now what you up to?" Al yelled.

"No questions. I feex. You cannot see."

"Lissen, you sawed-off little jerk—who you giving orders to around here?" Al hollered.

He got up, but I held his arm. "Take it easy," I said. "Give the little guy a chance. He's doing this for Mosko, remember? Maybe he's got some angle. Look what he did for the wheels."

"All right. But what's the big idea of the tarpaulin?"

"Secret," Tarelli called out. "Nobody must know. Three weeks I work to do. Ees miracle. You see."

We didn't see anything. We didn't even hear much of anything; some banging and clanking around, but not much. I guessed Tarelli was working on the weighing-machine with special tools from his suitcase, but I couldn't figure the angle. All I know is he worked on and on, and Al and I kept drinking beers and waiting for Big Pete Mosko to come upstairs and bust up the act.

But Mosko must have been plenty busy counting the take. He didn't show. And the fidgeting went on behind the curtain until Al and I were going screwy trying to figure things out.

"I got it!" Al says, at last. "Sure, I got it. Plain as daylight. Tarelli fixed the wheels downstairs for the big-time marks, diden' he? Well, this is for the little sucker—Mr. Bates, who comes in upstairs for a drink. We work the old routine on him, see? Plant a steerer at the bar, get him into an argument about what he weighs, work him into a bet. Five, ten, twenty bucks. I hold the dough, get it? Then we take him over to the scales. Mr. Bates knows what he weighs, because before the showdown the steerer goes away to wash his hands, and I say to Mr. Bates, 'Quick, hop on the scales before he gets back. Then we'll know what you weigh for sure.' So the chump weighs himself and lets say he weighs 165. The steerer comes back and this time Mr. Bates offers to double or triple the bet. He can't lose, see? So the steerer falls for it and we have Mr. Bates for fifty or a hundred bucks. Then we weigh him official. And of course the scales says 170 or 175—whatever I want. Because I got my foot down on the pedal that fixes the scales. Get it? A natural!" Somehow it didn't seem like such a natural to me. In the first place, no Mr. Bates was going to be dumb enough not to see through the routine with the crooked scales, and he'd raise a holy stink about being cleaned. Secondly, Tarelli had promised Mosko something really wonderful. And for some funny reason I had faith in Tarelli. I knew he was working to get Rosa over here—and he'd do anything for her. After seeing her picture, I could understand that. No, I expected Tarelli to come through. A big scientist, physicist or whatever kind of Professor he was in the old country, would do better than fix a weighing machine.

SO I WAITED to see what would happen when Tarelli finished and took the tarp down.

Finally he did, and I saw—exactly nothing. Tarelli ripped down the canvas, carried his bag back downstairs, and left the scales standing there, exactly like before. I know, because Al and I rushed up to look at the machine.

Only two things were changed, and you had to look pretty hard to realize that much. First of all, the little selector knob you could spin to choose your fortune-telling question just didn't spin any more. And second, the small glass-covered opening above it which gave the questions was now blank. Instead of printed questions like "WILL I MARRY RICH?" there was now a sort of black disk behind the glass. It kind of moved when you got up close to it, as though it was a mirror, only black.

I know that sounds screwy and it was screwy; but that's the only way I can describe it. It was a little black disk that sort of caught your reflection when you stood on the scales, only of course you can't get a reflection off something dull and black.

But it was as if the scales were looking at you.

I hopped up and fished around for a penny. Closer I stood, the more I felt like something or somebody inside the scales was giving me a cold, fishy stare. Yes, and there was, come to think of it, a soft humming noise when I stood on the platform. Deep down humming from inside.

Al went around back and said, "Little jerk opened up the machinery here, all right. Soldered the back on tight again, though. Wonder what he was up to? Coin company's sure gonna squawk when they see this."

I found my penny and got ready to drop it in. I could see my reflection in the big glass dial where the weight pointer was. I had a kind of funny grin, but I guess that came from looking at the black disk below and listening to the humming and wondering about the wonderful thing Tarelli had done.

I held my penny over the slot, and—

Big Pete Mosko come running up the stairs. Tarelli was right behind him, and right behind Tarelli were the four sharpies.

"What's the pitch?" Mosko yelled. "Get off that machine and throw it out of here."

I got off the machine, fast. If I hadn't, Mosko would of knocked me off.

"Wait," Tarelli chattered. "Wait—you see—ees what I promise you. Wonderful."

"Scales!" Mosko grabbed Tarelli by the collar and shook him until his hair flopped all over his face. "What do I need with scales?"

"But they tell fortunes—"

"Tell fortunes?" Mosko began to shake Tarelli until it looked like his hair would be torn right out of his head. "What do I need with phoney fortunes?"

"Ees—ees not phoney fortunes like you say. That ees the wonderful. The fortunes, they are true!"

"True?"

Mosko was still yelling, but the shaking stopped. He put Tarelli down and stared at him, hard.

Tarelli managed another one of his grins. "Yes, true. You get on machine. You put een penny. Fortune card comes out. Ees really true fortune. Tell your future."

"Malarkey!"

One of the sharpies, character named Don, started to laugh. He was a lanky blond guy with buck teeth, and he looked like a horse. In a minute we were all laughing. All but Tarelli.

"Take it easy, Tarelli," said Don, grinning and sticking out his big yellow teeth. He walked over to the little old man and stood looking down at him. It was funny to see the two of them together; Tarelli in his old overalls, and this sharpie Don in a handsome set of threads; new blue pinstripe job that matched the color of his convertible parked outside in the driveway. It was funny, and then it wasn't so funny, because the grin on Don's face was mean, and I knew he was just working up to something nasty.

"Look, Tarelli," Don said, still grinning. "Maybe you're a big scientist back in the University of Boloney or wherever you come from. But for my money, over here, you're just a schmoe, see? And I never heard that any scientist could invent a machine that really reads a person's future." Don reached down and patted Tarelli on the shoulder. “Now you know Mister Mosko here is a busy man,” he said. “So if you got anything else to say, spit it out fast-like. Then I won’t waste any more time before I kick you out in the road.”

“Huh!” Mosko grunted. “I got no time for screwballs at all, Don. Telling what’s gonna happen to you by science—”

“Ees not science.” Tarelli talked real soft and looked at the floor.

“Not science?”

“No. I do anytheeng to get Rosa here, remember, I tell you that? I do what science cannot do. I make pact. Make vow. Make bargain.”

“What kind of a bargain? With who?”

“I not say. My business, eh? But eet work. So I can build what I need for machine. Ees not science work here. Ees magic.”

“What the—”

Mosko was yelling again, but Tarelli’s soft voice cut him right off. “Magic,” he repeated. “Black magic. I don’ care who you are, what you are. You get on scales. Scales read your soul, your past, see you like you really are. Drop penny, scales tell your fortune. Read your future. Here, try eet—you see.”

Then Don cut loose with his horse-laugh. Only this time he laughed alone. And when he shut up, Tarelli turned to Mosko again.

“Understan’ what I tell you? Thees scale read the future. Tell anybody’s fortune. Ees worth much money to have here. You can make beeg business from thees. Now you get Rosa for me?”

“Sure,” said Mosko. “I’ll get Rosa. If it works. Hey, Tarelli, whyn-cha get on the machine and see if it tells your fortune about Rosa? Maybe it’ll say she’s coming. Ha!”

Mosko was ribbing him, but Tarelli didn’t know it. He turned kind of pale and stepped back.

“Oh no, Meestair Mosko. Not me! I not get on thees machine for anytheeng. Ees cursed, black magic. I do it only for Rosa—but I fear.”

“Well, what we all wasting time standing around for?” Don snickered. “Tarelli’s chicken. Afraid he’ll get on the scales and nothing will happen, so we boot him out. Well, I’m not scared. Here, gimme that.”

He snatched the penny out of my hand, hopped on the scales, and slid the penny down. I could hear the faint humming, and then when the penny disappeared I could hear the humming a little louder. The black disk on the scales got cloudy for a second. The pointer on the big dial behind the glass swung over to 182. Don stood on the scales, 182 pounds of what the well-dressed man will wear, including his nasty grin.

“So?” he shrugged. “Nothing happens.”

There was a click, and a little white card slid out of the slot below the black disk.

Don picked it up and read it. He shook his head and passed the card to Mosko and the others. Eventually it got to me.

It was a plain white card with plain lettering on it—but it wasn’t regular printing, more like a mimeograph in black ink that was still damp. I read it twice.

WHEN THE BLACK CAT CROSSES YOUR PATH YOU DIE.

That’s all it said. The old superstition. Kid stuff.

“Kid stuff!” Don sneered. “Tell you what. This faker musta gummed up the machinery in this scale and put in a lot of phoney new fortune-telling cards of his own. He’s crazy.”

Tarelli shook his head. “Please,” he said. “You no like me. Well, I no like you, much. But even so, I geev you the warning—watch out for black cats. Scales say black cat going to breeng you death. Watch out.”

Don shrugged. “You handle this deal, Mosko,” he said. “I got no more time to waste. Heavy date this afternoon.”

Mosko nodded at him. “Just make sure you don’t get loaded. I need you at the tables tonight.”

“I’ll be here,” Don said, from the doorway. “Unless some mangy alley-cat sneaks up and conks me over the head with a club.”

For a little while nobody said anything. Tarelli tried to smile at me, but it didn’t go over. He tugged at Mosko’s sleeve but Mosko ignored him. He stared at Don. We all stared at Don.

We watched him climb into his convertible and back out of the driveway. We watched him give it the gun and he hit the road. We watched him race by towards town. We watched the black cat come out of nowhere and scoot across the highway, watched Don yank the wheel to swerve out of its path, watched the car zoom off to one side towards the ditch, watched it crash into the culvert, then turn a somersault and go roiling over and over and over into the gully.

There was running and yelling and swearing and tugging and hauling, and finally we found all that was left of 182 pounds and a brand new suit under the weight of that wrecked convertible. We never saw Don’s grin again, and we never saw the cat again, either.

But Tarelli pointed at the fortune-telling card and smiled. And that afternoon, Big Pete Mosko phoned Rico to bring Rosa to America.

III

SHE arrived on Saturday night. Rico brought her from the plane; big Rico with his waxed mustache and plastered-down hair, with his phoney diamond ring and his phoney polo coat that told everybody what he was, just as if he had a post office reader pinned to his back.

But I didn’t pay any attention to Rico. I was looking at Rosa. There was nothing phoney about her black hair, her white skin, her red mouth. There was nothing phoney about the way she threw herself into Tarelli’s arms, kissing the little man and crying for joy.

It was quite a reunion downstairs in the back room, and even though she paid no attention when she was introduced to me, I felt pretty good about it all. It did something to me just to watch her smiling and laughing, a few minutes later, while she talked to her old man. Al, the bartender, and the sharpies stood around and grinned at each other, too, and I guess they felt the same way I did.

But Big Pete Mosko felt different. He looked at Rosa, too, and he did his share of grinning. But he wasn't grinning at her—he was grinning at something inside himself. Something came alive in Mosko, and I could see it—something that waited to grab and paw and rip and tear at Rosa.

"It's gonna be nice having you here," he told her. "We gotta get acquainted."

"I must thank you for making this possible," she said, in her soft little voice—the kid spoke good English, grammar and everything, and you could tell she had class. "My father and I are very, very grateful. I don't know how we are going to repay you."

"We'll talk about that later," said Big Pete Mosko, licking his lips and letting his hands curl and uncurl into fists. "But right now you gotta excuse me. Looks like a heavy night for business."

Tarelli and Rosa disappeared into his room, to have supper off a tray Al brought down. Mosko went out to the big downstairs pitch to case the tables for the night's play. Rico hung around for a while, kidding with the wheel operators. I caught him mumbling in the corner and dragged him upstairs for a drink.

That's where Mosko found us a couple minutes later. Rico gave him the office.

"How's about the dough?" he said.

"Sure, sure. Justa minute." Mosko hauled out a roll and peeled off a slice for Rico. I saw it—five Cs. And it gave me a bad time to watch Rico take the money because I knew Mosko wouldn't hand out five hundred bucks without getting plenty in return.

And I knew what he wanted in return. Rosa.

"Hey, what's the big idea of this?" Rico asked, pointing over at the scales in the comer.

I didn't say anything, and I wondered if Mosko would spill. All week long the weighing machine had stood there with a sign on it, "OUT OF ORDER." Mosko had it lettered the day after Don got killed, and he made sure nobody got their fortune told. Nobody talked about the scales, and I kept wondering if Mosko was going to yank the machine out of the place or use it, or what he had in the back of his head.

But Mosko must have figured Rico was one of the family, seeing as how he flew in illegal immigrants and all, because he told Rico the whole story. There wasn't many around the bar yet that early—cur Saturday night players generally got in about ten or so—and Mosko yapped without worrying about listeners.

"So help me, it'sa truth," he told Rico. "Machine'll tell just what's gonna happen to your future. For a stinkin' penny."

Rico laughed.

"Don't give me that con," he said. "Business with Don and the cat was just a whatchacallit—coincidence.

"Yeah? Well, you couldn't get me on those scales for a million bucks, brother," Mosko told him.

"Maybe so. But I'm not scared of any machine in the world," Rico snorted. "Here, watch me."

And he walked over to the scales and dropped a penny. The pointer went up. 177. The black disk gleamed. I heard the humming and the click, and out came the white card. Rico looked at it and grinned. I didn't crack a smile. I was thinking of Don.

But Rico chuckled and handed the card around for all of us to see. It said:

YOU WILL WIN WITH RED

"Good enough," he said, waving the card under Mosko's nose. "Now if I was a sucker, I'd go downstairs and bet this five hundred smackers on one of your crooked wheels, red to win. If I was a superstitious jerk, that is."

Mosko shrugged. “Suit yourself,” he said. “Look, customers. I gotta get busy.” He walked away.

I got busy myself, then. The marks started to arrive and it looked like a big Saturday night. I didn’t get downstairs until after midnight and that was the first time I noticed that Rico must have kidded himself into believing the card after all.

Because he was playing the wheel. And playing it big. A new guy, name of Spencer, had come in to replace Don, and he was handling the house end on this particular setup. A big crowd was standing around the rig, watching Rico place his bets. Rico had a stack of chips a foot high and he was playing them fast.

And winning.

I must have watched him for about fifteen minutes, and during that time he raked in over three Gs, cold. Played odds, played numbers. Played red, and played black too. Won almost every spin.

Mosko was watching, too. I saw him signal Spencer the time Rico put down a full G in blue chips on black to win. I saw Spencer wink at Mosko. But I saw the wheel stop on black.

Mosko was ready to bust, but what could he do? A crowd of marks was watching, it had to look legit. Three more spins and Rico had about six or seven Gs in chips in front of him. Then Mosko stepped in and took the table away from Spencer.

“See you in my office,” he mumbled, and Spencer nodded. He stared at Rico but Rico only smiled and said, “Excuse me, I’m cashing in.” Mosko looked at me and said, “Tail him.” Then he shook his head. “Don’t get it,” he said. He was working the wire now, finding everything in order.

OUT of the corner of my eye I saw Rico over at the cashier’s window, counting currency and stuffing it into his pocket. Spencer had disappeared. Rico began walking upstairs, his legs scissoring fast. I followed, hefting the brass knucks in my pocket.

Rico went outside. I went outside. He heard my feet behind him on the gravel and turned around.

“Hey,” I said. “What’s your hurry?” Rico just laughed. Then he winked. That wink was the last thing I saw before everything exploded.

I went down on the gravel, and I didn’t get up for about a minute. Then I was just in time to see the car pull away with Rico waving at me, still laughing. The guy who had sapped me was now at the wheel of the car. I recognized Spencer.

“It’s a frame, is it?” Big Pete Mosko had come up from downstairs and was standing behind me, spitting out pieces of his cigar. “If I’da know what those dirty rats would pull on me—he was working with Spencer to trim me —”

“You did know,” I reminded him.

“Did I?”

“Sure. Remember what the fortune-telling card said? Told Rico, ‘YOU WILL WIN WITH RED’, didn’t it?”

“But Rico was winning with both colors,” Mosko yelled. “It was that dog Spencer who let him win.”

“That’s what the card said,” I told him. “What you and I forget is that ‘Red’ is Spencer’s nickname.”

We went back inside because there was nothing else to do—no way of catching Rico or Spencer without rough stuff and Mosko couldn’t afford that. Mosko went back to the tables and took the suckers for a couple hours straight, but it didn’t make him any happier.

He was still in a lousy temper the next morning when he cut up the week’s take. It was probably the worst time in the world to talk to him about anything—and that’s, of course, where Tarelli made his mistake.

I was sitting downstairs when Tarelli came in with Rosa and said, “Please, Meestair Mosko.”

“Whatcha want?” Mosko would have yelled it if Rosa hadn’t been there, looking cool and sweet in a black dress that curved in and out and in again.

“I want to know if Rosa and I, we can go now?”

"Go?"

"Yes. Away from here. Into town, to stay. For Rosa to get job, go to school nights maybe."

"You ain't goin' no place, Tarelli."

"But you have what you weesh, no? I feex machines. I make for you the marvelous scale of fortune, breeng you luck—"

"Luck?" Rosa or no Rosa, Mosko began to yell. He stood up and shoved his purple face right against Tarelli's button nose. "Luck, huh? You and your lousy machine—in one week it kills my best wheel man, and lets another one frame me with Rico for over seven grand! That's the kind of luck you bring me with your magic! You're gonna stick here, Tarelli, like I say, unless you want Uncle Sam on your tail, but fast!"

"Please, Meestair Mosko—you let Rosa go alone, huh?"

"Not on your life!" He grinned, then. "I wouldn't let a nice girl like Rosa go up into town without nobody to protect her. Don't you worry about Rosa, Tarelli. I got plans for her. Lotsa plans."

Mosko turned back to the table and his money. "Now, blow and lemme alone," he said.

They left. I went along, too, because I didn't like to leave Rosa out of my sight now.

"What is this all about, Father?" Rosa asked the question softly as we all three of us sat in Tarelli's little room.

Tarelli looked at me and shrugged.

"Tell her," I said. "You must."

So Tarelli explained about being here illegally and about the phoney roulette wheels.

"But the machine—the scales of fortune, what do you mean by this?"

Again Tarelli looked at me. I didn't say anything. He sighed and stared down at the floor. But at last, he told her.

A lot of it I didn't understand. About photo-electric cells and mirrors and a tripping lever he was supposed to have invented. About books with funny names and drawing circles in rooster blood and something called evocations or invocations or whatever they call it. And about a bargain with Sathanas, whoever that is. That must have been the magic part.

I guessed it was, because of the way Rosa acted when she heard it. She turned pale and began to stare and breathe funny, and she stood up and shook Tarelli's shoulders.

"No—you did not do this thing! You couldn't! It is evil, and you know the price—"

"Nigromancy, that ees all I can turn to to get you here," Tarelli said. "I do anytheeng for you, Rosa. No cost too much."

"It is evil," Rosa said. "It must not be permitted. I will destroy it."

"But Mosko, he owns the machine now. You cannot—"

"He said himself it brought bad luck. And he will never know. I will replace it with another scale, an ordinary one from the same place you got this. But your secret, the fortune-telling mechanism, must go."

"Rosa," I said, "you can't. He's a dangerous customer. Look, why don't you and your old man scram out of here today? I'll handle Mosko, somehow. He'll be sore, sure, but I'll cool him off. You can hide out in town, and I'll join you later. Please, Rosa, listen to me. Look, kid, I'll level with you. I'm crazy about you. I'll do anything for you, that's why I want you to go. Leave Mosko to me."

She smiled, then, and stared up into my eyes. She stood very dose and I could smell her hair. Almost she touched me. And then she shook her head. "You are a good man," she said. "It is a brave thing you propose. But I cannot go. Not yet. Not while that machine of evil still exists. It will bring harm into the world, for my father did a wicked thing when he trafficked with darkness to bring it into being. He did it for me, so I am in a way responsible. And I must destroy it."

"But how? When?

"Tonight," Rosa said. "Tomorrow we will order a new scale brought in. But we must remove the old one tonight."

"Tarelli," I said. "Could you put the regular parts back in this machine if you take out the new stuff?"

"Yes."

"Then that's what we'll do. Too dangerous to try a switch. Just stick the old fortune-telling gimmick back in and maybe we can get by for a while without Mosko noticing. He won't be letting anybody near it now for a while, after what happened."

"Good," said Tarelli. "We find a time."

"Tonight," Rosa repeated. "There must be no more cursed fortunes told."

But she was wrong.

IV

SHE was wrong about a lot of things. Like Mosko not having any use for the fortune-telling scales, for instance. He lied when he told Tarelli the machine was useless.

I found that out later the same afternoon, when Mosko cornered me upstairs in the bar. He'd been drinking a little and trying to get over his grouch about the stolen money.

"I'll get it back," he said. "Got a gold mine here. Bigges' gold mine inna country. Only nobody knows it yet but you and me." He laughed, and the bottles rattled behind the bar. "If that dumb guy only could figure it, he'd go crazy."

"Something worked up for the fortune-telling?" I needled.

"Sure. Look, now. I get rich customers in here, plenty of 'em. Lay lotsa dough onna line downstairs. Gamblers, plungers, superstitious. You see 'em come in. Rattling lucky charms and rabbits-foots and four leaf clovers. Playin' numbers like 7 and 13 on hunches. What you think? Wouldn't they pay plenty for a chance to know what's gonna happen to them tomorrow or next year? Why it's a natural, that's what—I can charge plenty to give 'em a fortune from the scales. Tell you what, I'm gonna have a whole new setup just for this deal. Tomorrow we build a new special room, way in back. I got a pitch figured out, how to work it. We'll set the scales up tomorrow, lock the door of the new room, and then we really operate."

I listened and nodded, thinking about how there wasn't going to be any tomorrow. Just tonight.

I did my part. I kept pouring the drinks into Mosko, and after supper he had me drive him into town. There wasn't any play on the wheels on Monday, and Mosko usually hit town on his night off to relax. His idea of relaxation was a little poker game with the boys from the City Hall—and tonight I was hot to join him.

We played until almost one, and I kept him interested as long as I could, knowing that Rosa and Tarelli would be working on the machine back at the tavern. But it couldn't last forever, and then we were driving back and Big Pete Mosko was mumbling next to me in the dark.

"Only the beginning, boy," he said. "Gonna make a million off that scales. Talk about fortunes—I got one when I got hold of Tarelli! A million smackers and the girl. Hey, watch it!"

I almost drove the car off the road when he mentioned the girl. I wish I had, now.

"Tarelli's a brainy apple," Mosko mumbled. "Dumb, but brainy—you know what I mean. I betcha he's got some other cute tricks up his sleeve, too. Whatcha think? You believe that stuff about magic, or is it just a machine?"

"I don't know," I told him. "I don't know nothing about science, or magic, either. All I know is, it works. And it gives me the creeps just to think about it—the scales sort of look at you, size you up, and then give you a payoff. And it always comes true." I began to pitch, then. "Mosko, that thing's dangerous. It can make you a lot of trouble. You saw what it did to Don, and what happened to you when Rico had his fortune told. Why don't you get rid of it before something else happens? Why don't you let Tarelli and Rosa go and forget about it?"

"You going soft inna head?" Mosko grabbed my shoulder and I almost went off the road again. "Leave go of a million bucks and a machine that tells the truth about the future? Not me, buddy! And I want Tarelli, too. But most of all I want Rosa. And I'm gonna get her. Soon. Maybe—tonight."

What I wanted to do to Big Pete Mosko would have pinned a murder rap on me for sure. I had to have time to think, to figure out some other angle. So I kept driving, kept driving until we pulled up outside the dark entrance to the tavern.

Everything was quiet, and I couldn't see any light, so I figured whatever Rosa and Tarelli had done was finished. We got out and Mosko unlocked the front door. We walked in.

Then everything happened at once.

I heard the clicking noise from the corner. Mosko heard it, too. He yelled and grabbed at something in the dark. I heard a crash, heard Tarelli curse in Italian. Mosko stepped back.

"No you don't!" he hollered. He had a gun, the gun had a bullet, the bullet had a target.

That's all.

Mosko shot, there was a scream and a thud, and then I got the lights on and I could see.

I could see Tarelli standing there next to the scales. I could see the tools scattered around and I could see the queer-looking hunk of flashing mirrors that must have been Tarelli's secret machinery. I could see the old back of the scales, already screwed into place again.

But I didn't look at these things, and neither did Mosko and neither did Tarelli.

We looked at Rosa, lying on the floor.

Rosa looked back, but she didn't see us, because she had a bullet between her eyes.

"Dead!" Tarelli screamed. "You murder her!"

Mosko blinked, but he didn't move. "How was I to know?" he said. "Thought somebody was busting into the place. What's the big idea, anyhow?"

"Ees no idea. You murder her."

Mosko had his angle figured, now. He sneered down at Tarelli. “You’re a fine one to talk, you lousy little crook! I caught you in the act, didn’t I—tryin’ to steal the works, that’s what you was doing. Now get busy and put that machinery back into the scales before I blow your brains out.”

Tarelli looked at Mosko, then at Rosa. All at once he shrugged and picked the little box of mirrors and flashing disks from the floor. It was small, but from the way he hefted it I could tell it was heavy. When he held it, it hummed and the mirrors began to slide every which way, and it hurt my eyes to look at it.

Tarelli lifted the box full of science, the box full of magic, whatever it was; the box of secrets, the box of the future. Then he smiled at Mosko and opened his arms.

The box smashed to the floor.

There was a crash, and smoke, and a bright light. Then the noise and smoke and light went away, and there was nothing but old Tarelli standing in a little pile of twisted wires and broken glass and tubes.

Mosko raised his gun. Tarelli stared straight into the muzzle and grinned.

“You murder me too now, eh? Go ’head, Meestair Mosko. Rosa dead, the fortune-telling maching dead, too, and I do not weesh to stay alive either. Part of me dies with Rosa, and the rest—the rest was machine.”

“Machine?” I whispered under my breath, but he heard me.

“Yes. Part of me went to make machine. What you call the soul.”

Mosko tightened his finger on the trigger. “Never mind that, you crummy little rat! You can’t scare me with none of that phoney talk about magic.”

“I don’t scare you. You are too stupid to un’rstand. But before I die I tell you one theeng more. I tell your fortune. And your fortune is—death. You die too, Meestair Mosko. You die, too!”

Like a flash Tarelli stooped and grabbed the wrench from the tools at his feet. He lifted it and swung—and then Mosko let him have it. Three slugs in a row.

Tarelli toppled over next to Rosa. I stepped forward. I don't know what I'd of done next—jumped Mosko, tried to kill him with his own gun. I was in a daze.

Mosko turned around and barked. "Quit staring," he said. "Help me clean up this mess and get rid of them, fast. Or do you wanna get tied in as an accessory for murder?"

That word, "murder"—it stopped me cold. Mosko was right. I'd be in on the deal if they found the bodies. Rosa was dead, Tarelli was dead, the scales and their secret was gone.

So I helped Mosko.

I helped him clean up, and I helped him load the bodies into the car. He didn't ask me to go along with him on the trip, and that was good.

Because it gave me a chance, after he'd gone, to go to the phone and ring up the Sheriff. It gave me a chance to tell the Sheriff and the two deputies the whole story when they came out to the tavern early in the morning. It gave me a chance to see Big Pete Mosko's face when he walked in and found us waiting for him there.

THEY collared him and accused him and he denied everything. He must of hid the bodies in a good safe place, to pull a front act like that, but he never cracked. He denied everything. My story, the murders, the works.

"Look at him," he told the Sheriff, pointing at me. "He's shakin' like a leaf. Outta his head. Everybody knows he's punchy. Why the guy's off his rocker—spilling a yarn like that! Magic scales that tell your fortune! Ever hear of such a thing? Why that alone ought to show you the guy's slug-nutty."

Funny thing is, I could see him getting to them. The Sheriff and his buddies began to give me a look out of the corner of their eyes.

"First of all," said Mosko, "There never was no such person as Tarelli, and he never had a daughter. Look around—see if you can find anything that looks like we had a fight in here, let alone a double murder. All you'll see is the scales here. The rest this guy made up out of his cracked head."

"About those scales—" the Sheriff began.

Mosko walked over and put his hand on the side of the big glass dial on top of the scales, bold as you please. "Yeah, what about the scales?" he asked. "Look 'em over. Just ordinary scales. See for yourself. Drop a penny, out comes a fortune. Regular stuff. Wait, I'll show you."

WE ALL looked at Mosko as he climbed up on the scales and fumbled in his pocket for a penny. I saw the deputies edge closer to me, just waiting for the payoff.

And I gulped. Because I knew the magic was gone. Tarelli had put the regular works back into the scales and it was just an ordinary weighing machine, now. HONEST WEIGHT, NO SPRINGS. Mosko would dial a fortune and one of the regular printed cards would come out.

We'd hidden the bodies, cleaned up Tarelli's room, removed his clothes, the tools, everything. No evidence left, and nobody would talk except me. And who would believe me, with my crazy guff about a magic scales that told the real future? They'd lock me up in the nut-house, fast, when Mosko got off the scales with his fortune told for a penny.

I heard the click when the penny dropped. The dial behind the glass went up to 297 pounds. Big fat Mosko turned and grinned at all of us. "You see?" he said.

Then it happened. Maybe he was clumsy, maybe there was oil on the platform, maybe there was a ghost and it pushed him. I don't know. All I know is that Mosko slipped, leaned forward to catch himself, and rammed his head against the glass top.

He gurgled once and went down, with a two-foot razor of glass ripping across his throat. As he fell he tried to smile, and one pudgy hand fumbled at the side of the scales, grabbing out the printed slip that told Big Pete Mosko's fortune.

We had to pry that slip out of his hands—pry it out and read the dead man's future.

Maybe it was just an ordinary scale now, but it told Mosko's fortune, for sure. You figure it out. All I know is what I read, all I know is what Tarelli's scale told Mosko about what was going to happen, and what did happen.

The big white scale stood grinning down on the dead man, and for a minute the cracked and splintered glass sort of fell into a pattern and I had the craziest feeling that I could see Tarelli's face. He was grinning, the scale was grinning, but we didn't grin.

We just pried the little printed slip out of Big Pete Mosko's hand and read his future written there. It was just a single sentence, but it said all there was to be said . . .

"YOU ARE GOING ON A LONG JOURNEY."

Tooth and Consequences

A good dentist can always fill a tooth. But how would he fix molars that weren't even there?

DOCTOR KING rose to his feet abruptly. His lonely vigil as night physician in the clinic was interrupted by a curious sound. A very curious sound. A clicking sound.

Harry Spencer stood in the doorway. He was the young dentist from the office down the hall. King knew him well, but now he stared curiously, wondering if Spencer had a pair of dice in his hand.

No dice. But Spencer moved slowly into the office, a look of dismay on his usually cheerful face.

"Do you hear that noise, Doctor?"

"Yes," said King. "Sort of a clicking, isn't it?"

"Clicking, hell!" gasped Harry Spencer. "That's my teeth chattering!"

"A dentist with chattering teeth," chuckled King. "That's a novelty." But his eyes held no smile as he scrutinized the agitated Spencer.

"Sit down—I'll get you a drink," he promised. And he did. Spencer gulped the whiskey gratefully. His teeth now clicked only against the glass.

"Better?"

"Much better, thank you. But Doctor—I didn't come in here for a drink. I need your help."

"Suppose you tell me the story," King suggested.

Spencer shrugged. “You may think I’m crazy. I wonder myself. But—you asked for it.”

King sat back as the young dentist began to speak.

“I had only one patient tonight. He came in about an hour ago. I’d dozed off in my chair, and when I looked around, this stranger was standing in front of me, smiling. He was a tall, dark man.”

“Mae West type, eh?”

“You wouldn’t joke about this guy if you saw him, Doctor. Or heard him talk. He looked—funny to me. Oh, nothing I could put my finger on. Just that he made me nervous, because he was so calm, so deliberate, so cold.

“He said his name was Vonier. Claimed to be a mill-worker. He was off the job at night, and he heard about the clinic so he came here to get some cavities filled.”

“What’s wrong with that?” asked King.

“Nothing. But he had a few ideas on how he wanted to be treated. He refused to fill out a patient’s card with his name and address. He said that if he could Come to me twice a week with no questions asked, he’d pay double for my work.”

“Just an eccentric,” King commented.

“Perhaps. But that no questions asked idea—that’s bad. I realized that the minute I got him into the chair and took a look at his mouth. Then I wanted to ask questions.” Spencer shuddered.

“I wanted to ask him why his teeth were so large. So abnormally developed. Particularly the biting teeth.” Spencer shuddered.

King smiled. “Little Red Riding Hood and her grandmother?” he suggested.

“I told you it sounds crazy,” Spencer murmured. “But there was nothing funny about that stranger’s teeth.

Like the fangs of a wolf, or a dog. That’s what they were, I tell you! Fangs. Fangs in the throat of a stranger with cold, deep eyes.”

“Have you been having trouble with your nerves recently?” asked King, smoothly.

"No—but I will have from now on. You see, I haven't told you the worst part yet. The part that made my own teeth misbehave.

"After I took my first inspection I got my hand-mirror to examine a bicuspid. I thrust it into his mouth for a back view."

"Go on."

"I put it into his mouth to see the reflection—and there was nothing there!"

"Nothing?"

"No reflection at all! It may sound foolish, but have you any idea of how horrible it was at the time? You do the natural thing and get the unnatural. Like—like turning on your cold water faucet and having a snake wriggle out.

"I backed away from the chair and told him to go away. Told him to come back tomorrow night—I wasn't feeling well. He just smiled and left, because he could see it was true. I wasn't feeling well at all. That's why I ran down the hall to you."

Doctor King grunted. Then he went to work.

"Hallucinations, eh?" he mumbled, as he helped remove Spencer's shirt. "Dizzy spells," he commented, busying himself with a stethoscope. "Delusions," he chanted, applying arm-bands.

Then—"Aha, just as I thought! Nothing wrong with you at all Spencer, except perhaps a little high blood pressure. Here—take these. Three a day, one after every meal. Ought to fix you up perfectly."

"What are they?"

"Garlic pills. Perfectly harmless. Now, don't worry. Come in again at the end of the week. You ought to come around nicely if you'll just forget this little incident."

Spencer thanked him, pocketed his pills, and left the office. King had given him back his courage, and his pills were easy to swallow. His advice, though—that wasn't easy to swallow.

Spencer did his best to forget, but that night he had a dream. It was a dream about a stranger with deep dark eyes, and long, pointed teeth. The teeth chattered, and Spencer woke up and listened to the clicking in his own mouth.

HARRY SPENCER breezed into Doctor King’s office with a hearty, “Hello, Doc!”

“Well, how’s it going?”

“Swell. No trouble at all.”

“Glad to hear it. No more—spells.”

“Not at all. This Vonier fellow came in again this evening. I examined his teeth with the mirror.”

“Reflection O.K.?”

“Of course. Say, Doc, I must have sounded like a fool when I came babbling in the other night.”

“Nonsense. I appreciate your little problem. Now, perhaps, you can help me with one of mine.”

“Certainly—what’s up?”

“Nothing much. But maybe you could help me. It seems something has happened to our blood plasma stores.”

“Your what?”

“You know we keep canned blood for transfusions here at the clinic. In case of factory accidents at the mill. Well, during the last week they tell me some of the cans have been disappearing.”

“Stolen?”

“Apparently. And at night. There’s plenty of staff people on duty all day, but in the evenings there’s no one here in the clinic but you and myself. The refrigerator is down in the annex corridor. Haven’t noticed anyone prowling around, have you?”

Spencer shook his head.

“No. But that’s funny. Stealing cans of blood. Could it be a practical joke?”

King turned to his desk as he spoke. “No—I don’t think so. You see, I found one of the cans outside in the alley last night. It had been ripped open. Here, take a look. Tell me what you think.”

He held out the gleaming metal container to Spencer.

Spencer stared at the corrugated edges of the can for a long moment.

“Somebody has been feeding wolfhounds,” he said. “There are toothmarks on this can.”

“Thought so,” said King. “Well, there’s nothing to worry about. I’m putting a new lock on the refrigerator.”

“No,” said Spencer, edging out of the office. “Nothing to worry about at all.”

But on the way home he worried, just the same.

During the last week, blood had disappeared.

During the last week, Vonier had come to the clinic.

The long arm of coincidence?

Granted. The long arm of coincidence might sweep away a few cans of blood. But the long arm of coincidence didn’t have any teeth in it. Teeth, biting into can tops. Long, pointed teeth, like the ones in Vonier’s mouth.

The following evening Spencer took a look at those long, pointed teeth again.

Vonier came in quietly, sat down in the chair. Spencer tried to smile professionally as he produced his mirror and made his inspection.

Then he gulped.

The mirror thrust in Vonier’s mouth showed nothing, again. Nothing at all.

He went dizzy, for a moment, because he remembered there was a new lock on the refrigerator down the hall. And now there was no reflection in the mirror.

Vampires have no reflections.

After drinking blood, after absorbing the humanity of blood, they might become normally visible in mirrors for a short time. Vonier, sneaking in and ripping open cans with his teeth; drinking deep. Then coming into the office for dental work. Once before he had missed, somehow, and there had been no reflection. Now the refrigerator was locked, and again there was no reflection.

SPENCER stared down into the thin, pale face in the chair. His mind whirled as he stepped back. He nicked his thumb accidentally as one hand brushed the instruments on his table.

“You’ll—you’ll have to excuse me,” he murmured. “Another spell, I’m afraid. You’d better come in again tomorrow.”

The tall, dark man smiled, shrugged, arose from the chair.

Spencer couldn’t help it. He sat down, closed his eyes. He heard Vonier’s footsteps across the floor. His eyelids flickered momentarily—but he saw.

He saw Vonier bending over the white tile table, his head darting like a serpent’s to the spot where the tiny red jet lay. His tongue lapped—and then Vonier grimaced with a look of curious pain.

Spencer sat there, trying to control his shudderings as Vonier left the room.

Now it couldn’t be denied.

The dark stranger with the long teeth, the bad teeth, was a vampire.

Abnormal teeth because of an abnormal diet. Why not?

It explained the decay, too. There was another explanation for the decay—an explanation involving sleeping all day in a terrible way. In a coffin, packed in grave-earth, hidden somewhere in the city, Vonier, who came only at night. Who drank blood from cans. Whose reflection vanished when he had no nourishment.

“The blood is the life.”

Of course he wouldn’t allow his teeth to be pulled! A toothless vampire?

Naturally he wouldn’t give his address. If Spencer tracked him down by day he knew what he’d find.

Certainly he had to grimace when he encountered the spot of Spencer’s blood. Spencer was taking garlic pills, and vampires cannot endure garlic.

Some authorities—Spencer shuddered when he thought of a demonolatrist as an authority!—said that garlic killed vampires. Why should it have such an effect?

Well, why is an allergy?

So there it was.

Spencer didn't sleep that night. Early in the morning he went down to the public library. He wanted to read certain books.

About silver bullets and stakes through hearts, and crucifixes and holy water.

About bodies that decay not in the tomb, and rest not.

About things that never die, that walk by night and drink deep from the throats of men.

About sunset to sunrise and pointed fangs and the legends of all nations in all times.

Early that evening he went in to Doctor King's office. He didn't have the courage to speak. King would accuse him of madness, in the stupid, melodramatic way in which people actually do accuse others of madness. The police would do nothing, and Spencer must keep still, keep the lock on the refrigerator door, keep thinking.

Doctor King gave him something to think about, all right.

"I'm out of those garlic pills right now, Spencer. Get another batch in Monday, I expect. It won't hurt you to wait a few days, I guess."

He guessed.

No garlic pills. No garlic in the bloodstream. And a hungry vampire!

Spencer backed out of the office, hurried down to his own quarters. "I must keep that refrigerator locked," he whispered. "I must. What if there's an accident and they need blood in a hurry and it's gone?"

Yes. But—what if Vonier is hungry and goes for your neck?

There was a solution to this problem, Spencer realized. He could run like hell.

He opened his office door with that resolve.

And the vampire walked in.

VONIER was tall, dark, thin.

That’s the way vampires are supposed to be—but so are a good third of all normal males.

Vonier was a foreigner with an accent. But there are many such in a mill town.

Vonier was pale. But Spencer was even paler, just now.

Now, it wasn’t height, weight, complexion or accent that marked the vampire for what he was. It wasn’t even the teeth, or the peculiar faded quality of his dark suit.

It was something about his lips. Lips that were thin, yet full. A paradox, unless you saw it. Lips that were used too much in partaking of nourishment, and became overly developed.

And of course, Vonier’s eyes remained. Remained, staring sightlessly in death for twelve hours out of every twenty-four. Staring sightlessly at—what? No wonder they were dark and deep and knowing. No wonder they glared in hunger greater than human hunger. How long had they stared and hungered? How old was this creature?

Vampires are ageless and deathless until stake or silver strike their hearts into corruption. How many throats had been ripped before this thing discovered the blood transfusion cans in the refrigerator? How many would be ripped again, now that the cans were protected by a stout lock? And how soon?

Very soon, Spencer thought, unless he could act. For Mr. Vonier was quite pallid tonight. He was slow in his movements, almost drunkenly deliberate. Only his eyes were quick. Quick and hot, as they gazed at the dentist’s throat with a desire he had never seen in human eyes before. An unimaginable desire.

“You’re—late,” Spencer choked out.

“I was held up,” Vonier answered, with a little smile. “I had to do some shopping.”

Shopping. That’s what you do when you’re hungry.

“Well, let’s get started.”

Vonier slid into the chair.

“What must you do tonight, Doctor?”

Spencer’s voice trembled. He had to put this over. He had to.

“I’m afraid, Mr. Vonier, that some of those teeth must come out. If you’ll let me make a cast of your mouth now—just a wax impression—I can tell you in a jiffy where the trouble is.”

“Please, no. I am very sensitive. I do not wish for you to place anything in my mouth.”

What? No nice little plaster of paris cast that Spencer had worked on? No nice little plaster of paris cast, treated with liquid air, to harden immediately in the vampire’s mouth and clamp his teeth together forever?

That was a disappointment.

But there was plan number two. Spencer’s voice mastered a tremor. “Still, you’ll have to have a few extractions. Those lower left molars are pretty bad.”

“I do not wish—”

“I’m the Doctor! I’ll give you gas, so it won’t bother you. Those teeth are probably dead, anyway.”

Dead.

Vonier smiled, but Spencer didn’t like it. He got the gas going, fumbled with the tube and cone.

“Breathe deeply.”

Do dead men breathe?

The gates of Hell closed. Eyelids fluttered down over them.

He—it—was sleeping.

Now! Spencer was stern. Sure, they’d call it murder. But he must chance it.

HE FUMBLED with the drill. Put in the new head. The long steel bit he’d bought specially. The steel bit that was like a sharp splinter. Sharp as a stake. A stake to drive into the heart.

The drill buzzed. Spencer fed more gas into the creature that lay all white and still under the cold blue light; lay like a slick and glassy corpse in the morgue. Fill it with gas, and then drive that drill home into the heart—

Pulses pounding, he guided the drill towards the rotten chest. One swift stab, now.

“Just a moment.”

The eyes flickered. Lightning. More lightning in the steel clutch of the long, cold hands.

“My teeth are not there, Doctor. You know that.”

“You know a lot more, too. Don’t you, Doctor?”

Vonier sat up. The smile was full now, the long fangs exposed.

“You know why the blood was stolen, don’t you? You know about my teeth, too. You know why your garlic kept me off last night. Isn’t that so, Doctor?”

“Y-yes.” Spencer said it the way men used to when the Inquisitors tightened the rack.

“Ah. Then don’t you know that one of—us—cannot be killed by poison, or bullet, or sword? That fire does not consume us when we walk, nor gas drug our senses?”

Spencer realized the truth too late. Much too late.

“Who has locked the refrigerator?” A soft voice. Soft as the clinging caress of a serpent. And as cold.

“I don’t know. The clinic doctors must have the key.”

“Get it for me tomorrow. You know why. I will have it or you will provide me with nourishment.”

“Garlic—” Spencer began. It took courage to say anything without screaming.

The vampire smiled. “I think not. Something has happened to your supply of garlic, hasn’t it?”

“How do you know?”

Mr. Vonier’s answer was quite dreadful. “The carnivorae, my dear Doctor, have a very acute sense of smell.”

The black-clad figure slid from the chair, moved towards the door. Then Vonier turned. Spencer looked into a haggard white face. There was hunger there—but for the first time he read something inherent in all starvation. A kind of pathos.

"I don't like this," Mr. Vonier said, softly. "You must believe that, Doctor. I was—normal—once. It's what psychiatrists might call a compulsion, you know. A compulsion. Something driving you.

"But that's beside the point, isn't it? You are not interested in the long years. The long nights. The longer days—"

Spencer stared, but Vonier regained his composure swiftly.

"I tried to fight it. I took blood from the cans, instead of in my regular way. But when you are denied food too long, you get hungry.

"Remember that. Give me the key tomorrow night—or I shall force my way to nourishment with my teeth. They are very sharp teeth, aren't they, Doctor? Good night."

The door closed.

Spencer didn't follow. He could have taken that last chance, trailed the vampire to its lair somewhere in the city, waited until daylight and entered with a stake.

But human beings are human beings. Sometimes they faint. Spencer did when the door closed.

IT WAS dawn when he came to.

Dawn—of the last day.

Spencer didn't waver. If it wasn't his neck tonight, it would be somebody else's neck. He had to protect the blood supply, for he had seen the injured workmen roll in, their families clustering about them in moaning groups. They could not be denied. There was no way out unless he could find it himself.

The priest couldn't help him. It was noon when Spencer went to Father Donnelly and gave him the refrigerator key to keep. He wanted to confess, but at the last moment he knew it would be no use. He just told Father Donnelly to keep the key for him.

He took a crucifix, too.

That might hold it off for a little while. The crucifix could not destroy, but like garlic, the shape held an allergy.

Then Spencer went home, took out his revolver, and began to mould a silver bullet.

The stake had failed. Garlic had failed. Gas had failed. Poison and fire wouldn't work. He couldn't pull the teeth or trap the mouth.

So mould a silver bullet.

Why should silver affect them? Perhaps it was the contact of silver with the blood stream. The blood circulates in 46 seconds. That is, in normal men. The physiology of vampires must be strange enough. Silver poisoned, silver might disturb elements of dead blood mingled with living blood.

The physiology of vampires . . .

Spencer believed in the silver bullet. He had to. It was the last resource of vampire legends and it had to work.

But it didn't.

Evidently legend was legend—legend from a day of rough pistols and muzzle-loaders. It was already dusk when Spencer realized he was beaten by ballistics. Mould and file as he would, the bullet wouldn't fit for firing.

And he had melted down the silver crucifix for the bullet!

It was the old story. Science against the Powers of Darkness, that sort of thing. And this time science had failed. Spencer smiled wryly. He wished he had the crucifix now. But with it or without it, he had his rendezvous to keep.

How he walked to the clinic he never knew. Every step was a battle. But Vonier would be there, and if he didn't show up, Vonier would stalk abroad. Stalk abroad and drink—

Spencer hurried in. No weapons now. He knew what this meant. He was walking the Last Mile when he went down the hall to his office.

He sat there counting the minutes. Silver bullets shooting into Time. Silver bullets and a silver key and a silver crucifix. 46 seconds, and the physiology of a vampire.

The door opened.

Vonier.

He didn't say anything. He didn't need to. Spencer read it in his eyes, read the hunger blazing there.

The smile in the pale face, the ageless face, was sardonic.

"I have two cavities to fill tonight, Doctor. One in my teeth and one in my stomach."

Spencer almost laughed. There was a jest—with teeth in it.

"Before we proceed, please, will you take a look at this one here? It's very painful."

Harry Spencer's most difficult patient climbed into the chair, and like an ordinary mortal, indicated a yellow fang. His long, talon-like finger fumbled in his mouth.

"Zhiz un eer."

Just another patient, indicating the source of his pain. Just another—

Spencer looked at the infected incisor. Enamel decay. Cavity. Against the roots, deep.

Fill the teeth of the creature that was to kill him? Anything! Just to stall, stall for time, stall against the question of where the key was. Perhaps the creature thought he had brought the key. Perhaps these last few moments might suggest a way out.

Harry Spencer was, after all, a professional man. He gave his patient's teeth a professional examination. He would give this tooth a professional filling.

"Lose the fear in routine. It's just another patient."

Spencer's brain mumbled to him, then shivered in fear as he looked into the deep eyes of Vonier, saw what waited there, what lurked in hunger.

HIS FINGERS didn't tremble as he drilled. How he longed to plunge that drill down the red throat—into the lungs from which welled an odour of unspeakable corruption! But it would do no good. Vampires do not die by steel.

His fingers didn't tremble as he turned away and compounded the filling.

But they did tremble as he packed it into the enlarged cavity. For a moment his pick slipped, and he cut a tiny nick in the gum of the creature as he finished the job. A little gout of blood welled, and Vonier winced in pain. But the filling was in place.

Vonier sat up. "There, now." His voice was hoarse with a hunger no longer concealed. "And now, Doctor—if you'll just hand over that key?"

He read the answer in Spencer's eyes, read it in Spencer's beaded forehead.

The vampire rose swiftly.

Arms wound about Spencer's body, tight as the grip of shrouds. Fingers like white worms writhed into Spencer's throat, bending him back.

Clothes smelling of grave-earth, a breath of carrion, and through it all the white face burning bright, bending closer. Spencer saw the yellow fangs gleam, saw the teeth descend to his neck.

He fought desperately—but Vonier held him as though he were a puppet with flailing arms. Vonier held him and the teeth descended.

Even at this last moment he could think about how long they were, and how sharp, and how they could sink into a throat and tear the life away.

The vampire ripped his head backwards, stabbed that mouth down into Spencer's neck—

And fell.

Spencer went down, too, when the grip was released. The creature was somewhere beneath him, groaning. Or was he? Groans died away, and Spencer stared at a litter on the rug.

Less than a minute since it had risen from the chair and gripped him. Less than a minute, and it was gone. Even the rotted clothing . . .

And it was less than a minute later that Doctor King walked into the room.

“Hello, Spencer. Just closed up the office for the night. Thought I’d drop in and see how you felt.”

Spencer was busily engaged with a broom, sweeping up a little pile of powdery dust on the floor.

“Had a patient tonight?” King asked.

Spencer nodded. “He’s gone though. Filled a tooth for him.”

He stooped and picked something gleaming from the dust at his feet.

“Funny thing—the filling seems to have dropped out when he left. Careless of me.”

“You’re a bad dentist, eh?” King chuckled.

“No,” said Spencer. He stared for a long moment at the tiny silver filling he held amidst the dust in his hand.

“No—I’d say I’m a damned good dentist, at that!”

Let's Do It My Way

Facing a ruthless foe is bad enough; but when your leader is a coward, if not worse . . . then what can you do?

LIEUTENANT RAK FENTON was master of the APOLLO when she slashed past the orbit of Mars, her jets flaring great yellow thrusts of power. For the faint span of time that the planet showed in the scope a cloud of memory blurred his mind. He knew the Low Canals of Mars too well, and memory laid its bleak hand across his heart.

Then the APOLLO was beyond. He set the controls on automatic, and turned toward his crew. Grimly he surveyed them. They were young and eager and as yet unaware of the true nature of their mission.

He said bluntly, “Effective today we go on three-quarter rations.”

“But—” The mate, Miller, forgot himself in surprise. Then he stopped the protest and said smartly, “Yes, Sir.” Smitty, the mechanic, and Wurtz, the radioman, stood with loose-jawed amazement, then stiffened themselves into resentful ramrods.

They were a good crew. The communications man, Wurtz, was as capable as any. Moreover, it was said that Smitty, the mechanic, could take two pipe cleaners and a welding torch and nurse a washtub around the triplanet route.

The three saluted, too smartly to be this far out in space, and turned back to their stations. Rak knew what they were thinking. It was as clear as if they had spoken: “The Lieutenant is afraid. The easiest mission of them all and already he’s lost his nerve.”

The easiest mission! Rak smiled grimly and stared at the visiscreen. They were nearing the Asteroid Belt and he pressed the buttons that energized the supplementary meteor repellers.

The screen showed the lights of a fleet of fisher ships, searching for the rare asteroid jewels. As the fishers hung near the edge of the Asteroid Belt Rak could see the tiny flashes of their rocket powered nets.

In some measure, the sight of the asteroids cheered him. The crew would be eager, seeing them, for Solo Maneuvers in the “Belt” were a patrolman’s joy. These maneuvers consisted normally of a month’s time, spent in weaving in and out among the asteroids, blasting the smaller fragments out of existence with quick bursts from the pom pom rays in the bow, or hiding behind some mile thick asteroid, then pouncing forth to blow some imagined enemy to bits. By Terra! That was sport. That was hunting fit for a spaceman.

And so their work began. In addition to keeping them on three quarter rations, Rak kept his crew in battle suits. They roamed the near edge of the asteroid belt for a week. At the end of that time the ship was like a hunting dog to his will.

He came upon two of his crew the eighth evening, without intent to eavesdrop. Wurtz was hunched down, smoking a pipe of fragrant Venusian tobacco, and Rak paused a moment, unnoticed, to savor the smoke.

He heard Smitty saying, “First three-quarter rations and now this damned haste. The Lieutenant will play things so safe he’ll get in a week early, with half his rations left. I hate to blast off with a man afraid to take chances.”

Wurtz took the pipe from his mouth. “I hear rumors of trouble with Mars. Could we be getting ready?”

Unwilling to listen longer, Rak moved; and when his motion caused them to look up in surprise, he said shortly, “You’re both wrong.” He singled out Wurtz for attention and added, “There’s a cargo of special equipment in the aft hold. Break it out and figure how to mount it. It’s mostly electronic and photoanalytic instruments.” He moved on, aware of their astonishment.

He was satisfied now. They were as ready as time permitted. He moved to the controls, and accelerated the ship outward, toward the outer fringe of the Belt. Then he rang the bell that summoned the crew.

LOOKING at the assembled crew, Rak could feel their distrust as if it had been a physical thing. Fie ordered quickly, “Make yourselves at ease, gentlemen. I suggest you sit down.”

When they were seated he said, “Your mission here is not the normal Solo Maneuver. Nothing could be farther from the truth. You were not told at the time of departure for routine security reasons. With the Martian unrest it has been doubly necessary to exercise care.” He broke off. Miller, the mate, was staring wide-eyed, past his right shoulder. He turned quickly, seeing the visiscreen. In the upper corner of the screen a space ship moved.

And what a ship! It was shaped like a truncated cone, as smooth as polished ebony. It was black, all black, and should have been invisible in the eternal night of space, except that a faint silver rim showed around it, like the silver at the dark edge of a cloud, outlining it in weird and awesome beauty. No triplanet ship looked like that.

A chill unease filled the room. Rak smiled grimly. “That ship is the reason for our presence here. You see on the screen the strange ship mentioned in the last intelligence summary. Gentlemen, that ship is an Alien.”

He could hear Smitty suck in his breath, then silence fell again. Wurtz stared at the screen, fascinated. Rak said harshly, “Our mission is to use our photo- and wave-analyzers on that Alien ship, and to use them at the time the Alien is using her own weapons.” Stunned, the crew seemed rooted to the ship’s floor.

Rak said coldly, “The odds are not so great as you might think. We have perhaps one chance in a hundred. Let me review the facts as we have them:

"We are not at war with the Alien. She is not likely to fire at us unless fired upon, or until we attempt to photoanalyze her. No communication with the Alien has been established. The life form is unknown.

"Our speed and maneuverability, using the Harkness Accelerator, is much greater than that of the Alien. We can successfully run away. The report of the first contact proves that.

"The screens of the Alien are proof against any weapon mounted on this ship. They are not proof against planetary-based weapons. The first Alien ventured near Terra after the brush with our patrol ships. She failed to answer challenge, and was destroyed.

"The Alien's weapon is a strange vibratory ray which will penetrate our defenses. If we are under that enemy ray as long as ten seconds you and I and this ship will be nothing but glowing dust.

"The range of our detectors is far greater than that of the Alien," Rak concluded. "Are there questions, gentlemen?"

There were no questions. The task was impossible; they all knew that. They had to approach closely an invulnerable ship, draw the fire of a weapon against which they had no defense, photoanalyze the ship and weapon, and get away.

Smitty said, quickly, "Look! There's another ship, a Martian spacer. The kind important officials use." The Martian ship showed on the far corner of the screen. That meant the APOLLO, the Martian and the Alien were all some hours apart.

Rak said quickly, "Plot me all courses as quickly as you can. If that Martian ship is to come into detector range of the Alien, we must warn her."

Miller began the problem at the calculators. Rak sat at the screen watching the Martian ship grow. From the type of ship it was obvious that some important figure was aboard.

Miller said swiftly, "The two courses will come within forty-three Rudd units of each other. That should be well within range of even crude detectors. Our own course will intersect the Martian somewhat sooner."

Rak thought rapidly. Action, swift action, would be necessary. He ordered, “Get the crew in battle suits.

I’m going to use the Harkness Accelerator and intercept the Martian quickly. Wurtz, get them on the commo and make a rendezvous as soon as Miller can give you some co-ordinates.”

Then he moved to the locker and donned his own battle suit, a rubberlike creation designed to protect the body against the tremendous acceleration of the Harkness.

THE TENSION in Rak’s mind gave way to a feeling of satisfaction as the rendezvous with the Martian ship was accomplished without mishap. The Martian ship was the Phobos.

He took Wurtz with him, leaving Miller in charge of the APOLLO, and crossed to the Phobos in a space dory.

On the way Wurtz said thoughtfully, “The Phobos? Where have I heard that name?”

“It was in a telecast last week. She’s the official ship assigned to Urgan.”

Wurtz turned away and spat.

Rak said coldly, “Urgan’s position entitles him to be treated with respect, whatever your personal opinion. Also remember that no mention of the Alien as such should be made.”

They entered the lock of the Phobos, and minutes later were in the large command-and-instrument room of the Martian ship.

The captain of the ship was unimportant. Urgan was in control here and he left no doubt of that. His faint gray fur raised in anger and he roared at Rak in bitter Terran oaths. Rak could feel the anger rising in himself, felt the rigid stiffness of Wurtz beside him.

He said politely, “As you know, our patrol detector screens are much more sensitive than those of Martian ships. Your present course will bring you in contact with a contraterrene drift. I suggest you modify your course.”

“Contraterrene!” Urgan roared. He looked at Rak keenly and Rak wondered if he had really accepted the lie. He seemed more relieved than frightened. Rak wondered what devil’s work was in process. He studied the Martian for a moment.

Urgan, with some differences, might have well been a Terran man. He was a big, light-boned example of the Martian homo, covered entirely with a faint gray fur. His eyes were as hard and bright as black diamonds. Urgan was the speaker of the Martian assembly. His power in political circles was equalled by his notoriety along the Low Canals.

Urgan asked, “You were on Solo Maneuvers here in the Belt?”

Rak said shortly, “Yes.” Any other answer would have created a curiosity he wished to avoid.

“Good! Then as Speaker of the Martian Assembly I request that your ship accompany mine until this drift has passed beyond the asteroid belt. Obviously you have the equipment to safeguard us.”

RAK’S MIND whirled. He was neatly trapped. He wondered if the trap had been intentional, or had grown by chance out of his lie. If he refused Urgan he would create an incident, and draw curiosity as to his real mission. If he obeyed the request he would lose the Alien.

As he pondered he heard the Martian captain ask quickly, “Do you think that is wise?”

The question had been asked in one of the obscure dialects of the Low Canals. Rak held his face wooden as though he had not understood. In truth not ten earthmen would have known that tongue. Rak had grown up along the Low Canals, for he was the son of one of the first Martian colonists.

He knew the dialects, the rages, the mad-dog nature of the Low Canal tribes.

Urgan said swiftly, also in dialect. “Of course, what can these fools suspect? We can still get the jewels before The Day.”

Then Urgan was all smiles. He said in Terran, “Will you grant my request, Lieutenant?”

Rak said coldly, “You leave me little choice.” Unable to conceal his irritation he whirled and said, “Let’s go, Wurtz.”

He heard Urgan’s voice whispering after him in that dialect no Earthman was supposed to understand, “These Terran dogs. When I am Emperor such insolence will stop.”

Rak entered the lock with Wurtz beside him. Wurtz said bitterly, “Nursemaid to that piece of space jetsam. What do we do now, Lieutenant?”

Rak stared at the controls of the space dory. As a commander he should never let his crew know he was without a plan. He said, “I’ll let you know what to do when the time comes.”

He pressed the controls, and the dory leaped out of the lock across space to the APOLLO.

RAK’S MIND was still whirling as he arrived at his station back on the APOLLO. He believed he understood the basic elements of Urgan’s plan. Urgan planned a coup d’etat of the Martian government on The Day. For that day he would need money quick money. He had come to the Asteroid Belt to get it, in the form of the tremendously valuable jewels. Rak thought he knew how Urgan planned to get the jewels.

The Asteroid fishers were well armed with small arms. However if a ship like Urgan’s were to suddenly ray the after parts of a fisher ship, that would open the fisher like a plugged watermelon, and unless the persons inside happened to be in space suits—Rak shuddered. Of course detection of such a crime and armed pursuit would be inevitable. But if The Day were soon, as soon as Urgan returned, then the patrol would not be fighting a pirate, but would come against The Emperor of Mars. The entire Martian battle fleet would then protect him.

It was a desperate gamble, but Urgan was known to be without fear, and the rewards for success would be the whole of Mars.

All that evening Rak wrestled with the problem, and dreamed of it that night. When he awoke he was no nearer a solution. He was awakened by the rattling of the space locks, and he rose quickly.

A knock sounded on his door. Curious at this early visit, he called, “Come in.”

Urgan came in. He thanked Miller, who had shown him the way, then closed the door carefully and stood looking at Rak. Then he drew a needle gun and leveled it.

There was death behind that apparent nonchalance, Rak knew well.

Urgan said, in the Low Canal dialect, “I radioed the Martian Intelligence for a report on you. I understand you grew up along the Low Canals. That is unfortunate; you must have understood too much yesterday.”

Rak’s mind whirled, seeking some escape. His crew would be unsuspecting. A determined man could probably ray the three of them before they suspected treachery.

Rak said swiftly, also in the dialect, “A gardener does not break his spade. You have need for me.”

The needle ray did not waver. “What do you mean?”

“You will need space captains in the weeks to come, you will need commanders who are loyal—” Rak’s voice lowered, “loyal and ambitious.”

Urgan grinned. “You are a Lieutenant, you want to be a Captain, is that it?”

Rak understood that grin. It meant that Urgan was sure he was bluffing. He said bluntly, “I want to be a Colonel.”

That took the grin off of Urgan’s face and made him consider. Urgan said slowly, “Considering your birth place, I think I believe you. It is unfortunate that I cannot afford to take chances.” The needle ray aimed more carefully, and apprehension touched Rak with chill fingers. He said swiftly, fencing death with words, “About the jewels. You need those at once. You take quite a chance attacking the Asteroid fleet. I can show you how to avoid that chance.”

Urgan said softly, “Keep talking.”

“I was at the controls coming in. I saw a meteorite at the edge of the belt, a ruddy one like they found last year. You could see the edge of a jewel sticking out.”

Urgan laughed. “And you didn’t stop to try to pick it up? Do I look like a fool?”

“Should I have shared it with the crew? Why should I be so generous? I plotted its drift. On my watch last night while the crew was asleep I was going to pick it up. Then you asked us to stay on until the contraterrene drift had passed.”

Rak could see the Martian considering that. Urgan said slowly, “You were irritated by my request. I remember that.”

In his moment of hesitation Rak plunged forward, low and hard, his life riding on that surprise motion. He slashed at Urgan’s wrist with the edge of his hand. The needle ray fell from Urgan’s grip, and Rak put his foot on it. Urgan crouched, catlike, waiting to use his foot in a swift jaw breaking kick when Rak stooped for the weapon.

Rak said, “I can call for my crew. You know that.”

Urgan seemed to be weighing that. “Why don’t you call them?” he asked.

Rak smiled meaningfully, “I would, but you see, I want to be a Colonel.”

Urgan considered. The threat about the crew was true. “All right.” He took one step backwards, and seated himself. He smiled at Rak quietly, as if they had been discussing the latest telebook.

Rak picked up the gun. He said, “I’ll keep this,” then he drew a notebook from his pocket and began to copy something therein. He gave Urgan this copy saying, “The equation is that of the Asteroid’s path. As you can see there is only drift to consider.”

Urgan grunted and rose from the chair. He thrust the paper into a pocket of his clothing and asked, “How will you land the asteroid fragment. Have you a net?”

“No. I hoped to jockey alongside it and get it in the locks.”

"We have one net aboard. Suppose you follow us. After all, your ship is armed, and you have the Harkness Accelerator. If I planned to steal the jewel I could hardly run away."

"That makes sense," Rak agreed.

"And now, my weapon." Urgan extended his hand for the piece.

"Sorry."

Urgan's eyes showed the faintest flicker of disappointment. Rak knew what he had hoped. He had hoped to ray Rak, and his crew, now that he had the location of the jewel.

Urgan turned to go back to his ship. Rak followed, watching him until he had cleared his space dory out of the APOLLO'S lock.

When Rak returned to his cabin he found his crew waiting for his return.

Rak could feel their animosity as he waited for an explanation. Miller said, "As the crew of this vessel we have no right to demand an explanation of the master's actions. But as members of the patrol, we have the right to protect it from treachery. We ask you, therefore, to answer a few questions."

Rak asked coldly, "What questions?"

"When Urgan came aboard he had his hand on 'a concealed weapon. I stood by outside your cabin in case I might be needed. You talked in Low Canal, you argued and then you agreed. I could tell that much from the tone of your voices. Last night you talked in your sleep. When I came to awaken you for watch you were raving about stealing asteroid jewels and making emperors."

Miller leaned forward. His voice was filled with suspicion. "We all ask you, what is your connection with Urgan? What have you to do with theft and emperors?"

Time was running thin. The sands were slipping down the glass. Rak drew out Urgan's weapon and said, "Here is my connection with Urgan. Consider yourselves all under arrest, for insubordination."

The crew stared back at him with hard eyes. Miller said quietly, "You dirty traitor."

Rak ordered quickly, “Put your weapons on the table. Miller, take the crew and begin immediate search of the outside of this ship and the lock, and any place that Urgan could have reached. Search for any form of sabotage. Hurry now, for we may have only minutes.”

Then he thrust the captured weapons in his pockets and went out to take over manual control of the APOLLO.

The Phobos had already set out on the course that Rak had indicated. A chill wind blew over him. That meant Urgan was putting distance between them. Probably Urgan had left a Magno bomb somewhere in this ship.

He began to play a game of hare and hounds with the Martian ship, following by leapfrogging from the cover of one asteroid to another.

This navigation was doubly difficult because he had to be alert for treachery on the part of his own crew. They would mutiny if given the chance. He had their weapons, and the key to the arms room. However; in time they could break in and get weapons.

Rak’s stomach grew queasy. He wondered if it were the sudden changes in the ship’s course, or if it were the thought of the desperate gamble he was taking. He heard Miller’s feet behind him and whirled, hand on weapon.

Miller was puzzled. His attitude toward Rak was uncertain rather than dangerous. Miller said, “We found a magno bomb just outside the lock. I defused it.”

Rak smiled. “Good. Now get the crew into battle suits and to their stations.”

Puzzlement grew into wonder on Miller’s face. From long habit he said, “Yes, Sir.”

That posed another problem. Rak could not put on his own battle suit. As he donned the cumbersome suit he would be at the mercy of his suspicious crew, yet he would need the suit badly. If he had to use the Harkness Accelerator—He shuddered. He had seen bodies that had been unprotected against the Harkness.

He gave all his attention to this game of hare and hound he was playing. Tension grew in him. The time for action had come.

Behind him Miller reported, “Crew ready for action. I brought your suit, Sir.”

For the faint span of a moment Rak considered. Had the finding of the bomb and his present obscure action brought Miller back to loyalty? He would need the suit, no doubt of that.

And then the visiscreen resolved his doubt. The dark bulk that had filled the screen slipped away as they rounded the asteroid that had been momentary cover.

Miller’s breath was gasp of comprehension. Ahead of them the Phobos had swerved like a frightened hare.

She had, as Rak planned, intercepted the Alien. In the instant of sighting, Urgan had recognized that this was a trap, and the Martian ship swung broadside and let go all weapons in a coruscating flash of power. The Alien ship glowed in this power, undamaged, and aloof. A ray came out from the black ship, traveling slowly, so that the end of it could be seen, like a great fingertip reaching. It was an odd color, yellow green, like grass too long away from the sun, and it pulsed as it reached out. The reaching finger touched the Phobos then winked out. The Phobos was gone, yet her shape remained. Gases faintly phosphorescent, laid a ghostly outline against the inked background of space.

In that instant Rak turned on the Harkness. He felt as if a giant hand seized him, and crushed him until his chest was a million spears of pain. His voice shrill with unbearable agony, he screamed once before the blackness came.

Dimly, out of aeons of agony, light came to his eyes. He blinked up at the light, and set his teeth as pain twinged again. He could discern Miller above him; then he felt the touch of a needle in his shoulder, and drowsiness pushed against the pain, moving it back in a slow tide.

The second time he opened his eyes the pain had dropped into a gnawing background. He could see Miller this time, but was unable to speak.

Miller smiled down, answering the unspoken question. “You’ve been here a week. You’re in bad shape, but you’ll make it. We’re on the way to Base hospital.”

Rak struggled with the question, but the rawness of his throat would not let the words come. He begged Miller with his eyes.

Miller understood. He said, “Wurtz was at the analyzer when the Alien fired. We have everything, photographs, spectra, wave analyses, even some of the residue of the Phobos. Wurtz got it all, just before you used the Harkness. With luck our scientists will be able to figure out the Alien’s weapon and her screens.” Miller smiled, “Mission accomplished.” Then he thrust another needle into Rak’s arm, and drowsiness crept gradually back.

Dimly, Rak heard the voices of the crew at the door to his room. In the no man’s land of drowsiness he heard Smitty’s voice, and the words told him that he had done more than accomplish his mission. The words told him that now and forever, this was his ship and his crew.

“How is the skipper,” Smitty asked. “How’s the Old Man?”

THE END

Head Man

His name was Otto Krantz, and he was the greatest actor in Berlin. And was not Berlin the capital of the entire reasonable world?

He appeared before the public every day in the same drama, in the same role. Now, in 1937, it appeared as though the show might run forever, but no one seemed bored by his performance. And Otto Krantz did his best to keep it this way. He was never satisfied, but continued to rehearse and seek improvements in his part.

Take the matter of costume, for example. Krantz always appeared in evening clothes, but of a very simple cut. This sober garb was a surprising contrast, for many of the minor players wore gaudy uniforms or sought attention by wearing outlandish rags. But Krantz, after much study, realized his modest attire brought him more popular approval than the extravagant outfits of the others.

Again, the other actors were given to impassioned gestures as gaudy as their clothing. They shouted at the audience, they ranted, raved, wept, scowled, went into hysterics.

The spectators were never impressed. They much preferred the business-like approach of Otto Krantz, who said little but acted with the finesse of a master. He never played to the gallery. While on stage, he went through the "business" as if the audience didn't exist. For this reason, Krantz remained the most popular actor in Berlin, playing over and over again the selfsame role in the selfsame Comedy.

The Comedy was entitled The Third Reich.

The stage was the platform of the public executioner.

Otto Krantz filled the role of Official Headsman.

Each performance boasted a new supporting cast and a growing audience to cheer the Comedy on.

It was always the same. Every morning Krantz made his grand entrance in the bleak courtyard, instructed the new players in a stage whisper, and graciously conducted them to the center of the platform. With becoming modesty, the great actor allowed each a moment alone in the spotlight in which to receive the tribute of the spectators.

After this, the show proceeded swiftly. Capable assistants did the placing and the binding—but it was Otto Krantz who tested the straps, bowed politely to the military escort, and then raised the bright, shining blade of the headsman's axe from its place in a block of ice.

Then came the glorious moment of climax; the moment that never failed to move both the minor players and the crowd. And when it was over, Otto Krantz lifted the head from the basket and held it up to his applauding audience with an honest smile of workmanlike pride.

This happened not once, but as often as ten or a dozen times in a single morning. Yet Krantz never faltered, never grew tired, never missed a line or a cue.

A sneering Prussian of the old school, the sniveling young son of a lower-class family, a withered hausfrau or a rosy-cheeked beauty—all received the same efficient courtesy at the hands of the executioner; hands, that grew stained and red with the drops that fell as each head was lifted from the basket.

At the end of the performance, Otto Krantz bowed, retired, and washed his hands like a common laborer. Democratic, was the Official Headsman.

Outside of his public appearances, Krantz led a quiet life. A glass of schnapps when work was through, perhaps a little beer to wash down dinner at some humble bierstube; a stroll through the street to hear the news, and then home to the big upstairs room near SS District Headquarters. In the evening there might be a Party meeting to attend, or a summons notifying him of tomorrow's labors.

It was a simple existence, for Otto Krantz did not share the hysteria of the times. He served the Reich with no thought of personal pleasure or profit. Let others raise the rabble and bluster in public meetings. In his time, Krantz had cut short a good many of these speakers—cut them short by a neck. These days might bring honors to a wiser head—but many wiser heads fell into his basket.

Krantz was content. A year ago he had been a humble butcher. Since leaving the slaughterhouse for a public post, he had seen enough of the world and its ways, and had met many people. Officially, in the past year, he had met several thousand. Each acquaintance was of painfully short duration, but it was enough.

He had gazed into the faces of the best families of Germany. He had held those faces in his hands—those proud, proud faces that would never smile again. And he knew that the blue-bloods stained his axe with gore as red as that of the lowest thief.

So Krantz was content. Until, gradually, the faces came too fast. It was impossible to ignore them any longer. He felt himself becoming interested in them because they passed in such an endless variety before his eyes. For each face masked a secret, each skull held a story. Young, old, pure, debauched, innocent, guilty, foolish, wise, shamed, defiant, cringing, bold—ten a day, twenty a day, they mounted the platform and bent their necks to the yoke of Death.

Who were these people he conducted into eternity? He, a simple butcher, was shaping the destiny of Germany. Shaping it with the axe. What was the nature of that Destiny? These faces knew.

Krantz tried to find out. He began to peer more closely at each prisoner in turn. Without realizing it, he gazed deeper into dead eyes, felt the shapes of skulls, traced the texture of hair and skin.

One day after work he entered a bookstall and bought texts on phrenology and physiography. That had been two months ago and now he had gone farther in his speculations.

Now, when work was through, he went home quickly and threw himself down on the bed. With eyes closed he waited for the faces of the day to pass in review.

They came—pallid, noble faces molded in sadness or rage; three thousand death masks, and the end not yet! And with them came a message.

“You, Otto Krantz, are our Master! You are the most powerful man in the Reich. Not Hitler, not Goebbels, not Himmler or the others. You, Otto Krantz, hold the real power of life and death!”

At first, Krantz was afraid of such thoughts. But every day came a dozen new reminders, a dozen new faces to review in darkness, to remember, to relish.

To relish? But of course, it was a pleasure now. To be quiet. To dress in black. To wear a mask. To hide the secret thoughts and then come home to revel alone with three thousand memories!

For weeks now his memories had seemed to center around one particular moment—the moment when he held up the head and gazed into the face. Lately he had been forced to hold himself sternly in check as he did so, lest he betray his excitement. This was the supreme thrill, to hold the heads. If there was only some way to recapture that thrill, that sensation of power, at will! If only he could—

Steal the heads.

No. That was madness. If he were discovered, he would die. And for what? The foolish face of a gaping old wastrel?

Not that. Not a gray old head with a cruel, stupid face. It was not worth the risk. But there were other heads—strange heads of debauchees, golden heads of beautiful ladies that hung before him in dreams. These were worth possessing, worth the risk. To sit in his room and behold forever such symbols of his secret glory—there was a dream!

He must find a way, Krantz decided. It would be necessary to visit the condemned cells nightly, when the lists of execution were given out. Then he could inspect the crop and make his choices. He might make an arrangement with old Fritz, the scavenger who did the burials of all the unclaimed bodies. For a few marks Fritz would do anything. Then Otto Krantz could go home with a burlap bag slung over his shoulder. Nobody would be the wiser.

Krantz thought it all out carefully. He had to be careful, make sure no one suspected, for if they knew they would not understand. They might think he was crazy and shut him away. Then he wouldn't have his axe any more. He wouldn't be able to polish the heavy, gleaming blade every morning before work started. And he couldn't see the heads every day. That must not be permitted to happen.

So he was very careful the next few times he went to work. Nobody who noticed the tall, broad-shouldered man with the close-cropped mustache and bald head would suspect that behind his stern, impassive countenance there lurked a dream.

Even his victims didn't realize it when he stared at their faces each morning. Perhaps the black mask he wore helped to disguise the hideous intensity of his searching stare. It also concealed his disappointment.

For none of these traitors had the face that would satisfy him. None seemed to hold the symbol of power he desired. There was nothing but a succession of commonplace countenances. Krantz was disappointed, but he didn't give up.

He went to Gestapo headquarters one evening late in the week. He passed up the broad stairs and received the salute of the sentinel Troopers with the dignity befitting an official of the Reich. He had no trouble in the outer offices.

The man at the desk chuckled when he heard Krantz make his request.

"You want to see the list for tomorrow? Here, it's ready. Only seven of the swine, for high treason. You can probably do the job with one hand."

Otto Krantz didn't laugh. He spoke again, smoothly. "If you please, I should like to see the prisoners."

" See them?"

"Yes."

The man at the desk shrugged. “That is very irregular. I’m afraid you’d have to ask Inspector Grunert for permission.”

“But can’t you—?”

“One must obey orders, you know. Let me announce you.” The desk official buzzed the intercom, spoke briefly and then raised his head. “You may go right in,” he said, nodding toward the door behind him.

Krantz forced a rigid smile. He had to go through with this, carry it off. If only he could get permission, it would be easy to make further plans.

As he entered Inspector Grunert’s office, the rigid smile became suffused with incredulous delight. For there, sitting on the bench before the Inspectors desk, were the two prisoners he wanted—the answers to his prayers, his dreams.

Otto Krantz stared at them closely, noting with growing pleasure each detail of their faces.

The man was old, for only the old have long white hair. The man was young, for only the young have smooth, delicately pointed features unwrinkled by the years. The man was ageless, for only the ageless have great green glowing eyes that burn upwards from unthinkable recesses of the brain behind.

Then he looked at the other prisoner, the woman.

The woman was a wanton, for only wantons have wildly burnished locks that flow like flame above their brows. The woman was a saint, for only a saint has the white, ecstatic purity of a face transfigured by suffering. The woman was a child, for only a child has eyes that beam in beauty.

“ She is the woman I want,” droned the voice within Otto Krantz.

He couldn’t tear his eyes from them. The long white hair, the long red hair. The slim necks. The greenish glow of their eyes. Father and daughter? Father and daughter of Mystery. Creatures of another world, a world of dreams.

And tomorrow they would become his dreams. His to possess. Symbols of his power, the power of the headsman’s axe. These were the two he wanted. . . .

“Ah, Krantz, here you are.” Smiling, Grunert rose and extended a fleshy palm. “Just in time to meet two future clients.” The fat Inspector bowed sardonically in the direction of the prisoners. “Allow me to present Joachim Fulger and his daughter, Eva.”

They did not stir. Neither man nor girl looked at Otto Krantz. Their eyes rejected the presence of the Headsman, the Inspector, and the room itself.

Grunert chuckled. “Cool heads, eh?”

“ Wonderful heads,” purred the voice inside Otto Krantz, but his lips remained closed.

“Yes,” continued the Inspector. “One runs across all types in line of duty. Queer fish. Take these two specimens, for example.”

"I’m going to,” whispered the inner voice.

Grunert could not hear it as he went on. “What do you suppose these two have been doing?” he inquired. “You’ll never guess, so I’ll tell you. They just signed the confession, in case you don’t believe me.”

“What?” asked Otto Krantz, knowing it was expected of him.

“Practicing sorcery against the Reich—can you imagine such a thing in this day and age? Sticking pins in images of our Fuehrer Grunert scowled reflectively. “Their block leader got wind of it last month. Sounded fantastic, but he checked them just as a matter of routine. Everyone in the neighborhood seemed to know they were queer ones—selling love philtres, telling fortunes, and all that.

“But when the block leader dropped in to pay them a visit—all very pleasant, not in an official capacity or anything—this swine of a magician and his unnatural offspring put an ice pick into his throat!”

The two prisoners did not stir. Inspector Grunert nodded at Krantz and tapped his head significantly. “You see how it is,” he shrugged. “They could get the camp or a firing squad. But I decided the sorcery charge was the one to press. Make it high treason, I said. Herr Goebbels is always looking for a story—and here is a good example to set before those who work secretly against the Fuehrer.”

He rose and confronted the silent, unblinking pair. “Cool as cucumbers, aren’t they? But they cursed enough when we had them brought in, I can tell you! A few days here and they signed the confessions without a murmur.

“Crazy fanatics! Trying to kill men by sticking pins in photographs and dolls. Why, it’s barbaric!”

A laugh crawled up out of Joachim Fulger’s white throat. The voice that followed it was curiously disturbing.

“Do you hear, Eva, my child? We are barbaric, says this barbarian in his murderer’s uniform! He sits here in his torture chamber and explains our barbarism to the brutal savage whose axe will shear our heads from our necks tomorrow morning.”

Again, the laughter.

Otto Krantz watched it well out of the white throat. The axe would bite there—so—

The girl’s voice came now. “We are sorcerers, too, by his standards. But our magic is cleaner than the spells of these madmen with their chanting slogans, their howling worship of ancient gods. Our crime is that we have fought evil with evil, and apparently we have lost.

“But the day will come. Those who take the sword must perish by the sword; those that take whips shall die beneath them, and those who wield the axe will lie beneath it.”

The words moved Krantz until he remembered she was possessed; a witch, a lunatic. But she was beautiful. That long white throat—he’d strike it there—

“Let them rave,” Grunert chuckled. “But you wanted to see me about something, Krantz?”

“It does not matter. Some other time,” muttered the Headsman.

“Very well.” Grunert faced the prisoners. “You will meet Krantz again tomorrow morning. Perhaps then he can match your sharp tongues with something sharper. Eh, Otto?”

“Yes,” Krantz whispered. He couldn’t tear his eyes from them. The long white hair, the long red hair. The slim necks. The greenish glow of their eyes. Creatures from another world, a world of dreams. And tomorrow they would become his dreams. His to possess. Symbols of the power of the axe. These were the heads he wanted. . . .

Abruptly, Otto Krantz turned and stumbled out of the room. He had remembered a duty to perform. A most important duty. He had to get back to his room and begin.

It wasn’t until he busied himself at the vital task that Krantz permitted himself to feel the thrill of anticipation again. But then it could no longer be held back, and Otto Krantz grinned in glee as he sat in the darkness of his room and delicately sharpened the headsman’s axe.

2

“You want I should let you have the heads from those two bodies and bury the corpses secretly? Nein!”

Fritz the scavenger shook his head in bewildered but emphatic denial.

“But nobody has registered to claim the bodies. No one will know if you quicklime them with the heads or not,” Krantz wheedled.

“I cannot do this thing,” Fritz grumbled.

Otto Krantz smiled.

“Fifty marks in it for you,” he whispered. Fritz blinked. But still he shook his head.

“I can get you extra butter rations,” Krantz murmured. “I will talk to the District Leader tomorrow.”

Fritz sighed. “I would do it for you without pay,” he said. “But I cannot. You see, the Fulgers are not going to be beheaded after all.”

“What?” Krantz reacted with a shocked grimace. “But the Inspector himself told me—”

Fritz shrugged. “I have just come from Headquarters. It was decided to drop the sorcery charge as foolish. The murder charge was upheld. They will die early in the morning, before a firing squad. Shot, not beheaded.”

Then and only then did Otto Krantz realize how much the possession of those two heads meant to him.

He had come away from his room in the middle of the night, carrying his axe in its velvet case. He had scurried through the streets, his official evening dress gaining him free passage from any SS troopers encountered on the way. He had hurried here to the little room beneath the cell blocks where Fritz the scavenger dwelt. And all the while he had been hugging the thought of what was to come, gloating over the attainment of his goal. Now the opportunity had slipped away.

With it, something slipped in Otto Krantz ’s brain. He could feel it, the usurpation of his consciousness by that single pulsing urge. He couldn’t define the sensation. He knew only one thing—he must get those heads.

They hung before him in midair, those mocking twin faces. One with long white curls, one with red. They were laughing at his confusion, his dismay, his defeat.

His defeat? Never.

Krantz thought fast, spoke rapidly.

“It is still true that no one has claimed the bodies?”

“Yes, that is so.”

“Then after the Fulgers are shot, you will still take them to the lime vats?”

“I suppose.”

“Who has signed the papers for execution?”

“No one, of course. You remember. Inspector Grunert always does that when he arrives, first thing in the morning.”

Krantz rubbed his hands. “So no orders have actually been issued yet. No firing squad is appointed, no time has been set?”

“That is true.”

“Very well, then. Fritz, I offer a hundred marks to you for the heads.”

“But there will be no heads, I tell you—they’ll be shot.”

Krantz smiled. “No they won’t! I’m taking the Fulgers out to the yard right now. I’ll get the job over with before the official ceremony begins at dawn.”

“But the orders—”

“Who will know? I’ll tell Grunert I picked up the order along with the rest at his office and took the liberty of assigning a squad to do the job, just to save him the trouble. He’ll sign the order afterwards and forget about it. He’ll never bother to ask who did the shooting, and since the bodies are unclaimed, you can cart them away.”

“The risk, they’ll see you do it—”

“No one will see. I shall bring them here myself.”

“Here, to my room?”

“I’ll tidy it up again for you, my fastidious friend.”

“No, I won’t permit it. We’ll be caught!”

“Fritz!”

Krantz’s voice was very soft when he uttered the name. But his face was hard. His hands, his butcher’s hands, were harder as they closed about the throat of the old scavenger.

Fritz fell back, choking. “Yes—yes—but hurry. It’s nearly dawn now.”

Krantz hurried.

He picked up the necessary papers in the Inspectors office. He raced down the silent, night-lined halls to the cell blocks, located a blinking guard, and bawled orders to the surprised fellow in convincing tones.

“Where’s the escort?” the guard protested.

“Upstairs, waiting,” snapped Krantz.

“You’re going to take them up alone?”

“You saw the orders. Get the Fulgers for me. At once, dummkopf!”

Befuddled, the guard led him to the cell.

“ Raus!”

The Fulgers were waiting. Yes, they were waiting, and their green eyes gleamed in the murky dawn.

There was no trouble. They preceded Krantz up the stairs without a word. The Headsman followed, slamming the outer door in the guard’s face.

“This way,” said Otto Krantz. He indicated a door.

Fulger and his daughter obeyed. The outer halls were deserted and Krantz, with a pounding heart, knew that they would reach Fritz’s quarters without being seen.

They did.

Fritz had everything in readiness. He’d hauled out an extra block of ice, and the axe was imbedded deeply therein, to keep the edge sharp. He had set up the official block as well. The basket and sawdust were waiting. It was all done in the proper regulation manner, just as it would be outside. He handed Otto Krantz the Headsman’s mask.

Krantz donned it.

Joachim and Eva Fulger stood against the wall of the little room under the cell blocks and stared. The old man turned to Krantz.

“But the court decreed that we be shot,” he murmured. “Why the axe? And why here, inside? Where are the guards, where are the officials—”

The bony fingers of Otto Krantz raked across his mouth.

“Silence!”

Eva’s expression did not change. She merely opened her mouth a trifle and screamed.

Krantz stopped that. Her curls helped. Twisted expertly about her throat, they muffled further outcry.

Fritz had the old man kneeling now. He kicked the block into place.

Krantz drew the axe from the ice.

There was a deathly silence in the little room.

A deathly silence. . . .

“I warn you,” murmured Joachim Fulger. “As ye sow, so shall ye reap.” Krantz had a sharp retort for that. The axe—

The nightmare was over. Cleaning the room, hiding the bodies until they were ready for the lime, getting the burlap sack—Fritz tended to all that.

Otto Krantz appeared in the courtyard promptly at dawn, ready for his official duties. Grunert was there, and some others. The seven victims were led out. Krantz labored.

It was all a red blur. He plodded through his task mechanically now, as he had in the slaughterhouse long ago. The significance was gone from the moment. Sheep bleated, sheep died.

He could hardly wait to get home. . . .

Grunert casually inquired about the Fulgers, after the executions were over. Krantz mentioned taking the liberty of arranging for the firing squad on his own authority, then quite indifferently presented the order for signing. Grunert shrugged, signed without reading, and sent it along with the rest for the official files.

It was over, then.

Fritz had his hundred marks in a wallet.

And Otto Krantz—he had his sack. He hugged it to his breast as he sped through the streets toward home. No need to stop for food or drink today. There was a substitute for food and drink in the sack—for here were dreams come true.

Krantz ran the last few blocks, his feet moving in rhythm with his pulsing heart.

When he locked himself in the room, he was almost afraid to look, for a moment.

Suppose they had changed! But they had not changed.

White-haired Joachim and auburn-tressed Eva stared up at him with glowing green eyes. Their faces were set in grimaces of undying hate.

And Krantz stared, stared as Perseus stared into the countenance of Medusa.

He gazed at their Gorgonic grinning and laughed aloud. Someone seeing him right now might think him mad, he reflected. But he was not mad. Not he, Otto Krantz, Official Headsman of the Third Reich. No madman could have been as clever, as cunning, as crafty as he.

These two had been mad. Mad, with their babbling of sorcery and witchcraft. They had not even had the sense to be afraid of death. They had mocked him, ridiculed him, called him a crude barbarian.

Well, perhaps he was a barbarian. A headhunter, maybe. Like those Indians in South America—Jivaros, weren't they? That's what he was, a headhunter!

Krantz laughed.

They had mocked him, so now he mocked them. He talked to the heads for a long time. He flung their words in their teeth. 'Those that live by the axe shall perish beneath it," they had said. And, "as ye sow, so shall ye reap."

Krantz told them what he thought of that. He told them a great deal. After a while he no longer realized that he was talking to the dead. The heads seemed to nod and shake in answer to his words. The grins expanded sardonically.

They were laughing at him again!

Krantz grew angry. He shouted at the heads. He shouted so loudly that at first he didn't hear the knocking on his door.

Then, when it rose to thunderous crescendo, he turned.

With a start, he realized it was already dusk. Where had the day gone to?

The knocking persisted.

Krantz got out the burlap bag, filled it, and shoved it under his bed. Then he answered the door, straightening his collar and striving to control the trembling of his lips.

" Lieber Gott, let me in!"

It was Fritz, the scavenger. He stood quivering in the doorway until Otto Krantz dragged him across the threshold by the scruff of the neck. "What is it?"

"The Fulgers—their bodies have been claimed by a relative. A cousin, I think. He comes tonight to take them for burial."

"No, he can't do that!"

"But he is, he has received permission. And we shall be found out, and it will mean the axe for us."

Krantz managed to control his voice. He thought fast, frantically. Desperation blossomed into inspiration.

"Where are the bodies now?" he whispered.

"I have them out at the lime pits, behind the walls—near the old quarry."

"And this cousin of the Fulgers will not come for them until late tonight?"

"That is right. He has received permission to bring a hearse and two coffins."

Otto Krantz smiled. "Good. We shall be all right, then. This cousin of the Fulgers will not examine the bodies too closely, I think. He will not even bother to search for bullet wounds."

"But they are headless—"

"Exactly." A smile crept over Krantz's face. Even in the twilight Fritz could see that smile, and he shuddered. "What is it you will do?"

"Do you remember the last words of Joachim Fulger?" Krantz whispered. "Yes. As ye sow, so shall ye reap. That's from the Bible, isn't it?"

"Exactly." Krantz grinned. 'The old fool meant it as a warning. Instead, it will be our salvation."

"But I don't see—"

"Never mind. Go at once to the shop down the street. Purchase five yards of strong catgut and a surgical needle. I will meet you at the lime pits tonight at eight. I'll bring the sack with me. Now do you understand?"

Fritz understood. He was still shuddering as Krantz pushed him out into the hall toward the stairs.

It was a grisly ordeal. They worked in darkness, lest a light betray their presence to SS troopers on guard in the pits beyond.

They crouched in the little shed in utter blackness and groped their way about the business in silence. Fortunately, there was no trouble in locating the bodies. Fritz had carefully set them aside for immediate interment.

The rest was up to Krantz. He was no surgeon, but his fingers held a skill born of utter desperation. If he bungled the task, his life was forfeit, and he knew it. He strung the catgut and sewed.

The needle rose and fell, rose and fell, rose and fell in darkness as Otto Krantz pursued his fanciwork.

And then it was done—done amidst the shuddering whimpers that rose from Fritz's frantic throat.

But Krantz held his nerve to the last. It was he who added the final touch—binding the high collars about the two white throats and carefully patting the prison shirts into place beneath. His sense of touch served him well in this last gesture of precaution. At last he sighed, signifying that the task was complete.

Fritz wanted to bolt for it then. Krantz whispered that he must wait, must hide by the wall across the way from the shed, until they saw the cousin actually come and take the bodies away. Then and only then would he be certain of their safety.

So they waited, waited until midnight in the darkness. What phantasms it held for Fritz, Otto Krantz could not say. But as he stared into the night he saw the grinning faces of Joachim and Eva Fulger hanging bodiless in midair, their eyes alive with undying mockery.

Krantz pressed his eyelids together, but the faces remained, their leering mouths twisted as though in an effort to speak from beyond the barrier of death.

What were they trying to tell him?

Krantz didn't know. He didn't want to know. The hands which had wielded the surgical needle so expertly now hung limply at his sides as he waited.

Then the hearse came. The cousin, escorted by a guard, went into the little shed. Two mortician’s assistants brought the coffins. Krantz held his breath as they disappeared inside the shed.

They were not inside long. Soon they reappeared, carrying the closed coffins. They did not speak, there was no sign of agitation. The coffins were placed inside the hearse and the car drove away.

It was then that Krantz broke and ran, sobbing, from the scene.

He was safe. Everything was over, and he was safe. The heads were back on their bodies.

He got to his room somehow. Perhaps he might snatch a few hours of sleep before dawn. Then he must get up and return to duty as though nothing had happened. But now, to sleep—

But Otto Krantz did not sleep.

The heads were back on their bodies, yet they would not go away. They were waiting for Krantz in his room. He saw them hanging in the shadows, even when he turned on the lights.

They hung there—the head of the old man with the long white hair, and the head of the girl with her flaming curls—and they laughed at Krantz. They laughed at him.

Krantz bared his teeth.

Let them laugh! He was Otto Krantz, Headsman of the Reich. Krantz, the executioner, whom all men feared.

He had outsmarted them after all. Now they would be buried away in a grave and no one would ever know that Krantz had murdered them.

Krantz told them this in whispers, and they nodded to each other, sharing secrets. But Krantz did not mind. He was no longer afraid.

He almost welcomed the coming of dawn in this changed mood. He donned his immaculate evening dress carefully. He brushed his stiff collar into place before the bureau. The heads laughed at him over his shoulder in the mirror, but he didn’t care about that now.

He swaggered through the street on his way to Headquarters, cradling the axe in its case against his brawny chest. A passing guard drew stiffly to attention as Krantz marched by.

Krantz laughed. There—wasn't that proof of his importance, his cleverness? Let the heads understand that he was a man of position, of power.

Otto Krantz knew he had nothing to fear. He would go about his duties today without question. He squared his shoulders and marched up the steps, into the outer office. He wasn't worried. He knew no one else could see the heads but himself.

He smiled at the man behind the desk. That was the way—brazen it out! "I'd like to see Inspector Grunert, please. About today's orders. Is he here yet?"

"The Inspector left word for you to go right in."

There. The Inspector was waiting for him! That's the kind of a man Otto Krantz was. Inspectors waited for his arrival. He smiled derisively at the heads. Then he strutted into Inspector Grunert's office. The Inspector was waiting.

Krantz realized that just as soon as the two Gestapo men stepped from behind the door and pinned his arms close to his sides. They took the axe, they held him tightly, he could not struggle, he could only gape, he could only pant, he could only listen to what Grunert was saying.

"Otto Krantz, I arrest you in the name of the Third Reich, for the murder of Joachim and Eva Fulger."

But what was he talking about? The Fulgers were in their graves by now, buried.

No—they weren't.

The Inspector was pulling the sheet from the table over in the corner.

And Otto Krantz stared. He saw the heads again, and this time everyone could see them. They were grinning up at him now from over the tops of the sheets.

Somehow he dragged his captors forward with him. He bent over the bodies. He wanted to know how, know why they had been discovered.

They looked all right. The heads had been sewed on tightly. Perfectly. The high collars were still in place. Nothing was wrong with his work, nothing looked suspicious. Why, the collars hadn't even been pulled back to disclose any of the sewing!

Then what was wrong?

Krantz gazed at the still bodies, trying to read the secret. He didn't hear any of Inspector Grunert's mumblings about madmen, about murder. He was trying to remember what had happened.

"As ye sow," the old man had warned. "As ye sow—"

Then Otto Krantz's gaze traveled up again to the heads of the dead wizard and his daughter. He screamed, once.

"Too bad you didn't have any light to work with in that shed," Inspector Grunert purred.

Otto Krantz didn't hear him.

He was staring madly at the grinning heads of the old man and the girl—the heads he had sewed back on in the darkness and inadvertently switched.

End of Your Rope

Any time you get the urge to pick on a Hindu, remember that he knows how to use a rope as more than just a lethal necktie!

HAVE YOU EVER been desperate for a meal? Willing to do anything for food? Well, I was. And so I went to Jack’s Shack to eat. You can see how starved I was to risk a dinner at Jack’-s Shack. Because as a cook, Jack takes up where the Borgia family left off.

But I did it. Ordered a chicken dinner and actually ate it. I was just banging my way through the drumsticks when I heard a cackle. This didn’t surprise me—from the toughness of the chicken I could easily believe it was still alive.

Then the cackle came again. I wiped the gravy out of my eyes and looked up.

Sure enough. There he was—the tall man with the tall tales—Lefty Feep. In person, and in a new suit, as usual. A very glad plaid, in an orange and green combination which matched his yellow tie, purple shirt, and the blue circles under his eyes. Sometimes, when I see Feep I wish I were colorblind. And after he starts talking, I’d just as soon be deaf, too. Heaven knows I’m already dumb—from listening to him.

But there was Lefty Feep, and I had to make the best of it.

“Hi, Bob, what’s with the mob?” he greeted me.

“Sit down,” I invited. “I’m just finishing dinner.”

"Is that a chicken you are picking?" he asked.

"It must be—it's too small for a vulture," I answered. "Here, how about a wing?"

"A wing?" Lefty Feep's voice rose with his eyebrows. "A wing is not the thing!"

"What's the matter, aren't you hungry?"

"Absolutely. But please—no wings!"

"What's the trouble?" I persisted. "Don't you like chicken wings?"

"It is not that I do not like wings—I merely hate them," Feep explained. "Every time I think of them I think of Arthur Arthur. And every time I think of Arthur Arthur I think of a rope. And every time I think of a rope I get ready to hang myself."

"Why, what happened?"

I ought to have known better than to ask that question. Lefty Feep leaned across the table and shook a wishbone in my face.

"It is a very gory story," he whispered. "It is a tale to make you pale and quail without fail. A narration of damnation."

"Some other time, Lefty," I said, hastily. "Right now I'm all tied up. I'm at the end of my rope."

"You are at the end of your rope? Wait until you hear about the rope my pal is at the end of."

"Later," I pleaded. "I have a heavy date."

"Tell her to reduce," snapped Lefty Feep. "You must hear about what happens to my pal."

"Must I?" I said.

And then, as Lefty Feep pushed me back into the seat and held me firmly in place with both hands, I knew that I must.

Lefty Feep opened up his mouth, I opened up my ears, and the story came.

THE OTHER day I suddenly wake up with a terrific craving to have some fruit. So naturally, when I get dressed I head down the street to a tavern. There is naturally no better place to find the fruit I crave—such as the cherries at the bottom of Manhattan and the lemons on the side of Tom Collins. Otherwise I seldom go into a tavern, unless, of course, I want a drink.

Any kind of how, there I am in this alcohol hall, just stepping up to the bar, when I spot an old pal of mine. To be exact, he spots me—with a couple drops from the drink he is holding in trembling fingers.

"Why, hello Arthur," I say, surprised.

"Well cut off my allowance and call me broke, if it ain't Lefty Feep!" bawls this personality. "Have a drink, fink! Come on, pal."

I take a not so good look at my pal Arthur and see that he is not exactly over on the alkaline side. He is, to be candid, at least three sheets and a pillowcase in the wind.

The bartender evidently agrees with me, because he suddenly leans over and taps Arthur on the shoulder.

"Arthur," he says, "why don't youse go home? Youse is drunk."

"Give me another drink," Arthur insists.

The bartender shrugs. "Lissen, my boy," he says, "why do youse get drunk, anyway?"

Arthur sneers. "You put twelve scotches in front of me and then you ask why I get drunk?" he shrieks, sarcastically. "You might as well cut off my head and ask me why I'm bleeding."

I stick my tongue out at the discussion.

"Arthur," I tell him, "the bartender is right. You're a good newspaper reporter, aren't you? Why waste your time hanging around taverns? You look like a bar rag."

"I have two reasons," Arthur sighs. "The first is my name. Arthur Arthur! There's a name for you. Arthur Arthur! With a name like that I should live in Walla Walla and eat tutti-frutti until I get shot by a dum-dum bullet! I hate my name, but every day I have to see it all over a newspaper as the byline of the stories I write."

"But you write good stories for the papers," I console him.

"I am coming to that," moans Arthur Arthur. "My second reason. I have pretty good luck for a while—lots of accidents, drownings, murders—all that a man could ask for. But what happens this week? Nothing! Not even a teensy-weensy little axe slaying! I tell you, the peace and quiet around this town makes me sick."

He stares at me. "Give me a torso!" he pleads. "Just a single torso! Stick a few knives in it. Wrap it in brown paper and leave it at the railroad station for the cops to find it. That's all I ask!"

"I am sorry, Arthur," I tell him, "I am very sorry, but I do not have a spare torso."

Arthur Arthur ignores me and blobbers on.

"This morning my editor gives me an assignment to go down and meet a customer arriving on the S.S. Leukemia or some such boat. This customer is some kind of Hindu fakir on his way to confer with Einstein about the theory of relativity.

"Just imagine! Me, a crack feature writer, getting such an assignment! I am not meeting Paulette Goddard, either. This Hindu will show plenty of limb, but he won't be any Marlene Dietrich. Can you figure me picking up some little brown midget in a bath towel and jabbering to him in good old Bronx Hindustani?"

Arthur Arthur takes another drink. I pat his shoulder.

"You shouldn't be so sensitive, my boy," I tell him.

"All artists are sensitive," grunts Arthur Arthur. "Give me a good murder!"

"There, there. Maybe you will get a murder tomorrow," I console him. "We can't all have murders whenever we want them, see?"

"Well, I want one now," insists Arthur Arthur. "You don't know how it is with me. I got to have one."

"Listen," I squawk. "Don't be childish. You and your murders! Why not go down to the boat and get this thing over with? You don't want to get thrown out on your assignment."

"Maybe—" says Arthur Arthur.

"I know it hurts your professional pride," I coax, "but we all have our ups and downs. A Hindu today, but who knows? Maybe a great big passion slaying for you tomorrow."

"All right," says Arthur Arthur, "I'll do it. Call me a taxi."

"You're a taxi," I tell him. But bum gags aside, Arthur Arthur calls a cab and then sails out of the joint for his interview.

THE REST of the story I get later from him, but I will carry on from here.

Arthur Arthur drives down to the dock and flashes his press card. He goes up the gangplank of the ship and asks a steward for directions.

"Where," he inquires, "can I find Omar Khayyamer?"

The steward gives him a dirty look and then a cabin number on another deck. Arthur Arthur plods up to the stateroom. He stands in front of the door. Here it is now. A meeting with a little Gandhi in triangle trousers. Oh well!

The door opens. A tall drip in evening clothes smiles out. He has straight dark hair and grey eyes. Perhaps he is the butler.

"Pardon me," pipes Arthur. "I'm looking, for Omar Khayyamer."

"Don't look any further," says the tall drip.

"But I'm a reporter—I'm here for an interview—I must see him."

"Well, take a good look, then."

"You mean, you're the swami. the Hindu whatchamacallit?"

"I'm not Andy Hardy," says the guy.

"But you speak English and you don't look like a Hindu," objects Arthur Arthur.

"Come in and sit down," says Omar Khayyamer.

So in goes Arthur and down he sits, still staring at the good-looking man in evening clothes.

"Say," he mumbles, "I'm pretty sorry I doubt your word. My name is Arthur Arthur, and I want an interview—"

"And probably a drink," suggests Omar, smiling. "Will scotch do?"

"Always does."

So they drink.

"I want to explain why I am so skeptical," Arthur says. "I expect to meet some old skinny dried-up guy with a pair of diapers on. I figure he will keep a goat in the room, or something."

"Sorry to disappoint you," says Omar. "But I suppose I could buy a goat."

"Where?"

"Why almost anywhere. I'm a stranger here, but maybe you could help me."

"Now you're kidding me, Mr. Khayyamer."

"Just call me Butch."

"Butch?"

"They do at Cambridge." Omar smiles. "Yes, and at Oxford and the Sorbonne too, I'm afraid I'm not a very picturesque figure for a Hindu swami. Too civilized for a good story. I'm just in this country to interview Einstein and discuss certain mathematical formulae and postulates. It's all here in the briefcase, but it won't interest your editor and readers."

Omar points at a little dark case on the table.

Arthur sighs. "Too bad," he remarks. "I was kind of hoping for a little excitement."

Just as he asks for it, he gets it.

All at once a terrific series of revolver shots rattles through the walls from the next stateroom.

Arthur jumps to his feet like he is being shot out of an invisible cannon.

But quick as be is, Omar is quicker.

He runs to the door connecting with the other stateroom. He tugs at it. It is locked. Then Omar smiles and holds out his hands.

He walks through the door!

Maybe it is an illusion or maybe it is the scotch, but Arthur Arthur gasps. He runs over to the door and tugs it. This time it opens fast. So fast that Arthur can't figure out whether he just sees a mirage or not.

All he knows is that he is standing in the stateroom doorway and watching a very active scene.

There are four men in the room. Three of them are very busy. The fourth man is very dead.

He lies on the floor, and standing over him is a bearded big guy, holding a smoking revolver.

This shocks Arthur not a little, because there is a sign on the wall which definitely says NO SMOKING.

The other two bearded men are pulling out drawers and peering under the mattress, looking for something.

They are not exactly expecting to see swami Omar and Arthur coming in on them so suddenly. So they are startled for a moment.

Then they turn on the heat. The guy with the gun jumps.

Two bullets sing a merry tune over Arthur's head.

The other two lugs have no guns, so they just point their beards at the swami Omar and then dive for him in a flying tackle.

Arthur Arthur dives on the bed.

When he does, he trips over the carpet on the floor. He lies there, expecting any minute to feel a bullet in his back, or what he has sticking out from under the bedclothes in place of his back.

But nothing happens. He turns around and sees the guy with the gun bending down where the carpet is turned over. He is grabbing what lies underneath it. A briefcase.

MEANWFIILE the swami Omar is pretzel-bending the two hoods who tackle him. He has them both tied into knots, and his bright eyes sparkle when he notices the third guy picking up the briefcase he finds.

“Arthur,” yells Omar. “Quick—get that briefcase!”

Arthur Arthur does a very brave thing. He actually obeys Omar and charges down on the guy with the briefcase. He snatches it and runs back into the swami’s stateroom.

The bearded guy with the gun chases after him. And Arthur Arthur, crossing into the other stateroom, trips again. He feels the big lug bearing down on him. He feels the iron butt of the revolver crack his head.

And then he feels from nothing. Arthur Arthur definitely gets deprived of his consciousness. He is knocked very far out.

When he wakes up he is sitting on the floor of swami Omar’s stateroom. Omar is bending over him. Arthur sits up. His hand trembles. Omar puts the scotch bottle in it.

“What happens?” Arthur asks, between gulps.

The swami shakes his head. “They depart with the briefcase,” he explains. “Fortunately, they do not make a mistake and take mine.”

“But who are they?” asks Arthur Arthur.

“Enemy agents, I believe. Evidently they follow our friend next door across the ocean in order to gain possession of his brief-case. And they want it enough to turn him into our late friend.

“When you get knocked out I come in here on the run, but the man with the gun skips out the door with the briefcase. Meanwhile my two playmates also vanish from the other cabin. Now that place is filled with reporters, police, and all the other parasites that come to prey on the bodies of the dead.”

Arthur Arthur hears a pounding outside the swami Omar’s door. Omar also listens.

“Arthur,” he whispers, “you must help me get out of here. I don’t want to run into a lot of publicity—it will be a poor reflection on my forthcoming visit with Einstein. How can we get away unobserved?”

Arthut Arthur smiles. “Why don’t you just walk through the solid door like you do before?”

Omar sighs. “You notice that, do you?” he murmurs. “Well, I’ll have to explain about it later. But how can we get out now?”

Arthur strolls over to the stateroom door and opens it a crack. He sticks out his arm and jerks two white-coated stewards into the room. The stewards start to yell, but Arthur knows from experience that the best way to gag a man is to stuff dollar bills down his throat. So in a few minutes the stewards consent to take off their white jackets and give them to Arthur and Omar.

“Come on,” says Arthur. “Out we go, and don’t say a word.”

When they reach the door Omar turns around.

“I nearly forgot my briefcase!” he yells. He picks it up from the floor where it falls in the excitement, and they elbow their way out, disguised as stewards.

Passengers and boat officials collar them.

“Who’s in there? What are the cops doing? Do you see that Hindu guy?”

Arthur Arthur smiles. “I don’t know anything,” he says. “I just go in to change the bath towels.” Then he dives through the mob, pulling Omar after him. They get down the gangplank and into a taxi.

“Where are we going?” asks Omar.

“Some place where I can get an exclusive story from you on all this,” Arthur tells him. “That’s what I am sent out to do by my editor.”

“But I don’t want to go to a newspaper office,” objects the swami Omar.

“Who says anything about an office?” Arthur comes back. “We are going to a cafe and relax. There is nothing I rather do than sit back and relax on my expense account. It is very comfortable, being padded.”

Sure enough, Arthur takes Omar to a very classy night spot. Nothing less than the Herring Room of the Bismark Hotel.

A blast of elegant perfume hits them as they enter.

“Ah,” sighs Arthur, recognizing it with delight. “Gin!”

THEY DOFF their hats to the check-room girl and then go out on the dance-floor where people are scraping shins to the orchestra tooting of Blue Serge and his Musical Mothballs.

"Very elegant and impressive," breathes Omar, staring around at the host of gay, sophisticated celebrities from Nebraska and Oklahoma.

They take a table. The waiter ambles over.

"One scotch," Arthur orders.

"One scotch for two gentlemen?" sneers the waiter.

"One bottle of scotch, dummy!" yells Arthur Arthur.

One bottle of scotch it is, and it does strange things to both of them.

"Now what about this trick of walking through doors?" asks Arthur, a couple of drinks later. "Are you one of these Hindu mystics? One of those guys that uses a bed of nails for a sofa and eats butterflies?"

Omar smiles. "I pick up a little occult ability, yes," he admits. "It is just a case of mind over matter. And speaking of matter—can't we order some food?"

"Wait a minute," suggests Arthur Arthur. "Let me take a squint at the bill so far. This is one of the biggest gyp joints in town."

Arthur calls the sneering waiter and takes a look at the bill. He whispers to swami Omar. "Cover charge—$15. Service charge—$10. Scotch—$10."

He turns to the waiter who is ready to take an order.

"Bring us a couple glasses of water," he says.

The waiter sneers again, but he brings them the water and a very dirty look.

"Too bad," whispers Arthur to Omar. "Me taking you to such a place. We can only afford water now on my expense account."

The swami Omar smiles at Arthur. Then he smiles at the waiter, who is still standing around hoping to give these two dead-beats the bum's rush.

The waiter doesn't like to see Omar smile. But there is something else he does not like to see either. Because Omar suddenly waves his hand over the glass of water and the water disappears. Instead something yellow and bubbling takes its place.

Then Omar does the same pass over Arthur's glass. Same result.

"Have some champagne," Omar suggests.

Arthur has some champagne.

The waiter had a fit.

Omar smiles up at him, winking at Arthur Arthur on the sly. "Now about that food," he says. "I'm still hungry."

He turns to the wall. There is a potted plant sitting there for decoration. Omar just reaches out and begins to pluck fruit from the fern. He gets grapes, bananas, peaches, oranges, and cherries.

The waiter gets convulsions.

All at once a pineapple appears in Omar's hand.

"I don't order this—take it back!" Omar yells at empty air. The pineapple disappears.

So does the color from the waiter's face.

Then Omar turns to the waiter very politely. "Have a banana?" he urges.

The waiter finds his voice. "I don't want no banana," he gasps. "Youse is a witch!"

He scuttles off. Omar smiles and peels an orange.

"How do you do it?" Arthur Arthur marvels.

"Simple for a yogi adept," Omar explains. "I know the planes and angles. Planes and angles seem to divide matter into far separate physical entities, when in reality all corporeal structure is homogenous."

"The hell you better!" remarks Arthur Arthur.

"Now take this fruit. It's real, isn't it? Just as real as the fern which is standing here all the time. The only trick is to make the fruit appear on the fern. Merely a matter of conjunction. Proper understanding of the physical laws behind metaphysics does the trick. Planes and angles, that's all."

BUT ARTHUR ARTHUR is not listening. He is looking at the planes and angles exhibited by two young damsels who now stand before the table.

One of these damsels is a redhead. Her hair is so vivid that all she needs is roller skates to look like hell on wheels.

The other tomato is a blonde, athletic type. The kind that can run the gamut of emotions and still be plenty speedy.

Arthur Arthur, being a gentleman, knows what to do when two unescorted young ladies appear on the scene.

“Hello, babe,” he says, politely.

The blonde damsel, also very polite, sits down in his lap. The redhead drapes herself around Omar.

“What a pleasant American custom,” he remarks, pulling two more glasses out of nowhere and snapping his fingers. A bottle of champagne thumps dowfi on the table.

“Who throws that?” asks the blonde, looking up.

“It comes out of nowhere,” says the redhead, with a puzzled look.

“Do you do this?” the redhead persists, looking at Omar. “Are you some kind of a magician or such?”

“That’s right,” Arthur breaks in. “We are both magicians. He’s the kind that makes the drinks appear. I am the kind that makes them disappear.” And he swallows very quickly.

“Why what have you got here?” asks the redhead, picking up Omar’s briefcase and beginning to open it.

“Put that down!” Omar yells. The redhead giggles and puts it down.

But Arthur Arthur notices her glance off to another table and wink.

He looks at that table on the other aide of the room. Looks and sees the three bearded men who have the fight in the stateroom!

Arthur turns to Omar. “Grab that briefcase!” he yells. “These dames are sent here by those crooks from the boat!”

But he warns too late. The redhead jumps up, running with the briefcase. Meanwhile the blonde pulls out another briefcase from under her evening wrap and slaps it on the table.

“Fair exchange is no robbery,” she mutters, then beats it after her friend. The three bearded bozos are waiting for the girls at the end of the room.

All at once Omar stands up. He stretches out his hands and makes history in the Herring Room. The Herring Room served a lot of bad liquor in its time and not a few Mickey Finns, but this is the first evening when all the customers see snakes at once.

And that is exactly what they see when Omar stretches out his pinkies.

Directly in front of the two fleeing damsels, little wiggling green crawlers appear. They slither around the ankles of the dancers and make unpleasant sounds. So do the dancers.

“Snakes!” yells the redhead. She turns around and runs back to the table. Arthur intercepts her pass and grabs the briefcase again. Now he and Omar have two briefcases.

The customers have snakes and hysterics. They are running to and fro, and the ones that run to, bump into the ones that run fro.

Arthur notices that the biggest of the three beards is pulling out a revolver again. It seems to be a habit with him.

“This is where we come in!” he yells to Omar.

They hold the briefcases very tightly and plunge towards an exit. A path is opened up by a whistling bullet scooting overhead. They use the path. The beards chase after them out the door.

“Taxi!” yells Arthur Arthur, hitting the street. They hurl into a waiting cab.

“Where to, buddy?” asks the driver.

“Anywhere that’s the hell out of here!” screams Arthur.

IN THE nick of time they whizz away. Behind them the bearded bozos jump up and down on the pavement.

“What is all this?” Arthur asks Omar, shivering against the cab seat.

“Evidently our friends make a mistake this afternoon,” Omar explains.

"In the haste of their escape they take my briefcase instead of the one they are searching for. When they discover this, they trail us to the Herring Room and get the girls to try and switch briefcases again."

"Must be something pretty important in that briefcase to take all these chances," Arthur suggests.

The swami Omar nods. He opens the zipper of the second case, then whistles. "Naval plans!" he murmurs. "No wonder. They are spies, all right."

"And what's in your own briefcase?" asks Arthur.

"Something even more important, that I wish to show to Professor Einstein," Omar tells him.

Suddenly the cab stops.

Arthur blinks. "Say, where are we?" he mumbles.

The cab driver sticks his nose around. "From the tenor of your remarks," he says, "I infer that youse wish to visit another jernt."

Sure enough, they are parked in front of a little dingy tavern way out in the sticks.

Omar shrugs. "Might as well go in," he suggests. "This place looks quiet. You and I must decide what to do about all this."

They pay the driver and go into a very ordinary-looking little bar-room. It is quite deserted. There is a balcony and stairway in back.

The only personality in the joint is a little bartender with an outsize schnozz.

"Evening, gents," he drawls. "What's it gonna be?"

They order scotch and sit at a table, eyeing the two briefcases.

"Now what to do about all this?" Arthur begins.

His question is answered for him right away.

Because the door of the tavern opens very quickly. Then it shuts and locks very quickly. And the three bearded bozos are in the tavern.

"So!" gasps Arthur Arthur. "That cab driver—"

But there is no time for conversation. The biggest beard is already doing his usual trick—pulling out the revolver.

The swami grabs his briefcase. The other one lies on the table, but Arthur Arthur does not stop to pick it up. He races for the balcony stairs after the swami.

The three spies charge them. When Omar gets to the head of the stairs he turns. He yanks out at the rails and wrenches the wooden steps loose. They crash to the floor.

Arthur and the swami Omar stand on the balcony. The three whiskers stand below. A gun barks.

Arthur ducks down. But the bullet doesn't even come close. It hits—of all things—the tavern chandelier. The lights go out.

Arthur and Omar peer into the darkness. Down below the spies are lighting matches, fumbling at the briefcase on the table.

"It's the wrong one, by Gar!" comes a thick voice. "We got to get upstairs somehow."

Then Omar does a very surprising thing. He walks to the edge of the balcony and calls down at them.

"Gentlemen—you will find a rope in my briefcase. Throw it up here and I will tie it to the balcony rail. Then you can climb up and get your briefcase."

One of the beards calls back.

"What kind of trick are you making with us? Why do you change your mind?"

"What else can I do?" answers Omar. "I don't think the briefcase is worth the cost of my life. We'll make a bargain. If you climb up on a rope you can't shoot me. I will give you the briefcase and we will go our separate ways and forget the whole thing."

They go into a huddle downstairs. Finally the voice calls out again.

"We agree. I've got the rope from your briefcase. Here it comes."

THERE IS a swish and a thump, and the rope lands across the balcony rail. Omar's hands do things to the rope in the darkness.

“Are you selling out to these crooks?” Arthur whispers.

“This is the only way,” Omar tells him. He calls over the edge of the balcony. “Ready, now?”

Arthur can hear grunting as the bearded man climbs up the rope. Then the grunting dies away.

A voice comes from below. “Are you safe up there, Peter?”

“Quite safe.”

But it is swami Omar who speaks. The man on the rope says nothing.

“You two come up now,” Omar says, in a deep voice.

Arthur Arthur blinks in the dark as he hears the other two men climbing the rope. But where is the first man?

Suddenly the climbing and breathing sounds are gone.

And Omar laughs.

“See that?” he chuckles. “All three of them climb the rope.”

“What is all this?” asks Arthur.

Omar reaches into his pocket and pulls out a flashlight. He plays it on the rope. A most peculiar rope.

It is not tied to the balcony at all. It just stands straight up in the air.

There are no three spies on it. There isn’t even one spy.

On top of that, there is no top on the rope. No visible top. It just stands straight in the air and seems to go up into a kind of grayish cloud and fade away.

“What?” gulps Arthur Arthur, taking this all in.

“This is what I have in my briefcase,” Omar answers. “What I intend to take and show Professor Einstein.”

“But—”

“It’s the old Hindu rope trick!” explains Omar. “I just trick our three friends into climbing up a rope which makes them disappear into nowhere.” He smiles at Arthur Arthur: “This is the kind of thing you westerners refuse to believe. Now you can tell your editor you see it happen with your own eyes. And that’s that. Now we will climb down, take the rope, and then take this briefcase with the naval plans along to the authorities.” Omar glances down at the floor of the balcony where the briefcase is. Only it isn't, any more.

"I am robbed!" yells Omar. "One of those dogs must reach out when he passes the balcony level here and grab the briefcase. Now they've got it up there with them."

He faces Arthur Arthur with a slow stare.

"Those papers are very important," he says. "We must get them back."

"How?"

"Arthur, there is just one thing to do. You must climb up that rope and get back the second briefcase."

Arthur shudders. "Not on your life. I'm not going to be roped into climbing that thing!"

"But you must!"

"Why not climb up and get it yourself?"

"If I do, how would you get me down?" asks Omar.

"If I do, how would you get me down?" Arthur snaps back.

"Leave that to me," says swami Omar.

Arthur Arthur eyes the dangling rope. It is thick and brown, and it stands straight up in the air from the floor below. He can see every strand and thread in it, but when he stares up the rope just blurs off into nothing.

"Just what is up there?" he asks Omar.

Omar shrugs. "That is what I intend to discuss with Einstein," he says. "This rope is woven by the holy contemplants in the temple where I study metaphysics. Every strand is a prayer to the Infinite. All I know is that the rope is a link with that part of existence beyond our five senses. According to the theories of Einstein and the physicists, it could be a gateway to the Fourth Dimension."

Arthur shakes his head. "What you are giving me is not exactly a road map," he says.

"Why not climb up and find out?" the swami Omar coaxes. "I think beyond that rope lies the realm of what we call Imagination. It is from here that I get the champagne and the fruit and the serpents that apparently come from nowhere. I imagine them and they come from Imagination to existence. That is all I know. The rest is up to you.”

“Up to me?”

“Yes. Up the rope, which you will climb. You will find the three spies and get back the briefcase.”

“I rather be hanged with your lousy rope than climb it,” screams Arthur Arthur, passionately.

BUT OMAR steps forward suddenly. His hands shove out. Arthur Arthur topples backwards across the balcony rail. He tumbles, grabs empty air. Grabs the rope.

He hangs there. Then, with a groan, he tries to slide down. But he can’t! The rope tangles up under his feet in invisible knots.

Still groaning, he climbs up. He sticks out his hands pleading to Omar, like an organ-grinder’s monkey asking for pennies.

But Omar shakes his head. “Good luck!” he calls out. “I suggest that wherever you go, you stick close to the rope at all times.”

Arthur Arthur climbs a few feet more without knowing it. And then the rope seems to move of its own accord beneath his hands. The swami’s voice gets very faint and far away. The world turns to a gray mist, like the mist at the top of the rope.

Arid all at once Arthur feels himself shooting up—up through a ceiling that isn’t there, through a sky that doesn’t exist, and into the world beyond.

He stops in the middle of a cloudy plain. Nothing but mist all around him. He seems to be standing on something, but he can’t see it. He seems to be holding the rope with one hand, but he can’t see it. Looking down, he can’t even see himself!

He can’t see his own feet or his own hands!

Arthur closes his eyes and shudders. But there is nothing to shudder, because his body appears to disappear.

Only his mind is left. Omar is probably right. This is a world of pure Imagination.

There is nothing to rely on but his thoughts.

That's it! Maybe if he thinks of his body, he will see it! Arthur imagines himself. And sure enough, looking down, there he is. Right in the middle of the mist.

It is too much for Arthur Arthur. "I need a drink!" he thinks.

Sure enough, out of the mist comes a glass of scotch. Just like it does for swami Omar back on earth.

Arthur can see it. And he certainly can drink it.

Then he feels better. All at once he remembers his mission up here—somewhere there must be the three bearded bozos with the briefcase. But where? Where in this mist?

And how can he find them?

Then he thinks of it. He merely has to imagine that they are standing right next to him.

He imagines.

Nothing happens.

Then he remembers he forgets to think of them as being visible.

So he does. And there, standing on little clouds of mist at his left, are the three spies.

But without any briefcase!

Arthur remembers he must imagine the briefcase, too.

And there it is, in the leader's hand.

Here is where Arthur makes his mistake. "Hey!" he yells out, "throw that briefcase over to me!"

The bearded leader shakes his head.

"All right then," says Arthur Arthur. "I can think that you give me the briefcase."

Suddenly a gleam appears in the biggest beard's eye.

He catches on.

In two seconds Arthur suddenly plunges head over heels into space, falling down into the depths of the mist. A wind screams in his ears.

“He thinks I am falling,” Arthur realizes. He closes his own eyes and concentrates hard.

“I’ve got wings—I can’t fall,” he imagines.

Sure enough, a thump knocks against his shoulder blades. He stops falling and begins to flap. Looking around, he sees a lovely pair of white wings on his shoulders.

He flies back to the cloud of mast.

THE THREE are standing just as he leaves them. Quickly, Arthur Arthur imagines that the leader throws him the briefcase.

And the briefcase sails for his arms.

Then the leader’s eyes glitter again.

Arthur Arthur stretches out his arms to catch the briefcase. But it is not a briefcase that dives for his arms. It is a snarling lion!

Crazy like anything, Arthur forces himself to think fast. It is not a lion, he imagines. It is a balloon. The balloon lands gently on his shoulder—

And turns into an octopus!

Arthur feels the coils of the tentacles around his neck. He imagines they are not there.

“I wish those rats would strangle in their own beards!” he mutters.

And they do! The three spies reel back clawing at their necks as the barber-bushes rear up and choke them. The leader, Peter, just manages to gurgle, “Think yourselves free!”

In a second the three are facing Arthur once more. And he knows now that the game is up. There is only one way out of this. They understand, and they have three brains to work with against his one. If they all attack him—

Arthur shudders as a dozen arrows suddenly sink into his back, a bolt of lightning strikes his chest, and a big rock bounces on his skull.

He thinks just in time. “I can’t be hurt.”

As he tears the arrows out of his unwounded body, the three blink in astonishment. For a second he has them off guard with surprise.

He turns them into butterflies.

They turn themselves into machine guns.

Arthur Arthur makes himself transparent so the bullets go through him.

They turn him to steam. He evaporates, thinking wildly.

“This can’t go on,” he realizes. “They are too many for me. Wait—

I’ve got it!”

A second later there are a hundred Arthur Arthurs flapping wings in the air. The trio is surrounded.

But not for long. Another second and a thousand bearded spies appear.

Arthur Arthur turns into a thousand men, each fifty feet tall. But it is too much. He cannot hold such a thought and still act. Neither can the bearded bozos.

They return to their normal single bodies again. The spies stare at Arthur Arthur in a daze.

Quick as a flash, he wills that the briefcase come to his hands.

Then the leader of the anti-razor gang goes back to normal with a vengeance. He whips out the old familiar revolver of his.

Before he can shoot, Arthur Arthur wilts the barrel down to asparagus.

But he can’t go on. He can’t think. Desperate, he gets one last spurt of energy.

“We are all back at the bottom of the rope again!” he thinks.

There is a crash, a flash, and a smash.

IT IS A long time later that he wakes up on the tavern floor. Omar is bending over him with the bottle ready.

Arthur sits up. All around him are familiar objects. The coil of rope. Three bearded bodies. A briefcase. Omar picks up the rope and the briefcase.

"The police will arrive soon," he says. "Our three friends are unconscious and they can pick them up. Let us get out of here now, though. I must not delay my visit with Einstein."

Omar leads Arthur out. Arthur shakes his head. "Tell me it doesn't happen," he begs. "Those three lugs get tangled up in the rafters, don't they? I go up after them and we all fall down. I just imagine the rest."

Omar stares at him and shakes his head. He shrugs and smiles.

"Well, if it makes you feel any better," he says.

"Nothing makes me feel any better," Arthur answers. "Except maybe a drink."

"Get it yourself then," Omar tells him. "I must be on my way."

So Omar heads off in one direction and Arthur tails into the tavern where I meet him that afternoon.

I am still there, absorbing my fruit, and when he sees me he makes me sit down in a booth and tells me this story I tell you. Strange, is it not?

* * *

Lefty Feep sat back, shaking his head.

"Very strange," I admitted. "But I still don't understand why you won't eat chicken wings, or why Arthur Arthur is afraid of ropes, and all that. After all, he merely suffered from a little hypnotic experiment."

"Maybe," said Lefty Feep.

"No maybe about it," I answered. "It was pure hallucination. You and I know that the so-called Hindu rope trick is a fake. And certainly you don't believe any of that stuff about a world of Imagination lying at the other end of it, where whatever you think comes true."

"Of course I do," Feep told me.

"But even Arthur Arthur didn't believe it," I persisted.

Feep grinned.

"That is right. When he tells me the story he says he doesn't believe it really happens. Only when I take him to the doctor does he realise it is all a fact."

"You took Arthur to the doctor? Why?"

Feep grinned again.

"Because he makes one mistake when he wishes himself back down the rope in such a hurry. I must take him to the doctor right away, because he doesn't come down the same as when he went up."

"Meaning?"

"He has to go to the doctor and get those wings amputated!"

THE END

The Weird Tailor

Either he was working for a crazy man . . . or a practitioner of Black Magic.

I

ONLY a connoisseur of horrors would have appreciated Erik Conrad's window dummy.

It had been a cheap model to begin with—and the passage of twenty years had not improved its crudely moulded features, its awkward stance, or the general air of clumsiness inherent in face and form. There was something grotesque about the dummy, as if it had been created by the alien art of another world; as though a life-term from Outside had deliberately set about to model a "man" from a poor woodcut in an ancient book.

The brash smile, the jaunty little mustache, and the open candor of the staring blue eyes had all suffered the gnawings of Time, so that now the figure was minus an upper lip, the left corner of the mustache, and the entire right eye. A crack extended from the empty eye-socket up to the crown of the head and split the marcelled hair directly along the indented part. A chipped finger and a nick in the left wrist contributed to the gruesome aura of decay.

Certainly the suit Erik Conrad had draped over the dummy was just the garment which would be selected for the cheap client of a cheap mortician.

It was eminently appropriate to the corpse-like pallor of the window dummy, but the effect of the ensemble was well calculated to disturb the eyes of the sensitive observer.

Fortunately, Erik Conrad was not overly imaginative. He didn’t mind the sight of the leering dummy slumped in the shadows at one corner of his dingy little tailoring establishment. He was not affected by the spectacle of its hideously progressive decay, any more than he was affected by his own.

For the years had not dealt kindly with Erik Conrad, merchant tailor. He had suffered a disintegration comparable to that of the dummy since setting up a shop of his own on this side street. His blue eyes were faded from endless peering, his fingers twisted and calloused from stitching, his shoulders bent from stooping over the pressing table. The sparse brown hairs plastered against his sloping skull were slowly turning gray, and hence were almost invisible against the gray pallor of his skin.

Erik Conrad was not conscious of these changes. He noted and bewailed only the steady decline, of his business. Conrad’s window dummy slumped a trifle with the years, and Conrad himself stooped more than a bit—but the business itself tottered on its last legs. Time had dealt most harshly with little independent merchant tailors. The popularity of the readymade suit, the competition of stylish downtown tailoring establishments, the inroads made by modern cleaning and dyeing concerns—all had contributed to his loss of revenue.

Conrad saw it happen, and he found no solution. His only relief lay in cursing and grumbling as he went about his steadily decreasing daily tasks.

Then, a year ago, he had married.

Anna was a refugee; a young woman of great physical attraction and shy personal charm. A stranger in a new world, she readily consented to marriage, even though Erik Conrad was middle-aged and none too successful. She was grateful enough to stand in the steam-filled back room and assist in the pressing which now formed the bulk of Conrad’s existing business.

CONRAD, for his part, gave up cursing and grumbling after his marriage to Anna. Now, when he was discouraged or out of sorts, he merely smiled and shrugged, took his wife by the throat, and throttled her. Not too hard, of course, for she had her work to do. Anna did not complain too greatly, nor did she give way to tears. It is difficult to either scold or cry when one’s throat has been thoroughly choked by gnarled and twisted fingers.

At first she had longed for a child to keep her company, but after coming to know her husband better, she was glad that there was no little one to suffer Conrad’s mistreatment. Sometimes, when the tailor was out delivering pressed garments, she grew lonely in the deserted shop, and it was then that she talked to herself, in German. Sometimes, when she became self-conscious or apprehensive about this habit, she pretended that the window-dummy was a person, and talked to it.

She even invented a name for it—“Otto”, after her cousin, the one who had been killed in the air-raid over Dresden, so many years ago. Otto had worn a mustache, too, and they would have been married. But a bomb had fallen from the sky, and when they found Otto in the ruins his head had been cracked like the dummy’s—so—and on his face was the little wooden smile, beneath the waxen pallor.

Anna told Otto all about it, and Otto listened, looking at her through the steam-clouds with his one good eye. Anna knew there was harm in this pretending, but she needed something.

And so life went on, its currents diverted from the tiny side-street where the little tailoring shop stood. The window dummy crouched corpse-like in the corner, Conrad choked his helpless, hopeless wife, and Anna’s beauty faded and disappeared in wisps of hot steam. A fine cloud of gray dust descended to settle over bolts of doth, racks of unclaimed garments, corners of the floor where no feet trod. The dust settled on the shoulders of the window dummy, sifted through Conrad’s hair.

No connoisseur of horrors came to stare at the dummy or examine the sadistic secrets lurking behind the dingy exterior of the shop. Things might have gone on that way for years longer—the dummy could have continued to deteriorate, Conrad's fingers might have eventually left a permanent indentation in Anna's throat, and Anna would gradually have become a whining, half-mad harridan. The cloud of dust might have grown to an inch-deep layer upon the floor. The process could have been carried on indefinitely—but it didn't.

Mr. Smith saw to that.

Mr. Smith stepped into the tailoring shop one bright and sunny afternoon. Anna happened to be behind the counter in the outer room, and when she saw the stranger, one of her hands stole instinctively behind her head to tuck in the straggling hairs on her neck.

For Mr. Smith inspired that sort of self-concsiousness.

Mr. Smith looked prosperous. His sleek, smooth, well-shaven features wore a smile of benevolent affluence. His manicured nails and carefully clipped little gray Van Dyke beard hinted of riches, and his heavy tweed suit fairly shouted wealth to the beholder. The heavy, confident tread of his custom-made shoes was somehow transformed into the merry tinkle of jangling gold-pieces.

He placed one plump hand carefully on the dusty counter, so that the errant sunbeams played over the massive diamond ring upon his third finger, and drummed authoritatively.

"Is the proprietor in?" he asked.

Anna smiled. She looked at his face, looked at the ring, then looked at his face once more.

"I'll call him, sir."

Her step was strangely buoyant as she walked into the steam-filled back room. Conrad was dozing in a chair.

"Erik, there is a customer outside."

He blinked and grunted in annoyance.

"Quickly. He is a very distinguished gentleman, I think."

"Bill collector!" snarled Conrad. But he rose, brushed lint from his shabby coat, and shuffled out.

When he saw the stranger, he straightened up. He tried to look dapper and alert.

"Yes? What can I do for you, Mr—?"

"Smith. Mr. Smith," said the man in tweeds. "Do I understand correctly when I assume that you are prepared to custom-tailor a garment from material of my own selection?"

IT TOOK Erik Conrad several seconds to comprehend that this distinguished elderly gentleman was asking him if he could make a suit.

Then he understood, and immediately his mind conjured up visions of fabulous profits—ten dollars here, fifteen there, another twenty over-all on the basis of the fine fancy words this stranger had used.

"That is right, sir. You would like me to make you a suit? I imagine you'd want something special—"

"Correct. I want something very special."

Mr. Smith smiled with his eyes as well as his mouth when he answered the last question.

"Very well. If you'd give me an idea of what you have in mind, I could show you some very fine material. I've got a wonderful stock of woolens here."

Conrad gabbled on, wondering to himself how he could possibly dare to show any of his shabby bolts to such a rich and elegant customer. He tried to remember fragments of sales-talk long since fallen into disuse; he stalled for time, he perspired, he grew red and impassioned.

Mr. Smith interrupted with an airy wave of the hand. The diamond sparkled as it flashed through the air, and Conrad's faded eyes followed it thirstily, as if seeking to draw fresh fire from its ageless brilliance.

"That won't be necessary," said Mr. Smith. "I have the material already selected. Here, in my bag. Would you care to examine it?"

"Of course," said Conrad. He was relieved and disappointed at the same time; relieved at being spared the ordeal of displaying his meagre stock, but disappointed because he could not profit on the sale of material.

Still, he could make enough on tailoring the garment itself. This was a piece of luck. He eagerly awaited an inspection as Mr. Smith opened the bag and spread a bolt of cloth on the counter. Conrad switched an overhead light into position.

“Take a look,” said Mr. Smith. “There’s enough here for a suit, I believe.”

The cloth was gray. No, it couldn’t be gray, because it had little flecks that reflected the light. It was gold. But gold does not shimmer in rainbow hues. It was a peculiar offshade of tan. But tan is not green, and there was green in this cloth, also some red and blue. No, it was gray. It had to be gray.

Conrad stared at it, stared at the iridescent surface. Mr. Smith seemed to notice nothing unusual, so Conrad forced himself to remain silent—but he had never looked upon this material before, in all his years of tailoring.

HE SPREAD the bolt out and fingered the material. It tingled to the touch, sliding through his hands with an electric crackling. It was not wool, or flannel, or cotton. The more Conrad saw of it, the less sure he became of what he saw. He could not discern a definite weave or texture. Neither eye nor finger could isolate a single thread for examination. Staring at it, Conrad began to experience a peculiar sensation—a tightness in his head.

But it was cloth, and Conrad was a tailor. He could make a suit from it, for this distinguished customer.

The distinguished customer eyed him closely as he examined the garment, and Conrad strove to remain impassive. “It will be difficult to work with so unusual a fabric,” he commented. “Still, I can promise you a suit. Now, if you’ll slip off your coat, sir, I will take the measurements—”

Mr. Smith held up his hand. The diamond’s dazzling reflection gleamed from the single eye of the window dummy in the corner.

"The suit is not for me," he told Conrad.

"No? Then what is it that you wish?"

"The suit is for my son," the elderly man told him.

"Will he come in for a fitting, then?"

"No. It's to be a surprise. You see, I have all of his measurements written down here. Quite exact, they are. I shall require a most unusual fit for this garment."

"And the style?"

"That, too, is noted." Mr. Smith pulled out a sheaf of papers, covered with fine, crabbed script. "You understand all this must be done in strictest confidence, and exactly as I have indicated. I require a special suit. Of course, if you cannot handle it—"

Again the diamond described its glittering arc.

"I'm sure I can," said Conrad, hastily. "Anything you want, I'll give you."

"Money is no object." Mr. Smith smiled confidentially. "I expect you to bill me for your trouble. But these instructions, while they may seem peculiar to you, must be followed to the letter."

Conrad nodded, and the two men bent over the sheaf of papers. Mr. Smith read aloud, slowly, emphasizing certain matters and enlarging upon other details. The measurements must be thus and so. The cut must conform in this wise to the diagram. There must be no lining—none whatsoever—the technical problem involved here would have to be solved by Conrad's own ingenuity. Yes, and another thing; no vest would be required. Of course it might look a bit odd, but again Conrad must strive to turn out a suit of superficially conventional appearance and at the same time work within these limitations. Oh, and here was material for the buttons. Bone, to be turned and bored by hand.

Bye-the-bye, that was another very important stipulation. All work on this suit must be done by hand; no machine shortcuts were permissible. Of course Mr. Smith realized what this entailed, and he expected to pay for the extra attention.

Conrad listened, comprehended finally the physical rudiments of what he must do, if not the reasons inherent in the instructions. But then, understanding was not required of him—merely strict obedience.

"And here are the dates," Mr. Smith concluded. "The times during which you can work. As you see they are most carefully worked out; the hours and even the minutes calculated to a nicety. I beg of you to keep faith with me and sew on this suit only as directed. That is most important."

Here Conrad could not withhold his curiosity. "I can work only at these times?" he asked. "But why?"

Mr. Smith started to frown, then bit his lip until it curled back in a smile. "It is natural that you should ask, I know. All I can tell you is that I happen to be a believer in astrology. As such, I am sure you will humor me in these requests. Set your own price for the service."

Conrad shrugged. So be it. Perhaps this Mr. Smith was mad. But no, with his fine clothes and big diamond—he was only eccentric. The rich are often so.

"Please, not a word to anyone," the customer said, as he turned away from the counter. "Take a month, six weeks, but conform to my schedule and keep silent. I am reposing my trust in you."

"It shall be as you wish." Conrad bent his head in the immemorial obeisance of servant to master, of artisan to aristocrat, of craftsman to burgher, of artist to patron.

So master-aristocrat-burgher-patron Mr. Smith went away from the little shop and Conrad carefully wrapped and put away the strange bolt of cloth.

"Conrad, what is all this?" asked Anna, timidly slipping into the shop from the pressing room at the rear. "Who was that man?"

"Never mind, woman, it doesn't concern you," he told her.

"But I listened—I heard him talking to you about sewing at funny hours —"

"Be silent! It is nothing to you."

"Conrad, I'm afraid. There is something not right in all this, something that will make trouble."

"Trouble!" Conrad went over to her and gripped her thin shoulders. "It is you who makes trouble for me, you little fool!"

He beat her, then, until she whimpered and broke away to huddle in the corner of the shop. Conrad went out and sought the tavern where for a long time he sat mumbling to himself over his beer. In the beer-foam he saw the sparkling of diamonds.

Anna whispered to herself in the darkness, then whispered to Otto the dummy. In Otto's eye she saw not diamonds but the cold, empty glitter of glass.

II

THE spider began to spin.

Squatting in the gloom, the web was woven with crabbed cunning, with squinting skill. Silent and ceaselessly the weaving went, the pattern emerged from fashioning fingers. Days, hours, minutes threaded past on single strands.

There were interruptions and distractions, of course. Conrad did not proceed with his work without making a futile effort to analyze the nature of the peculiar fabric. He placed it under a strong light, even used a pocket magnifying glass in order to observe the threads—but all he could conclude was that this was some cloth foreign to his knowledge. He tried wetting the material and found that moisture left no stain. There was no real reason for his inquiry, of course; but Conrad was curious and the mystery surrounding the making of the suit disturbed him.

He was more violently disturbed, during these weeks, by the sudden appearance of collection agents and small creditors, including the tavern-keeper down the street. He fobbed them off with promises or curses as suited their temperaments, and told himself that he must hasten and complete the garment. Often as he sewed he amused himself by idle computation. Should he charge two hundred dollars for the suit? Or three hundred? Why not—five hundred?

One or twice he tried to hasten his task by working on the suit at times unspecified by Mr. Smith's schedule. Strangely enough, he could not sew—not literally, but his stitches went awry, the cloth slipped through his fingers with that peculiar crackling feel of static electricity, and there were other mishaps. Insensitive as he was, Conrad felt a touch of fear as he considered the nature of the unusual garment he was fashioning. The hints about astrology were a clue, but Conrad guessed at other things. This was a most peculiar job, and a most peculiar suit. It began to take shape under his fingers, and as it did so, fears took shape in Conrad's mind.

Whatever Mr. Smith intended, whatever his plans for the suit, Conrad meant to be out of the deal. All he wanted was to finish it and collect his—yes—five hundred dollars.

There were only two possible answers; either he was working for a crazy man or for a practitioner of Black Magic. Conrad relished neither speculation, and after long hours of toiling and brooding, it was small wonder that at times he lost his temper and raised his hand against Anna.

His wife received another, more thorough beating when at last the suit was completed. It hung from the hook, a strange, shimmering garment with high collar, unusual peaked lapels, a curious button arrangement, and no pockets whatsoever—sleeves of practically simian length, and curiously cuffless trousers. But it was the cloth more than the cut which contributed to the strangeness. In bolt form that fabric had disturbed Conrad's eyes. Now, in the shape of a suit, there was something quite odd and yet impelling to the eye. Conrad found himself glancing again and again at the new suit, trying to visualize it as it might appear when actually worn.

"Looks funny," Anna commented.

"Of course," Conrad nodded. "That's because it isn't pressed. So get busy, woman."

It was after this, when Anna returned and told him the suit just "wouldn't take a press," that Conrad gave his wife a severe beating. When he took the garment and attempted, in vain, to do the job himself, he was tempted to strike Anna again.

Instead, he reminded himself that it would be wise to deliver the suit and collect his payment as soon as possible.

Placing the peculiar coat and trousers in a box, Conrad set out for the address Mr. Smith had entrusted to him. It was in an unfamiliar section of the city, and he decided it would probably be best to go by taxi.

JOLTING through the streets in the cab, Conrad conjured up a vision of the mansion in which Mr. Smith must live. He would open a wrought iron gate, go up a long, tree-bordered walk to the big front door, grasp the bronze knocker and summon a butler. The butler would ask him to wait in the hall, then return to usher him into the big drawing room. And there was Mr. Smith—so—seated before the huge open fireplace. Ah, it was a wonderful house, that one!

The cab jerked to a halt and Conrad was jarred out of his musings. He started as he peered out at the doorway of the ramshackle tenement dwelling huddled between two warehouses on the mean street. For a moment he considered cursing the cab driver, then hastily checked the address. No mistake, this was his destination.

Conrad paid the driver and darted through the entrance, lugging the garment box under his arm. At the tenant register in the hall he pressed the buzzer for 4A. He paused, buzzed again, waited. Sighing, he prepared to trudge up the stairs.

It was not a pleasant ascent; leg-muscles protested, hands clung to rickety railings, nose inhaled the stairwell reek of a dozen compounded unpleasantness. Conrad cursed the eccentricity of his customer. Why should a wealthy man choose to affect such poverty? Unless, of course, he was hiding out here.

There was some mystery connected with this whole affair, and it might very well be that Mr. Smith had his reasons for choosing this squalid lodging.

Was that the answer?

Conrad considered the possibilities as he knocked on the door of 4A. He might be getting mixed up in some dirty business. Then again—

"Come in," said Mr. Smith. "I've been expecting you." The bright smile glittered.

the diamond glittered, and Conrad's forebodings dissipated in the dazzle.

Yet there was nothing bright about the room. Toiling up the stairs, Conrad had wondered if perhaps his client might be concealing a luxurious hideaway beneath a grimy exterior. But this room was as filthy as the tenement in which it rotted.

Conrad noted a wooden table, a cot, a few chairs and a battered second-hand trunk in the corner beneath the single window overlooking the courtyard. A tattered curtain concealed a shallow alcove niche on the far side of the room. There was absolutely no sign of a fireplace, a butler, or any other figment of his day-dreams.

Mr. Smith, however, seemed real enough; and his eagerness at the sight of the box under Conrad's arm was quite genuine.

"You have brought it!" he boomed. "Splendid! I can hardly believe that you managed, with all the difficult stipulations I found it necessary to impose."

"It wasn't easy," Conrad replied. "Mighty strange, that material. And you wouldn't believe the trouble I had—"

"On the contrary, I would readily believe every word." Mr. Smith smiled and rubbed his hands, While the diamond zigzagged through the gloom. "I hadn't really dared to hope for success, and yet you say the suit is complete?"

"Just like you ordered."

"Fine. You have no idea how I've waited, what this means to me. And to my son."

"Your son—where is he?" Conrad inquired.

"That does not matter, does it?"

“But don’t you want a fitting, to make sure everything’s all right?”

“I’ll take your word for it,” said Mr. Smith. “If you followed instructions, the fit will be perfect. As a matter of fact, if you hadn’t done exactly what I directed, you wouldn’t have been able to complete the garment. So I know it’s right.”

“Thanks.” Conrad bowed his head in acknowledgment. “I did my best to turn out a good job.”

“I know you did, and it is I who should be thanking you.” Mr. Smith also bobbed his head, at the same time extending both hands. “Now, if you’ll be good enough to leave the suit with me—”

The diamond came dose to the box, but Conrad drew back. “Wait a minute,” he said. “What about money?”

“Ah, yes, the fee. How much did you say it was?”

Erik Conrad took a deep breath of musty air. “Five hundred dollars,” he murmured.

“Very reasonable,” commented his customer. “Send the bill along and I’ll take care of it.”

“Yes?”

“I have the bill made out, right here.” Conrad fumbled in his pocket. “And if you don’t mind, I need the money badly, and I was hoping that maybe today—”

Mr. Smith shook his head, slowly but emphatically. “I’m afraid that’s out of the question. After all, it’s not customary for one to pay tradesmen on delivery, is it? Why not mail your bill in the regular fashion—you’ll get your money, never fear.” Again he sought to take the package from Conrad, but the tailor retreated to the curtained alcove. “I must have my money first,” he persisted. “Look, if this was a regular job I wouldn’t mind, but I’ve spent all these weeks working. And I have bills to pay. You wouldn’t understand, because you’re rich, but it’s different with me. I got to eat.”

“My dear fellow.” Mr. Smith advanced, cordially confidential. “On the contrary, I can understand your situation only too well. For it so happens that at the moment, I am in the same fix."

"You?"

"Precisely." Mr. Smith grinned as if he had just told the biggest joke in the world. "Oh, don't misunderstand. In a very short while I should be in funds again. As soon as my son and I are re-united, in fact. But until then, I'm far from rich. In fact, I have no money, no money at all. So you'll have to wait—"

"But how can you say that?" Conrad wailed. "A man like you, wearing a big diamond?"

Mr. Smith drew the ring from his finger and tossed it on the table. It glinted its way over the wood, then rolled to the floor.

Mr. Smith did not bother to pick it up. "A fake," he said. "A cheap, synthetic fake. Oh, at one time I had another, and the stone was real enough. But I was forced to place it in pawn, along with almost everything I possessed, in order to continue my studies. I have spent every penny on my son. Now, please, be reasonable and give me that suit."

Again he reached for the package and again Conrad retreated—this time backing through the curtain veiling the alcove until his progress was halted by a waist-high obstruction.

Conrad turned and found himself confronting a gleaming refrigerator—a big one, and obviously brand new.

"What's this?" the tailor accused. "If you're so hard up for money, why do you need a big new refrigerator?"

"It's not for me," Mr. Smith placated, hastily. "I had to buy it for my son. Like the suit. Now if you'll come over here and show me—" and he attempted to grasp Conrad by the arm and draw him away.

But Conrad shrugged him off, still staring at the gleaming refrigerator with a look of mingled puzzlement and disdain.

"Poor!" he muttered. "Why, I'll bet it's full of fancy food and—"

Impulsively, the little tailor yanked at the handle. The door opened and he stared inside. An icy blast fanned his face.

There were no shelves in the refrigerator. The six-foot high interior consisted of bare walls framing a single object. That object was the rigid, frozen body of a man.

The corpse stood upright, a blue and naked horror with a youthful face congealed into the age-old grimace of death.

“Close that door!” screamed Mr. Smith.

Conrad released the handle and jumped away. He pressed his back against the wall and bared his teeth. “Murderer!” he gasped. “So that’s it!”

“No, you don’t understand. I’m no murderer. He died a natural death. Can’t you see? He is my son. He is the one I was working for, planning for. That’s why I had you make the suit. It’s for him. You can’t stop me now, no one can stop me.”

Mr. Smith advanced. His hands worked at his sides, then rose. “Give me the suit,” he said. “Give it to me.”

Conrad tried to move away, but Mr. Smith blocked his path. “Give it to me,” he repeated. And his hands moved out.

IT HAD grown dark in the murky little room. Erik Conrad saw a diamond eye wink up through the shadows on the floor. It was watching him—watching him as he stood there with a dead man behind him and a madman before him. The dead man had grimaced, and now the madman was grimacing, too. Grimacing, and reaching for Erik Conrad in the dark, as the diamond eye stared.

There was nothing else. There was no five hundred dollars. There was no butler. There was no justice or mercy or hope. Only this maniac trapping him in the blackness and now he was hitting him across the side of the face, and from far away a panting voice said over and over again, “Give it to me, you fool, give it to me, you fool, give it to me, you fool—”

Until Erik Conrad struck back. The pudgy madman tried to choke him, tried to kick him, tried to squeeze him, and there was nothing else to do but strike back. Conrad said, “Let me go,” but Mr. Smith didn’t even hear him because he began to scream and claw at Conrad’s eyes. There was nothing else to do but strike back and it was only natural that Conrad pick up the wooden chair and swing it. He felt it land on Mr. Smith’s head and Mr. Smith’s scream died to a moan. Conrad raised the chair again and brought it down. Mr. Smith’s moan died to a gurgle. Conrad struck again, and again, and again, feeling the chair splinter and come apart in his hands. Mr. Smith’s gurgle died.

And so did Mr. Smith.

Erik Conrad didn’t know that until afterwards, of course. Not until he shook off his hysteria and turned on the light and bent down, panting, to examine Mr. Smith? crushed and battered features as he la; sprawled on the grimy floor. Then the tailor understood.

He was a murderer.

The diamond eye had seen it all. The diamond eye knew it was a mistake, an accident. The diamond eye knew that Mr. Smith was a madman who preserved his son’s body in a refrigerator and had ordered a suit made up out of his own insane impulses. The diamond eye understood what ad happened.

But the diamond eye was a fake. And the murder was real. Soon the police would come—

Erik Conrad rose, grabbed at the suit package, and headed for the door. He had to get out of here. Everything was ruined now, everything was spoiled, there was no money, and he had risked his life forever in coming here. It was—

At the door, Conrad halted. He noted once again the presence of the battered trunk in the comer. A wild hope rose, and Conrad knelt.

The trunk was unlocked and opened easily. Conrad threw back the lid. This was the treasure-chest, the secret hiding-place, the source of riches; it had to be, it was only logical and right and just. Eagerly he surveyed the contents of the old trunk.

“Books!” Conrad groaned. “Nothing but books!”

But wait—some of them were quite old. Some of them had iron hasps and locks. Some of them had worn vellum inserts. Didn’t people collect old books? Conrad seemed to remember reading about auctions and sales at one time—there were people who foolishly paid a lot of money for things like that.

He stacked an armful hastily and stood up. After all, it wasn’t really stealing. Mr. Smith owed him five hundred dollars which he would never collect. Surely Conrad was entitled to a few wormy old books. These volumes were no longer of any use to Mr. Smith. Dead men read no tales.

Conrad stepped into the hall, carrying the suit box and the books. The hall was dark and still as he tiptoed downstairs. No one had seen him come in, no one saw him leave. The taxi-driver wouldn’t remember him, would never connect Conrad with the killing in the ordinary course of events.

The ordinary course of events—

In that phrase Conrad recognized the key to salvation. He must only remember to behave naturally as if nothing had happened, to return to the shop and go about his business in the normal way, and there would be no trouble at all.

Conrad walked down the street, a little tailor carrying his bundles. He paused at corners, jostled and was jostled in return, obeyed traffic signals like the good citizen he was, and eventually arrived at his shop. Strangely enough, he was trembling.

The place was dark and nobody saw him enter. Nobody except Otto, the window-dummy. And Otto’s eye, like Mr. Smith’s diamond, was glass.

Conrad smiled as he shuffled down the hall into the bedroom, Glass. It was all glass, everything was a fake. And if everything was a fake, then nothing had happened. He hadn’t killed anyone.

“It’s a fake, just a fake,” Conrad murmured to himself as he fell face downward on the bed. “Nothing to worry about—it was all a fake!” Then he began to cry.

III

CONRAD wasn't conscious of the exact moment of transition from tears to terror. Sometime he must have roused himself and switched on the bedroom light. Somehow he must have begun to paw idly through the stack of battered books. Somewhere he must have noticed the volume printed in heavy black-letter German, and he had begun to read the text.

It was then that he remembered his early speculations concerning Mr. Smith; the possibilities of the mysterious stranger's interest in Black Magic. Mr. Smith had proven himself a madman, to be sure, but still, these volumes were books on sorcery. The treatise Conrad was reading dealt with spells and charms, with formulae and incantations designed to raise up demons. Erik Conrad found himself stumbling over the pronunciation of strange names—Azaziel, Samael, Yaddith. There was nothing particularly disconcerting about the way in which the book was written; everything was set down in a straightforward, matter-of-fact style. Only the subject-matter itself was grotesque and irrational.

Perhaps it was this very circumstance which caused Conrad's hands to tremble as he held the tome. This treatise on the summoning of evil entities was written in the style of a cookbook, filled with recipes. Take the maiden's blood, take the heart torn from the infant's breast, take the eyes of the hanged man—mix and stir in the cauldron, add the corpse-fat, and evoke your friend. Simple. Easy. Anyone can do it.

It was absurd, it was insane, it was—convincing. Men had written this book, men had read dais book, men had used this book for centuries. Men like Mr. Smith, whatever his real name might be. They had used this book to produce—what?

It was then that Erik Conrad began to tremble. And it was then that Anna returned from her evening shopping; returned quietly and tiptoed into the room so as not to disturb Conrad as he read.

"Erik—" she murmured.

The tailor’s face contorted with startled fear. He rose from the bed with a gasp which, as he faced and recognized the intruder, became transformed into a snarl of rage.

“What do you mean by sneaking in like that?” he choked. “You stupid fool!”

“But what is wrong? I only wanted to ask about the suit. You sold it, eh?”

Conrad indicated the box on the bed. “Does this look like I sold it?” he demanded.

“Was something wrong, then?”

“No, nothing was wrong. Don’t bother me, woman!”

“But the money—I thought—”

“Be quiet!” Conrad glowered at her, but Anna persisted.

“After you left,” she continued, “I told Mister Schwenk the butcher—he come after the money for the meat, you know—that he should come back tomorrow because you were getting paid by a customer. So—”

“You told him!” The tailor gripped Anna by the shoulder. “But I warned you to say nothing to anyone. Nobody should know about the suit, understand? Do not mention it to a soul, do not mention it to me again, ever. And get it out of my sight, quick.”

Anna sank, gasping with incomprehension, in this torrent of violence. But Conrad’s clawlike fingers bore her up. “Not a word!” he screamed. “Now take the suit and burn it, woman! Burn it in the furnace. And never speak of it again. Forget everything. Forget that I made it, forget Mr. Smith, forget that I went out today!”

He raised the box from the bed and thrust it into Anna’s arms. Then he slapped her across the face once, twice, three times. The third time he brought his hand away wet with tears. A fourth blow would bring blood, and for a moment he was tempted to deliver it.

Then suddenly all purpose left him. “Get out!” he screamed. “Get out and leave me alone.”

Anna stumbled out and closed the door. Conrad slumped to the bed once more and returned to his reading. He read for a long time. There were many subjects of outré interest.

Evocations—the runes of pestilence—the resurrection of vanished youth —the cloak of invisibility—the raising of the dead—the preservation of corpses and the use of mantic arts in restoring a semblance of life—the weaving of the cloth of Fate—

Conrad read the last sections again. It was all explained in prosaic detail. The bargain with the Powers. The sacrifice. The granting of the boon, the woven strands of Immortality with which to cloak the preserved corpse; The finished garment to impart life to any wearer bearing human guise. Conrad read it, and Mr. Smith had read it, too. He had read it and acted on it.

NOW at last, Erik Conrad knew the secret of the suit, the secret of the frozen corpse, the secret of the weaving and the shaping. Mr. Smith had hoped to bring life back to his son.

Of course the old man had been mad, just as the author of this book had been mad. Best now to burn the book, and the other volumes, in case there should ever be any tracing, any questions.

Conrad loaded his arms with the ancient tomes and plodded down the dark hall to the basement stairs. He descended, knelt before the furnace, opened the door, recoiled momentarily before the blast of heat; then tossed the books into the fire.

There was no trace, no single shred left of the strange suit. Apparently there had been no burning cloth odor, either. Anna had done her job well.

Anna—where was Anna? Conrad climbed the stairs, peered into the kitchen. Deserted. And the hall was dark. Was she out in the shop? She must be, but why?

Quietly, Erik Conrad walked down the hall. Yes, she was in the shop, he could hear her whispering. Talking to herself. He could distinguish words, phrases.

“. . . hates me, Otto. You’re the . . . friend I’ve got . . . going crazy . . . you had lived. Wish . . . could talk . . . tonight . . . hit me. Sometimes . . . dead.”

She was in there, talking to that window-dummy again! Was the whole world going mad?

He moved quickly into the shop, switching on the light. Anna turned. She was huddled in a heap at the feet of the wax dummy. Conrad stared at her, then at the mannikin. There was something strange about it, something different. It took a moment for him to comprehend and then he realized that Anna had put the crazy suit on the dummy.

“What are you doing?” Conrad was surprised when his voice came out so quietly. “Didn’t I tell you to burn the suit?” Why he was talking calmly, sensibly.

“I was going to. I didn’t mean any harm. I just wanted to look at it again—you acted so funny about it all that I wondered if there was a secret.”

Conrad nodded, still very quietly. He even helped Anna to her feet as she continued.

“So I thought I could see it better if I put it on Otto—I mean, on the dummy here. Did you notice it in the dark, Erik? It looks queer—so glowing—”

Conrad was gentle with her, quite gentle. “Anna,” he said, “this is not wise of you. To disobey my orders. To pry into things that do not concern you. To talk to clothing dummies. Are you sure you feel all right, Anna?”

She hid her face. “I know,” she sighed. “Sometimes I wonder if I’m out of my mind. But you are cruel, Erik. You beat me.”

“I will not beat you now,” said Conrad. “If you will burn the suit at once. I only hit you because I was afraid. Perhaps if I tell you, you can understand.” It was odd how calm he felt, how quietly he could talk like this to her now.

“You see, the suit must be burned. And no one must ever hear about it, or about Mr. Smith. Because this afternoon we quarreled, and I killed him.”

“You killed—?”

"An accident. Yes, an accident. He tried to take the suit away, it was self-defense, Anna. Mr. Smith was crazy. He had his son's body in a refrigerator and he thought the suit would bring the boy back to life." Anna stared into his eyes. Conrad nodded gravely. "So you see, it just happened that way. But the police wouldn't believe me if they knew. That's why I wanted the suit burned. That's why I wanted you to forget. Now. Do you understand me?"

"Yes." Anna came dose. "And I'm sorry, I didn't know what was upsetting you, Erik. Only—"

"Only?"

"Only I think you should tell the police. Tell them the truth, tell them everything. I'll make them believe you. Please, Erik! You cannot carry such a sin on your soul forever. For my sake, Erik, tell them what happened, that it was self-defense. I—I couldn't bear to go on living with a murderer."

As she spoke, Conrad stared over her shoulder at the clothing dummy. It slumped ridiculously in the corner, its cracked waxen features stolid, its glass eye gleaming. The impossible suit hung in ill-fitting folds across its shoulders, giving an apelike aspect to the arms. All this Erik saw, and at the same time he was conscious of listening to Anna. Obviously she was losing her sanity. Obviously she would never cease to urge him to confess and might even end up by going to the police herself with the story.

SO, OBVIOUSLY he must remain calm.

Remain calm now as he moved back to the wall and switched off the light. There. Now the shop was pitch dark. No one could see in from the street. No one could see as he did the obvious thing—take Anna by the throat and squeeze, so, and squeeze and squeeze—

"Help!" The gasp came out, and he had to squeeze harder, not so calmly. "Erik—stop—oh—save me—Otto—save me!" Crazy, to call on the dummy for help. Erik squeezed until she sagged and he could stare over her shoulders, stare into the pitch dark, which wasn't really pitch dark at all because something was glowing over there in the corner. Something with arms and legs. It was the suit, of course, Anna had said the suit glowed in the dark, and it did. Like phosphorus, like silver, like gold, glowing brighter and brighter, and every time that Erik squeezed the glow increased.

It was only the crazy suit, the crazy suit ordered by the crazy man for a crazy purpose; there was nothing to fear. Erik Conrad could bring death to Anna, but the suit could not bring life. It couldn't!

But Conrad wasn't calm any more. Not when he saw the silver arms stretch, saw the silver legs race forward, saw the leering eye of glass gleaming and flashing with a light that pierced brain and being.

He let Anna go, and turned to flee. Something caught him in the dark, then. There was nothing left to do but scream, and he tried that, but too late. There was a gleaming and a pressure and a spangle of silver fire that burst into final blackness.

Then there was nothing.

Only a connoisseur of horrors would have appreciated Erik Conrad's window-dummy as it loomed over him, clad in the silver suit of enchanted Life—with its waxen fingers clamped in a grip of death about Erik Conrad's throat.

"The Devil With You!"

When the magicians descended on the Hotel Flopmoor for their annual convention they decided to raise hell—literally! . . .

IT MUST have been the fickle finger of Fate.

There is no other explanation possible. It was the fickle finger of Fate, moving at random over the map, which descended upon Davenport, Iowa, plunged through the roof of Moe Hare's Furniture Factory, tapped Bill Dawson on the head and granted him a two-week vacation with absolutely nothing to do.

Destiny's capricious phalange pointed the way to New York, and Bill went there. After all, why not? He was twenty-six, an orphan, unattached, and he'd been reading back issues of The New Yorker at the public library for years. It might be a fine place to spend a vacation. So Bill reasoned, or thought he reasoned—but actually, it was Fate's fingernail scratching away inside his brain.

It followed him on his trip, sat up with him on the day-coach, yanked him into a taxicab at Grand Central, and directed him at random to one of the big city's famed hostelries—the Hotel Flopmoor by name. The fickle finger guided his hand as he registered, indicating room 522. It notched into his collar, guided him through the streets that first evening, and turned his head away from any sights that might prove interesting.

Fate had plans for Mr. Bill Dawson—big plans. And the finger was very definitely on him. It rode back up with Bill on the elevator that night, after a stroll down 42nd Street. It almost helped him undress, in its eagerness to get him into bed. As a last gesture, it was the fickle finger of Fate that tucked the covers around Bill's neck and stroked his forehead into a dreamless sleep.

At least, Bill thought it was dreamless, until he opened his eyes. It seemed as if his wristwatch indicated midnight. It seemed as though somebody had switched on the bedlamp. It seemed as though there was a stranger in bed with him.

Bill lay on his side and stared. Yes, there was a man lying in bed beside him—a long, thin man whose long, thin legs were desperately tangled in the blankets.

The long, thin man had a long, thin face, and his sardonic grey eyes snapped behind gleaming spectacles as he favored Bill with a long, thin smile.

"Pardon me," said the intruder. "I don't believe we've met. My name is Marmaduke Hicks."

BILL GOGGLED, but not for long.

For a second voice came from somewhere behind his back. Bill whirled in the bed. To his utter dismay he found himself staring into another face lying on that side; a fat, moon-face, supported by a pudgy body. The smiling little fat man brushed a chubby hand through a tangle of red hair. He ignored Bill's gaze and peered over at the thin gentleman.

"Hicks!" he shouted, cordially. "How did you get here?"

"Crawled through the transom, Tubby."

"Good for you," said Tubby. "I've been hiding in the closet for ever so long. Think he's spotted us?"

"Who? You mean old Bipple? He's too drunk."

“I wish I was,” said the fat man, wistfully. “I’ve never been too drunk.” He smiled at Bill. “Pardon me, stranger, but you don’t happen to have a little something around, do you?

Bill sat up in bed and grimaced.

“Anti-social, eh?” grunted Mr. Hicks. “Guess there’s nothing we can do about it, then.”

“You can get out of my bed,” Bill suggested. “I want to go to sleep.”

“Hear that, Hicks?” asked the fat man. “He wants to sleep.”

“Well, let him. I’m sure I won’t disturb the lazy swine. But it’s a fine thing, I must say, when a host hasn’t the simple courtesy to stay awake and entertain guests when they drop in on him.”

“We could sing him a lullaby,” suggested Tubby, with elaborate irony. “Or tell him a bedtime story.”

“Listen here,” Bill grated. “I don’t know who you are or what you’re doing in my room, but you’ll have to get out. You two are either drunk or crazy, and I don’t care which.”

“I care,” replied Mr. Hicks. “And I’d much rather be drunk. Come to think of it, I am.”

“Now, look,” Bill began—but his tirade was interrupted. An ominous knocking shook the door of the room.

“Open up in there!” shouted a voice.

“Good Lord,” whispered Mr. Hicks. “It’s Bipple!” He slithered down in the bed and pulled the covers over his head. The fat man attempted to follow suit, but too late. For a key grated in the lock and a man entered the room. He switched on the light, revealing his harsh, square-jawed countenance to Bill and Tubby.

“Aha!” The square jaw waggled accusingly. “Caught you! Telbertson, what are you doing in that bed?”

He addressed the fat man, who timidly squeaked out a reply. “That’s a very personal question,” he said, “But if you must know, I’m having a baby.”

"Thieves! Swindlers! Deadbeats!" The manager's voice rose with each word. "For two years you've been sneaking from room to room in this hotel, moving in with guest after guest, ducking the house detective, ducking me. You have ruined my temper, broken my health, driven me to the horrors of drink."

As if to prove his point, Manager Bipple produced a flask from his side pocket and gave a convincing imitation of a man being driven to drink. It needed no glance at his flushed face to see that this was not his first drink; only rage had kept him sober.

Tubby Telbertson and Marmaduke Hicks rose from the bed as one man and approached the manager. "Let's settle this affair man to man," Hicks coaxed. "Over a friendly drink."

He took the flask, used it, and passed it to Tubby. After a long time, the flask returned to Bipple, who drank again.

"You're a good sport," Hicks said. "Am I?" asked the manager, with a tipsy giggle.

"Best sport I know. And I've got a sporting proposition for you. We owe you for two years of room rent. What say we play you for it—double or nothing?"

"Oh no you don't!"

Tubby patted the manager on the shoulder. "Come now, that isn't sportsman Bipple talking. Here, have another drink. You got the dice, Hicks?" Hicks nodded.

"Well, suppose you phone room service for a quart of rye and some ginger ale?"

BIPPLE RAISED his hand to protest, but Hicks waved him aside with a gracious leer. "It goes on our bill, naturally," he explained. "Drinks on us. Well, let's get started."

Bill Dawson clambered out of bed and gathered his pajama tops about him in a flurry of righteous indignation. "You mean you're going to play dice here in my room?” he asked. “I demand that you get out and let me go to sleep. I don’t know whose idea of a joke this is, but it’s my room and I want you to leave.”

“It’s not your room.” This, surprisingly enough from Bipple. “It’s my room. I own this hotel and I can shoot dice wherever I please.”

“Good old Bipple! Spoken like a true host!” Hicks patted the inebriated manager on the back, then squatted on the floor and produced a pair of dice. “Now, how much do we owe you?” he asked.

“Let’s see.” Bipple fumbled for a bill as Tubby phoned room service. “Ah, here we are. Comes to exactly four thousand, six hundred and forty-three dollars and fifty cents,” Bipple droned. “That includes the liquor you just ordered, of course.”

“Fair enough. Shall we say double or nothing?”

“Well—” Tipsy as he was, the manager hesitated. Bill chose that moment to open his mouth again.

“Get out of here!” he yelled. “Don’t be a fool!”

“Nobody tells me what to do,” Bipple retorted. “Of course I’ll make it double ’r nothing. Whose dice?” Hicks, Bipple and Tubby knelt and peered at the cubes. Tubby scooped them up in one pink paw and rattled them, rolled them in an ivory pattern across the rug.

“Seven!” the fat man shouted. And seven it was. “You lose, Bipple.”

A tap on the door sent Bill on his way. He half-expected to see a couple of uniformed men bearing strait-jackets, and in his present confusion he would probably have donned one himself. But it was only the bellboy bringing up the drinks.

The bellboy poured expertly, and before Bill could protest he found a tall glass of rye and soda thrust in his hand. He gulped air, then his drink. The bellboy stood smirking at him.

“Will that be all, sir?” he inquired. Tubby nudged Mr. Hicks. “Wants his tip, I guess,” he whispered.

Hicks nodded, “Look, boy,” he began. “I’ll shoot you for the tip. My dollar against your quarter.”

“Well—” The bellboy hesitated.

“Go ahead,” Bipple boomed, downing his rye with more alacrity than ginger-ale. “See what a sport I am? Just lost over four thousand to my good friends here. Go ahead and shoot!”

THE BELLBOY squatted. Dice rolled. Bill edged closer. This was madness, but interesting.

“Three!” yelled Tubby. “You lose the quarter. Shoot you for another, same odds.” The bellboy lost a dollar as fat little Mr. Telbertson’s fingers thumped the dice in a savage wardance to the Congo Goddess of Fortune.

And the rye changed hands. Bill, dazed, automatically accepted another drink. It descended on his stomach like a blazing meteor and he looked on with new interest. Thin Mr. Hicks was shaking now, and the bellboy had just lost his uniform.

Manager Bipple drew a roll of bills from his pocket and they disappeared as the dice were cast.

“Roll them?” offered Hicks to Bill. The young man took the dice in nerveless fingers.

“Drink up!” Bipple urged. “What you shooting for?”

“How about his hotel bill?” asked Hicks.

Bill cast a seven.

“You win!” Tubby nudged him and whispered, “Say fifty dollars on this one. Bill shot and made a six, then failed to make a nine. And Tubby had the dice again.

“I’ve got no money,” Manager Bipple confessed, downing a drink. “You boys have cleaned me.”

“Shoot you for the bridal suite,” Tubby offered. “And two brides.” He cast and threw an eleven.

“What a lucky dog!” moaned the manager. “I’ve lost our best rooms.”

“Take the dice,” Tubby urged; pressing the now overheated cubes into Bill’s hand. “We’ve got to hold this winning streak.”

"Nothing to bet any more," Bipple sighed, in drunken woe.

"Shoot him for the hotel," Hicks suggested to Bill. "Come on, Bipple, be a sport."

"Wager my hotel—are you crazy?" Bipple pleaded.

"Your hotel won't look much good after Tubby here tears out the bridal suite," Hicks reminded him. "Better get it back or lose the whole thing."

"All right," Bipple conceded. "It's a bet."

"Shoot him for the hotel, Bill," Tubby yelled. "Go ahead."

Bill's gaze was blurred, his hand was shaky. He threw the dice and watched them hit the rug through a haze. Four and—three.

"Seven!"

"You won!" Hicks exulted. "You won the hotel!"

"Well, isn't that nice," said Bill.

And promptly fainted.

WHEN BILL opened his eyes he expected everything to be all right. He'd be back in his comfortable bed, the two drunks and the manager would be gone, and the dream would be over.

As it happened, things proceeded a bit differently. To be exact, when Bill opened his eyes he got an ice-bucket of cold water full in the face.

"That'll bring him around," he heard Tubby mutter. "A little water always does the trick."

"Trick!" grumbled a voice identified as belonging to Manager Bipple. "Don't mention that word to me."

Bill sat up and brushed the water from his face and pajama-tops with a towel Hicks thrust into his hand.

"I'm sorry," he said.

"For passing out?" Tubby chuckled. "Think nothing of it. I do it every night—eventually."

"No, not that." Bill strode over to Mr. Bipple. "I mean, about the dice game. Winning your hotel from you. Of course I wasn't serious. I have no intention of holding you to the bet." Manager Bipple shook his head and smiled. "On the contrary, my dear boy, I insist! You won the hotel fair and square and it's all yours."

Bill blinked as he saw that Bipple was serious. Not so Mr. Hicks.

"This calls for a little drink," he said. "All that water makes me thirsty. Tubby, do the honors."

Tubby did. By the time Bill had donned dry pajama-tops the fresh highballs were ready, and so were his companions.

"Here's to our new manager!" Tubby toasted. "May he enjoy his stay here as much as we do."

"That's very generous of you," Bill said, thoughtfully, "but I'm not so sure. You see, I know nothing at all about running a hotel. It must be a pretty big job."

"Nothing to it," Hicks told him. "Calls for no intelligence at all. Look at Bipple here—he got away with it for years."

"But there's five hundred rooms in the Flopmoor. A ballroom and a banquet hall and dozens of bellboys and waiters and cooks and chambermaids—"

"—and millions of cockroaches," Tubby finished for him. "So what? They all know their jobs. All you have to do is sit back and watch the money roll in. My boy, you're in business."

"We'll stick around and help you out, too," Mr. Hicks offered. "I happen to be on friendly terms with most of the staff here—"

"—particularly the chambermaids," Tubby again concluded. "Yes, Bill, we won't let you down. So stop worrying and drink up, I say."

BILL DRANK up, but he didn't stop worrying. He turned to Mr. Bipple, painfully aware of a smug smile on that worthy's face.

"See here, Mr. Bipple," he said. "I may be the new owner of this hotel, but that doesn't mean I want to be the active manager. Suppose I make you a deal? You can name your own terms, if you like. How about staying on here as manager?"

To everyone's surprise, Bipple shook his head. The smile faded from his face and for a moment he seemed almost sober.

"No!" he declared. "Absolutely no! I'm getting out of here before tomorrow morning and that's that!"

"Wait," Marmaduke Hicks broke in. "What's the big idea? Why all the rush?"

"The Convention starts tomorrow," Bipple explained. "And I want no part of it."

"What Convention?"

"The Magician's Convention, that's what. And I'm getting out of here before they get in. You won't catch me going through what I did last year. Whassa matter, don't you remember it?"

"Come to think of it, Tubby and I weren't around that week last year. We went to Florida for a change and a rest."

"The nightclubs got our change," Tubby explained, "and the racetracks got the rest." He peered thoughtfully at Mr. Bipple over the top of his glass. "So that's it! I thought it was funny—you giving up the hotel so gracefully. You wanted to get away from this Convention, eh? Why?"

"You'll find out," Mr. Bipple assured him.

"But please," Bill broke in. "You can't rush off this way and leave me holding the bag."

"What bag?" asked Mr. Hicks, with sudden interest. But Bill continued his plea.

"Surely it can't be so bad that you won't even tell me what to expect," he went on.

"It can!" Bipple shivered. "Why do you suppose I started drinking tonight? Even thinking about those awful magicians is enough to give me the shakes. You wanna know something? I'm glad I lost the hotel—glad, I tell you! Glad, glad, glad!" With each repetition of the word, Manager

Bipple had edged closer to the door. Now he opened it and darted out into the hall.

"Goodbye!" he called. "And watch out for Dritch! Whatever you do, beware of Dritch!"

The door slammed behind him. Hicks stared at Tubby, who passed the look along to Bill.

"What's a Dritch?" he asked.

"I don't know," Hicks confessed. "But we'll find out. We'll find out lots of things; don't worry."

"But I am worried. I can't run this hotel alone."

"Tubby and I will help you. First thing to do, of course, is go down to the wine-cellar and take inventory."

"Never mind the wine-cellar. What I want to do is sit down and have a long talk with somebody who really knows the score about this hotel. The assistant manager or the maître de hotel, some one like that. If we're expecting a convention tomorrow I should be prepared. And I'd like to find out what made Bipple so frightened of these magicians."

"This is no time of night to be thinking about conventions," Tubby grumbled. "Besides, all those people you mentioned must be home in bed. Or somewhere in bed, anyway."

"How about Annabel?" suggested the thin partner.

"The very thing!" Tubby exclaimed. "She's not in bed anywhere, is she? I mean, she's on duty downstairs all night."

"Well, call her and tell her to come on up."

"She might misunderstand."

"That wouldn't stop Annabel. Besides, you can always say the manager wants to see her."

Tubby wobbled over to the telephone and called.

Hicks offered Bill another drink. Bill's acceptance was almost automatic. Only a part of his mind seemed to be functioning; just enough for him to ask, "Who is this Annabel?"

“Old Bipple’s niece. She runs the cigar counter in the lobby. One of our favorite people, that girl—you’ll like her, wait and see.”

“But why drag her up to my room in the middle of the night?”

“I could think of several reasons, all good,” Hicks observed. “However, right now you want to talk to somebody about running this hotel. Annabel’s your girl. She’s been here for over a year and she knows the whole routine inside and out.”

“She said she’ll be right up,” Tubby called, from the phone. “So we’d better mix another drink, fast.”

THE PARTNERS mixed another drink, fast. Bill sat down on the bed and began to dress with equal haste. He felt, somehow, as though he were beginning to learn a lot about life in the raw, and wondered what he’d learn about life with clothes on.

He had learned about drinking, about gambling, about the pleasures of taking things easy. His education, however, still lacked one most important feature. No man is really educated until he knows about women. Therefore some schools of thought maintain that no man is really educated.

At any rate, Bill Dawson was now about to discover an entire new section of existence—the eternal, infernal feminine.

There was a soft knock and the door opened. A girl entered the room.

“Hello, Annabel,” Hicks cried, genially. “What took you so long?”

“Just stopped on the way for a drink and a chaser.”

“Ten minutes just for a drink?”

“No. But it took me a while to get rid of the chaser. He was very persistent.”

“Hi!” piped Tubby. “Just in time.” He handed her a glass which she accepted eagerly. She peered over the rim at Bill.

“Who’s the new face?” she inquired, casually.

“Excuse me,” said Bill, rising. “My name’s Bill Dawson.”

“I’m Annabel Bipple.”

“Pleased to meet you.”

“You should be,” the girl observed. For a moment they stood eyeing each other in appraising silence.

Bill saw that the girl was tall and slender, with the type of figure which is described by female fashion authorities as “interesting” and more exactly characterized by men in the form of a shrill whistle. Annabel’s hair had evidently been offered a choice of becoming either blonde or auburn, and had finally adopted the best of both shades. Her face contained the usual combination of eyes, lips and nose. But behind that tilted nose was determination, beyond those full red lips was character, and beyond those deep violet eyes lay a strange new world of hidden, whimsical beauty. A lovely girl but somehow dangerous, Bill decided.

Annabel, meanwhile, was critically interested in this strange staring creature before her. He was tall, blond and young—but there are many men who answer to that description. Yet for some inexplicable reason, Bill intrigued her. She decided it must be his face. There was something incomplete, unfinished, about it; something missing in the man’s eyes. He looked unawakened and lonely.

Among Annabel’s many weaknesses was a liking for unfortunates. Despite her carefully-calculated air of hardness and sophistication, she was a sucker for pigeons, alley-cats, and lost dogs. And this was surely one of the lost dogs of the world. The realization that she felt an instant attraction towards this man caused her to adopt an air of defensive mockery. She knew she had designs on this man, and she was a finished artist. Consequently, Bill was already a finished man.

Annabel broke the silence at last. Furious with herself for feeling sympathetic, she disguised her attitude in an outward insolence. “Well,” she asked, “have you finished your inspection? Or must I go into my dance?”

“You were staring at me, too,” Bill flashed, defensively.

“Was I? Well you can hardly blame me. Who is this creature, Hicks? Did you suddenly decide to start a rescue mission?”

“Not at all,” the tall gentleman assured her. “As a matter of fact, Bill is the new manager of the Flopmoor.”

CAREFULLY, Hicks explained to her just what had happened earlier in the evening. Annabel listened closely and nodded.

“What a tragedy,” she mused. “My poor uncle out of a job and the whole hotel at the mercy of this—this—”

“Hey,” Bill interrupted. “It’s not that bad. After all, I’m not a complete idiot.”

“You mean there’s something missing?”

“Please, no insults. After all, this may come as quite a shock to you—I mean, about your uncle and all—but at least you might be courteous about it.”

“I am courteous,” Annabel observed, deliberately goading him into a rage. “Otherwise I’d probably burst out laughing whenever I looked at you, you long-legged squirt.”

“Who’s a long-legged squirt?”

“You are.”

“Listen,” said Bill, goaded by alcohol and exasperation alike. “Nobody can get away with calling me a name like that. I have half a mind to do something about it.”

“You may have half a mind,” the girl retorted, “but what can you do about it?”

Bill stepped forward, grabbed the bewildered Annabel by the shoulders, propelled her to a chair, sat down, turned her over, and applied the palm of his hand repeatedly to the most likely available spot.

“This is what they do in the movies,” he muttered, grimly.

“Well, I’ll never go to the movies with you,” the girl gasped. Then, “Ouch—you’re hurting me!” Her hardboiled exterior was breaking down rapidly. So, she feared, was something else.

"Squirt, eh?" Bill muttered. "I'll show you!" He emphasized each word with a hearty whack.

"Oh," fumed the enraged girl, "You'll pay for this!"

Bill released her suddenly and she slid to the floor. For a moment Annabel sat there stupefied, then her violet eyes misted and she indulged in the common feminine reaction. Somewhat awkwardly, Bill knelt beside her and proferred his handkerchief.

"Blow," he suggested, chivalrously.

When Annabel's eyes were clear again she looked at the young man with deeper insight. She had never expected anything like this, and it knocked out her plans for casual dalliance completely. This man might be a lost dog, but he knew his way around. He had, she mused, rising and patting herself gingerly, left his mark on her.

"I'm sorry," Bill said. "Guess I lost my temper."

"That's all right. I deserved it." The words came out before she could stop them.

"Let's be friends," Bill placated. "Forget all about this."

"Right." Annabel turned to Tubby. "Quit staring at me, you little rounder, and mix up some drinks."

"Coming right up," Tubby announced. Hicks, whose mouth was never closed except around the neck of a bottle, looked amiably at Bill and Annabel.

"Glad you two have decided to make up," he said. "Looks like you hit it off all right."

"Let's forget about hitting, if you don't mind," Annabel begged. "It brings back all-too tender memories."

"We have other problems," Hicks agreed. "Such as running this hotel. Don't forget, the convention arrives tomorrow—for that matter, I'll bet most of the magicians checked in tonight. We'll have to figure out what to do."

"The Magician's Convention?" Annabel jumped up. "No wonder my uncle left so suddenly."

"Then you know something? All we could get out of him was a few hints."

"That's plenty. Plenty for me." The girl started for the door. "Excuse me, I have to pack."

"Please—you can't run out on us now," Tubby begged.

"I'm relying on you to show me the ropes," Bill added.

"It would be a pleasure," declared the girl. "But this convention is another matter. Whenever I think about last year, I feel like going to bed and pulling the covers over my head."

"A fine idea," Hicks leered. "Go right ahead."

"Never mind that. I'm serious."

"But what about those magicians?" Bill persisted. "What did they do that's so awful?"

"What didn't they do? For three days this hotel was full of rabbits and white mice and black cats and pigeons. The cats chased the mice and the pigeons chased the people."

"What about the rabbits?"

"They chased each other. It was a mess. And all those prestidigitators, pulling knives and forks out of their sleeves in the dining room and changing the color of peoples' drinks in the bar, and making the potted palms in the lobby grow before your eyes—you never saw anything like it."

"Sounds like fun," Bill mused. "Why is everybody so scared of a thing like that?"

"Dritch," sighed Annabel.

"Dritch? Seems to me Mr. Bipple was using that word. What on earth is a Dritch?"

"It isn't a Dritch, it's Mr. Dritch. And I'm not so sure he's on earth."

"Huh?"

"He's a terrible little man—or maybe not a man."

"I'm getting more confused every minute," Bill declared.

"So were we, during the last convention. He showed up and took a room, him and his beard. And his friends. I don't know which was the worst—his beard or his friends. We tangled with both of them. The important thing is, nobody has been able to use that room since."

"Why?"

"Because," whispered Annabel, "it's haunted!"

SEVERAL drinks later, the party went down to the lobby and approached the night clerk at the desk.

"It's my duty as manager," Bill had persisted. "Besides, if this Dritch shows up again this year, I want to know what he's been doing."

As for Hicks and Tubby, they were only too willing to co-operate, particularly after the last of the whiskey was gone.

Annabel stayed discreetly in the background. Not seeing her, the clerk assumed the men to be strangers.

"I'm sorry," he said, looking up from his ledger. "I'm afraid I'm out of rooms."

"Aren't you in one now?" Hicks quibbled.

"No, gentlemen, you don't understand. There's a convention in town and we're all full."

"So is the convention," muttered Tubby, unhelpfully. "But never mind that now. We want the key to the haunted room."

"What?"

"I'm the new manager," Bill offered. "Didn't Mr. Bipple tell you?"

"Oh—Mr. Dawson!" The clerk beamed. "Yes, Mr. Bipple did mention your name in passing. But he passed awfully fast. I never saw a man leave this hotel in such a hurry. You'd have thought the Devil himself was at his heels. And come to think of it, with this particular convention coming up —" The clerk shrugged eloquently. "Seeing as you're the new manager, I'd better warn you. These magicians are a pretty queer bunch. Particularly Mr. Dritch, that little man with the beard. Mr. L. Dritch, he called himself, and —"

"Blast Mr. Dritch!" Bill exploded. "That's all I hear around here. All I want is the key to the haunted room."

"Please, don't go up there," warned the clerk. "It hasn't been opened for a year. The chambermaids say there's something terribly wrong with the furniture, and other things."

"I've been in plenty of hotel rooms," Hicks remarked, "and none of them were haunted by anything worse than bedbugs."

"Remember, sir, I warned you. I take no responsibility."

"Pooh to your ghosts," Tubby sneered, brandishing a bottle. "Look, we're bringing our own spirits."

"Very well, then." The clerk produced a key. "But let me know if you see any astral phenomena. Or anything that might be construed as partly astral."

"Half-astral, even," Hicks nodded. "Very well, as you say. Let's go." Brandishing the key to Room 1013, Bill and the partners joined Annabel and made for the elevator. A bellboy stepped forward and accosted Bill.

"Carry your baggage, mister?" he inquired.

"No thanks." said Annabel. "I'll walk." The party whisked into the elevator and ascended. Bill found himself suddenly quite nervous; partly because of the nature of their coming adventure and partly because of the close proximity of Annabel. The lively young lady and her livelier companions had already done strange things to him, and he feared that if they sowed any more wild oats he might be ploughed under in the process.

Room 1013 proved on first glance to be a spacious apartment with a large number of chairs, several handsome tables, and a fine sofa. There was also a massive bed.

"Looks comfortable enough," Tubby commented. "Certainly can't see anything wrong with this set-up."

"Speaking of set-ups," Hicks said, "that reminds me. Where's the bottle?" Tubby produced a fifth; Bill switched on all the lights and closed the door, and Annabel pulled the shades. The room was still for a moment as they instinctively waited for something to happen. Nothing did. Silently, Hicks passed the bottle around. Gurgling, then more silence.

“Well,” sighed Bill, “let’s make ourselves comfortable and wait for developments.” Suiting action to word, he lowered himself into the nearest chair.

“Hey, be careful!” came a voice out of nowhere. “Who do you think you’re sitting on?”

Bill hastened to rise. “What’s this?” he gasped.

“An order, buddy,” continued the soft, deep voice. “Don’t sit on me.”

Bill appealed to his companions. “Am I crazy, or did that chair just speak to me?”

“I wouldn’t vouch for your sanity, brother,” purred the voice, “but I certainly did speak to you. I’m sick and tired of having strangers flop all over my lap.”

The partners goggled. “A talking chair,” said Annabel. “So that’s what’s been going on here.”

“You can sit on my lap anytime, sister,” the chair beguiled.

“Why not?” A new voice chimed in, from the direction of the sofa in the corner. “Drape yourself all over, if you like. This one is on me.” The invitation was followed by a gurgle of low laughter.

THE MEN listened to this unusual suggestion with mounting apprehension. Only Annabel showed no dismay. She turned to the sofa in defiance. “One more crack like that,” she warned, “and I’ll knock the stuffing out of you.”

She had scarcely finished speaking when a pillow detached itself from the sofa and sailed through the air, striking her smartly on the head.

“Hold it, sister,” the sofa advised, calmly. “I’m liable to get rough.”

Annabel huddled in the center of the room. “I’m beginning to understand what they meant by a haunted room, all right.”

“I’m not,” Tubby complained. “But I’m afraid I will unless I have another drink.” He set the fifth of whiskey on a small table and turned to his companions. “Have a shot,” he invited.

“Thanks,” said a voice behind him. “Don’t mind if I do.” Tubby turned just in time to see the bottle upset itself and pour whiskey on the table’s surface, which absorbed the liquor rapidly.

“Wheeee!” chortled the voice. “This is better than furniture polish. Now have one on me.”

Tubby was trembling, but he managed to snatch the bottle before it emptied further. He drank and the others quickly followed his example.

“I don’t understand it,” Bill whispered. “Could we possibly have a ventriloquist in the crowd?”

“No,” said the chair. “It’s a pity, though—you’d make a lovely dummy.”

Bill’s temper gave way for a second time that evening. “Shut up!” he told the chair. “I’d like to break your legs.”

“You and who else?” jeered the furniture.

“Yes,” added a large, feminine-looking bureau in the corner. “Lay off the rough stuff,” it continued in a girlish voice.

Bill regarded the bureau with a menacing eye. Then, “How would you like a good kick in the drawers?” he demanded.

A shrill burst of laughter greeted this remark. “Why you fresh thing!” taunted the bureau. “That’s no way to speak to a lady.”

Goaded beyond belief by this insane conversation with wood-work, Bill forgot what he was saying or doing. “Lady indeed!” he shouted. “Look at those drawers. Great knobby things! Besides, they’re half-open.”

“What a thing to say!” shrieked the voice.

Bill turned to his friends. “Let’s get out of here,” he panted. “Talking furniture—haunted rooms—I’ve had just about all I can take for one evening.” At that moment came a furious knocking at the door. Half-suspecting a trick, Mr. Hicks gingerly turned the knob. Two women promptly entered.

“Is this the room where they’re holding the party?” demanded the taller of the two. “Somebody called the bar and invited us up—some magician, he said it was.”

"Called himself the Great Little," volunteered the second girl. "Great Little what, he didn't say."

"Oh Lord!" groaned the spectacled man, and turned to his friends with a hasty whisper. "We can't let word get around about the furniture, I suppose. Might as well invite them in for a minute or they'll get suspicious." He faced the women again with assumed gaiety. "All right, come on in," he invited. "This is the party, and we're always glad to have company." He indicated Tubby. "Meet the Great Little himself. The other two are his assistants. As for me, I'm Marmaduke the Magnificent. And that thing over there is a bottle of whiskey. Shall we get acquainted with it?"

Introductions were accomplished and drinks were poured, while the furniture remained mercifully silent. Tall blonde and short blonde gravitated to Hicks and Tubby, and Hicks and Tubby gravitated towards the furniture, soon forgetting their recent experiences as the drinks went round.

WITHOUT thinking, Tubby invited the short blonde to sit on the sofa with him. Bill tried to signal, but Tubby didn't notice.

"My," murmured Tubby's girl, patting the mohair. "What an elegantly upholstered sofa."

"You're pretty well upholstered yourself," muttered a muffled voice from somewhere below.

"What was that?" asked the girl.

"Oh, nothing," Tubby gasped. "I think my voice is changing—getting much lower, lately."

"So are your topics of conversation," the girl told him.

Hicks had escorted his blonde to a large chair. When she was seated, he twined his angular body over the side and put his arm around the girl. Suddenly the young lady uttered a shrill squeak.

"Why, what a way to act!"

"Did I do anything wrong?" Hicks asked, innocently.

The girl regarded him with a strange glint in her mascara-laden eyes. “You didn’t do anything any good,” she confessed. In a moment she squealed again and jumped up from the chair.

“Am I offending you, somehow? Hurting your feelings?”

“You hurt more than that,” the girl declared, furiously. She stared down with a puzzled expression. “You couldn’t have, though,” she mused. “I was watching this time, and you didn’t pinch me. Unless—say, it couldn’t have been the chair now, could it?”

She appealed to Hicks, but the chair supplied its own answer.

“You bet it was, baby,” it chuckled. “I haven’t had so much fun since the time I caught a Congressman.”

The blonde gaped at the laughing furniture with awe in her eyes. Then she turned to Hicks again.

“Pinch me quick to see if I’m dreaming,” she begged. Then, hastily, “No—don’t. I’ve been pinched enough as it is!”

The chair guffawed.

The other blonde rose and approached her companion. “Let’s get out of here,” she suggested. “This place is creepy.”

Her companion shrugged. “It’s all a gag,” she decided. “Don’t forget, these fellows are magicians.” And in a lower voice, she quickly added, “Besides, they have plenty of liquor. What can we lose. Let them have their fun.”

Hicks and Tubby were by this time sufficiently bottle-weary to accept any situation, and Annabel seemed content to be anywhere as long as Bill was present. As for Bill himself, he was in no condition to object. Each outburst from the furniture had been an excuse for him to refresh himself from the bottle; now he no longer cared if the furniture talked or not. In fact, it was beginning to seem natural.

Since the women didn’t appear to be upset by the queer room, the party made up its mind after another drink. “It’s a nice place we have,” Hicks announced, stubbornly. “We’ll stay here, and phooey to the furniture!”

“The same to you, buddy,” boomed a voice from the washroom.

"Aw, shut your trap!" rejoined the thin man.

"Let's order more drinks," his blonde girl-friend now suggested. "This looks like a real party."

Bill went to the phone and jiggled the receiver.

"Let go of me!" the mouthpiece scolded.

Bill ignored its chattering as he contacted room service—a brunette switchboard operator he remembered seeing in the lobby.

"Hello," he began', brightly. "This is Room 1013. Send us up a fifth of rye, if you please."

"Make that two fifths, you cheapskate," the phone cut in.

"What?" asked the switchboard operator.

"I didn't say anything."

"Do you ever?" This from the phone.

"See here," Bill shouted. "One more remark out of you and I'll disconnect your wiring. I'll tangle your batteries."

"What's that?" asked the switchboard girl.

"Pm not talking to you," Bill explained. "I mean, I am talking to you, but —"

"Is there another party on the line?" the girl asked.

"This party is bad enough in itself." the phone put in, promptly. "At least it's as bad as it could be without you being present, you trull!"

"See here," said the girl at the desk, in repressed fury. "Are you trying to insult me?"

"That's pretty hard to do over the phone, baby," shot back the voice. "However, if you must be insulted, come on up."

This was too much for Bill. With an oath he ripped the offending telephone from the wall and tottered away.

HIS COMPANIONS weren't making out much better, he discovered. The chairs refused to be sat on. Whenever one of the gathering attempted to lodge in a seat, they were promptly booted from behind and thrown to the floor, where the sofa pelted them with cushions.

Bill tried to sit on the latter with Annabel, and it promptly overturned, grumbling in a loud voice about "lounge lizards!"

Panic gripped the party, and almost by instinct the three men and the three girls huddled together in the center of the room as the furniture laughed and jeered in wooden accents.

Suddenly the table rose and sailed gracefully over their heads. Everyone ducked until it landed against the other wall.

"Maybe it serves us right," Tubby whispered. "I've smashed a lot of furniture in my time—can't blame furniture for wanting to smash me."

"Certainly turning the tables on us," Hicks agreed. "If some of those spiritualist mediums could only see this!"

Bill was not taking matters so calmly. "Let's get out of here," he snapped.

He crawled over to the door and tugged at the knob. The door refused to budge.

"Open up!" he shouted.

"Closed for the night," echoed a hollow voice from the keyhole. Bill tugged desperately, but nothing happened.

"Trapped!" he groaned. A vase detached itself from the mantel and winged straight at Tubby's head. The little man ducked just in time, then rose and ran for the bed.

"Golly!" he panted. "I've been driven out of bed by those things before, but this is the first time I've ever been driven into one."

The sailing table now zoomed forward, and Hicks rose from the floor and joined his partner in the bed. "They're ganging up on us," he panted. "They want to kill us!"

Chairs began to scrape across the room menacingly, stiff-legged and strong-armed, and the girls retreated to the safety of the big bed.

Bill put his arms around Annabel protectingly as a pillow struck him in the head. The furniture continued its eery march. Suddenly the lamp flickered and went out, and in the darkness the legs of the chairs scraped in grumbling whispers, the drawers banged squeakily, and the blackness was filled with creaking laughter.

Bill turned and propelled Annabel towards the bed, diving under the sheets with the other four. It was cozy but crowded, and there was little time to consider the proprieties or even the improprieties of the situation.

For as if Bill's arrival were a signal, the entire bed began to rear up on its base, sliding the scrambled sextette to the bottom, where they lay in a confused heap.

"Ouch!" competed with "Eeeek!" and was overridden by "Hey!" and "Golly!" and "Help!" but the bed paid no heed. The head now rose, and they tumbled back and forth.

"I'm getting seasick!" Tubby moaned. He rose and tried to race for the door in the darkness. Immediately, the bureau carommed across the room and barred his path. Then the chairs closed in. Inch by inch, Tubby was forced back into the bed.

Deep, mocking howls filled the blackness. "Fve taken a lot of punishment in my time," observed the mattress, in a rather stuffy voice. "Yes sir. Bruised springs, broken cords." The bed-frame itself interrupted.

"That's nothing," it complained. "You ought to see my bolster. My poor, cracked bolster!"

"The blazes with you, and your bolster too—whatever that is!" Bill replied.

"We're talking about punishment," the bed resumed. "No more taking it. I'm going to give a little in return."

So saying, the bed lifted itself about a foot in the air and came down with a rousing thump. What it did to the sextette was definitely unnerving.

"Listen, sister," came Tubby's wail, from the bottom of the tangled, fleshy pile. "Just because we have no chairs, you don't have to use my face for a substitute."

"Oh, then those must be your teeth! I thought for a moment I was sitting on a mouse-trap."

Laboriously, the frightened party disentangled while the bed continued its soliloquy.

"What a life I've led," it whined, in self-pitying tones. "The things I've stood for!"

"We quite understand," Hicks said, hastily. "You needn't go on. How did you and the furniture come alive in the first place?" he asked, trying to change the subject.

"At the Magician's Convention last year," the bed explained. "One of the magicians—guess he was a friend of Dritch—happened to sleep in this room. He talked in his sleep, and while talking he repeated a magic spell of some kind that brought us to life."

"What became of him?" Hicks asked.

"He snored too much," said the bed, quite horridly. "So I smothered him under the mattress."

"Quit talking to the furniture," one of the blondes begged. "We want to get out of here!"

"Out, eh?" muttered the familiar voice from below. "Good idea. Hang on everybody—here we go!"

SUDDENLY the bed began to move. Before anyone in the party had realized their predicament the bed slid gracefully over to the door. Now the door obligingly opened, allowing the bed and its dazed occupants to proceed out into the hall corridor of the hotel. They rolled along towards the end of the hallway with startling speed.

"Stop it, somebody!" Annabel screamed, clinging to Bill's neck.

"Yes!" Tubby added frantically, "Can't somebody pull the throttle?"

"You're thinking of a runaway train," Hicks shouted above the clatter of rolling casters. "This is a runaway bed."

"Runaway?" Tubby wailed. "If anybody sees us it'll be a giveaway!"

"I'm getting off right here," said one of the blondes. But she could not. In some mysterious fashion the covers had managed to twine themselves around the various members of the party, who were now held in a tenacious grip.

"These damned things are holding us like the octuples of a tentapus," Hicks muttered.

"You mean the tentocts of a pulipus, don't you?" Annabel corrected, sweetly.

"Never mind the details!" Mr. Hicks shrieked. "Look where we're going now!"

The mad bed had clattered down the hall as far as the staircase. Now, despite the loud protests of its inmates, it began to descend the stairs. Immediately the scrambled sextette slid again to the bottom of the bed where they lay groaning at every bump.

"Oh!" sighed Bill, whose long silence had been due to a pillow that was wedged in his mouth. "If I ever get out of this, I'll be an invalid for life."

"A bed-ridden one," added Tubby, "From now on, I sleep in a hammock, if at all."

"Or a nice cool grave," Hicks babbled. "Oh Lord—here we go again!"

And so they did. Ten flights of stairs were clatteringly covered. Fortunately, nobody else in the hotel seemed aware of the noise; the hour was late and the convention guests probably believed the sounds were caused by their own members coming home. So the ten flights of stairs were painfully descended by the bed and its reluctant passengers, and at last the strange, vehicle bounced right out into the lobby.

It was two A.M., but the sound of the tumult served to awaken the ever-watchful house detective from his slumbers.

He ambled over as Bill nudged his companions. "Know him?" he whispered.

Hicks shook his head. So did Tubby. Even Annabel tossed her curls. "A new one," she explained. "Hired yesterday, I think. The old house dick quit when he heard the Magician's Convention was coming."

"Then let's get out of here," Bill implored. "Bed, do your stuff! Keep right on moving!"

But the bed, for reasons of its own, stopped right smack in the center of the lobby as the Law approached.

CONSEQUENTLY, all that gentleman witnessed was a lone bed occupying the deserted lobby. Its six occupants immediately pretended slumber. Annabel cradled her face in her hands, Tubby snored, and Hicks hid under the blankets. But the detective was not convinced. He strode up to the bed and poked Hicks in the side. “What have we here?” he demanded. “Huh?” Hicks assumed drowsiness. “What do you mean, waking a man out of a good sound sleep?”

“Get up, you,” barked the house dick, slapping Hicks sharply on the bottom of his feet.

“Here, now,” Hicks objected. “Why not let sleeping dogs lie?”

“You picked a fine place for it, brother,” the detective snarled. “Right here in the middle of the lobby.”

“A fine place for what?” inquired the smaller of the two blondes.

“Never mind, lady. All I want to know is, why did you decide on the lobby?”

“Just trying to advertise the hotel,” Tubby offered, weakly.

“I suppose these ladies constitute a portion of your advertising matter?” the detective wanted to know. “One thing I’d like to find out before I run you all in. Just how did you get the bed all the way down those stairs?”

“This I can’t answer,” Tubby answered. “But I’d like to give it a good kick in the slats.”

“We’re not responsible,” the larger blonde added. “We just rode down.”

“Well, all out—this is the end of the line.” The detective gestured at them with his cigar. “Rise and shine.”

“We can’t,” said Annabel, in a small voice.

“You mean you won’t?” asked the house dick, menacingly.

“No, we can’t. We’re—we’re not dressed for the lobby.” She attempted a blush.

"Get up anyway."

"No," Tubby broke in. "I have my alarm set for seven. I need my rest."

"Out!" the detective insisted.

"We paid for this bed and we're staying in it," Hicks replied. "How do you like that?"

"How do you like this?" countered the detective, drawing a nasty-looking black revolver. "HI give you just ten seconds."

"But we're not dressed, either," Bill protested, stoutly defending Annabel's story.

"You mean to tell me all six of you are—?" The man could go no further. "All in one bed, too!"

"We're Scotch, mister," Annabel explained.

"Listen," said the detective, despairingly. "Any more of this talk will drive me screwy. I want you all to wrap some blankets around you and come into the office. There's an awful lot of funny business going on around here."

"But we can't come," Bill said, deciding to tell the truth. "The bed won't let us go."

The detective groaned and Bill subsided.

"You see, sir," Tubby went on. "It seems like we made our bed and now we have to lie in it."

"I'll call the manager!" yelled the detective.

"But—" Bill blurted out, "I am the manager!"

THAT WAS too much for the house dick. Gibbering insanely, he discharged his gun at the bedsheets, which immediately burst into flame. The bed, angered at this sudden attack, began to roll after the detective. With a scream of horror, the poor man fled before the ill-tempered bed's charge, as the flaming sheets parted to release the six bed-partners.

Bill, completely unnerved, headed for the elevators. The last thing he saw was a backward vision of the bed knocking down the detective and jumping frantically around on his prostrate form.

Reaching the open, empty elevator, Bill slammed the door shut and glided upwards. He meant to stop at the second floor, but through the glass he saw that the halls were now crowded by pajama-clad people, all aroused by the revolver shots and the general bedlam over the bed that took it on the lam.

Bill didn't care to face people for a long, long time to come. For this reason he sped the dark elevator up to the twelfth and topmost floor. Here was a stairway corridor that led up to the roof garden. Bill opened the elevator door and stepped out.

"Now for a little air," he whispered.

"Just what I needed," said a musical voice from behind him. Bill whirled suddenly, half-expecting to see the elevator stool rising to beat his head in.

Instead he encountered Annabel.

"How did you get here?" he demanded.

"I was here all the time," said the girl, demurely. "But you didn't even bother to look around. If you had, we might have taken more time to get up here."

"What?"

"Not very bright tonight, are we?" the girl jeered. "Very well, let's stroll around the roof."

Bill agreed. It was the worst thing he possibly could have done under the circumstances. These circumstances included the deserted roof-garden, the wicker sofa, the night breeze, and the moon.

The garden looked down on the elfin lights of a great city—a city of enchantment when viewed from this height. The wicker sofa invited watchers to sit down, whereupon the night breeze, cooling their cheeks, caused them to gaze upwards. And then, of course, they could not help but notice the moon.

It floated serenely in the sky, a white witch among ghostly clouds. Moonbeams tangled in Annabel’s hair, melted into Annabel’s eyes.

bill gazed at her silently, and she gave him back a mocking smile. Any other man, under similar circumstances, would have embraced his opportunity—that is to say, Annabel. But Bill’s innocent reaction made her feel strangely tender. This, the girl did her hardboiled best to disguise.

“You great big chivalrous square!” She moved closer to him and Bill moved away. “What’s the matter—am I really so repulsive?”

“Of course not,” Bill confessed. “I can’t trust myself when I get near you.”

“You sound like the second act of a lousy play,” she told him. And moved still closer.

“I wonder what’s become of the boys,” Bill quavered. “Perhaps we’d better go downstairs.”

“We will,” Annabel promised, a gleam in her violet eyes. “We will, eventually.”

And, eventually, they did . . .

WHEN Bill Dawson awoke in his own room some hours later he was not, strictly speaking, a new man. But he was not an old man, either.

Whatever had happened to him in his peculiar nightmare, it had all been for the best, he decided, as he dressed and faced the morning. He felt refreshed, alert, confident, ready to face New York and his vacation with renewed zest. The vividness of his weird dream seemed to add to his well-being this morning.

Actually, as he remembered it, the mental images of Mr. Marmaduke Hicks and Tubby were more vivid than those of the people he had known back at the furniture factory. He could recall the details of their dress with greater clarity, the intonations of their voices, the peculiarities of their expressions. He fancied he could almost smell their breath.

Bill remembered, too, that he had been quite drunk in this nightmare, and happily so. He had behaved in an uncouth, uncivilized way, and found it all surprisingly attractive. He recalled the exuberant antics of his dream companions. And he remembered Annabel.

Annabel! A vision of her white slimness, honeyed hair and violent violet eyes crossed his mind. A dangerous girl, but a delectable one. What a dream that had been, he mused. But now, to face reality—

Bill was just ready to go down for breakfast when the phone rang. He picked it up. A male voice came across the wire.

"Hello, is this the manager?"

"No. This is Mr. Dawson's room."

"That's who I'm looking for. Mr. Dawson, the new manager."

"New—manager?"

"Yeah. Aren't you the 'gent what won the hotel last night in a crap game?"

Bill almost dropped the phone.

Then it wasn't a dream. It was real! That meant Annabel was real. And Hicks, and Tubby—

The door opened. Hicks and Tubby marched in.

Bill's grasp on the phone wavered. "What do you want?" he murmured.

"This is Janus," said the voice on the phone. "I'm the doorman. And if you're the new manager, I figure you'd wanna know that—"

"Yes, I'm the new manager, I guess," Bill admitted, more to himself than to the doorman. "What was it you wanted me to know?"

"Only that somebody just brought a wolf into the hotel."

"A wolf?"

"Yeah. One of them magicians, I guess. So what do I do?"

"I'll be right down," Bill promised. He hung up hastily and turned to face Marmaduke Hicks and Tubby Telbertson. Both the tall and the short gentlemen were attired in spotless morning clothes; black tailcoats and grey, striped trousers.

“How do we look?” Tubby piped. “Thought we’d better get into these outfits and pretend to be assistant managers or something.”

“Wonderful,” Bill agreed. “But I thought you two were broke. Where’d you get the wardrobe?”

“There was a mortician’s convention here last month,” Hicks explained. “Things were pretty dead, but we managed to get hold of these undertaker’s suits.”

“Well, change into some zookeeper’s costume,” Bill sighed. “We’ve got a wolf in the lobby.”

“I told you these magicians played rough,” Tubby said, not at all perturbed. “Let’s go see about this.”

“Annabel’s downstairs,” Hicks added, as they moved to the door. “Just drank breakfast with her. She told us you hit the roof last night.”

“What happened to you?” Bill changed the subject, hastily.

“Oh, we were around. Which reminds me, we have a date to meet Mrs. Pratt and Susan Foster at the Convention Meeting this noon.”

“Who are they?” Bill asked, as they entered the elevator.

“Our little playmates of last night. The blondes,” Hicks explained. “Mrs. Pratt’s ex-husband is President of International Legerdemainiacs. That’s the official name of the Convention, you know. She doesn’t like him, but she came here hoping some other magician might give her a job. She used to be Pratt’s assistant in the magic act—he worked under the name of Houdonit, you know—and she claims he did a lot of prestidigitation with her.”

“You seem to have found out a lot,” Bill observed.

“Oh, we did,” Tubby assured him. “Susan Foster wants to get in a magic act, too. She used to be in burlesque, and she has a wonderful idea for a strip-tease. After she removes her clothing, she vanishes completely.”

THE PARTY emerged from the elevator on the lobby floor. The first person Bill saw was Annabel. She flew into his arms, and if Bill had any doubts as to her reality, they were quickly and firmly dispelled. Bill lost himself in a long kiss, but he was called into awareness by a terrible thing.

The thing was a sound. A howling.

“The wolf!” Tubby exclaimed. Nor was he alone. An excited knot of guests clustered along the lobby wall, out of harm’s way. Over at the registration desk stood two men—and the wolf.

Bill stared at the great shaggy beast, then turned his attention to its companions. They were equally strange and equally dismaying. One of them was tall and gaunt, a cadaverous figure muffled in a long black cloak. The other was a walking beard.

Never in his life had Bill seen such a beard. It was shaggier than the wolf; a huge white Fuller Brush of a beard that swept the floor. Somewhere behind the beard a face must have been concealed, because a red nose protruded through it about four feet from the floor. Bill judged the beard’s wearer must be a small man. How he was attired could not be told. He might have gone nude if he chose—for no one could appear naked with that beard.

Wolf, cloak and beard were now confronting the desk clerk, and an argument seemed to be in progress.

“I’m sorry,” the desk clerk was saying. “I can’t register a wolf.”

“You don’t need to register him,” came a voice from behind the beard. “This is not a dog show.”

“We do not permit animals, sir. Everyone who stays here must be registered.”

“But it’s for the Convention,” the beard argued. “I’ve told you a hundred times.”

“Wolves do not belong at Conventions,” was the answer. “I am sure the rest of the magicians would not approve. Think of the publicity—the press will be here, and we’ll even have a broadcast over the radio tonight. We can’t afford to have a wolf in the hotel—suppose he howled when we went on the air? Wolves and radio don’t mix.”

“On the contrary,” persisted the beard, “This wolf may come in handy on the radio. We could use his paws for station identification.”

“Sorry, but I cannot give a room to the wolf,” the desk clerk snapped.

“Let me speak to the manager!” It was the cloak who spoke now.

“Here I go,” Bill muttered, removing Annabel’s arms from his shoulders.

“No, Bill—keep away!” warned the girl. “That wolf looks dangerous. Remember what my uncle said about this Convention. Lots of queer things happen. Be careful!”

“I’m the manager,” he said. “I’ve got to take care of these problems or the hotel will get a bad name.”

He strode resolutely towards the desk.

“Manager!” yelled the cloaked man. “We want the manager!”

“That’s me,” Bill announced. Cloak, beard and wolf turned and stared at him. The wolf made a low noise in its throat and opened a big red mouth.

Bill quickly dodged to one side and entered the desk clerk’s cage. “What’s the trouble?” he asked.

“These gentlemen have just registered here, and they insist we give a room to the wolf,” the clerk explained. “It’s the Convention, of course.”

“I see.” Bill glanced at the ledger and noted the names of the cloak and beard.

“You are Pseudo W. Nym?”

The cloak bowed, and the long white face creased into a smile. “That’s my stage name, of course,” explained the cloak. “My real name is Onymous. N. Onymous, to be exact.”

“Greek?”

“From Transylvania. Triladelphia, Transylvania.”

Bill noted the second name on the ledger—the beard’s—and his heart sank.

“Mr. L. Dritch?”

“That is correct.” The beard bowed.

“Dritch. Weren’t you here last year?”

"That is correct," said the beard. "I made a preliminary investigation of the premises. My findings were satisfactory, so this year—as you can see—I have returned with my friends."

"Very decent of you, I'm sure," Bill quavered, eyeing the gigantic wolf.

"More of them will be arriving this evening," Mr. L. Dritch purred, through the beard. "Some of my friends do not—er—care to be seen in daylight."

"This I can understand."

"What's that?"

"I mean—it will be nice to have them here. Are they all magicians?"

"Definitely, my dear sir. Thaumaturgists, necromancers, adepts, cabalists, goetists and evocators. To say nothing of mages and wizards and other practitioners of the mantic arts. This will be, unless I greatly err, a real Convention." A chuckle filtered through the beard—a chuckle filled with malice and dandruff.

"We'll try to make you feel at home," Bill promised, wondering whether it would be best to keep the mysterious Mr. Dritch happy until he thought of a way to get rid of him. "Anything you want, just ask me."

"I will do so," Mr. Dritch nodded. "Perhaps you could begin by finding me some raw meat."

"Raw meat?"

"For the wolf, here. He's hungry."

"Never mind that," the cloaked Mr. Nym interrupted. "Are there any children around?"

Bill turned pale.

"He's very fond of children," Dritch explained.

"Raw children, that is," added the cloak.

BILL DECIDED that pleasing these peculiar guests was out of the question.

“Now see here,” he said. “One thing you simply must understand. We can’t have a wolf staying at this hotel.”

The beard shrugged, and Mr. Dritch shrugged with it. “But that is just what I’ve been trying to tell this stupid room clerk,” he said. “This isn’t an ordinary wolf.”

“He’s not?” Bill glanced down at the great slavering beast as it sniffed hungrily at his leg.

“Certainly not. He’s really a werewolf!”

“A were—but that’s impossible, there are no such things!” Bill turned and appealed to the group loitering fearfully in the lobby. “You heard what he said, folks. Tell him there are no such things as werewolves.”

The group was silent, but every eye stared glassily at the shaggy creature at Bill’s side.

“You see,” Bill laughed, weakly. “Nobody believes in a silly superstition like werewolves any more.”

The wolf opened red jaws.

“All right,” said the wolf. “Have it your own way, then, smarty. So I’m not a werewolf. Boo!”

“Good heavens!” Bill peered at the lobby spectators. “Did you hear what I heard?”

Apparently they had, because there wasn’t anybody in the lobby any more.

“Now do we get that room?” purred Mr. L. Dritch, dusting the carpet with his long white beard.

“Give them the room,” Bill sighed. “Give them anything they want, just so they get that—monster—out of sight.”

“Fine,” said the cloak. “I want to go up to my room right away and change for the Convention meeting. It must be started in the ballroom by now.”

“I want to change, too,” remarked the werewolf.

“Not in the lobby,” Mr. Dritch warned.

The desk clerk extended a pen with a trembling hand. The wolf grasped it between its teeth and laboriously scratched a signature in the register.

“Mr. W. Wolf,” it wrote.

Sighing, the room clerk extended keys to the trio and they marched away. Nobody offered to carry their baggage, and Bill, feeling that the hotel must extend some courtesy even to such unusual guests, tagged along to the elevator.

“What about your luggage?” he inquired.

The man in the cloak turned and smiled. “Never mind,” he said. “Two men will bring it up later.”

“Two men?”

“Well, you can’t expect one man to carry such a load alone,” the cloak explained. “Ordinarily it takes six, three to a side. Plus the honorary pallbearers, that is.”

Bill didn’t care to ask any more questions. He went for the corridor, to find his new assistants and Annabel. The last he saw of Mr. Dritch, Mr. Nym and Mr. W. Wolf was when they entered the elevator. The hairy trio looked as if they belonged at a Barber’s Convention, and Bill heartily wished that’s where they’d gone.

“Looks like trouble ahead,” he sighed.

“Right,” said Mr. Hicks, grabbing him at the hall door and yanking him through. “Come on into the ballroom. The Convention’s just started, and all hell is busting loose!”

THE SEVENTH Annual Convention of the International Legerdemainiacs at the Hotel Flopmoor, New York, opened promptly in the Grand Ballroom at 10 A. M. the morning of October 30th.

The magicians, some two hundred in all, including professional stage and nightclub performers and a large group of skilled amateurs and hobbyists, were welcomed to the two-day session by Oswald Pratt, better known to the public as “Houdunit”.

He promised them a business meeting in the afternoon and an election of officers that night; a free tour of the city next morning, and a Grand Hallowe'en Ball for the following evening to wind up the Convention.

But this morning's session, said Mr. Pratt, was to be devoted to introducing a number of prominent and internationally famous practitioners of illusion and deception, who would speak on new tricks and variations of old ones.

"The first distinguished guest I wish to present," said Mr. Pratt, peering down from the stage at the audience of bearded, goateed and mustached stage magicians who sat stiffly in the evening clothes and turbans usually associated with their deceptive calling, "is that celebrated mentalist, star of stage, screen, radio and television—none other than the famous Dumbinger—who has arranged to give us a demonstration of his mind-reading powers and his remarkable feats of memory. As you all know," Mr. Pratt informed his hearers, "Dumbinger is the man who never misses, the man whose mental concentration is the marvel of the world today. It is a pleasure and a privilege to present the one and only Dumbinger—in person!"

There was loud applause. A spotlight flashed on the stage, Mr. Pratt bowed and gestured, and—

Nothing happened.

Nobody appeared. Mr. Pratt peered up at the platform as the crowd stamped and whistled. He walked back on the stage. "Mr. Dumbinger!" he called.

A pimply-faced bellboy suddenly raced down the aisle and whispered up at the stage. Mr. Pratt nodded and faced the audience. He held up his hands for silence.

"I'm sorry," he said. "There has been an error. It seems Mr. Dumbinger forgot his appointment this morning. As a matter of fact, he has registered at the wrong hotel. He just phoned and said he will be down later as soon as he can find his trousers, which he seems to have mislaid." Jeers and hoots from the magicians. Mr. Pratt, a large, red-faced man, became if anything larger and more red-faced. "In his absence," he said, "I will carry on myself. Since this morning session is devoted to illusions, I'll show you how I perform one of my own. It's a variation of that famous old standby—sawing a woman in half."

Pratt stared into the darkness of the hall. "I have my own equipment here," he said, "But I need a volunteer. I'm wondering if my former wife happens to be present. She is familiar with the trick and may be kind enough to assist me."

"Here I am, Oswald," called the tall blonde who had entered Tubby's life the night before. "I'll be right up."

She took the stage, and there was more whistling as she bowed to the onlookers. Pratt rushed to the wings and presently returned, wheeling a huge table and a circular saw attached to an electrical turbine.

"I thought you'd be here, Mabel," he whispered to his ex-wife. "And I hope you're behaving yourself. Remember our agreement—if I ever catch you with another man, I cut off your alimony."

"You can saw me in half," retorted the blonde, "But if you cut off my alimony you'll be sorry."

BOTH NOW presented smiling faces to the audience, and the stunt began. Mrs. Pratt lay down on the table. Pratt went into his patter routine. He placed a box over the blonde's body and then set his electric saw above her midriff. He turned on the current. Spotlights flashed on the gleaming circle of steel as the motor hummed and the saw rasped. It bit into the board, cut through the wood, sliced through the blonde's body, sliced through the table beneath. There was a hiss and a roar.

Pratt moved the two halves of the table apart, showing Mrs. Pratt's head and bust separated from her legs and torso. There was loud applause.

Presently he covered the two halves with a cloth, waved a small wand, and caused a cloud of smoke to cover the entire table. When the cloud wafted away he lifted the cloth and Mrs. Pratt jumped down from the table, smiling and exhibiting a whole body once again.

There was louder and prolonged applause.

And at this moment a voice in the audience cried, “Fake!”

“Fake?” gasped Mr. Pratt.

“Fake!” yelled the voice. “A great big fake!”

At this juncture, Hicks had noticed the uproar and dragged Bill down the hall towards the ballroom. As he entered it with Annabel and Tubby tagging along, the cries of “Fake!” grew louder and more furious. The entire meeting was in a tumult.

“Who calls me a fake?” Pratt demanded, staring into the darkness and trying to locate the voice.

“I do!”

“And who, pray tell, are you?”

“Archie!” yelled the voice. “Archie the Archfiend!”

“Never heard of you,” Pratt snapped. “Who books you?”

“Nobody. I’m on my own.”

“Where’d you appear last?”

“I never perform in public,” Archie yelled back. “People don’t appreciate my type of magic.”

Mr. Pratt forced a laugh. “You see, gentlemen?” he asked the crowd. “Here is a rank amateur, who has never even appeared on the stage, challenging my illusion. I suppose you object to my timing?”

“I object to the whole thing,” Archie called up. “It’s all a fake. That big saw and that box and black cloth—all a lot of hooey, that’s what it is. You can’t saw a woman in half and make it look real.”

“Perhaps you can do better?” challenged Mr. Pratt, in a fine red rage that went nicely with his white gardenia.

“Sure I can. Matter of fact, I will.” The small figure came down the aisle and clambered up to the stage. Bill and his companions saw a little portly man with a snub nose who looked more like a burlesque comic than a magician. He peered tauntingly up at the huge Mr. Pratt.

“Well, here I am,” he said. “Ready to go. Of course, I didn’t bring a girl with me, you know.”

“Excuses,” snorted Pratt. “I thought so! Cheap excuses! Well, you won’t get out of this so easily. We can get you an assistant from the crowd, can’t we?”

“You mean some girl would be willing for me to saw her?” asked Archie, incredulously.

“Why not? How about my ex-wife, here?”

But Mrs. Pratt shook her head. “Sorry. Once is enough. Besides, I’m afraid of this character. He looks like a schizophrenic to me.”

“Like a what?” demanded Archie, red hair bristling.

“Schizophrenic,” repeated Mrs. Pratt. “You know—split personality.”

“Lay on the table and I’ll split your personality for you,” Archie offered. But the tall blonde moved away. “You see?” said Archie. “I can’t do it without a volunteer.”

“I’ll take a chance.” A feminine voice rose from the darkness of the hall.

A MOMENT later the girl appeared—a slim, blackhaired young woman clad in slacks. “I ain’t a professional,” she explained, “but I’ve always wanted a chance to go on the stage on account of my friends all say I’m lousy with talent.” She snapped her gum roguishly at Mr. Pratt.

“Will she do?” Pratt demanded of Archie.

“Why not? No great loss.” Archie rubbed his hands. “Now for the equipment.”

“Want to use my table and box and saw?”

“No. Who needs all that crud?” Archie shrugged. “That’s just what I mean about fakes. I want to show you all how to really do a saw routine. All I need is a chair and a saw. A regular hand saw.”

“Hand saw?”

A bellhop was fetched and dispatched to bring back a saw from the basement. Archie strutted before the crowd.

“You never saw an act like this before,” he told them. “This will give you a real thrill. I learned my magic the hard way—no props for me, no siree!

Hero, stretch out, honey, and relax while I cut up." The girl bent back over a low chair, resting her trunk against the seat.

"This is awfully nice of you to help," Archie crooned at her. "You sure you don't mind?"

"Not if it helps me professionally," the girl assured him. "It—it won't hurt, will it?"

"Of course not. I told you I'm a real magician. So I'll make sure you don't feel a thing."

The bellboy returned with a handsaw—a gleaming, wicked little thing. Archie hefted it. "Used to play one like this back on the farm," he mused. "That was before I got on the Arthur Godfrey Amateur Show."

"Never mind the autobiography," snarled Pratt. "You made some dirty remarks about my trick. You promised to show us how you saw a woman in half. Now get going, and let the chips fall where they may."

"Hips," corrected Archie the Archfiend, sweetly. "All right, here we go."

He picked up the saw and poised over the young lady's midriff.

"Hey, wait!" Pratt exclaimed. "No cloth? No patter to the audience? No misdirection or sleight of hand?"

"Naw!" Archie grunted. "That's the beauty part of my trick. I just saw her, see? See-saw. Right out in front of everybody. Like—this."

And he took the saw and began to saw the girl in half.

There was no noise, no smoke, no black cloths fluttering, no music, no drama. Just a stout little man sawing a shapely brunette across the middle with a plain carpenter's handsaw. The saw sliced into her, the little man worked away, and pretty soon the saw came out the other side.

"Hey!" yelled the girl. "I'm chilly!"

"Fresh air blowing on yer stomach," Archie explained. "You're open at the middle now, see? In two pieces.

"But it didn't hurt—it's a trick," the girl persisted.

"Sure, that's the trick, doing it so it doesn't hurt, and so you're still alive. But you're in two pieces, all right."

The audience rose.

It was true. The girl was in two pieces, all right or all wrong. One piece consisted of head, bust and arms. The other piece was legs and torso.

"There you are," called Archie the Archfiend. "That's what I call really sawing a woman in half."

"Good Lord!" yelled Pratt. "He—he did it! I can see she's been bifurcated."

"Watch yer language, buddy," cautioned Archie.

"You—you mean I'm really cut in two?" wailed the brunette. "Actually?"

"Actually."

"But I didn't know—and how will this help me professionally—ooh, it's true!" gasped the girl, looking down and seeing her legs wiggling on the floor as her torso moved independently of her own volition.

SCREAMS rose from the audience. Annabel grasped Bill's arm tightly. "See what I mean about magicians?" she whispered.

"Do something!" yelled Mr. Pratt at Archie, who stood smiling and pointing at the divided girl.

"What more do you want?" asked Archie. "I told you what I'd do and I did it."

"Put me back together, quick!" gasped the girl.

"Yes—hurry up and put her back together!" Pratt moaned.

"Sorry. That's not part of the trick," Archie smiled. "I never said I would put her together again. Matter of fact, I don't know how to. Never got any instructions, and like I say, this is the first time I really tried to saw a woman in half."

"But I can't stay like this," the girl screeched.

"Why not? You're alive, and nothing hurts you, does it? Why beef?"

"Oooh!" The girl tried to sit up but failed, since she no longer had anything to sit up with, let alone on. "Why, you sawed-off little squirt—"

"Look who's calling me sawed-off!" chuckled Archie.

"Stop him!" yelled Pratt, as the little man walked away.

"Yes—stop him!" the girl echoed.

The audience still wasn't quite sure if the whole thing was a gag or not. Now they learned the ghastly truth. For as Archie walked away, the girl followed him.

To be exact, the legs followed him. The legs and torso got up from the chair and began to chase him through the hall.

The sight of the trunkless torso moving through the darkness was a little too much for the magicians at large. They began to run, too. So did Bill and Annabel and Hicks and Tubby.

As for Mr. Pratt, he stood on the stage and stared at the head and arms of the sawed-up girl.

"I can't make heads nor tails out of all this," Pratt sighed.

"Do something!" she yelled.

"Yeah," Pratt muttered, to himself. "I guess I'd better." Picking up the gavel, he banged lustily and yelled, "Meeting is adjourned."

But nobody heard him. The darkened hall was completely empty. Pratt's last glimpse of the audience consisted of a vision of Archie the Archfiend, struggling to worm his way through the crowd at the rear exit, while the animated torso of a woman kicked him in the pants.

"NOW WHAT do we do?" Bill groaned, as Annabel dragged him along the corridor.

"Relax," the girl advised, panting and lashing out at the crowd. "Be like me," she told him punching one of the fleeing magicians in the ribs, "Keep calm and cool."

"Yes," Hicks shouted, above the din, as he ripped the coat of the man ahead of him, "Don't get excited!" Tubby, who was running interference, grunted in assent as they moved out into the lobby.

"But this will ruin the hotel's reputation Bill objected. "We'll lose all our business."

“Take it easy. In a couple of hours everybody will have forgotten about the whole thing. The story will be twisted around until everyone thinks it was all a gag. These magicians are a wild bunch anyway. Look—they’re not checking out. They’re just heading for the bar to drown their memories.”

The girl spoke truly. Bill could see the guests crowding into the cocktail lounge.

“We’ll have to make plans, though,” he warned. “Remember those awful creatures who checked in this morning with Mr. Dritch? Wait until they get loose—”

“We’ll think about that problem later,” Hicks promised. “When we’re equipped to handle it.”

“He means when we’re drunk,” Tubby supplied, unhelpfully. They halted before the elevators and Bill peered around, trying to locate Archie the Archfiend and his pursuer. But the little redheaded sorcerer and his unusual better half were nowhere to be seen.

“Time to go,” Hicks remarked, glancing at his watch. “We have a date for lunch with Mrs. Pratt and Susan Foster, remember? Are you two joining us?”

“Not at the moment,” Bill sighed. “I couldn’t stand the thought of eating lunch while the bottom half of a woman is running loose in this hotel.”

“That sounds a little odd, but I guess I get what you mean,” Annabel conceded. “You and I will stay here, then. See you boys later.”

She waved farewell to Hicks and Tubby as the twosome took their leave, and the elevator went up.

“Come on,” Bill said, grabbing Annabel’s arm. “I’ve got work to do.”

“What sort of work?”

“Well, I’m the manager. I’d better find out what this is all about.” He led Annabel to the offices behind the registration desk. There he introduced himself to the hotel steward, the comptroller, the assistant manager, a Mr. Al Gonquin, and several other dignitaries who had all been informed of Bill’s new job by Manager Bipple before he left.

Bill said as little as possible. He asked polite questions about how things were going, indicated his approval of arrangements for the day, and rejoiced in the knowledge that news of the terrible scene in the ballroom had not yet come to their attention.

"Why, running a hotel seems to be easy," Bill confided to the girl as they left. "All you need is a lot of guests and some beds."

"A great theory," Annabel agreed. "I'm all for it, myself. Shall we go upstairs and relax a bit?"

"Not yet." Bill was grimly determined. "I've got to solve this business about the sawed-up woman. Go to the desk and ask Al Gonquin to call a meeting over in the service room. I want to speak to all the bellboys, and also to the house detective."

TEN MINUTES later a dozen bellboys and the house detective faced Manager Bill Dawson in the small room off the lobby. The house dick was properly apologetic for events of the previous evening.

"I didn't know you was the manager," he explained, "or else I wouldn't have paid no attention how many people you had in bed with you." The bellboys exchanged wondering smirks at this.

"Thank you," said Bill, with a pained smile. "Let's consider the incident closed. I trust it will not happen again."

"Oh that's all right," the house dick beamed. "You can do it again tonight if you like. Round up a whole bunch and climb into bed right in the lobby if you like, it's OK with—"

"Kindly shut your fat mouth," Bill snapped. "Now, men, let's get down to business. I have called this meeting for a very serious reason. The good name and reputation of the Flopmoor is at stake. No guest should be informed of what I have to say here, and it will be your duty to conceal the facts wherever possible."

"You can trust us, boss," said the head bellhop.

"Good. Briefly, I want to warn you all about a certain woman, or rather, a certain portion of a certain woman. Her bottom half is running around loose."

"What?"

"I mean—oh, how can I explain it? I want you all to conceal the bottom half of this woman. Don't let it get out whatever you do."

"Please, sir," said one of the bellboys. "I don't quite understand. Do you want us to find this loose woman for you and bring her here?"

"No. Just the bottom half is what interests me—I mean, it's chasing after the guests and I want it to stop."

"What's its name?" asked the house detective. "I don't recall us registering half a woman before."

"We didn't," Bill gulped, desperately. "She was all right when she came in. It's just that somebody cut her in two in the ballroom recently—"

"Then it's murder!" shouted the detective. "I'll call police—homicide—we'll tail the guy that cut her—"

"He's already being tailed," Bill explained. "By her lower limbs. Can't you understand? This bottom half isn't dead, it's very much alive, and—oh, Annabel, help me!"

Annabel patted the stricken man on the shoulder and took over. In a few words she explained the unusual situation to the bellhops and the detective. They promised faithfully to keep on the lookout for the animated torso and try to bring it back to the upper portion of the woman in the ballroom. "Don't let that half get away, either," Annabel warned. "You'd better split up; some of you look for one section, some for the other."

Then Annabel led Bill away, as the bellhops tossed coins, heads or tails, to determine which half they would look for.

"You need a drink after all this," she suggested. "And some rest. Let's go up to your room and take things easy for a while."

"All right," Bill agreed. "But we can't stop work now. I want to be prepared for those magicians—no telling what Mr. Dritch will be up to. If he animated furniture last year, Lord knows what to expect now."

The lobby was quiet once more. Bill stopped at the desk to order sandwiches and a bottle of rye sent up to his room, and then escorted Annabel to the elevator.

“Wonder what Hicks and Tubby are doing?” she mused, as they ascended. She was not long in finding out.

The elevator came to rest on the second floor and two men entered, casting nervous glances over their shoulders. Both of them wore violent bathrobes and still more violent frowns. The elder of the two, disregarding Bill and Annabel completely, grumbled to his companion in low tones.

“There I lay,” he muttered, “when all of a sudden the door opens and these two women come running in like all hell was at their heels. Into the washroom they go and turn on the showers, just like that.”

“You don’t say!” commented his companion.

“I do say. So I yelled through the door and asked them what they thought they were doing. ‘We’re taking a bath’ one of them yells back. So I asked ‘Why?’ and she says ‘Because we’re drunk, that’s why, and we want to sober up fast so we can drink some more. And don’t come in, because the tub is crowded and besides, we’re only half-dressed. Then they started to laugh and I got out of there.”

“Lucky I came along in the hall,” remarked the second man. “What are you going to do about it all?”

“I’m going to find the manager and complain about those half-dressed women.”

“That’s going to sound funny complaining about half-dressed women, I mean,” mused the second man.

“Well, I’ll make the manager find them and throw them out, whoever they are.”

“How will you recognize them if they’re only half-dressed?” his friend pondered. “I mean, they all sort of look alike that way, don’t they?”

“Don’t tell me there’s any more of them in this hotel,” said the first man, hastily. “I came here for a rest. And there’s darn little rest with those half-dressed women around.”

“Or any half-dressed women,” his companion added thoughtfully.

BILL SHRANK back in the corner and hid his face. The elevator paused on the fourth floor and allowed another passenger to enter—a scantily-clad man who was attired quite simply in a small bath towel. He looked bewildered and apologetic as he addressed the occupants of the car.

“Have you noticed any half-dressed women running around?” he inquired.

“Do you want a half-dressed woman?” asked Annabel, curiously.

“Gawd no, lady—I’ve had my fill of them!” groaned the small man.

“Frank, aren’t you?”. Annabel replied. “You and your half-dressed Women.”

“Quit saying that word, lady,” begged the man. “Half-dressed women have ruined my day. And that’s not the worst.”

The elevator-boy was so engrossed in this story that he failed to start the car. The little man in the bath towel buttonholed him and continued his tale of woe. “I came into my room a little while ago and there they were, two women lying right on my bed, fast asleep.”

“They’re pretty fast awake, too,” Annabel offered. But the little man ignored her. “So I went over to wake them up and all of a sudden I stumbled on something lying on the floor. I was standing on a man’s stomach.”

“Go on,” said Bill, softly, although he was beginning to realize who the man was talking about.

“By this time I was a little confused, I guess. Because I kicked this man quite hard in the face. He slid under the bed, but believe it or not, as soon as he disappeared another man stuck his head out from down there and began to curse me. By this time the women woke up and the other man crawled out and all four of them began chasing me around the room, drunk as coots.

“I tried to talk to the tall man, the one who wore glasses—and he said they were unfrocked members of the Ku Klux Klan and if I would undress they would make me Supreme Kleagle. Then I could join them in the big hunt.

"So I asked what they were hunting for, only half-dressed like that, and what do you think they told me?"

"What?" asked Annabel.

"They said they were looking for half a woman. Half a woman, mind you—and just the bottom half at that. Said she, or it, was running loose somewhere in the hotel and they had to find her. Told me to be on the lookout for a pair of green slacks with nothing up above.

"And all the time they were telling me this, they kept pulling off my clothes—said they were going to use me for a decoy for this half-whatzis.

"So I told them they were crazy, and drunk, and to get out of my room. I even went over to the door and opened it. And then—"

The little man gulped and shuddered. He nearly dropped the bath-towel in his agitation.

"So help me, when I opened the door, in marched half a woman! A pair of green slacks and nothing else. Just a torso—but even more so, if you know what I mean!

"They all jumped on her, or it, and it tried to kick, but they wrapped it up in a sheet, and I saw my chance and ran for the elevator. And here I am."

"And here we are," said Annabel, as the elevator stopped on their floor. She turned to the elevator operator. "Boy, take these gentlemen downstairs and see that valet service provides them with fresh wardrobes. Then send them all into the bar for some refreshment. On the house, of course, compliments of the management. We'll see that the rooms are cleaned up for them again."

"Thanks, lady," said the little man. "Are you the manager?"

"He is," Annabel indicated Bill. "And those drunks are just relatives. You know how it is with relatives—got to put up with them, can't kick them out. I trust you'll pardon the whole affair."

"All right with me," agreed the big man in the bathrobe. "I'd pardon anything for a drink right now." He peered at Bill. "So they're your relatives, eh?" he mused. "Well, if I may ask just one question—what relation are you to that half of a woman?"

"Oh, she's my half-sister," Bill replied.

"Of course, now I get it," the man said, as they exited. A slow look of doubt crept over his face. "But wait—" he cried.

Bill and Annabel didn't wait. They hastened to his room.

"I hope they sent up that bottle," he sighed. "I need a drink right now more than those men. What a panic this turned out to be—and imagine, me, wanting a drink!"

"Do you good, Annabel said.

IT DID. The bottle and sandwiches waited, but not for long. Bill and the girl sat down and ate. And drank. And drank some more. It was getting on towards afternoon, and Bill felt the need of relaxation. Once more life had resumed its unreal quality; things were happening much too fast, and there seemed to be no solution save an alcoholic one. One drink led to another.

Annabel sat down on the edge of Bill's chair and stroked his hair as he poured into the glasses.

"It may be a little strange to you, all this excitement, but I hope you're having fun," she murmured.

"Yes, I am, heaven help me!" Bill sighed. He was having a good time, and it bothered him. Bill, like most sedentary souls, had always looked on pleasure as something that one watched, not as something one. One was offered the pleasure of music, reading, seeing entertainment—but the idea of participation was something new. And yet here he was, plunged into a whirl of pleasurable events. It was too much to cope with, so he took refuge in drink. The liquor warmed and worked in him.

"So much has happened," he told the girl. "Up to a few days ago all this was strange to me. Believe it or not, in the town I come from, I'd never stayed out all night. I’d never had anything to drink but a glass or two of beer. And I’d never—well, I mean—”

“You’d never met a girl like me,” Annabel supplied, helpfully. “Sorry now?”

“How can you say that?” Bill took another drink, a big one. He felt very flushed and feverish, but pleasantly so. “You’re wonderful, Annabel. You and Hicks and Tubby—I suppose I shouldn’t approve of the things you say and the things you do, but I like it. Every bit of it. Take this drinking, now. You know, I’m almost getting drunk.”

“Almost?” Annabel giggled. “I’d say you were quite drunk, pet. Quite, quite drunk.”

Bill scowled defiantly. “Wrong,” he said. “Changed my mind. I’m all right.”

“How could you tell?” Annabel teased.

“Well, for instance—if I started to see funny animals. Like, maybe penguins. If I saw a penguin walk into this room I’d be drunk.”

“Penguins don’t walk,” Annabel said. “They waddle.”

“So does my Aunt Minnie,” Bill answered. “And she’s no penguin.”

“My Uncle George is a Moose,” Annabel offered.

“Don’t confuse me,” said the tipsy young man, taking another big swallow from his glass. “We were talking about something else. Drunks and penguins.”

“Did you ever see a drunken penguin?” asked Annabel, innocently. “They have Arctic circles under their eyes.”

“How true,” Bill murmured. “How too, too true.”

“Now I know you’re drunk,” said the girl. “Come and let me put your head under the faucet. You’ve got to sober up.”

“Oh, no—I’m sober’s a judge!”

At this ill-favored moment the door of the room opened.

“Quick!” Bill sprang to his feet. “The police must be here!” But it was not a policeman who entered the room. It was a duck.

A large, white, fat duck waddled into the room and sanity fled before it.

Bill bounded away to the wall.

“Good Lord! I must be drunk—it is a penguin!”

Annabel stared calmly at the duck as it waddled across the carpet, but Bill howled.

“Yes, I am drunk, all right. Get me a doctor!”

“That’s no penguin, dear. That’s only a duck.”

“Then get a quack!” Bill, unnerved by the notion of being under the influence of alcohol, suddenly dropped to his hands and knees and crawled hastily towards the door. The duck waddled behind him, seeming to examine his retreating flanks in sly silence. Suddenly the bird extended its beak and Bill rose with a wild squeal. He darted at the bird, but it waddled into the washroom.

Bill sighed in relief. “Thank heavens it’s gone,” he breathed. “Give me a drink.” He started across the floor, then half-tripped over an object lying on the carpet. It was round, and white, and shiny.

“A duck egg!” yelled the harassed young man. “It laid an egg on my carpet!”

Annabel laughed, then stopped as her eyes encountered an apparition peering through the open doorway.

IT WAS a face—a big, coarse face, followed by an even bigger and coarser body. The coarse face had a coarse voice, too.

“Pardon me, folks,” said the face, in an offensive manner. “But have youse happened to see my duck?”

“Do you want to show us a duck?” asked Annabel, politely.

“No,” the face denied. “I’m lookin’ fer one. Is it loose in here, my duck?”

“I’ve seen your duck, all right!” Bill suddenly yelled. “And if I ever see it again, I’ll knock the stuffing out of it.”

“But it ain’t a stuffed duck, Mister,” whined the face. “It’s a live one.”

“I’ll say it’s a live one,” Bill panted. “Look at this.” And he thrust the newly-laid egg under the nose of the face in the doorway.

“What’s the matter with it?” the face inquired. “That there’s a good egg. Duck eggs is worth money. Don’t get sore, Mister—just tell me where my duck is and I’ll go away.”

“What do you want with the duck, anyway?” Annabel asked.

“I’m a poultry-fancier,” replied the face, proudly.

“Well, we didn’t fancy this particular specimen.”

The face became suspicious. “Come clean now, folks. Where’s my duck? What did youse do with it?”

“What can a person do with a duck anyway?” Annabel inquired.

The face was not convinced. “Did youse kill my duck?” it accused.

“Do we look like a couple of duck-murderers?” gibbered Bill.

“Well, somethin’ happened to it,” mused the face. “Been plenty of funny business in this hotel today, I hear. Duck busted outta the crate downstairs when I brung it to deliver to some magicians for the convention here. It’s a trained duck, see? Does tricks. Magicians said they wanted a duck so as they could make it vanish. Well, it vanished, all right. So I follers it up here. Somethin’ happened to it, and you folks had better pay the bill.”

“What bill?” Annabel wanted to know in an insistent voice.

“Why, the bill for my duck.”

“But your duck already has a bill,” Annabel argued. “I saw it.”

“And I felt it,” Bill grated, rubbing his memento painfully.

This tipsy argument did none of the participants any good. The face became irate. “Come on, youse killed my duck and youse know it. Pay up and quit squawking!”

As if to refute his words, an agonized squawk now issued from behind the washroom door. Bill raced over.

The duck was swimming merrily about in the bath-tub.

Something snapped inside Bill at the sight. He reeled forward and plunged into the tub, seeking to strangle the mocking bird.

He slipped and struck his head—and went out, cold.

Bill came to five minutes later, on the sofa, with Annabel’s arms around him.

“It’s all right now,” she soothed. “The duck is gone. And guess who’s here?”

“The half-woman,” Bill groaned. “Wrong!” Hicks peered over the side of the sofa. “It’s me and Tubby. We captured the half-woman and took her downstairs to be glued together or something. Anyway, she’s out of the way, now, and everything is quiet. Aren’t you glad we fixed things?”

“Sure,” Bill sighed. “I heard about it in the elevator. You and those women. Such vulgar antics!”

“What you need, friend—aside from a drink, which is coming right up, that is—is a vacation from the hotel business,” Tubby told him.

“Right, an excellent idea,” Hicks chimed in. “Let’s all go away from here and relax. We’ll pick up the girls and find a spot to drink in.”

“Now stop that!” Bill raged. “I’m through with vulgarity! I’d like something cultured and refined.”

“The very thing,” Annabel exclaimed. “Let’s take Bill to the library. Or maybe a museum.”

“Why not?” Hicks agreed. “I’ll call Mrs. Pratt and Susan and tell them to meet us downstairs. Let the Magician’s Convention run itself this evening. We’ll get away from it all and have some nice, cultured, refined fun.”

Bill groaned as Annabel assisted him to his feet. “This sounds too good to be true,” he sighed. “I’ve got a sneaking hunch we’re heading for trouble.”

“What kind of trouble can you have in a museum?” Tubby wanted to know.

He soon found out.

THE PARTY met Mrs. Pratt and Susan Foster in the lobby.

“What’s up?” asked Mrs. Pratt, sweetly.

“We’re going to acquire culture,” Hicks told her. This remark did not exactly kindle a look of enthusiasm on the blonde’s face, and Marmaduke Hicks hastened to ask, “What’s the matter? Don’t you girls want to be cultivated?”

“Certainly,” Susan Foster agreed. “My room number is—”

“Never mind!” Bill broke in. “I’m thinking of education.”

“I’ll handle your education,” Annabel said. “You’re my star pupil.”

“I don’t like this,” Mrs. Pratt remarked, as Tubby hailed a taxi. “That ex-husband of mine is very jealous, you know. He’s been trying to get something on me for years. Wants to stop paying alimony. And I think he’s been spying. If he finds me running around with strange men—”

“Oh, we’re not strangers,” Hicks assured. “We’ve been introduced.”

“Nevertheless, I’m worried.”

“Come on,” Tubby coaxed, as the cab pulled up. He gave an address to the driver as the party took seats. Annabel climbed in last, completely ruining Bill’s shoe-shine, and seated herself on his lap, ruining his morale. The taxi jolted along.

In a few moments the vehicle halted before a large cafe. “Here we are,” Tubby announced. The Cafe de Paree, Run by a little Frenchman named Le Vinsky.”

“Here, this is no museum!” Bill protested.

“Don’t be impatient. We’ll get there. Just thought we ought to have a little refreshment first to tide us over.”

“Have you no appreciation of art?” Bill raged. “They tell me the Metropolitan is showing a glassware collection from ancient ruins.”

“They have some ancient bottles in here,” Tubby soothed. “I appreciate them very much. And their contents will turn you into a magnificent ruin.” Bill, protesting, found Annabel dragging him in after the rest of the party, and soon the six were seated at a table near the orchestra. The noise depressed Bill so that he drank several stiff highballs without thinking. The others needed no encouragement. It was some time before a now befuddled Bill rose in determination.

"Enough of this," he announced. "We're going to a museum if it kills us. Come on, you promised!"

Another taxi took them down to the Metropolitan, which appeared to be closed for the night. "Too late," Tubby informed them. "We might as well go back to the cafe."

"No you don't!" Bill was stubborn. "If we do that, we'll just get into trouble. I want a museum—any museum will do."

"Okay, buddy." The cab-driver entered into the conversation abruptly. "Museum it is. Let's go."

They went.

"Here you are, Buster!" The cab driver ground-to a halt and gestured up at a large, dingy-looking structure over which hung the legend, Imperial Wax Museum.

"But this isn't a regular museum," Bill groaned. "Let's go somewhere else."

"Yes," Hicks agreed. "No wax museum for me. Who wants to look at a lot of candles?"

"Only one open this time o'night," the driver argued.

"All right. Come on in." Bill disembarked and helped the girls alight. They approached the door and paid admission to a dyspeptic and doleful doorman.

"Why so sad, friend?" Tubby asked, with alcoholic amiability.

"You'd be sad, too," the man replied, "if you had nothing else to do all day but look at a lot of dummies."

"Here, now, no insults."

"I mean the waxworks," assured the doorkeeper. "Give me the creeps, they do. Dummies all day long, that's all I see."

"Don't take it so hard—look what it did for Edgar Bergen."

This remark was lost on the doorkeeper. "It ain't so much the job itself," he babbled. "It's the bloodiness of the thing. Regular chamber of horrors. I get the shakes just thinking about it."

THE PARTY passed inside, then regretted it. For it was a chamber of horrors they entered, and no mistake. Some sweet, sadistic soul had executed the wax figures, and they were fiendishly calculated to inspire shudders. After looking around, Bill decided the designer should have been executed himself. The place was a domicile of dread.

At this evening hour the dim rooms were deserted, save for the sextette, and the wax figures assumed added terror in the silence.

“Have a drink,” Tubby whispered, producing a pint bottle from his inside pocket. For once, Bill did not object, but swallowed as eagerly as the rest. In a moment, confidence restored, the party proceeded.

Jack the Ripper—Landru—Gilles de Retz—Dr. Crippen—Salome with the head of John the Baptist—Blackbeard the Pirate—the beheading of Anne Bolyen—the assassination of Marat—the murder of Rasputin—the Inquisition—the Cleveland Torso Slayings—all passed in review.

By now the party was growing gruesomely gay. A few nips from the bottle primed them against horror, and Mrs. Pratt giggled a trifle hysterically. Annabel clung to Bill and her nearness did things to his heart and head. He was almost content to give up the goal of culture. A certain recklessness rose in him, an urge to plunge madly into the sea of life and battle the waves until he reached the Happy Isles. Annabel did this to him and he no longer wanted to fight against it. He was ready for anything; or almost anything except what happened.

It was at this dangerous moment that another party entered the museum. It consisted of two heavy-set, thick-jowled men Bill remembered having seen back at the cafe they had stopped at for a drink. One of the big fellows seemed even more familiar; Bill did his best to remember his name.

“I could swear they came here,” said the taller and fatter of the two to his companion. “I wonder what she’s pulling off now?”

“Heavens!” whispered the divorcee, suddenly ducking behind a pillar. “That man is my ex-husband, Mr. Pratt.”

At the mention of the man’s name, Tubby giggled.

“Don’t laugh!” breathed the woman, furiously. “He’s got his lawyer with him. They’re after my alimony, all right.”

“What’ll we do?” Hicks asked. “We don’t want to let him get his hands on that.”

“Shut up and get out of here, fast,” Mrs. Pratt hissed.

It seemed that everybody took an immediate dislike to Mr. Oswald Pratt. The beefy magician was much more like a typical big business man: big-muscled, big-shouldered, big-voiced and big-headed. The type of man who smoked expensive cigars, told cheap jokes, and knew only one master—the Almighty Dollar, which he ambiguously referred to as “Success”. Mrs. Pratt, in fact, had divorced him mainly because he insisted on referring to her as “the little woman.”

All this she hastily explained to her friends in a whisper as the two men peered about the gloomy corridors of the wax museum. “Now, let’s sneak out before he sees me,” she concluded.

HICKS PRODUCED the bottle again and passed it hastily. “Wait,” he told them, “I have a great idea.” He proceeded to explain it quickly in muffled tones. It was received with subdued but inebriated enthusiasm. A moment later the little group scattered off into the dimness, each bent on his or her own errand.

Meanwhile Mr. Pratt and his legal friend, “Honest John” O’Toole, paced rapidly down the center corridor.

“See anybody?” Pratt snapped impatiently. “Don’t know where they could have gone to.”

“If they’re here, we’ll find them,” the legal eagle assured him. He glanced intently about him in the gathering gloom, but his professional eye was attracted by the fascinating parade of criminal activity displayed here. Before he realized it, O’Toole had taken up a position before the Gilles de Retz display and was gazing happily at the spectacle of Monsieur de Retz assaulting one of his wives with a long, sinister-looking knife.

"What's this?" demanded Pratt, halting beside the exhibit.

"Gilles de Retz," the lawyer explained. "French guy who killed his wives. Regular Bluebeard, that baby was."

"Good for him," Pratt muttered. "I wish to heaven I'd handled mine that way." He chewed his cigar viciously as he considered the last statement. "Yes," he continued, "I should have tried this on Dorothy."

"Why not?" said O'Toole, humoring his employer. "They say this was quite common in them old royal families."

"I come from a very old family," observed Pratt, proudly.

"Yeah?" sneered a voice out of nowhere. "Which one—the Jukes or the Kallikuks?"

Pratt, thinking this remark came from his companion, became indignant. "HI have you know," he snapped, "that my ancestors came over on the Mayflower."

"Is that so?" mocked the voice. "Well, it's a good thing the immigration laws are stricter now."

Pratt became livid. "What's that?" he demanded, collaring O'Toole.

"I didn't say anything. Not a word."

"Come on," Pratt rejoined. "There's something screwy going on here. Ever since I thought I saw that torso moving this morning, I've been a little punch-drunk, you know." He walked on, followed by his friend. Suddenly he halted beside the Salome exhibit.

"So help me," he observed, "if I didn't know that was a dummy, I'd swear this figure was my wife."

He pointed at Salome, who stood regarding the head of John the Baptist, which rested on top of a large cabinet.

"Not a bad figure," commented the lawyer, "for your wife."

"Ah, she wore falsies," sneered her ex-husband.

The Salome image trembled violently.

"Do my eyes deceive me," Pratt said, suddenly, "or did that dummy just quiver?"

"Must be the light."

“My wife used to quiver like that all the time,” Pratt mused. “It was due to drinking, of course. That bat was always lushed up.”

This was too much for the figure to bear.

“I can’t blame her,” said a furious feminine voice. “A woman would have to drink in order to stand living with you.”

PRATT HAD the eyes of an insane fish. “Am I mad?” he asked. “Torsos running this morning. Now a statue, moving and talking. Let’s go back to the Convention—I want to lie down.”

“No,” said O’Toole, a baffled look in his own bulging eyes. “You’re not crazy. I heard a voice too.” Suddenly he reached out and tapped the figure of Salome with his cane. The response was instantaneous, although it did not come from Salome.

Instead, the head of John the Baptist began to squirm hideously on the cabinet. The eyes opened and bearded lips writhed into a horrid life. It was a nasty-looking head with a brown beard and incongruously red hair. There seemed to be a lighted cigar between its lips.

“Lay off the lady,” the severed head whispered. “And put down that cane, you squirt, before I bite it in half.”

With shrill gasps, the two men turned and fled down the aisle. In their confusion, they ran in the wrong direction.

“It spoke to me,” O’Toole kept mumbling. “It spoke to me!”

“Did you notice the cigar?” Pratt panted. “I wonder how it could inhale?” Then, “Now what?” he cried, caroming into a hooded figure that blocked the passage with upraised sword.

“Just a dummy,” he sighed, in relief. The figure, on inspection, proved to be part of the group depicting the death of Rasputin. It was a realistic scene—too realistic for Pratt’s jangled nerves. He gazed at it in mute horror for a moment while regaining his breath. Suddenly he spotted something peculiar.

“Funny,” he observed. “I never knew that guy Rasputin wore glasses before.” He pointed a shaking finger at the Mad Monk who was lying on the floor in a pool of red paint. Rasputin was indeed wearing glasses—and his beard had a tendency to sag rather foolishly to one side.

“Everything’s wrong in here,” whispered O’Toole. “Rasputin with glasses, Salome with the quivers, and John the Baptist getting his voice back after that throat operation. Think it’s all a trick? After all, you’re a magician.”

“Since that torso business this morning I’m not so sure,” Pratt replied. “Did you notice all the strangers at the Convention? Funny-looking characters I never saw or heard of before. Some of them came in tonight, and I swear something terrible’s going to happen before long. This is all a part of it, too. Maybe I’d better resign, get out of this racket, turn in my wand to the union.”

“Don’t let it get you, pal,” said O’Toole. “We’re still out to find your ex-wife. I mean business and nothing is gonna scare me off her trail.” Suddenly Pratt was tapped on the shoulder by a hand out of nowhere.

He whirled and confronted a very tall thin gentleman who wore a streetcar conductor’s uniform.

“Right this way, gents—I’m the guide,” said the man.

Perhaps the guide might have explained why somewhere down the line was a naked window dummy which had once worn the streetcar conductor’s uniform in a scene depicting Murders of the Mad Motorman Who Went Off His Trolley.

BUT MR. HICKS did not choose to reveal this. Instead he led his unsuspecting victims easily along the aisle, drowning out their protests in a flood of conversation.

“Wonderful museum we have here,” he babbled. “Never saw a more splendid set of waxworks. Speaking of wax-works,” and he turned to address O’Toole, “do you wax your mustache?”

"I haven't got a mustache."

"But would you wax it if you had one?" inquired Hicks, earnestly.

"Certainly not!"

"Then how about a nice mustache made of wax?" pursued Hicks. "Would you care to buy one? I could steal it for you off that statue of General Grant over there."

"I don't want any of your lousy mustaches," O'Toole said, wearing the look of confusion Hicks had made for him. "I'm here on business. I'm a criminal lawyer."

"What did they throw you in for?"

"You don't understand," Mr. O'Toole managed to answer, in a strained voice. "Everything I do is within the law."

"Well, I know just the place for a lawyer like you," Hicks babbled, stalling for time. "You ought to see our mounted police exhibit."

"Canadian Northwest?" inquired O'Toole, more out of desperation than any desire to know.

"New York mounted police," Hicks answered.

"How did you get the horses?"

"What horses?"

"Why, for the mounted police."

"There are no horses," said Hicks.

"Then what are the policemen mounted on?"

"Why, on a platform, of course."

"Phooey on all this," interrupted Mr. Pratt. "See here, I'm in this place looking for my wife."

"What would she be doing in this museum?" parried the false guide, with a disarming smile. "Don't tell me you married one of the waxworks?"

"No," Pratt forced himself to reply. "But I think she's hiding here. As a matter of fact," he continued, "she might be right over there." And he pointed to Mary, Queen of Scots.

Before Hicks could stop him, Pratt bolted over the railing and began to shake the wax figure violently. But he was wrong—the dummy did not move.

“You’re crazy,” the guide assured him.

“Beginning to think so myself,” Pratt muttered. He laughed shrilly. “Perhaps we’re all crazy. Maybe I’m Napoleon.”

“No!” boomed a voice. “7 am Napoleon!”

At the sound of these words Pratt wheeled suddenly, then collapsed. Tubby, in the costume of the Little Corporal, stood at his side. “I’m Napoleon,” he announced. “You must be nuts!” Then he stared at O’Toole. “Don’t start telling me you’re King Tut, either, because this gentleman can prove it.”

And Mr. O’Toole was forced to confront Bill, who leered at him madly from inside an open mummy-case.

Where the girls had found the Wooden Horse of Troy will never be known. It is enough they had, and somehow managed to struggle into it.

Now this beast put in an untimely appearance.

There is nothing worse than the sight of a wobbly wooden horse in a wax museum—a big wooden horse that is unexpectedly alive. As this nightmare loped drunkenly down the corridor on six legs, Mr. Pratt and Mr. O’Toole suddenly decided that they had suffered enough.

With low animal moans they fled for the door, just as the horse suddenly split in the middle and pursued them. The head charged Mr. O’Toole and the terrifying other end bounded after Mr. Pratt. Neither of these gentlemen stopped running until the museum was several blocks behind them.

Here a policeman halted them and asked the reason for their haste.

“The head of a wooden horse was chasing me,” gasped O’Toole.

The policeman sneered, and looked at Mr. Pratt. “And just what was chasing you?” he asked.

But for some reason, Mr. Pratt wouldn’t tell. He just sat down on the sidewalk and strangled himself.

"GREAT WORK!" said Mr. Hicks, surveying his companions. "I'm proud of you."

"Splendid," Mrs. Pratt agreed, emerging from the wooden horse-head. "You frightened that wretch almost to death. Let's all have a drink on that."

The bottle changed hands. Annabel handed it to Bill, who was helplessly fumbling in his mummy-wrappings.

"Baby want?" she inquired. "You know, you look cute that way."

"Get me out of here," demanded the struggling young man. He took a long drink that didn't do him any good, and a long look that helped a great deal.

"Why, Bill, you're helpless," exclaimed the girl. She placed her arms about the man, and in a moment Bill was investigating the claims set forth by the advertisements of a popular lipstick.

The experiment was pleasant and prolonged. By the time it was finished, Tubby had an idea.

"Let's give our wax friends here a break," said the fat man, with a tipsy leer. "Don't forget, they were a big help to us and they deserve a reward."

"What can you do for a wax dummy?" demanded Susan Foster, who had a practical mind about some things.

"Well, we could take them out and buy them all a drink."

"Fine!" Hicks agreed, without knowing why. "I'll handle the doorman."

He went out into the corridor and approached the dour fellow who stared stolidly into the night, ignoring all uproar from within the museum.

"Nice place you have here," Hicks said. "We enjoyed it a lot."

"That's funny," mused the doorman. "Two other guys went in for a while and then they came running out like the devil hisself was at their heels."

"They weren't frightened," lied Hicks, valiantly. "Just killing time for a while and then they had to leave in a hurry." He lowered his voice. "You see, one of them expected to become a father."

"He picked a funny place for it," snorted the doorman, sourly.

"Don't be silly," Hicks argued. "One can become a father almost anywhere."

"I'd hate to become one in a wax museum," said the doorman. "The kid might be born with two heads." Suddenly the dour man warmed up and became talkative. "My cousin's wife once had a baby in a movie theatre. Twins."

"Oh," Hicks murmured. "A double feature."

"Right," said the doorman. "But she only had a chance to see one show. Later she went back and got her money refunded."

Now Hicks had intended to confuse the doorman, but he was more than a little confused himself by this conversation. "Here," he said, producing the bottle, "Have a drink."

The doorkeeper accepted. As he tilted his head back, his neck gurgled and contorted in a revolting fashion.

Hicks stopped the foul spectacle by deftly winding a scarf around the man's neck. He produced another and tied his hands and feet. Then he deposited him safely on a couch inside the hall, and reclaimed his bottle.

"Hereafter don't drink strange liquor," he warned the writhing man. "It's liable to gag you." On this remark he turned and rejoined his companions inside.

His friends were drunkenly selecting their waxwork escorts. Tubby took to another redhead—Queen Elizabeth. Mrs. Pratt seemed to find comfort in that divorce-fiend, Henry the Eighth. Susan Foster, for no reason at all, decided on Rasputin. Bill merely grabbed the first dummy available—which unfortunately proved to be Lady Godiva. Annabel sniffed at him and turned to something called a Chinese Hatchet Victim. Hicks lifted down Madame Pompadour.

The result was quaint, to say the least. Tubby still wore the Napoleon costume, Bill's mummy-wrappings were intact, and Hicks changed the guide outfit for a convict suit. The three women wore their street clothes. Thus arrayed, the party crept out the front entrance, each dragging a silent wax companion.

Convict and French courtesan; Napoleon and the Virgin Queen; the overdressed dummy and the over-exposed Lady Godiva; followed by three girls escorting a bloody corpse, a bloody king and a bloody monk—it was a ghastly procession.

Two taxis were summoned—for a cabdriver will carry Death Himself, provided that gentleman has the fare—and the motley assemblage whizzed back down the street to the Cafe de Paree.

IT WAS THE after-theatre dinner hour as they entered, and tables were crowded. A harrassed head waiter met them in the doorway. When his eyes had feasted upon the costumes of these unusual customers, his overworked smile sagged dreadfully. It was only by straining his suavity to the utmost that he was able to meet the commanding gaze of Mr. Hicks.

“Well?” challenged the gentleman in the convict suit. “What are you staring at?”

“Nothing, M’sieu,” the waiter assured, in a voice that entirely lacked conviction. “Nothing at all.”

“Get us a table,” Hicks ordered. “A big table.” Then, “Don’t mind us, we’re going to a masquerade party,” he explained, “and besides, we’re all awfully drunk.”

This last statement was heartily endorsed by the head waiter. Never had he seen a more dreadfully drunken crowd. Fully half of these people seemed incapable of walking at all, but were supported by their partners. Some of them seemed to stare quite hideously, with eyes void of all expression. Unless he escorted them to a table at once, it was quite possible that a number of his guests would collapse on the lobby floor, and this would be a bad advertisement for the cafe.

Accordingly, Francois, forcing a fixed and frozen smile, bowed to Hicks and choked forth a despairing, “Follow me, M’sieu.” The halfdummy, half-drunken cavalcade trailed across the empty dance floor.

The bodies of the wax dummies dangled from their partner’s arms, and the feet trailed loathsomely behind. Once or twice the living members of the party got their own legs tangled up, or tramped viciously on waxen toes.

But the expression on the dummy faces never altered. Dorothy Pratt finally became so enraged at the antics of Henry the Eighth that she picked him up bodily and slung him across her shoulder.

This remarkable procession did not pass unnoticed by the patrons of the cafe, who gazed in wonder at the group's peculiar progress.

"Gawd!" breathed a lady from Brooklyn to her escort. "What is this, a circus? That must be the strong woman."

"Lordy!" muttered a wellknown Broadway columnist, "What will Billy Rose think of next?" He shook his head. "If they're celebrities, I don't know them. Unless that fellow with the beard is one of the Smith Brothers."

"Don't say that," pleaded his companion. "Because if you tell me that little fat guy is really Napoleon, I'm going to collapse."

Several other customers seemed prepared to follow his example. Fortunately for their shattered nerves, the group finally found places at a table on the far side of the dancefloor.

Francois stood by while the group seated themselves, then wished he hadn't. The six drunkest of the lot—which were, of course, the dummies—were brutally dumped into chairs by the more lively members of the party. The sight of Susan Foster daintily affixing a napkin to Rasputin's beard was almost too much for the head waiter's sanity. Casting professional dignity to the winds, Francois stared aghast.

"What's the matter, man, are you crazy?" asked Hicks. The head waiter refused to answer that one. He had too many doubts.

"Bring us twelve champagne cocktails," Hicks ordered. "The way your hands tremble, you can probably shake them up yourself."

FRANCOIS regarded his hands intently for a moment. They were indeed shaking most violently. He attempted to stop them by clenching his fists, which gave him the appearance of a man trying to shake two pair of dice at once.

"Well," barked Hicks, "what's the matter—St. Vitus Dance?" He turned to his comrades. "What a dive! The management is so destitute they have to employ a head waiter with palsy!"

Stifling a sob, Francois hurried away. "Twelve champagne cocktails," he told the bartender. "And don't spare the arsenic!"

From which it might be concluded that Francois was very upset indeed, for the Cafe de Paree had never served anything remotely resembling arsenic since the days of the wartime liquor shortage.

Bill and his friends were now settled at the table and they had time to glance around. The other patrons were engaged in the good old American custom of having a "big evening." The place was filled with sophisticated cosmopolites from Omaha, while at the bar crouched a few native New Yorkers, who gazed timidly at their more daring big-city cousins.

It was an unusual spectacle for Bill and a common one for Annabel. She didn't laugh, because she pitied these people and their philosophy. They were trying so hard to snatch a little happiness and paying so dearly for the privilege. Tomorrow many of them would be on their way home—back to their offices, their household drudgery, their children, and the long winter nights.

Life was pretty much routine for most people, Annabel decided. She and her carefree companions were among the elect. If she could only make Bill understand that; learn the secret of living without worrying about appearances. Not like these pathetic couples who would return tomorrow to eternal monotony with nothing but the memory of this synthetic evening to comfort them. They were so brave about it, too; so eager to go through the motions of enjoyment. Willingly they endured the outlandish cover charges, the hideous music, the indigestible food, the watered liquor, the veiled insults of sneering head waiters and condescending check-room girls. They were paying the price of their fun—and Annabel wished them luck.

These musings were interrupted by the appearance of the waiter, bearing the cocktails. He set them down without comment, although his eyes bulged, when he reached the Chinese Axe Victim.

“Something seems to be the matter with this gentleman,” he chattered, indicating the dummy’s throat, which had been gruesomely gored by the artist to show the spot where the hatchet had struck.

“Why, he’s just drunk,” Annabel assured him, tranquilly.

“But—but look at his neck!” the waiter wailed, indicating the cut throat.

“Oh, that?” laughed the girl. “I guess he must have cut himself. He’s always been so careless about shaving.”

The waiter received this explanation with a horrified stare. “Your friend must use an awfully big razor,” he ventured, thoughtfully.

“Yes,” Annabel answered. “He carries it around with him to use on people who ask impertinent questions.”

This was enough to send the waiter tottering away. That night he dropped seventeen plates and three brandy glasses. The next day the unfortunate man quit his job and entered a monastery, where he remained in his cell and refused to shave all the rest of his life.

Meanwhile the inscrutable workings of alcohol were having their usual effect on the group.

“Now that we’ve got our drinks,” Susan Foster remarked, in a practical voice, “just what do you intend to do with them? The dummies don’t really drink, you know.”

“We’ll each drink two,” Tubby decided. “And order some more, fast. Don’t want anyone to get suspicious.”

They drank and re-ordered. “Not much fun for the dummies,” Hicks remarked. “Let’s at least act sociable and talk to them.”

So presently the staring patrons of the Cafe de Paree had to watch six lively drunks conversing with six dead ones.

“Why, I’ve never seen anything like it in my life!” said an angular lady from Idaho. “Half those people look as if they were dead.”

Her companion, a travelling salesman from Baltimore, gazed at the group with distaste.

“They should be dead,” he muttered. “If I had a gun, I’d shoot them myself. Especially that fellow in the beard. I wouldn’t care to be living with that thing on."

"Neither would I!" said the lady, emphatically.

HICKS noticed the stares and whispered, "I'm afraid they're getting wise to us. We'd better make it look as if these dummies were alive, or some fool will come over and investigate."

Consequently the lady from Idaho had to watch while the dummies were manipulated by their companions; forced to bow and nod in their seats. Wax arms were raised and lowered with most astonishing haste. Rasputin was operated so that it appeared as if his corpse-like fingers were actually stroking the hairs of his nauseating beard. Henry the Eighth bounced up and down in his seat. Madame le Pompadour sat on Hicks' lap, and that callous gentleman pretended to kiss her. Queen Elizabeth had her napkin tucked in by Bill. Unfortunately he shoved it into her bodice a trifle too far and it began to disappear down the front of her gown. Absent-mindedly enough, Bill reached down and grabbed it.

This sight was too much for the lady from Idaho. She fainted on the spot. Her companion rose abruptly and strode over to the table.

"What's coming off here?" he demanded.

Bill looked up, letting go of the napkin in surprise.

"Why, nothing at all," he answered, brightly. Then he glanced down at the floor. "At least, I hope not."

"Then what are you doing to the lady?"

"Well," Bill considered. "It appears she dropped her napkin. I was just being a gentleman and picking it up for her."

As he spoke, Bill noticed the napkin had again disappeared inside the dress. He reached for it once more. The salesman stood and goggled at the sight until Bill had finally captured the napkin, rolled down his sleeve, and waved the cloth around like a flag of victory.

"Got it at last!" he exclaimed, happily.

"So I see," replied the salesman. Then, in a lower voice, "Doesn't the lady object to your familiarity?"

"Too drunk," Bill told him, gravely. "She wouldn't know it if I dropped a table-cloth down her chest." He thought about it for a moment. "But I'd sure hate to have to go after a thing like that."

"I'd sure hate to watch you," the salesman assured him.

"But that's a mere trifle," Bill improvised, wishing the man would go away. "When she gets going, there's no stopping her. Sometimes she loses knives and forks that way, or even dishes. Once it was a whole leg of lamb."

The man looked quite sick, now.

"Yes sir!" cried Bill, gaily. "When this little lady gets really drunk you never know what will drop next. Sometimes I get so tired of fishing for things, I'd like to send down a diver."

This final concept was entirely too much for the salesman. He turned and dragged back to his table where he proceeded to collapse alongside the body of his unconscious partner. It is not definitely known whether either of them ever got up again.

Meanwhile Annabel, in a vain effort to make her dummy look alive, had unfortunately bumped its head against the back of a chair. It cracked open on one side, and a thin trickle of powdered wax and sawdust now streamed down onto her plate.

At this point the waiter returned with fresh drinks. He stood watching the little mound of sawdust for some time. At last his bewilderment burst all bounds.

"Pardon me, miss," he said, curiously, "but. isn't that sawdust there on your plate?"

"Sawdust?" flared Annabel, noticing it for the first time. "Why—certainly not, It's—it's breakfast food!" she announced, defiantly.

"I'd have sworn that was sawdust, lady," pursued the waiter, thoughtfully. He was an observant, scientific-minded soul.

"Well, it's not sawdust," retorted the girl. "I always bring my breakfast food with me when I go out. Doctor's orders."

"I'd have to be pretty sick to eat that stuff, lady," said the waiter. "And without cream or sugar, either."

"I like it that way," said Annabel, wildly. To prove her words she took a spoon and forced herself to choke down a mouthful. Then she smiled, bitterly.

THE WAITER, however, was still unsatisfied. Glancing around, he noticed the marks of sawdust in the Hatchet Victim's hair.

"What's this, if I might ask?" he queried, suddenly. "More breakfast food on the gentleman's head?"

"Dandruff," Annabel explained.

"I see," mused the waiter. "I see." He kept staring.

"Come on, everybody," Annabel said, in a desperate attempt to get away. "Let's all dance."

Had the partners been sober, they would have avoided this suggestion like the plague. But acting on drunken impulse, they all decided to drag their inanimate partners 'out on the dancefloor and mutilate their arches to the raucous rhythm.

The cafe, by this time, was jammed to the eaves by a vast throng of pleasure-benders, and the dance-floor was correspondingly crowded. Many of the newcomers had not yet seen the partners and their queer companions. Now they got a generous eyeful.

The wax dummies made poor dancing partners. Bill and Annabel soon abandoned Lady Godiva and the Chinese Hatchet Victim, and danced with each other. Hicks managed rather well with Madame Pompadour, since her long skirt hid the dragging feet.

Tubby and Queen Elizabeth, however, had their troubles. Elizabeth's legs dragged along the floor almost a foot behind her as the little fat man twirled her torso. The dragging feet soon attracted attention from the other dancers, and Tubby began to get embarrassed. Finally he hit upon a solution. Opening up the coat of his Napoleon costume, he shoved the dummy's feet into his pockets and contented himself by dancing with the upper half. The result was loathsome to look upon. From a distance it looked as if the Virgin Queen was using her partner for a step-ladder.

"What a deal!" observed an opulent brunette, indicating the two. "Look—that woman is actually dancing with her feet in that man's pockets."

"Must be a new step," her partner told her.

"Well, I don't want to learn it," declared the brunette.

Others were of the same opinion. A small redhead, however, stopped in the middle of the floor and watched the performance eagerly.

"What will that Arthur Murray think up next?" she breathed to her companion. "We ought to try and learn that one." And she, in turn, attempted to put her feet in her escort's pockets.

"Cut it out," gasped the man. "This is no place for horseback riding."

Mrs. Pratt waltzed by with Henry the Eighth. The merry monarch was a heavy armful for the blonde divorcee, but she was game to the finish. She had never been known to lose a man unless she wanted to, and this was no time to begin. Accordingly she danced furiously, jiggling the dummy in her arms and kicking its waxen feet vigorously. About this time one of the legs detached itself from the body. Mrs. Pratt failed to notice its loss immediately, but others did.

A fat woman and her escort were the first to make the discovery. Under the impression that it was merely one of her partner's corns, the fat woman trod on the loose limb heavily. It squished. She glanced down and recoiled in horror.

"Yaaaah!" she screeched. "Look! It's a man's leg!" Her companion, who was more than a little bottle-fatigued, looked down with bleary eyes.

"Whassa matter?" he mumbled. "Aintcha never seen a man's leg before?"

"But there's no body with it," explained the fat woman, hysterically.

"Why should there be anybody with it?"

“I mean there’s nobody attached to this leg,” the woman sobbed.

“Who ever heard of someone bein’ attached to a leg?” demanded the drunken gentleman, impatiently. “People seldom fall in love with legs, honey,” he assured her. So saying, he lurched forward and stumbled over the revolting white limb.

“It’s a leg!” he screamed. “A bloody human leg!” A second later both he and the woman fell to the floor in a dead faint. Fortunately, they both rolled off the dance floor and under a table.

BUT NOW, for the first time, Mrs. Pratt realized what had happened to her dummy. Uttering a little shriek of dismay, she hastily dropped Henry the Eighth to the floor, whereupon the other limb fell off. Hastily, she dragged the wax carcass to the table. A number of dancers around her decided they had better return to their tables at the same time and take quick drinks. There was muttering and mumbling, staring and pointing. But the orchestra kept on playing, and Bill, Annabel, Tubby, Queen Elizabeth, Susan Foster and Rasputin, Hicks and Pompadour kept on dancing in apparent unconcern.

Susan Foster was finding that Rasputin was not an ideal partner, either. In some fashion or other she had managed to get her hands tangled in the waxwork’s beard. Now, try as she might, she could not release her fingers. Finally, in desperation, she began to shake the dummy violently from side to side.

The dance floor being almost entirely empty, this spectacle was clearly observed by all. The effect was that of a young woman earnestly endeavoring to strangle her escort on the spot.

Amidst a chorus of horrified groans, Miss Foster succeeded in dislodging her hands at last—and with them, her partner’s head.

Rasputin’s skull slipped to the floor with a dreadful thud, and Susan, blushing as well she might, dragged the headless corpse back to her table.

Hicks, Tubby and Dorothy Pratt raced after her and got ready to make a fast exit.

For the tumult by now had attracted the attention of an excited knot of waiters, and the police would doubtless be called any minute. The majority of the patrons remained glued (or in some cases, plastered) to their seats. Word had gone around that this whole thing must be part of the regular floor-show, which was a brutal enough performance in itself. So the spectators stayed and waited for developments.

Bill and Annabel, blissfully unaware of these last horrors, danced on with eyes only for each other. They circled the empty dance-floor gracefully, and might have gone on forever if Bill hadn't made a startling discovery.

Looking down, he noticed that his mummy-wrappings were loosened by the dancing and starting to unwind. Once started, they unravelled quickly. So the patrons of the Cafe de Paree were treated to still another illuminating exhibition—a most revealing spectacle. Annabel, in a vain attempt to keep Bill's costume intact, grabbed one loose end of the bandage and hung on, grimly. At the same time Bill tried to turn. The result was devastating.

For Bill, unable to stop, spun around like a whirling dervish. The wrappings kept unwinding. The harder Annabel tugged, the faster Bill was forced to spin. Like a maddened top he revolved while the bandages rolled away. Finally, like a shot out of hell, Bill catapulted across the room, naked to his shorts, and dropped right at the foot of his own table. The crowd, now convinced this was all part of the show, applauded wildly. Annabel bowed and stalked off.

The management, hearing the applause of the audience, might have been content to let the matter drop without starting trouble, if things hadn't suddenly taken a new turn—and for the worse.

AT THIS critical moment a waiter conducted two drunken gentlemen to a nearby table. These gentlemen happened to be Mr. Oswald Pratt and Mr. O'Toole. The two victims of the wax museum had ceased their flight at last in a tavern and thereupon sensibly drowned their painful memories in drink. By successive stages of locomotion and intoxication they had worked their way back to the Cafe de Paree.

Now they sat directly opposite the friends, who did not notice their arrival at the moment. Bill and his companions were talking about leaving.

"Why go?" Hicks asked. "These people think it's all a gag, anyway."

"Well, I'm not so sure," said Bill. He had salvaged a table-cloth and pow stood shivering beside his chair.

"Somebody is certain to ask questions."

Opinions flowed pro and con, and so did drinks. But it was Mr. Pratt who decided the matter for them. His bloodshot eyes suddenly hit the next table.

"Ye gods!" he bellowed. "They're back again, O'Toole—the dummies are back again and they are alive!"

O'Toole stared. "There's your ex-wife!" he yelled, pointing frantically, "See her over there with that convict?"

The two men rose and ran towards the table, but the partners saw them coming. Pratt, shouting hoarsely, tried to grab for Dorothy. Instead he received the body of Queen Elizabeth full in the face. He went down, strangling in a sea of petticoats.

O'Toole received Madame le Pompadour—in fact, he was given practically an entire harem as Bill added Lady Godiva and somebody contributed the legless Henry the Eighth. Throwing a tablecloth over the two prostrate men, the party rushed for the exit.

It all happened so quickly that they met with little resistance. Two waiters, however, tried to block the doorway as they rushed out. One of them was the suspicious fellow who had served them.

"Don't let them get away," he warned his companion. "They're all a bunch of trunk-murderers, if you ask me."

As if to corroborate this statement, he received a hearty blow on the head with the trunk of the Chinese Hatchet Victim which Bill now wielded as a battering ram. The other waiter caught a similar clout. His skull was hard enough to break the body of the dummy as the blow landed. Consequently, the horrified patrons of the cafe seemed to see one man broken in half on another man’s head.

After this there was no opposition. The three girls, the convict, the drunken Napoleon, and the man in the table-cloth reached the exit in safety and disappeared immediately into a convenient taxicab.

That evening the Cafe de Paree closed its doors forever, and did not reopen until the following Monday, when it became the Paree Cafe. Such was the devastating effect of this unusual incident upon Broadway night life.

“So much for culture!” Bill raged, as the cab carried them back to the Flopmoor. “I hope you’re all satisfied, now.”

“What’s the trouble?” Hicks inquired. “Didn’t you learn anything?”

“I learned what it feels like to be chased and assaulted and stripped practically naked in a public place,” Bill retorted, bitterly.

“But you were so clever, so brave,” Annabel consoled, snuggling close. “When you hit that waiter over the head I was proud of you.”

“Were you, really?” asked the poor dope, with a silly grin on his face.

“We were all proud of you,” Tubby asserted, drunkenly. “It’s a pleasure to live in the same hotel with a manager like you.”

“Good heavens, the hotel!” Bill sat upright again. “You boys were right about one thing—I did manage to forget the hotel worries for a while. But I wonder what’s been happening tonight while I was away?”

HE FOUND out soon enough. As soon as they entered the lobby, the house detective rushed up and grabbed Bill by the table-cloth.

“Thank goodness you’re here, boss, he breathed. “Hey, what happened—you been playing strip poker?”

“Never mind,” Annabel cut in.

“What’s the trouble?”

“Everything,” sighed the detective. “First off, there’s all them phoney names.”

“What phoney names?”

“Right after dark, characters started coming in to register. All of them had the same pitch—they was with the Convention, of course. Looked like magicians, acted like magicians, so I paid no attention. I’m just about used to screwballs by now.” He eyed Hicks and Tubby for a moment before continuing. “But then I got a gander at the names they signed in the register. Here, take a look.” He dragged Bill over to the desk and Bill read the list of recent arrivals.

“Cagliostro,” he said. “Why, wasn’t that some charlatan who lived back in the Eighteenth Century?”

“Don’t ask me,” Hicks replied: “I wasn’t around.”

“Comte de St. Germain,” Bill continued. “Merlin, Why, that’s impossible! Merlin, indeed!”

“Real old pappy guy with a long white beard,” the desk-clerk informed him. “Talked a funny line of English, he did. Carried one of those sticks with a star on top.”

“A wand,” Tubby muttered. “Just like at King Arthur’s Court. Notice anything else queer about him?”

“Well, he went into the grill to eat,” the clerk said. “And I understand he kicked up an awful fuss because they wouldn’t seat him at a round table.”

“It can’t be!” Bill muttered. “It can’t be!”

“They all asked the same thing,” the house detective went on. “Wanted to know the room number of that guy, L. Dritch. Guess they’re friends of his.”

“Any friend of his is no friend of mine,” Bill declared. “This looks like trouble to me. All these abnormal arrivals.” He scanned the register again.

“Well, at least we seem to have had one normal customer. This Dr. Stein.”

“Dr. Frank N. Stein,” the desk-clerk corrected.

“No—not that!”

“Shall we go up and interview some of these guests?” Hicks asked.

“Good idea,” said Bill. But he was interrupted. Employees began to arrive in the lobby.

THE FIRST was an elderly charwoman. She waddled up to Bill and sobbed on his table-cloth. “Yer the manager, aintcher?” she snivelled. “Well, I got er report ter make. They been stealin’ my brooms out er the broom-closets, that’s what. Stealin’ all my brooms.”

“Who stole your brooms?”

“Old ladies. Whole bleedin’ snag er them old ladies. Come with er Magicians, they said. Nasty, foul-mouthed old biddies they was, too. Opened up the broom closets on all er floors an’ grabbed the brooms. Said they was goin’ up to er roof and go for a ride. Never saw er bunch of drunken old ladies like them before.”

“Cats!” interrupted a bellhop, angrily. “Hotel’s full of black cats. Women brought ’em in. Want me to walk their dizzy cats for ’em.”

“What about that wolf up in 711?” complained another bell-boy. “Not the one with the blonde, I mean the real wolf. He tried to take a bite out of my leg just ten minutes ago.”

“That ees of no useless,” spluttered a man in a chef’s hat and apron, who appeared, brandishing a ladle. “The deep-freeze, she is occupied. I weesh to make an ask, who rents room in the deep-freeze, no?”

“What’s all this?” The desk-clerk shrugged. “I didn’t rent. the deepfreeze. Somebody parking their luggage in there?”

“A customer, he requests the crabs.

I hasten to procure of same from the deep-freeze. I open the door and—low and beheld—ees a man, sleeping on inside. I inform him to take the hell out of there. ‘Shut up’ he explains to me. ‘You weel capture your death of coldness’ I venture. ‘Ha ha!’ he remarks. ‘I like eet here. Eet reminds me of a tomb.’ And I swear by bleu he appears as one who belongs in a tomb. He sports of a long black cloak—”

“Pseudo W. Nym,” Annabel said. “Remember? Another of Mr. Dritch’s friends.”

“I do not get friendly with such,” the chef assured her. “I shake of my head. I slam of the door. I run as though hell. The customer, let him go to another hotel for crabs.”

"They're lousing up the ballroom," proclaimed the steward, emerging from the elevator. "Old fella in a long beard is in there—claims he's on the Entertainment Committee for the Grand Hallowe'en Ball tomorrow night. Found him drawing a lot of stars and circles all over the floor with blue chalk. And two of our oldest guests just checked out because one of them found a coffin in her closet."

"Was the coffin empty?" Bill managed to ask.

"Yes, it was empty, all right. But there was a sign pinned on the cover that said, BACK IN TEN MINUTES," the steward replied.

"Tell him about the bats," the desk-clerk reminded. "Whole top floor of the hotel seems to be filled with bats."

"The whole place is filled with bats," Bill declared. "But it's after midnight. I can't settle all these things now without disturbing all the guests. Better let it ride until morning. Just do what you can. As I recall, the Magicians are going out on a sightseeing tour all day. That will leave the hotel pretty well deserted. We can decide on a plan, go through the hotel room by room if we must, and get rid of all these queer characters. Clean the place up in time for the Ball tomorrow night. In that way we won't arouse any more talk than we need to, and we'll solve the problem sensibly. Now—for heaven's sake—let's all try to get some sleep."

HE TURNED to his companions. "I advise you to do the same." he said. "No more carousing tonight, please. We seem to be up against something mighty strange here. I don't want to have to call the police or get us involved in a public scandal, so let's take it easy. Tomorrow we'll track down the mystery. Tonight, we rest."

There was a lot of head-shaking and shrugging, but in the end Bill won them over. The house-detective and room-clerk promised to keep their eyes open for disturbances; the bellboys were alerted, and the party dispersed.

Bill kissed Annabel goodnight in the lobby.

"You know something?" she whispered. "This is all doing you a world of good."

"Because the hotel is being ruined?" he asked, "or because I am?"

"Don't talk that way. Two days ago you wouldn't have had the courage to face anything like this. You'd have turned and run away. Now—thanks to my cooperation—you're ready for anything."

"That's what I'm likely to get." Bill told her, "Anything and everything. But you're right. I'm enjoying myself, for the first time in my life."

"I'm glad," said the girl, and meant it.

They parted, and Bill sought his room and bed. He had imagined himself to be much too upset for slumber, but the moment his head touched the pillow he drifted off into a deep and dreamless sleep.

He slept for several hours. And then—

When Bill lifted his eyelids he thought for a moment he hadn't wakened. Then he suddenly realized his bed was on fire.

The ringing in his ears didn't come from an alarm clock but from a fire-engine in the street below. Bill blinked and got out of the smoking bed very quickly. It was turning dawn outside, but the flaming bolster of the bed lent light to the room—and speed to Bill's progress towards the window.

As he reached it, the window opened from outside and a fireman thrust his face in. He was a pale, gaunt fireman with a sleepy look in his eyes. Even his mustache drooped with boredom.

"Good morning, Mister," drawled the fireman.

"Who are you?" demanded Bill, still dazed. "A Peeping Tom?"

"You got the wrong party," said the helmeted man. "My name's Charlie Jenkins."

"Never mind the introductions," answered the now frantic young man in pajamas. "I've got a fire on my hands."

"Don't see any there," observed Fireman Jenkins, peering at Bill's hands.

"In my room, then. My bed's burning."

"Oh," observed the blinking intruder. "Kinda thought I smelled smoke." Slowly he crawled through the window. "How'd you start it?" he lazily inquired.

“I’m a Boy Scout,” Bill raged. “I rubbed a couple of bed-posts together and there it was.”

The fireman gazed down at the bed, which now burst into active flames.

“You suppose I better put it out?” he said, at last.

“What do you want to do?” Bill demanded, “Roast some marshmallows over it?”

“Don’t care for marshmallows,” shrugged the fireman, as he dragged a hose through the window. He pointed the nozzle and allowed a thin stream of water to play over the rapidly-burning bed. He had the expression of a man watering a garden full of pansies.

BILL DANCED about him in a frenzy. “Put it out!” he screamed. “Hurry up—don’t let the hotel burn down!”

“I’m putting it out,” retorted the fireman, wearily. “Fast as I can, too. Maybe you’d like to help by spitting on the flames?” he suggested, in a bitter voice.

“Don’t waste time—the whole place will burn down around our ears.”

“Might burn down farther than that,” Fireman Jenkins said, glancing at Bill. “It’s lower than your waist right now.”

Sure enough, sparks had ignited Bill’s pajama pants. “Put me out!” he yelled, and the fireman turned the hose on him, sending him backwards over the still-smouldering bed. Jenkins continued to play water over the blaze until it was extinguished. Then he handed the hose to a companion on the ladder outside and picked up an axe. He headed for the door.

“Never mind!” Bill screamed, “The door isn’t locked.”

But Jenkins battered the door down, then stooped and retrieved a bright object from the floor.

“Here’s the key,” he mused. “Must have fell out while I was breaking down the door.”

He trotted down the hall and called back, “Next time don’t go eating firecrackers in bed.”

Bill sank down on the ruined bed, speechless with rage. It was a fine way to start the day.

“This burns me up,” he said.

“Me too!”

The voice came from under the charred bed. Bill blinked and stared down. A haggard figure now crawled out from below.

“Sorry about the fire,” said the little man.

Bill recognized the amateur magician from yesterday morning—Archie the Archfiend.

“What are you doing in my room?” he raged.

“Hiding,” whispered Archie. “I had to see you, so I came to your room last night. You weren’t here and I waited around. Then I heard noises and I was afraid, so I crawled under the bed. Guess I fell asleep waiting.”

“And the fire?”

“Curse?”

“L. Dritch is out to kill me. Undoubtedly he wove a spell around me that would make me burst into flames. Tried to give me the supernatural hotfoot, understand?”

“I don’t understand. Why should L. Dritch want to kill you?” Bill asked. “I thought you were a friend of his.”

“I was,” sighed Archie the Archfiend, taking a chair. “Until I found out what he was up to. When he invited me to join him at this hotel I didn’t realize what he meant to do.” Archie riffled his hands through his carroty hair. “Then he told me and I refused to get in the act, so he cursed me. I had to hide out and I wanted to warn you. You see, I don’t mind a little hell-raising now and then, but big hell-raising—that’s another story!”

“Hell-raising?”

"HERE'S THE deal. I guess you figured out by now that L. Dritch is a real sorcerer. Dabbles in Black Magic. Dabbles? He practically wallows in it. An old friend of Black Art, the magician. You know him?"

"Uh-uh."

"You're lucky. Anyway, L. Dritch is a wizard. He sold his soul to the Devil years ago, and if you ask me, the Devil got himself a rotten bargain when he took it. But in return the Devil gave L. Dritch all kinds of magical power—to cast spells, work enchantments, call up demons and reverse the charges. Stuff like that. And all L. Dritch had to do in return to keep the pact alive, and himself alive too was to hold a sort of Witches' Sabbath once a year on Hallowe'en.

"As long as he did this, he wouldn't die. And our old bearded friend also found out he wasn't the only one who had made the same deal with Satan. There are others in the world, lots of others. Some of them have been around for a long, long time—never dying and always remembering to have their little Hallowe'en Party on schedule. L. Dritch got chummy with a lot of them on Witches' Sabbaths in the past. Most of them, you know, are held out on lonely mountain-tops in the deep woods, where it's dark and quiet."

"How do you know so much about all this?" Bill demanded. "Did you sell your soul to the Devil, too?"

"Nah," protested Archie the Archfiend, hastily. "I just rented it to him. Sort of a five-year contract, with options. I only deal in small magic, like the trick I pulled this morning. You see, I just wanted the power to be a real magician and show up those stage phonies. Always been crazy about it since I was a little fella, just knee-high to a skeleton. I wouldn't sell my soul outright—why that would be dishonest!"

"Glad to hear it," Bill observed. "But L. Dritch—?"

"He's wicked. He has all kinds of power. Raising the dead, turning people to stone, finding free downtown parking places—big stuff like that. So all the other damned souls respect him like a leader. And he met plenty of them on other Hallowe'ens—witches and warlocks and vampires and ghouls and werewolves—"

“But what are they doing in the Hotel Flopmoor if they meet on lonely mountain-tops?”

“That’s the big idea L. Dritch came up with. Last year he sort of stopped, in at the Magician’s Convention to get a few laughs and he suddenly came up with this bright notion.

“Way he figured it, why should he and his supernatural side-kicks have to dance around in the cold night air way out in some deserted spot in the country when they could all hold their Black Sabbath inside a nice warm, bright, modern air-conditioned hotel—with plenty to eat and drink, room service, and everything? Since the Magicians hold a Masked Ball, all these witches and vampires might get away with it as if they were only wearing costumes. They could mingle with the regular guests and nobody would notice. Besides, with all the hotel guests around, there wouldn’t be any trouble finding a human sacrifice or two.”

“Sounds sensible to me,” agreed Bill. Then, “What am I saying? It’s madness!”

“That’s what I told him,” Archie the Archfiend nodded. “And he got sore at me. Then, when I wouldn’t have any part of his other plan, he cursed me.”

“What other plan?”

“Well, at these Witches’ Sabbaths they do all sorts of things. It’s kind of hard for me to remember because I haven’t been to one since my Ma took me when I was a little boy. But anyhow, one of the things they have to do is summon up the Devil and a bunch of fiends.”

“This is difficult?” Bill asked. “Hard as hell. Because hell is where they come from. It takes a lot of dancing and chanting and praying, and they burn incense and raise an awful stink—the whole thing is a mess, So L. Dritch figured another way.”

“What way?”

“Well, he has magic powers. And your hotel has elevators.”

“So?”

"He's going to put the two together, that's all. This morning, when most of the guests are out for the day. L. Dritch and his fiend friends are going to use their magical arts to take one of your elevators and dig a shaft below it that runs down to Hell."

"Hell, you say?"

"Hell, I do. They'll run an elevator to Hell and bring back a crew of imps and demons on it for the Hallowe'en Night celebration."

"But they can't do this!"

"That's what I told them. Said I wanted no part of it and L. Dritch said I was a heel and cursed me. And they're going to do it—today."

"Come on," panted Bill, panting and shirting himself quickly. "Let's find the others. We've got to put a stop to this!"

"Yes," added Archie the Archfiend. "Before all Hell breaks loose!"

MR. L. DRITCH was entertaining guests in his suite—if you can call it entertainment to watch a hirsute wizard combing his beard with a small gardener's rake.

There were other bearded men in the room, and several bearded women. There was also a shaggy wolf, a thin old man in a peaked cap and a robe covered with cabalistic designs and moth-holes.

Dritch regarded the company from behind his hairy barricade and started to call the roll.

"Cagliostro?"

"Present."

"Monsieur le Comte de St. Germain?"

"Oui."

"Merlin?"

"Prithee, I am indeed in attendance. I wot."

"You what?"

"I wot, that's what."

“Oh.” Mr. Dritch identified various and sundry witches, hags, crones, beldames, enchantresses and sorceresses, plus a number of necromancers and Mr. W. Wolf, who was busily gnawing open a can of dog-food. All responded to the roll-call.

“Then we’re ready for action,” Dritch announced. “But wait a minute—where’s Pseudo W. Nym?”

As his name was spoken, the cloaked figure glided into the room. “Sorry to be late, boss,” said the vampire. “I just went out for a bite.”

“Well, time is short,” snapped L. Dritch, testily. “We have much to do.” He turned to the witches and smirked. “You girls are ready?” he asked.

“Ready,” croaked the eldest of the crones, stroking her horrid little familiar. Mr. Dritch regarded the familiar with curiosity. A witch’s familiar, of course, is a tiny demon sent by Satan to attend her—usually a cat, rat, bat, weasel or goat. But this particular familiar was most unfamiliar; it was a mole, and it had moles.

“We’re supposed to prepare the Grand Ballroom, eh?” rasped the witch. “Sweep it out with our brooms, and place the herbs on the altar. Then we’re to sprinkle the walls with fresh blood.”

“I’ll help you,” promised Pseudo W. Nym, quickly. Mr. Dritch wagged a finger at the vampire.

“Uh-uh,” he said. “You’d be snitching a taste all the time. I know you, my carnivorous chum. You’ve got other work to do. Guard the Ballroom doors with the wolf, here.”

He turned to the assembled wizards. “As for us, we’ve got to dig in and work. And I do mean just that—we’re digging that elevator shaft down to Hell.”

“But the guests—they’ll see us—” objected Cagliostro.

“Mayhap I can cast a spell of invisibility,” Merlin offered, with a smirk.

“I’ve got it planned,” assured L. Dritch. “We’ll take the big freight and service elevator at the back of the hotel here. It will hold more passengers, and it’s out of the way of the guests. Now you know what our plans are. We get down in the shaft, under the car, where we won’t be noticed—and then we start working.

“Each of us has mantic power capable of penetrating the earth to a depth of a thousand feet. So we’ll take turns in chanting and conjuration. First I shall chant and lower us a thousand feet. Then Merlin. Then Cagliostro. Then St. Germain here, and you others. In that fashion, we should be halfway to Hell before noon, and we ought to reach the Pit by nightfall. Then it should be a simple matter to evocate an elevator shaft which will be merely a continuation of the one now used in the hotel—we’ll conjure up ropes and cables and steel guiding rods in a jiffy—send the car down before midnight tonight—and bring up our distinguished guests. What a jolly surprise it’s going to be for Beelzebub! What a novel way of bringing the Prince of Darkness to his hour of triumph! I am sure he will reward us handsomely.”

“I PRAY naught goeth amiss,” Merlin grumbled. “For as ye knowest, should we fail to fulfill our bond with Satan and do not invoke him to our revels ere midnight, we lose our right to eternal life. Full thirteen hundred and thirteen years have I walked this earth—and I have no intent to depart now.”

“Thirteen hundred and thirteen years!” marvelled one of the wizened witches. “I should think you’d be mighty tired of living by this time. Why do you want to hang around, anyway?”

“It so happeneth that I am an elderly man,” Merlin explained, “and of late years I have come to treasure the boon of radio. I am a loyal fan of that program hight Portia Faces Life, and I wish to continue to hear the daily installments.”

Even these hardened fiends turned pale at this vile admission by the old wizard.

“Well, Portia will have to face Life without you today,” declared L. Dritch, sternly. “We’ve got work to do. Come, now, let’s get started. It’s getting on towards noon already.” The little knot of hell’s bedlams gathered up broomsticks and trudged off to the ballroom, accompanied by the vampire and the werewolf. Comte de St. Germain minced along behind them, to assist in placing the herbs. This left Cagliostro, Merlin, Mr. L. Dritch, and two minor wizards named Carelton Doppleganger and Dead Earnest.

“I guess we’re all familiar with the Ritual of Penetrability,” Dritch told them. “First finger of left hand extended downwards, Lord’s Prayer backwards, then into Latin—the Vulgate version of Chant 33 from A Child’s Garden of Curses. I don’t want any slip-ups . . . nobody is going to raise a lot of dust and dirt, and we’ll have to watch out if we strike water . . . this whole thing must be done scientifically. Now, let’s synchronize our watches.”

They were carefully adjusting their chronometers when the door opened and a group of determined figures catapulted into the room.

There was Marmaduke Hicks, Tubby, Annabel, and a grim-faced Bill, followed by the house detective.

“Sorry,” Bill said, stiff-lipped. “I’m afraid as manager of this hotel I’ll have to ask you folks to pack up and leave immediately.”

“Leave? But that’s impossible. We’re here for the Convention,” purred Mr. Dritch, suavely. “Have you any reason to complain of our presence here?”

“That wolf,” said the house detective. “And those women stealing brooms, and the guy in the deepfreeze, and—”

“You know what Conventions are like,” chuckled L. Dritch, deftly shutting the door. “Boys will be boisterous, and all that sort of thing. Surely a few minor cut-ups don’t bother you.”

“If you mean that minor cut-up who sawed a woman in half, such things do bother us,” Bill replied. “There’s no use arguing, you’ll have to go. And at once.”

“But this puts us in an awful hole,” Dritch shrugged, still unperturbed. “I can see there is only one solution.”

"And what's that?"

"To put you in an awful hole, too. I'm speaking of a grave." Mr. Dritch suddenly waggled his beard hideously and lunged at the young man.

"No you don't!" yelled the house detective, producing a revolver. "Stand back or I'll shoot!"

BUT L. DRITCH continued to advance. The maddened house detective raised the revolver, aimed it, and fired. At this close range, point-blank, he couldn't miss. The bullet struck L. Dritch squarely between the eyes—and bounced off.

"Yow!" screeched Tubby. "Here they come!"

And they came. The five wizards raced towards them in a flying phalanx, and in a moment the room was a melee. But only for a moment. For the magicians mumbled as they moved, Mid the eyes of Cagliostro wove a hypnotic web.

Bill tried to strangle L. Dritch in his own beard. Hicks and Tubby grappled with Merlin. Annabel and the house detective scrabbled at Doppleganger and Dead Ernest. But Cagliostro's evil eye rested lightly on each in turn, and in a few seconds the five humans were standing stone-still, in statuesque immobility.

"Got them," Cagliostro breathed. "All right, let's strike 'em dead!" croaked Dead Ernest. "I'll go up oil the roof-garden and dig some graves. Lots of nice flowers up there, too. We can have a lovely funeral."

The little necrophile regarded Annabel with avid eyes. "I'll be glad to handle all the arrangements," he offered.

"Not now." L. Dritch raised a restraining hand. "We've got to dig that elevator shaft; no time for graves. And I'll need the girl."

"What for?" rasped Merlin.

"For tonight. Surely you haven't forgotten that we'll want a human sacrifice. Why, she's made to order!"

"And the rest of them?"

"We'll leave them here. They can't move a muscle until Cagliostro releases them. Perfectly safe—and from now on we can't afford to arouse suspicion from the guests. I don't want five bodies laying around in this room or anywhere else in the hotel. There'll be plenty of that this evening."

He moved towards the door, his beard sweeping a path before him. "Come on," he commanded. "Let's start digging. Merlin, you'd better stay here and keep an eye on them."

"But I wouldst assist thee—" protested the ancient magician.

"Cheer up," Mr. Dritch soothed. "Be a good boy, and tonight I'll let you go to Hell."

Mr. L. Dritch, beard, and company left the room. Merlin sighed, selected a cigar from a humidor, and struck a match on a portion of Tubby's anatomy.

It looked like the end.

FOR HOURS the five frantic figures stood stock-still in L. Dritch's room, guarded by the ancient mage, Merlin. Alert, alive, anguished, but unable to move a muscle, the human statues felt minutes melt away. Helplessly, hopelessly, they waited.

Waited and wondered—about the hotel, the Convention, the witches, the wizards working in the shaft beneath the elevator. They fretted, they fulminated, they feared, but made no movement except for the ceaseless susurration of their breathing.

Meanwhile, for others, life went on.

Mr. Oswald Pratt and his fellow-Conventioneers were gaily touring New York in chartered sight-seeing busses. They lunched well and ended the afternoon in a tour of a large brewery. By the time darkness fell, several of the magicians were ready to follow suit. They prepared to lurch back to the hotel for the Grand Hallowe'en Ball.

Other hotel guests went about their accustomed or unaccustomed ways. There was nothing out of the ordinary left to disturb them. Archie the Archfiend had departed from the Flopmoor after telling Bill of the plans afoot for the evening. He fled hastily, fearing the wrath of L. Dritch, but he took with him the two halves of the woman he had so disastrously divided; promising her to put her together again as good as new once he had time to study the proper invocation. “I guarantee it,” he told her, stifling her protests. “I’m not one to do things by halves, you know.”

With the torso gone, and the various evil-doers occupied in doing their evil elsewhere, the hotel guests noticed nothing wrong. No wolves loped the corridors, no bodies filled the deepfreeze. Doormen summoned cabs, bellboys fronted and centred, waiters waited normally enough.

Upstairs in the Grand Ballroom, the hags haggled their way through the preparations for the Black Sabbath. While the wolf and the cloaked figure guarded the door against intrusion, the crones groaned as they raised an altar, spread foul-smelling herbs about, and sprinkled the walls and floor with chicken-blood.

“Hustle it up, girls,” commanded the eldest witch. “We got to git ready. Looks like there’ll be a hot time in the old town tonight.”

And in the black bowels of the elevator shaft, four sinister figures gestured and intoned, chanted and scrabbled at the noisome air. Steeped in darkness, they droned and descended, tunnelling their way into the earth at regular intervals—dropping down, down, down.

Each completed a ritual in turn, lowering them further and further, until they were drowned in darkness. The shaft sank straight, mile after mile. There was no stopping, no rest, no diversion—save for a brief sensation at around twilight, when Carleton Doppleganger completed an incantation and they sank another thousand feet into a gushing fluid that spurted upwards in a cloying cascade.

“We’re rich, fellas!” he shouted. “Rich!”

“What’s all this?” demanded L. Dritch, crossly.

“Don’t you understand? We’ve struck oil!”

BUT L. DRITCH was not impressed. Hastily he chanted anew, sinking them down beneath the level of the gusher. “No time for that now,” he exhorted. “We must hurry and prepare for the coming of Satan. He will reward our zeal.”

And so they burrowed in the blackness, burrowed incredible depths to unfathomable pits; burrowed until the stench of brimstone and boiling lava issued from the very center of the earth. And then the crust gave way and they clung to the sides of the pit while gazing down at a blazing core of fire.

“Hell!” exulted Dritch. “We made it!”

“Now what?” asked Cagliostro. “Do we walk through the fire and ask to see the Boss?”

“We’ll be burned to a crisp,” wailed Dead Ernest, gazing down at the crimson chaos of Hades below.

“Nonsense,” Mr. Dritch told them. “We don’t even try to get past those flames like this. That’s why we’ve got the elevator. We go right back up again, using Formula 819, the one for Levitation. It’s much faster. And as we go, we try 622—Fabrication of Metallic Objects. To reproduce the elevator shaft here all the way along the pit. And the cables. I’ve retained a visualization of the construction—I can imagine the correct design, and the Formula will do the rest. Once we reach the top, we wait for the proper moment and then we’ll get up a welcoming committee and go down to blazes together.

“The elevator will take us safely through the flames—our speed will keep us from burning or melting the cage—and we can step out and surprise the Old Boy himself. Won’t he be thrilled when we invite him to come up and join in the fun?”

“Fun,” cackled Dead Ernest. “It’s going to be lots of fun, with that human sacrifice of ours. What a dame! One look at her and I sort of forget who I am.”

“I’m weary,” sighed Doppleganger. “This has taken quite a toll of all of us. Let’s hurry, so we can renew our pact tonight. I long for new youth and vigour.”

“Me too,” Dead Ernest agreed, “Whatta dish that dame is—”

“Formula 819,” Mr. Dritch commanded, sternly. “Come on, everybody. Up we go. It’s hot as Hell down here, if you’ll pardon the expression.” Gesturing and chanting, the wizards worked their way back up the shaft. Elevator cables and steel beams blossomed behind them, and the shaft shook and shuddered at the evocation of material force. Ions unnaturally altered, electrons wrenched from their orbits, atoms energized with unholy abandon, all merged and coalesced into an appearance of actuality. The elevator shaft to Hell was complete.

IT WAS dark in L. Dritch’s room. Merlin the Magician turned on a light, but the living statues didn’t even blink. Bill and Annabel, Hicks, Tubby and the house detective had been standing still for so long that Merlin was completely accustomed to their supernatural stasis. The old goetist puttered around as though oblivious to their presence, pausing only to dust the friends from time to time. He seemed to do a most thorough job on Annabel.

The friends regarded him helplessly as he doddered and pottered about, singing blasphemous madrigals under his breath in a cracked voice. Obviously he was practising for tonight’s ceremonies.

“One-two, tear him in two Three-jour, sprinkle with gore” sang the wizard, as he opened up an old portmanteau and dumped a pile of bones on the bed, which he proceeded to sort.

“Five-six, poke his eyes out with sticks,
Seven-eight, put his brains on a plate”

hummed Merlin, rummaging around under the bed until he located a human skull (dolichocephalic) which he added to the disarticulated array on the counterpane.

"Nine, ten—"

began the thaumaturge, but was interrupted by a resounding rapping on the door.

Before Merlin could summon the strength to shuffle over and turn the key in the lock, the door swung open and in marched Susan Foster and Mrs. Pratt. Both of the blondes caught sight of their friends simultaneously, but neither of them batted more than .000 in the Eyelash League.

Bill tried desperately to make some sound or sign, but the women didn't offer even a down-payment of attention. They greeted Merlin effusively.

"Oh, there you are!" gushed Susan Foster. "We've been looking all over for you."

"Yes, we've gone from room to room for hours," Dorothy Pratt added.

"Looking for me?" Merlin was genuinely astonished. "But why, prithee?"

"Dorothy," corrected Mrs. Pratt.

"We'd heard so much about you," Susan Foster continued. "We felt we simply had to meet you. What in the world are you doing?"

Merlin indicated the jumble of bones on the bed. "Just inspecting some old souvenirs," he said. "If it pleaseth you ladies."

"It don't pleaseth me none," murmured Susan Foster. She turned and regarded the enchanted friends. "But what have we here—statues?"

"Nay, they are but hapless wights laboring beneath a mighty rune that binds them to the spot, ensorcelled," Merlin explained. He peered suspiciously at the two blondes. "But why dost thou inquire, and what is the reason ye seek me out?"

"Oh," simpered Dorothy Pratt, "everybody in the hotel is talking about the fake magician up here and we wanted to see for ourselves what you looked like."

"Fake?" cried Merlin. "Ye imply I am a charlatan, a fraud, an imposter, a deceitful humbug?"

"Couldn't have said it better myself."

"But I am the mighty Merlin!"

"Mighty like a rose," sneered Susan Foster. "I'll bet you're just another Hallowe'en masquerader like all the rest."

MERLIN frowned. The girls had divined his weak spot—pride. He would show these intruders a thing or two. Accordingly he reached a skinny hand into empty air and drew forth a pack of cards. Approaching Susan Foster he extended the deck invitingly.

"Pick a card," he murmured. "Any card."

Susan did so.

"Is it the king of clubs?" asked Merlin.

"Yes," the girl replied, grabbing the deck. "And so are all the rest of them, you cheap prestidigitator."

Merlin, unabashed, then reached into the loathsome depths of his chin-foliage and triumphantly brought forth a rabbit.

"Behold a hare!" he proclaimed.

"Ugh!" observed Mrs. Pratt. "Hares in his beard."

"Why shouldn't a beard have hairs?" asked Susan Foster, reasonably. But Mrs. Pratt was not convinced.

"My ex-husband could do that," she said. "And he's a fake. Why, he could even pull a rabbit out of a mustache.".

"Oh, yea?" Merlin was incensed. "Watch me." He went over to the trunk and pulled out an empty birdcage. Deftly concealing the cage in his fungoid beard for a moment, he brought it back into view—and it now contained a large, passionate-looking canary.

"Child's play!" Mrs. Pratt jeered. "Now if you could get in a bird cage and let the canary make you disappear, that would be a trick."

“Or,” continued Susan Foster, innocently, “if you could make these enchanted people come to life—”

“I can,” Merlin averred, testily. “Anything Cagliostro doth perform I can achieve.”

“Let’s see you do it, then.”

“Nay. I am not to be tricked thusly. These ones are needed shortly for tonight. I may not release them.”

“Oh, you mean for that stupid old sacrifice?” asked Dorothy Pratt. “I heard all about that.”

“Will ye attend?” asked Merlin. “I had not recognized ye as a witch.”

“Well, I am. And so’s my girlfriend, here. Two of the witchcraftiest dames you ever did see. So how about proving to us that you’re on the up and up? Let’s find out if you can get these statues to move.”

“Nay,” grumbled Merlin. “Absolutely nay.” Fie stroked his beard. “For such comely damsels I wot it difficult to resist such a request, but I dare not. If my companions should discover it—”

“They won’t know!” urged Susan Foster. “Just do it for a minute, so we can see. Then we’ll be satisfied, and you can date us up for tonight at the Sabbath.”

“Tell you what,” added Mrs. Pratt, “you’ll have to do it anyway before you sacrifice them, so you might as well let us see. I mean, you’re going to feed them first, aren’t you? They always feed the condemned a last meal.”

“Sure he will.” Susan stroked Merlin’s beard, almost having a stroke herself as she did so. “Come on, Merly, be a sport. Gee, Dorothy, doesn’t he look distinguished? Just like Monty Wolley.”

That did it. Merlin smiled and drew himself up to his full four feet ten. “Behold!” he said. “No, wait. I shall permit them to sup, but naught else. Hence, be so good as to order meals and then I shall release them.”

Dorothy Pratt stepped to the phone and called room service to order food. Then she and Susan sat back and waited fearfully.

BILL AND his companions shared their fear. The moment the two blondes had gone into their routine it was evident that they were acting according to a preconceived plan to release them. But now, on the verge of success, too many things might go wrong.

It was late. L. Dritch and his fiendish friends might return at any moment to take them to their doom. Merlin could easily become suspicious. And even if they were released to eat, it was doubtful if Bill or the others could defeat the magic of the sorcerer. Despite his senility, he had power.

The bellboy arrived and Susan Foster relieved him of his tray at the door. Dorothy Pratt had never left the wizard's side—in order to make sure that he didn't slip away, she kept a tight hold on his beard: according to her reasoning, a beard in the hand was worth two in the bush.

"Here's the food," Susan reminded the wizard. "Now let's see you do your stuff."

"I like not the looks of this," Merlin reconsidered. "It would go ill with me should any harm befall my prisoners."

"Aw, give them a break," Mrs. Pratt urged. "Look at them, practically starving to death. After all, you want to make a good impression tonight, don't you? What will old John J. Beelzebub say if you show him a bunch of scrawny, emaciated sacrifices? I understand he likes Grade A meat."

Susan Foster got in her barb. "He's just stalling because he doesn't know how. Isn't that so, Merly, you old buzzard?"

"A pox on you!" sniffed the sorcerer. "Behold! I call upon the Powers of Belial, Azaziel, Asreal, Samiel, Seth and Asmodeus!"

"Sounds like a big advertising agency to me," whispered Dorothy Pratt to her companion.

But no advertising agency, however fiendish, could have provided the response the wizard got for his invocation. For suddenly the darkness of the hotel room was illumined by a reddish glow. A cloud of pungent vapor gathered at the ceiling and then coalesced about the bodies of the enchanted quintet. It whirled around them, enveloping them in smoke, and then disappeared.

With gasps and groans, Bill and his companions moved.

Merlin raised his scrawny arms. “Avaunt!” he called. “By the Powers, ye cannot harm me! Sup, but durst not approach me.”

Bill, Annabel, Hicks, Tubby and the house detective obediently walked over to the table and lifted dishes from the tray.

“Thanks, pal,” whispered Annabel to Dorothy Pratt. “But where do we go from here?”

“Straight to Hell, if the old geezer has his way,” murmured Bill, bitterly.

“Hasten!” Merlin called out. “Before my comrades return to find ye thus released. And please—do not make use of the silverware.”

“Silverware? Why not?”

“I had the same complaint in the dining hall of this hostelry yester-eve,” Merlin explained. “Tis but a foolish allergy of mine. I dislike contact with aught of silver.”

“So I’ll eat with my fingers,” Tubby agreed. “Who cares? I’m dying for a meal.”

“More truth than poetry,” Hicks commented. “If the old creep doesn’t like silverware, who am I to knife him?”

“Who are you to what?” said Bill, almost to himself. Then, “That’s right. The legends all say it. The undead can’t stand silver. Silver bullets, so why not silver-plated knives and forks and spoons?”

“What are you talking about?” asked Annabel.

“Watch and see,” Bill answered. “Here goes.”

Scooping a handful of spoons from the table, Bill turned suddenly and flung them at the wizard.

Merlin ducked hastily and cried out. “Cease! A foul murrain upon thee! Cease or I—”

HE RAISED his hands to start a spell, then nearly had one as Bill sailed a fork at his ear.

“Grab the knives,” Bill yelled. “He can’t stand contact with silver.”

Hicks and Tubby acted. Bill sailed silverware at Merlin, who wavered, weaved, and dodged—but not for long.

A clatter of table utensils echoed on the floor, and as Merlin’s flesh came into contact with the cold silver, the unnatural life-force ebbed within his wizened frame. There was a single flash of flame, and then—no Merlin.

On the floor rested an empty robe and a tangle of white beard; nothing more. Merlin the magician had retired.

“It worked!” Bill cried. “Come on, everybody!”

“Now where?” Tubby gasped.

“To that service elevator, of course. We’ve got to stop that crew from going to Hell. And if Merlin could be destroyed with silverware, so can they.”

“Pick up the knives and forks and bring them along,” commanded Annabel. “Bring the tray, too. We’ll serve them something they aren’t expecting.”

The crew gathered up their culinary weapons quickly, then dashed for the door.

“Down the hall,” Hicks panted. “It’s after nine. They should be ready to start by now.”

From around the corner at the end of the hall they could hear a babble of voices, interspersed with cackles and howls.

“The wolf,” Bill guessed. “And those witches. Why, the whole crew must be going down as a welcoming committee.”

“Got to stop them—” began Tubby. Then, as the little fat man rounded the corner, “Too late!”

The clang of the elevator door told its own story. That plus L. Dritch’s triumphant shout of, “Going down!”

With the roar of a rocket-blast, the hell-born crew went Hell-borne. The elevator plummeted down before the eyes of Bill and his companions, and with shouts of frustrated rage they tossed silverware into the shaft.

Flames and fumes shot out of the pit as the elevator plunged endlessly into the earth. Whatever the supernatural agency used to build the shaft extension, it was apparent that the elevator was travelling at amazing speed. There was a whoosh and a rush and then a dull thud echoed from far off.

“Good heavens, what was that?” asked Annabel.

“It means they’ve already arrived,” Bill told her. “In a moment they ought to be back with their guests.”

“Guests?”

“Sure. That crew of demons for the Black Sabbath. Headed by none other than Satan himself.”

“And no silverware will stop him,” Hicks sighed. “Even if we had any, which we haven’t any more.”

“The cables are moving!” Tubby breathed. “They must be coming up.”

“I can’t see through the smoke,” said Mrs. Pratt. “Let’s get out of here—those flames and fumes—” She subsided into a fit of coughing.

“Bill, what can we do?” wailed Annabel.

“Nothing. Get back, all of you,” Bill commanded. The party retreated before the smoke billowing from the elevator shaft. Stumbling and lurching, they fled down the corridor as the sound of the rising elevator rose in their ears.

“Here they come!” yelled Hicks. “Every man for himself, now!”

“Bill, where are you?” Annabel stared at the smoke. “Hey, Bill’s gone!”

He was indeed gone. They peered at each other, shuddering at the sounds rising from the shaft. There was a humming and a triumphant howling, like the voices of the damned. And now came a banging and a rattling.

“Goodbye, all,” Tubby observed, racing down the hall. The blondes and the house detective followed suit. Hicks hesitated, then took to his heels. Annabel wavered, then plunged into the madness of smoke, flame and sound around the corner.

“Bill, darling, where are you?”

SHE GROPED along the hall. The yammering rose in frenzied pitch and the banging increased in volume. Suddenly the smoke parted and a glare of infernal light shone from the shaft. Annabel caught a single glimpse of the elevator cage rising—caught a glimpse of the wizards, the witches, and an incandescent flashing of fiery red forms. It was just a vague impression of horned heads, gleaming snouts, black scales and lashing pointed tails, of claws reaching out to clutch and talons poised to tear and rend.

Then the smoke rose again, there was a single final crash and the elevator wobbled.

A roar filled Annabel's ears. Something seemed to explode before her eyes, and then there was a rumbling crash that died away in a series of receding echoes.

Bill staggered out of the smoke.

"Darling, are you all right?" gasped the girl.

^Yeah. I guess so."

"But what happened? Where's the elevator?"

"Back in Hell," Bill told her. "And forever. I took a fire-axe and cut the cables."

"But can't L. Dritch conjure up new ones?"

"Not in the midst of a sea of flame he can't," Bill grinned. "They came through fast going down and coming up—but this time they landed long enough. I judge that fire will melt the cage and those wizards in about three seconds. As for the fiends, there they are and there they'll stay, forever."

One by one, the fugitives trailed back along the corridor—first Hicks, then Tubby, then the blondes, and finally the house detective.

"Bill saved us," Annabel triumphantly informed them. "Isn't he wonderful?"

The house detective shook his head ruefully. "Mebbe so," he grunted. "But we're cooked, anyway. After what's been going on here the past few days, this hotel won't have a customer left by tomorrow morning."

"Afraid he's right," Hicks said. "Down the hall those magicians are packing suitcases like crazy. Guess the Flopmoor is ruined forever."

"My uncle won't care," Annabel said. "But after all, he was only the manager. The hotel stockholders will probably sue Bill for all this. Maybe I wasn’t so good for you after all, darling.” Surprisingly enough, the girl began to sniffle. “Oh, Bill,” she sobbed. “I didn’t mean to get you into all this trouble.”

Bill tilted her head up and smiled at her.

“What do you mean, trouble?” he asked. “This is the luckiest thing that ever happened to me in all my life. And in all your lives. Can’t you tell by looking at me?”

Annabel and the others stared at him in bewilderment. At last she found her voice.

“What’s so lucky about the way you look?” inquired the girl. “You’re just all covered with smoke and grease and—”

“Something else,” Bill finished for her. “When I cut those cables and the elevator went down, it splashed. Something splashed all over me. Can’t you see what it is?”

“It’s oil, folks. We don’t need a hotel. We’re all rich. We’ve struck oil in that shaft—and it’s a gusher!”

Annabel gazed at him tenderly. “I’ve always wanted to marry a millionaire,” she said.

“Well, then, what are you waiting for?” Marmaduke Hicks took charge. “Come on, let’s dig up a minister tonight and get it over with. Then we can have a nice wedding celebration.”

“Not a bad idea.” Tubby led them along the hall to the elevator. He pressed the buzzer and the car whizzed up.

“Nothing doing,” Bill said. “No more elevators for me. I’m walking down. And another thing—I’m through with all this helling around.”

Annabel gave him a long look.

“That’s what you think,” she said.

THE END

The Shadow From The Steeple

. . . emeshed in a horror greater than any envisioned by his imagination.

WILLIAM HURLEY was born an Irishman and grew up to be a taxicab driver—therefore it would be redundant, in the face of both of these facts, to say that he was garrulous.

The minute he picked up his passenger in downtown Providence that warm summer evening, he began talking. The passenger, a tall thin man in his early thirties, entered the cab and sat back, clutching a briefcase. He gave an address on Benefit Street and Hurley started out, shifting both taxi and tongue into high gear.

Hurley began what was to be a one-sided conversation by commenting on the afternoon performance of the New York Giants. Unperturbed by his passenger's silence, he made a few remarks about the weather—recent, current, and expected. Since he received no reply, the driver then proceeded to discuss a local phenomenon; namely the reported escape, that morning, of two black panthers or leopards from the traveling menagerie of Langer Brothers Circus, currently appearing in the city. In response to a direct inquiry as to whether he had seen the beasts roaming at large, Hurley's customer shook his head.

The driver then made several uncomplimentary remarks about the local police force and their inability to capture the beasts. It was his considered opinion that a given platoon of law enforcement officers would be unable to catch a cold if immured in an ice-box for a year. This witticism failed to amuse his passenger, and before Hurley could continue his monologue they had arrived at the Benefit Street address. Eighty-five cents changed hands, passenger and briefcase left the cab, and Hurley drove away.

He could not know it at the time, but he thus became the last man who could or would testify to seeing his passenger alive.

The rest is conjecture, and perhaps that is for the best. Certainly it is easy enough to draw certain conclusions as to what happened that night in the old house on Benefit Street, but the weight of those conclusions is hard to bear.

One minor mystery is easy enough to clear up—the peculiar silence and aloofness of Hurley's passenger. That passenger, Edmund Fiske, of Chicago, Illinois, was meditating upon the fulfilment of fifteen years of questing; the cab-trip represented the last stage of this long journey, and he was reviewing the circumstances as he rode.

Edmund Fiske's quest had begun, on August 8, 1935, with the death of his close friend, Robert Harrison Blake, of Milwaukee.

Like Fiske himself at the time, Blake had been a precocious adolescent interested in fantasy-writing, and as such became a member of the "Lovecraft circle"—a group of writers maintaining correspondence with one another and with the late Howard Phillips Lovecraft, of Providence.

It was through correspondence that Fiske and Blake had become acquainted; they visited back and forth between Milwaukee and Chicago, and their mutual preoccupation with the weird and the fantastic in literature and art served to form the foundation for the close friendship which existed at the time of Blake's unexpected and inexplicable demise.

Most of the facts—and certain of the conjectures—in connection with Blake's death have been embodied in Lovecraft's story, The Haunter of the Dark, which was published more than a year after the younger writer's passing.

Lovecraft had an excellent opportunity to observe matters, for it was on his suggestion that young Blake had journeyed to Providence early in 1935, and had been provided with living-quarters on College Street by Lovecraft himself. So it was both as friend and neighbor that the elder fantasy writer had acted in narrating the singular story of Robert Harrison Blake's last months.

In his story, he tells of Blake's efforts to begin a novel dealing with a survival of New England witch-cults, but modestly omits his own part in assisting his friend to secure material. Apparently Blake began work on his project and then became enmeshed in a horror greater than any envisioned by his imagination.

For Blake was drawn to investigate the crumbling black pile on Federal Hill—the deserted ruin of a church that had once housed the worshippers of an esoteric cult. Early in spring he paid a visit to the shunned structure and there made certain discoveries which (in Lovecraft's opinion) made his death inevitable.

BRIEFLY, Blake entered the boarded-up Free Will Church and stumbled across the skeleton of a reporter from the Providence Telegram, one Edwin M. Lillibridge, who had apparently attempted a similar investigation in 1893. The fact that his death was not explained seemed alarming enough, but more disturbing still was the realization that no one had been bold enough to enter the church since that date and discover the body.

Blake found the reporter's notebook in his clothing, and its contents afforded a partial revelation.

A certain Professor Bowen, of Providence, had traveled widely in Egypt, and in 1843, in the course of archeological investigations of the crypt of Nephren-Ka, had made an unusual find.

Nephren-Ka is the "forgotten pharaoh," whose name has been cursed by the priests and obliterated from official dynastic records. The name was familiar to the young writer at the time, due largely to the work of another Milwaukee author who had dealt with the semi-legendary ruler in his tale, Fane of the Black Pharaoh. But the discovery Bowen made in the crypt was totally unexpected.

The reporter's notebook said little of the actual nature of that discovery, but it recorded subsequent events in a precise, chronological fashion. Immediately upon unearthing his mysterious find in Egypt, Professor Bowen abandoned his research and returned to Providence, where he purchased the Free Will Church in 1844 and made it the headquarters of what was called the "Starry Wisdom" sect.

Members of this religious cult, evidently recruited by Bowen, professed to worship an entity they called the "Haunter of the Dark." By gazing into a crystal they summoned the actual presence of this entity and did homage with blood sacrifice.

Such, at least, was the fantastic story circulated in Providence at the time—and the church became a place to be avoided. Local superstition fanned agitation, and agitation precipitated direct action. In May of 1877 the sect was forcibly broken up by the authorities, due to public pressure, and several hundred of its members abruptly left the city.

The church itself was immediately dosed, and apparently individual curiosity could not overcome the widespread fear which resulted in leaving the structure undisturbed and unexplored until the reporter, Lillibridge, made his ill-fated private investigation in 1893.

Such was the gist of the story unfolded in the pages of his notebook. Blake read it, but was nevertheless undeterred in his further scrutiny of the environs. Eventually he came upon the mysterious object Bowen had found in the Egyptian crypt—the object upon which the Starry Wisdom worship had been founded—the asymmetrical metal box with its curiously hinged lid, a lid that had not been closed for countless years. Blake thus gazed at the interior, gazed upon the four-inch red-black crystal polyhedron hanging suspended by seven supports. He not only gazed at but also into the polyhedron; just as the cult-worshippers had purportedly gazed, and with the same results. He was assailed by a curious psychic disturbance; he seemed to “see visions of other lands and the gulfs beyond the stars,” as superstitious accounts had told.

And then Blake made his greatest mistake. He closed the box.

Closing the box—again, according to the superstitions annotated by Lillibridge—was the act that summoned the alien entity itself, the Haunter of the Dark. It was a creature of darkness and could not survive light. And in that boarded-up blackness of the ruined church, the thing emerged by night.

Blake fled the church in terror, but the damage was done. In mid-July, a thunderstorm put out the lights in Providence for an hour, and the Italian colony living near the deserted church heard bumping and thumping from inside the shadow-shrouded structure.

Crowds with candles stood outside in the rain and played candles upon the building, shielding themselves against the possible emergence of the feared entity by a barrier of light.

Apparently the story had remained alive throughout the neighborhood. Once the storm abated, local newspapers grew interested, and on the 17th of July two reporters entered the old church, together with a policeman. Nothing definite was found.

although there were curious and inexplicable smears and stains on the stairs and the pews.

Less than a month later—at 2:35 a.m. on the morning of August 8th, to be exact—Robert Harrison Blake met his death during an electrical storm while seated before the window of his room on College Street.

During the gathering storm, before his death occurred, Blake scribbled frantically in his diary, gradually revealing his innermost obsessions and delusions concerning the Haunter of the Dark. It was Blake’s conviction that by gazing into the curious crystal in its box he had somehow established a linkage with the non-terrestrial entity. He further believed that closing the box had summoned the creature to dwell in the darkness of the church steeple, and that in some way his own fate was now irrevocably linked to that of the monstrosity.

All this is revealed in the last messages he set down while watching the progress of the storm from his window.

Meanwhile, at the church itself, on Federal Hill, a crowd of agitated spectators gathered to play lights upon the structure. That they heard alarming sounds from inside the boarded-up building is undeniable; at least two competent witnesses have testified to the fact. One, Father Merluzzo of the Spirito Santo Church, was on hand to quiet his congregation. The other, Patrolman (now Sergeant) William J. Monahan, of Central Station, was attempting to preserve order in the face of growing panic. Monahan himself saw the blinding "blur" that seemed to issue, smokelike, from the steeple of the ancient edifice as the final lightning-flash came.

Flash, meteor, fireball—call it what you will—erupted over the city in a blinding blaze; perhaps at the very moment that Robert Harrison Blake, across town, was writing, "Is it not an avatar of Nyarlathotep, who in antique and shadowy Khem even took the form of man?"

A few moments later he was dead. The coroner's physician rendered a verdict attributing his demise to "electrical shock" although the window he faced was unbroken. Another physician, known to Lovecraft, quarreled privately with that verdict and subsequently entered the affair the next day. Without legal authority, he entered the church and climbed to the windowless steeple where he discovered the strange asymmetrical—was it golden?—box and the curious stone within. Apparently his first gesture was to make sure of raising the lid and bringing the stone into the light. His next recorded gesture was to charter a boat, take box and curiously-angled stone aboard, and drop them into the deepest channel of Narragansett Bay.

There ended the admittedly fictionalized account of Blake's death as recorded by H. P. Lovecraft. And there began Edmund Fiske's fifteen-year quest.

Fiske, of course, had known some of the events outlined in the story. When Blake had left for Providence in the spring, Fiske had tentatively promised to join him the following autumn. At first, the two friends had exchanged letters regularly, but by early summer Blake ceased correspondence altogether.

At the time, Fiske was unaware of Blake's exploration of the ruined church. He could not account fot Blake's silence, and wrote Lovecraft for a possible explanation.

Lovecraft could supply little information. Young Blake, he said, had visited with him frequently during the early weeks of his stay; had consulted with him about his writing, and had accompanied him on several nocturnal strolls through the city.

But during the summer, Blake's neighborliness ceased. It was not in Lovecraft's reclusive nature to impose himself upon others, and he did not seek to invade Blake's privacy for several weeks.

When he did so—and learned from the almost hysterical adolescent of his experiences in the forbidding, forbidden church on Federal Hill—Lovecraft offered words of warning and advice. But it was already too late. Within ten days of his visit came the shocking end.

Fiske learned of that end from Lovecraft on the following day. It was his task to break the news to Blake's parents. For a time he was tempted to visit Providence immediately, but lack of funds and the pressure of his own domestic affairs forestalled him. The body of his young friend duly arrived and Fiske attended the brief ceremony of cremation.

Then Lovecraft began his own investigation—an investigation which ultimately resulted in the publication of his story. And there the matter might have rested.

But Fiske was not satisfied.

His best friend had died under circumstances which even the most skeptical must admit were mysterious. The local authorities summarily wrote off the matter with a fatuous and inadequate explanation.

Fiske determined to ascertain the truth.

BEAR in mind one salient fact—all three of these men, Lovecraft, Blake and Fiske—were professional writers and students of the supernatural or the supranormal. All three of them had extraordinary access to a bulk of written material dealing with ancient legend and superstition. Ironically enough, the use to which they put their knowledge was limited to excursions into so-called "fantasy fiction" but none of them, in the light of their own experience, could wholly join their reading audience in scoffing at the myths of which they wrote.

For, as Fiske wrote to Lovecraft, "the term, myth, as we know, is merely a polite euphemism. Blake's death was not a myth, but a hideous reality. I implore you to investigate fully. See this matter through to the end, for if Blake's diary holds even a distorted truth, there is no telling what may be loosed upon the world."

Lovecraft pledged cooperation, discovered the fate of the metal box and its contents, and endeavored to arrange a meeting with Doctor Ambrose Dexter, of Benefit Street. Doctor Dexter, it appeared, had left town immediately following his dramatic theft and disposal of the "Shining Trapezehedron," as Lovecraft called it.

Lovecraft then apparently interviewed Father Merluzzo and Patrolman Monahan, plunged into the files of the Bulletin, and endeavored to reconstruct the story of the Starry Wisdom sect and the entity they worshipped.

Of course he learned a good deal more than he dared to put into his magazine story. His letters to Edmund Fiske in the late fall and early spring of 1936 contain guarded hints and references to "menaces from Outside," But he seemed anxious to reassure Fiske that if there had been any menace, even in the realistic rather than the supernatural sense, the danger was now averted because Doctor Dexter had disposed of the Shining Trapezehedron which acted as a summoning talisman. Such was the gist of his report, and the matter rested there for a time.

Fiske made tentative arrangements, early in 1937, to visit Lovecraft at his home, with the private intention of doing some further research on his own into the cause of Blake's death. But once again, circumstances intervened. For in March of that year, Lovecraft died. His unexpected passing plunged Fiske into a period of mental despondency from which he was slow to recover; accordingly, it was not until almost a year later that Edmund Fiske paid his first visit to Providence, and to the scene of the tragic episodes which brought Blake's life to a close.

For somehow, always, a black undercurrent of suspicion existed. The coroner's physician had been glib, Lovecraft had been tactful, the press and general public had accepted matters completely—yet Blake was dead, and there had been an entity abroad in the night.

Fiske felt that if he could visit the accursed church himself, talk to Doctor Dexter and find out what had drawn him into the affair, interrogate the reporters, and pursue any relevant leads or clues he might eventually hope to uncover the truth and at least clear his dead friend's name of the ugly shadow of mental unbalance.

ACCORDINGLY, Fiske's first step after arriving in Providence and registering at a hotel was to set out for Federal Hill and the ruined church.

The search was doomed to immediate, irremediable disappointment. For the church was no more. It had been razed the previous fall and the property taken over by the city authorities. The black and baleful spire no longer cast its spell over the Hill.

Fiske immediately took pains to see Father Merluzzo, at Spirito Santo, a few squares away. He learned from a courteous housekeeper that Father Merluzzo had died in 1936, within a year of young Blake.

Discouraged but persistent, Fiske next attempted to reach Doctor Dexter, but the old house on Benefit Street was boarded up. A call to the Physician's Service Bureau produced only the cryptic information that Ambrose Dexter, M.D., had left the city for an indeterminate stay.

Nor did a visit with the city editor of the Bulletin yield any better result. Fiske was permitted to go into the newspaper's morgue and read the aggravatingly short and matter-of-fact story on Blake's death, but the two reporters who had covered the assignment and subsequently visited the Federal Hill church had left the paper for berths in other cities.

There were, of course, other leads to follow, and during the ensuing week Fiske ran them all to the ground. A copy of Who's Who added nothing significant to his mental picture of Doctor Ambrose Dexter. The physician was Providence born, a life-long resident, 40 years of age, unmarried, a general practitioner, member of several medical societies—but there was no indication of any unusual "hobbies" or "other interests" which might provide a clue as to his participation in the affair.

Sergeant William J. Monahan of Central Station was sought out, and for the first time Fiske actually managed to speak to some one who admitted an actual connection with the events leading to Blake's death. Monahan was polite, but cautiously noncommittal.

Despite Fiske's complete unburdening, the police officer remained discreetly reticent.

"There's really nothing I can tell you," he said. "It's true, like Mister Lovecraft said, that I was at the church that night, for there was a rough crowd out and there's no telling what some of them ones in the neighborhood will do when riled up. Like the story said, the old church had a bad name, and I guess Sheeley could have given you many's the story."

"Sheeley?" interjected Fiske.

"Bert Sheeley—it was his beat, you know, not mine. He was ill of pneumonia at the time and I substituted for two weeks. Then, when he died —"

Fiske shook his head. Another possible source of information gone. Blake dead, Lovecraft dead, Father Merluzzo dead, and now Sheeley. Reporters scattered, and Doctor Dexter mysteriously missing. He sighed and persevered.

“That last night, when you saw the blur,” he asked, “can you add anything by way of details? Were there any noises? Did anyone in the crowd say anything? Try to remember—whatever you can add may be of great help to me.”

Monahan shook his head. “There were noises aplenty,” he said. “But what with the thunder and all, I couldn’t rightly make out if anything came from inside the church, like the story has it. And as for the crowd, with the women wailing and the men muttering, all mixed up with thunderclaps and wind, it was as much as I could do to hear myself yelling to keep in place let alone make out what was being said.”

“And the blur?” Fiske persisted.

“It was a blur, and that’s all. Smoke, or a cloud, or just a shadow before the lightning struck again. But I’ll not be saying I saw any devils, or monsters, or whatchamacallits as Mister Lovecraft would write about in those wild tales of his.”

Sergeant Monahan shrugged self-righteously and picked up the desk-phone to answer a call. The interview was obviously at an end.

And so, for the nonce, was Fiske’s quest. He didn’t abandon hope, however. For a day he sat by his own hotel phone and called up every “Dexter” listed in the book in an effort to locate a relative of the missing doctor; but to no avail. Another day was spent in a small boat on Narragansett Bay, as Fiske assiduously and painstakingly familiarized himself with the location of the “deepest channel” alluded to in Lovecraft’s story.

But at the end of a futile week in Providence, Fiske had to confess himself beaten. He returned to Chicago, his work, and his normal pursuits. Gradually the affair dropped out of the foreground of his consciousness, but he by no means forgot it completely or gave up the notion of eventually unravelling the mystery—if mystery there was.

IN 1941, during a three-day furlough from Basic Training, Pvt. First Class Edmund Fiske passed through Providence on his way to New York City and again attempted to locate Dr. Ambrose Dexter, without success.

During 1942 and 1943, Sgt. Edmund Fiske wrote, from his stations overseas, to Dr. Ambrose (Dexter, c/o General Delivery, Providence, R. I. His letters were never acknowledged, if indeed they were received.

In 1945, in a U.S.O. library lounge in Honolulu, Fiske read a report in—of all things—a journal on astro-physics which mentioned a recent gathering at Princeton University, at which the guest speaker, Dr. Ambrose Dexter, had delivered an address on "Practical Applications in Military Technology."

Fiske did not return to the States until the end of 1946. Domestic affairs, naturally, were the subject of his paramount consideration during the following year. It wasn't until 1948 that he accidentally came upon Dr. Dexter's name again—this time in a listing of "investigators in the field of nuclear physics" in a national weekly newsmagazine. He wrote the editors for further information, but received no reply. And another letter, dispatched to Providence, remained unanswered.

But in 1949, late in autumn, Dexter's name again came to his attention through the news columns; this time in relation to a discussion of work on the secret H-Bomb.

Whatever he guessed, whatever he feared, whatever he wildly imagined, Fiske was impelled to action. It was then that he wrote to a certain Ogden Purvis, a private investigator in the city of Providence, and commissioned him to locate Doctor Ambrose Dexter. All that he required was that he be placed in communication with Dexter, and he paid a substantial retainer fee. Purvis took the case.

The private detective sent several reports to Fiske in Chicago and they were, at first, disheartening. The Dexter residence was still untenanted. Dexter himself, according to the information elicited from governmental sources, was on a special mission. The private investigator seemed to assume from this that he was a person above reproach, engaged in confidential defense work.

Fiske's own reaction was panic.

He raised his offer of a fee and insisted that Ogden Purvis continue his efforts to find the elusive doctor.

Winter of 1950 came, and with it, another report. The private investigator had tracked down every lead Fiske suggested, and one of them led, eventually to Tom Jonas.

Tom Jonas was the owner of the small boat which had been chartered by Doctor Dexter one evening in the late summer of 1935—the small boat which had been rowed to the "deepest channel of Narragansett Bay."

Tom Jonas had rested his oars as Dexter threw overboard the dully-gleaming, asymmetrical metal box with the hinged lid open to disclose the Shining Trapezehedron.

The old fisherman had spoken freely to the private detective; his words were reported in detail to Fiske via confidential report.

"Mighty peculiar" was Jonas' own reaction to the incident. Dexter had offered him "twenty smackers to take the boat out in the middle o' midnight and heave this funny-lookin' contraption overboard. Said there was no harm in it; said it was just an old keepsake he wanted to git rid of. But all the way out he kep' starin' at the sort of jewel-thing set in some iron bands inside the box, and mumblin' in some foreign language, I guess. No, 'tweren't French or German or Italian talk either. Polish, mebbe. I don't remember any words, either. But he acted sort-of drunk. Not that I'd say anything against Doctor Dexter, understand; comes of a fine old family, even if he ain't been around these parts since, to my knowing. But I figgered he was a bit under the influence, you might say. Else why would he pay me twenty smackers to do a crazy stunt like that?"

There was more to the verbatim transcript of the old fisherman's monologue, but it did not explain anything.

"He sure seemed glad to git rid of it, as I recollect. On the way back he told me to keep mum about it, but I can't see no harm in telling at this late date; I wouldn't hold anythin' back from the law."

Evidently the private investigator had made use of a rather unethical stratagem—posing as an actual detective in order to get Jonas to talk.

This did not bother Fiske, in Chicago. It was enough to get his grasp on something tangible at last; enough to make him send Purvis another payment, with instructions to keep up the search for Ambrose Dexter. Several months passed in waiting.

Then, in late spring, came the news Fiske had waited for. Doctor Dexter was back; he had returned to his house on Benefit Street. The boards had been removed, furniture vans appeared to discharge their contents, and a manservant appeared to answer the door, and to take telephone messages.

Doctor Dexter was not at home to the investigator, or to any one. He was, it appeared, recuperating from a severe illness contracted while in government service. He took a card from Purvis and promised to deliver a message, but repeated calls brought no indication of a reply.

Nor did Purvis, who conscientiously "cased" the house and neighborhood, ever succeed in laying eyes upon the doctor himself or in finding anyone who claimed to have seen the convalescent physician on the street.

Groceries were delivered regularly; mail appeared in the box; lights glowed in the Benefit Street house nightly until all hours.

As a matter of fact, this was the only concrete statement Purvis could make regarding any possible irregularity in Doctor Dexter's mode of life—he seemed to keep electricity burning twenty-four hours a day.

FISKE promptly dispatched another letter to Doctor Dexter, and then another. Still no acknowledgment or reply was forthcoming. And after several more unenlightening reports from Purvis, Fiske made up his mind. He would go to Providence and see Dexter, somehow, come what may.

He might be completely wrong in his suspicions; he might be completely wrong in his assumption that Doctor Dexter could clear the name of his dead friend; he might be completely wrong in even surmising any connection between the two—but for fifteen years he had brooded and wondered, and it was time to put an end to his own inner conflict.

Accordingly, late that summer, Fiske wired Purvis of his intentions and instructed him to meet him at the hotel upon his arrival.

Thus it was that Edmund Fiske came to Providence for the last time; on the day that the Giants lost, on the day that the Langer Brothers lost their two black panthers, on the day that cabdriver William Hurley was in a garrulous mood.

Purvis was not at the hotel to meet him, but such was Fiske's own frenzy of impatience that he decided to act without him and drove, as we have seen, to Benefit Street in the early evening.

As the cab departed, Fiske stared up at the panelled doorway; stared at the lights blazing from the upper windows of the Georgian structure. A brass name-plate gleamed on the door itself, and the light from the windows played upon the legend, Ambrose Dexter, M.D.

Slight as it was, this seemed a reassuring touch to Edmund Fiske. The doctor was not concealing his presence in the house from the world, however much he might conceal his actual person. Surely the blazing lights and the appearance of the name-plate augured well.

Fiske shrugged, rang the bell.

The door opened quickly. A small, dark-skinned man with a slight stoop appeared and made a question of the word, "Yes?"

"Doctor Dexter, please."

"The Doctor is not in to callers. He is ill."

"Would you take a message, please?"

"Certainly." The dark-skinned servant smiled.

"Tell him that Edmund Fiske of Chicago wishes to see him at his convenience for a few moments. I have come all the way from the Middle West for this purpose, and what I have to speak to him about would take only a moment or two of his time."

"Wait, please."

The door closed. Fiske stood in the gathering darkness and transferred his briefcase from one hand to the other.

Abruptly, the door opened again. The servant peered out at him.

“Mr. Fiske—are you the gentleman who wrote the letters?”

“Letters—oh, yes, I am. I did not know the doctor ever received them.”

The servant nodded. “I could not say. But Doctor Dexter said that if you were the man who had written him, you were to come right in.”

Fiske permitted himself an audible sigh of relief as he stepped over the threshhold. It had taken him fifteen years to come this far, and now—

“Just go upstairs, if you please. You will find Doctor Dexter waiting in the study, right at the head of the hall.”

EDMUND FISKE climbed the stairs, turned at the top to a doorway, and entered a room in which the light was an almost palpable presence, so intense was its glare.

And there, rising from a chair beside the fireplace, was Doctor Ambrose Dexter.

Fiske found himself facing a tall, thin, immaculately dressed man who may have been fifty but who scarcely looked thirty-five; a man whose wholly natural grace and elegance of movement concealed the sole incongruity of his aspect—a very deep suntan.

“So you are Edmund Fiske.”

The voice was soft, well-modulated, and unmistakably New England—and the accompanying handclasp warm and firm. Doctor Dexter’s smile was natural and friendly. White teeth gleamed against the brown background of his features.

“Won’t you sit down?” invited the doctor. He indicated a chair and bowed slightly. Fiske couldn’t help but stare; there was certainly no indication of any present or recent illness in his host’s demeanor or behavior. As Doctor Dexter resumed his own seat near the fire and Fiske moved around the chair to join him, he noted the bookshelves on either side of the room. The size and shape of several volumes immediately engaged his rapt attention—so much that he hesitated before taking a seat, and instead inspected the titles of the tomes.

For the first time in his life, Edmund Fiske found himself confronting the half-legendary De Vermis Mysteriis, the Liber lvonis, and the almost mythical Latin version of the Necronomicon. Without seeking his host's permission, he lifted the bulk of the latter volume from the shelf and riffled through the yellowed pages of the Spanish translation of 1622.

Then he turned to Doctor Dexter, and all traces of his carefully-contrived composure dropped away. "Then it must have been you who found these books in the church," he said. "In the rear vestry room beside the apse. Lovecraft mentioned them in his story, and I've always wondered what became of them."

Doctor Dexter nodded gravely. "Yes, I took them. I did not think it wise for such books to fall into the hands of authorities. You know what they contain, and what might happen if such knowledge were wrongfully employed."

Fiske reluctantly replaced the great book on the shelf and took a chair facing the doctor before the fire. He held his briefcase on his lap and fumbled uneasily with the clasp.

"Don't be uneasy," said Doctor Dexter, with a kindly smile. "Let us proceed without fencing. You are here to discover what part I played in the affair of your friend's death."

"Yes, there are some questions I wanted to ask."

"Please." The doctor raised a slim brown hand. "I am not in the best of health and can give you only a few minutes. Allow me to anticipate your queries and tell you what little I know."

"As you wish." Fiske stared at the bronzed man, wondering what lay behind the perfection of his poise.

"I met your friend Robert Harrison Blake only once," said Doctor Dexter. "It was on an evening during the latter part of July, 1935. He called upon me here, as a patient."

Fiske leaned forward eagerly. “I never knew that!” he exclaimed.

“There was no reason for anyone to know it,” the doctor answered. “He was merely a patient. He claimed to be suffering from insomnia. I examined him, prescribed a sedative, and acting on the merest surmise, asked if he had recently been subjected to any unusual strain or trauma. It was then that he told me the story of his visit to the church on Federal Hill and of what he had found there. I must say that I had the acumen not to dismiss his tale as the product of a hysterical imagination. As a member of one of the older families here, I was already acquainted with the legends surrounding the Starry Wisdom sect and the so-called Haunter of the Dark.

“Young Blake confessed to me certain of his fears concerning the Shining Trapezehedron—intimating that it was a focal point of primal evil. He further admitted his own dread of being somehow linked to the monstrosity in the church.

“Naturally, I was not prepared to accept this last premise as a rational one. I attempted to reassure the young man, advised him to leave Providence and forget it. And at the time I acted in all good faith. And then, in August, came news of Blake’s death.”

“So you went to the church,” Fiske said.

“Wouldn’t you have done the same thing?” parried Doctor Dexter. “If Blake had come to you with this story, told you of what he feared, wouldn’t his death have moved you to action? I assure you, I did what I thought best. Rather than provoke a scandal, rather than expose the general public to needless fears, rather than permit the possibility of danger to exist, I went to the church. I took the books. I took the Shining Trapezehedron from under the noses of the authorities. And I chartered a boat and dumped the accursed thing in Narragansett Bay, where it could no longer possibly harm mankind. The lid was up when I dropped it—for as you know, only darkness can summon the Haunter, and now the stone is eternally exposed to light.

"BUT that is all I can tell you. I regret that my work in recent years has prevented me from seeing or communicating with you before this. I appreciate your interest in the affair and trust my remarks will help to clarify, in a small way, your bewilderment. As to young Blake, in my capacity as examining physician, I will gladly give you a written testimony to my belief in his sanity at the time of his death. I'll have it drawn up tomorrow and send it to your hotel if you give me the address. Fair enough?"

The doctor rose, signifying that the interview was over. Fiske remained seated, shifting his briefcase.

"Now if you will excuse me," the physician murmured.

"In a moment. There are still one or two brief questions I'd appreciate your answering."

"Certainly." If Doctor Dexter was irritated, he gave no sign.

"Did you by any chance see Lovecraft before or during his last illness?"

"No. I was not his physician. In fact, I never met the man, though of course I knew of him and his work."

"What caused you to leave Providence so abruptly after the Blake affair?"

"My interests in physics superseded my interest in medicine. As you may or may not know, during the past decade or more, I have been working on problems relative to atomic energy and nuclear fission. In fact, starting tomorrow, I am leaving Providence once more to deliver a course of lectures before the faculties of eastern universities and certain governmental groups."

"That is very interesting to me, Doctor," said Fiske. "By the way, did you ever meet Einstein?"

"As a matter of fact, I did, some years ago. I worked with him on—but no matter. I must beg you to excuse me, now. At another time, perhaps, we can discuss such things."

His impatience was unmistakable now. Fiske rose, lifting his briefcase in one hand and reaching out to extinguish a table-lamp with the other.

Doctor Dexter crossed swiftly and lighted the lamp again.

"Why are you afraid of the dark, Doctor?" asked Fiske, softly.

"I am not af—"

For the first time the physician seemed on the verge of losing his composure. "What makes you think that?" he whispered.

"It's the Shining Trapezehedron, isn't it?" Fiske continued. "When you threw it into the bay you acted too hastily. You didn't remember at the time that even if you left the lid open, the stone would be surrounded by darkness there at the bottom of the channel. Perhaps the Haunter didn't want you to remember. You looked into the stone just as Blake did, and established the same psychic linkage. And when you threw the thing away, you gave it into perpetual darkness, where the Haunter's power would feed and grow.

"That's why you left Providence—because you were afraid the Haunter would come to you, just as it came to Blake. And because you knew that now the thing would remain abroad forever."

Doctor Dexter moved towards the door. "I must definitely ask that you leave now," he said. "If you're implying that I keep the lights on because I'm afraid of the Haunter coming after me, the way it did Blake, then you're mistaken."

FISKE smiled wryly. "That's not it at all," he answered. "I know you don't fear that. Because it's too late. The Haunter must have come to you long before this—perhaps within a day or so after you gave it power by consigning the Trapezehedron to the darkness of the Bay. It came to you, but unlike the case of Blake, it did not kill you.

"It used you. That's why you fear the dark. You fear it as the Haunter itself fears being discovered. I believe that in the darkness you look different. More like the old shape. Because when the Haunter came to you, it did not kill but instead, merged. You are the Haunter of the Dark!"

"Mr. Fiske, really—"

"There is no Doctor Dexter. There hasn't been any such person for many years, now. There's only the outer shell, possessed by an entity older than the world; an entity that is moving quickly and cunningly to bring destruction to all mankind. It was you who turned 'scientist' and insinuated yourself into the proper circles, hinting and prompting and assisting foolish men into their sudden 'discovery' of nuclear fission. When the first atomic bomb fell, how you must have laughed! And now you've given them the secret of the hydrogen bomb, and you're going on to teach them more, show them new ways to bring about their own destruction.

"It took me years of brooding to discover the clues, the keys to the so-called wild myths that Lovecraft wrote about. For he wrote in parable and allegory, but he wrote the truth. He has sot it down in black and white time and again, the prophecy of your coming to earth—Blake knew it at the last when he identified the Haunter by its rightful name."

"And that is?" snapped the doctor.

"Nyarlathotep!"

The brown face creased into a grimace of laughter. "I'm afraid you're a victim of the same fantasy-projections as poor Blake and your friend Lovecraft. Everyone knows that Nyarlathotep is pure invention—part of the Lovecraft mythos."

"I thought so, until I found the clue in his poem. That's when it all fitted in; the Haunter of the Dark, your fleeing, and your sudden interest in scientific research. Lovecraft's words took on a new meaning:

And at last from inner Egypt came
The strange dark one to whom the fellas bowed."

Fiske chanted the lines, staring at the dark face of the physician.

"Nonsense—if you must know, this dermatological disturbance of mine is the result of exposure to radiation at Los Alamos."

Fiske did not heed; he was continuing Lovecraft's poem:

"—That wild beasts followed him and licked his hands.
Soon from the sea a noxious birth began;
Forgotten lands with weedy spires
of gold.
The ground was cleft and mad
auroras rolled
Down on the quaking cities of man.
Then crushing what he chanced to mould in play
The idiot Chaos blew Earth's dust away."

Doctor Dexter shook his head. "Ridiculous on the face of it," he asserted. "Surely, even in your—er—upset condition, you can understand that, man! The poem has no literal meaning. Do wild beasts lick my hands? Is something rising from the sea? Are there earthquakes and auroras? Nonsense! You're suffering from a bad case of what we call 'atomic jitters'—I can see it now. You're preoccupied, as so many laymen are today, with the foolish obsession that somehow our work in nuclear fission will result in the destruction of the earth. All this rationalization is a product of your imaginings."

FISKE held his briefcase tightly. "I told you it was a parable, this prophecy of Lovecraft's. God knows what he knew or feared; whatever it was, it was enough to make him cloak his meaning. And even then, perhaps, they got to him because he knew too much."

"They?"

"They from Outside—the ones you serve. You are their Messenger, Nyarlathotep, You came, in linkage with the Shining Trapezehedron, out of inner Egypt, as the poem says. And the fellahs—the common workers of Providence who became converted to the Starry Wisdom sect—bowed before the ‘strange dark one’ they worshipped as the Haunter.

“The Trapezehedron was thrown into the Bay, and soon from the sea came this noxious birth—your birth, or incarnation in the body of Doctor Dexter. And you taught men new methods of destruction; destruction with atomic bombs in which the ground was cleft and mad auroras rolled down on the quaking cities of man. Oh, Lovecraft knew what he was writing, and Blake recognized you, too. And they both died. I suppose you’ll try to kill me now, so you can go on. You’ll lecture, and stand at the elbows of the laboratory men urging them on and giving them new suggestions to result in greater destruction. And finally you’ll blow earth’s dust away.”

“Please.” Doctor Dexter held out both hands. “Control yourself—let me get you something! Can’t you realize this whole thing is absurd?”

Fiske moved towards him, hands fumbling at the clasp of the briefcase. The flap opened, and Fiske reached inside, then withdrew his hand. He held a revolver now, and he pointed it quite steadily at Doctor Dexter’s breast.

“Of course it’s absurd,” Fiske muttered. “No one ever believed in the Starry Wisdom sect except a few fanatics and some ignorant foreigners. No one ever took Blake’s stories or Lovecraft’s, or mine for that matter as anything but a rather morbid form of amusement. By the same token, no one will ever believe there is anything wrong with you, or with so-called scientific investigation of atomic energy, or the other horrors you plan to loose on the world to bring about its doom. And that’s why I’m going to kill you now!”

“Put down that gun!”

FISKE began suddenly to tremble; his whole body shook in a spectacular spasm. Dexter noted it and moved forward. The younger man’s eyes were bulging, and the physician inched towards him.

“Stand back!” Fiske warned. The words were distorted by the convulsive shuddering of his jaws. “That’s all I needed to know. Since you are in a human body, you can be destroyed by ordinary weapons. And so I do destroy you—Nyarlathotep!”

His finger moved.

So did Doctor Dexter’s. His hand went swiftly behind him, to the wall master-lightswitch. A click and the room was plunged into utter darkness.

Not utter darkness—for there was a glow.

The face and hands of Doctor Ambrose Dexter glowed with a phosphorescent fire in the dark. There are presumably forms of radium poisoning which can cause such an effect, and no doubt Doctor Dexter would have so explained the phenomenon to Edmund Fiske, had he the opportunity.

But there was no opportunity. Edmund Fiske heard the click, saw the fantastic flaming features, and pitched forward to the floor.

Doctor Dexter quietly switched on the lights, went over to the younger man’s side and knelt for a long moment. He sought a pulse in vain.

Edmund Fiske was dead.

The doctor sighed, rose, and left the room. In the hall downstairs he summoned his servant.

“There has been a regrettable accident,” he said. “That young visitor of mine—a hysteric—suffered a heart attack. You had better call the police, immediately. And then continue with the packing. We must leave tomorrow, for the lecture tour.”

“But the police may detain you.”

Doctor Dexter shook his head. “I think not. It’s a clear-cut case. In any event, I can easily explain. When they arrive, notify me. I shall be in the garden.”

The doctor proceeded down the hall to the rear exit and emerged upon the moonlit splendor of the garden behind the house on Benefit Street.

The radiant vista was walled off from the world, utterly deserted. The dark man stood in moonlight and its glow mingled with his own aura.

At this moment two silken shadows leaped over the wall. They crouched in the coolness of the garden, then slithered forward towards Doctor Dexter.

They made panting sounds.

In the moonlight, he recognized the shapes of two black panthers.

Immobile, he waited as they advanced, padding purposefully towards him, eyes aglow, jaws slavering and agape.

Doctor Dexter turned away. His face was turned in mockery to the moon as the beasts fawned before him and licked his hands.

1951

The Hungry Horse

It was silly to be afraid of the house. And yet it wasn't really the house —it was the evil thing living there—hungry for tenants . . .

AT first there were just the two of them—he and she, together. That's the way it was when they bought the house.

Then it came. Perhaps it was there all the time; waiting for them in the house. At any rate, it was there now. And there was nothing they could do.

Moving was out of the question. They'd taken a five-year lease, secretly congratulating themselves on the low rental. It would be absurd to complain to the agent about it, and impossible to explain to their friends. For that matter, they had nowhere else to go; they had searched for months to find a home.

Besides, at first neither he nor she cared to admit that they were aware of its presence. But both of them knew it was there.

She felt it the very first evening, in the bedroom. She was sitting in front of the high, oldfashioned boudoir mirror, combing her hair. They hadn't settled all their things yet, and she didn't trouble to dust the place very thoroughly. In consequence the mirror was cloudy. And the light above it flickered.

So at first she thought it was just a trick of shadows. Some flaw in the glass perhaps. The wavering outline behind her seemed to blur the reflection oddly, and she frowned in distaste. Then she began to experience what she often called her “married feeling”—the peculiar awareness which usually denoted her husband’s entrance to a room she occupied.

He must be standing behind her now. He must have come in quietly, without saying anything. Perhaps he was going to put his arms around her, surprise her, startle her. Hence the shadow on the mirror.

She turned, ready to greet him.

The room was empty. And still the odd reflection persisted, together with the sensation of a presence at her back.

She shrugged, moved her head, and made a little face at herself, in the mirror. As a smile it was a failure, because the warped glass and the poor light seemed to distort her grin into something alien—into a smile that was not altogether a composition of her own face and features.

Well, it had been a fatiguing ordeal, this moving business. She flicked a brush through her hair and tried to dismiss the problem.

NEVERTHELESS she felt a surge of relief when he suddenly entered the bedroom. For a moment she thought of telling him, then decided not to worry him over her “nerves.”

He was more outspoken. It was the following morning that the incident occurred. He came rushing out of the bathroom, his face bleeding from a razor-cut on the left cheek.

“Is that your idea of being funny?” he demanded, in the petulant, little-boy fashion she found so engaging. “Sneaking in behind me and making faces in the mirror? Gave me an awful start—look at this nick I sliced on myself.”

She sat up in bed.

“But darling, I haven’t been making faces at you. I didn’t stir from this bed since you got up.”

“Oh.” He shook his head, his frown fading into a second set of wrinkles expressing bewilderment. “Oh, I see.”

“What is it?” She suddenly threw off the covers and sat on the edge of the bed, wriggling her toes and peering at him earnestly.

“Nothing,” he murmured. “Nothing at all. Just thought I saw you, or somebody, looking over my shoulder in the mirror. All of a sudden, you know. It must be those damned lights. Got to get some bulbs in town today.”

He patted his cheek with a towel and turned away. She teak a deep breath.

“I had the same feeling last night,” she confessed, then bit her lip.

“You did?”

“It’s probably just the lights, as you said, darling.”

“Uh huh.” He was suddenly preoccupied. “That must be it. I’ll make sure and bring those new bulbs.”

“You’d better. Don’t forget, the gang is coming down for the housewarming on Saturday.”

Saturday proved to be a long time in coming. In the interim both of them had several experiences which served to upset their minds much more than they cared to admit.

The second morning, after he had left for work, she went out in back and looked at the garden. The place was a mess—half an acre of land, all those trees, the weeds everywhere, and the dead leaves of autumn dancing slowly around the old house. She stood off on a little knoll and contemplated the grave gray gables of another century. Suddenly she felt lonely here. It wasn’t only the isolation, the feeling of being half a mile from the nearest neighbor, down a deserted dirt road. It was more as though she were an intruder here—an intruder upon the past. The cold breeze, the dying trees, the sullen sky were welcome; they belonged to the house. She was the outsider, because she was young, because she was alive.

She felt it all, but did not think it. To acknowledge her sensations would be to acknowledge fear. Fear of being alone. Or, worse still, fear of not being alone.

Because, as she stood there, the back door closed.

Oh, it was the autumn wind, all right. Even though the door didn't bang, or slam shut. It merely closed. But that was the wind's work, it had to be. There was nobody in the house, nobody to close the door.

SHE felt in her housedress pocket for the door key, then shrugged as she remembered leaving it on the kitchen sink. Well, she hadn't planned to go inside yet anyway. She wanted to look over the yard, look over the spot where the garden had been and where she fully intended a garden to bloom next spring. She had measurements to make, and estimates to take, and a hundred things to do here outside.

And yet, when the door closed, she knew she had to go in. Something was trying to shut her out, shut her out of her own house, and that would never do. Something was fighting against her, fighting against all idea of change. She had to fight back.

So she marched up to the door, rattled the knob, found herself locked out as she expected. The first round was lost. But there was always the window.

The kitchen window was eye-level in height, and a small crate served to bring it within easy reach. The window was open a good four inches and she had no trouble inserting her hands to raise it further.

She tugged.

Nothing happened. The window must be stuck. But it wasn't stuck; she'd just opened it before going outside and it opened quite easily; besides, they'd tried all the windows and found them in good operating condition.

She tugged again. This time the window raised a good six inches and then—something slipped. The window came down like the blade of a guillotine, and she got her hands out just in time. She bit her lip, sent strength through her shoulders, raised the window once more.

And this time she stared into the pane. The glass was transparent, ordinary window glass. She'd washed it just yesterday and she knew it was clean. There had been no blur, no shadow, and certainly no movement.

But there was movement now. Something cloudy, something obscenely opaque, peered out of the window, peered out of itself and pressed the window down against her. Something matched her strength to shut her out.

Suddenly, hysterically, she realized that she was staring at her own reflection through the shadows of the trees. Of course, it had to be her own reflection. And there was no reason for her to close her eyes and sob as she tugged the window up and half-tumbled her way into the kitchen.

She was inside, and alone. Quite alone. Nothing to worry about. Nothing to worry him about. She wouldn't tell him.

He wouldn't tell her, either. Friday afternoon, when she took the car and went into town for groceries and liquor in preparation for tomorrow's party, he stayed home from the office and arranged the final details of settling down.

That's why he carried up all the garment bags to the attic—to store the summer clothes, get them out of the way. And that's how he happened to open the little cubicle under the front gable. He was looking for the attic closet; he'd put down the bags and started to work along the wall with a flashlight. Then he noticed the door and the padlock.

DUST and rust told their own story; nobody had come this way for a long, long time. He thought again of Hacker, the glib real-estate agent who'd handled the rental of the place. "Been vacant several years and needs a little fixing up," Hacker had said. From the looks of it, nobody had lived here for a coon's age. All the better; he could force the lock with a common file.

He went downstairs for the file and returned quickly, noting as he did so the heavy attic dust. Apparently the former occupants had left in something of a hurry—debris was scattered everywhere, and swaths and swirls scored the dust to indicate that belongings had been dragged and hauled and swept along in a haphazard fashion.

Well, he had all winter to straighten things out, and right now he'd settle for storing the garment bags. Clipping the flashlight to his belt, he bent over the lock, file in hand, and tried his skill at breaking and entering.

The lock sprung. He tugged at the door, opened it, inhaled a gust of mouldy dampness, then raised the flash and directed the beam into the long, narrow closet.

A thousand silver slivers stabbed at his eyeballs. Golden, gleaming fire seared his pupils. He jerked the flashlight back, sent the beam upwards. Again, lances of light entered his eyes.

Suddenly he adjusted his vision and comprehension. He stood peering into a room full of mirrors. They hung from cords, lay in corners, stood along the walls in rows.

There was a tall, stately full-length mirror, set in a door; a pair of plate-glass ovals, inset in old-fashioned dresser-tops; a panel glass, and even a complete, dismantled bathroom medicine cabinet similar to the one they had just installed. And the floor was lined with hand-mirrors of all sizes and shapes. He noted an ornate silver-handled mirror straight from a woman's dressing table; behind it stood the vanity-mirror removed from the table itself. And there were pocket mirrors, mirrors from purse-compacts, mirrors of every size and shape. Against the far wall stood a whole series of looking-glass slabs that appeared to have been mounted at one time in a bedroom wall.

He gazed at half a hundred silvered surfaces, gazed at a half a hundred reflections of his own bewildered face.

AND he thought again of Hacker, of their inspection of the house. He had noted the absence of a medicine cabinet at the time, but Hacker had glossed over it. Somehow he hadn't realized that there were no mirrors of any sort in the house—of course, there was no furniture, but still one might expect a door panel in a place this old.

No mirrors? Why? And why were they all stacked away up here, under lock and key?

It was interesting. His wife might like some of these—that silver-handled beauty mirror, for example. He'd have to tell her about this.

He stepped cautiously into the closet, dragging the garment bags after him. There didn't seem to be any clothes-pole here, or any hooks. He could put some up in a jiffy, though. He piled the bags in a heap, stooping, and the flashlight glittered on a thousand surfaces, sent facets of fire into his face.

Then the fire faded. The silver surfaces darkened oddly. Of course, his reflection covered them now. His reflection, and something darker. Something smoky and swirling, something that was a part of the mouldy dampness, something that choked the closet with its presence. It was behind him—no, at one side—no, in front of him—all around him—it was growing and growing and blotting him out—it was making him sweat and tremble and now it was making him gasp and scuttle out of the closet and slam the door and press against it with all his waning strength, and its name was—

Claustrophobia. That was it. Just claustrophobia, a fancy name for nerves. A man gets nervous when he's cooped up in a small space. For that matter, a man gets nervous when he looks at himself too long in a mirror. Let alone fifty mirrors!

He stood there, shaking, and to keep his mind occupied, keep his mind off what he had just half-seen, half-felt, half-known, he thought about mirrors for a moment. About looking into mirrors. Women did it all the time. Men were different.

Men, himself included, seemed to be self-conscious about mirrors. He could remember going into a clothing-store and seeing himself in one of the complicated arrangements that afforded a side and rear view. What a shock that had been, the first time—and every time, for that matter! A man looks different in a mirror. Not the way he imagines himself to be, knows himself to be. A mirror distorts. That's why men hum and sing and whistle while they shave. To keep their minds off their reflections. Otherwise they'd go crazy. What was the name of that Greek mythological character who was in love with his own image? Narcissus, that was it. Staring into a pool for hours.

Women could do it, though. Because women never saw themselves, actually. They saw an idealization, a vision. Powder, rouge, lipstick, mascara, eye-shadow, brilliantine, or merely an emptiness to which these elements must be applied. Women were a little crazy to begin with, anyway. Hadn't she said something the other night about seeing him in her mirror when he wasn't there?

PERHAPS he'd better not tell her, after all. At least, not until he checked with the real-estate agent, Hacker. He wanted to find out about this business, anyway. Something was wrong, somewhere. Why had the previous owners stored all the mirrors up here?

He began to walk back through the, attic, forcing himself to go slowly, forcing himself to think of something, anything, except the fright he'd had in the room of reflections.

Reflect on something. Reflections. Who's afraid of the big bad reflection? Another myth, wasn't it?

Vampires. They had no reflections. "Tell me the truth now, Hacker. The people who built this house—were they vampires?"

That was a pleasant thought. That was a pleasant thought to carry downstairs in the afternoon twilight, to hug to your bosom in the gloom while the floors creaked and the shutters banged and the night came down in the house of shadows where something peered around the corners and grinned at you in the mirrors on the walls.

He sat there waiting for her to come home, and he switched on all the lights, and he put the radio on too and thanked God he didn't have a television set because there was a screen and the screen made a reflection and the reflection might be something he didn't want to see.

But there was no more trouble that evening, and by the time she came home with her packages he had himself under control. So they ate and talked quite naturally—oh, quite naturally, and if it was listening it wouldn’t know they were both afraid.

They made their preparations for the party, and called up a few people on the phone, and just on the spur of the moment he suggested inviting Hacker, too. So that was done and they went to bed. The lights were all out and that meant the mirrors were dark, and he could sleep.

Only in the morning it was difficult to shave. And he caught her, yes he caught her, putting on her makeup in the kitchen, using the little compact from her purse and carefully cupping her hands against reflections.

But he didn’t tell her and she didn’t tell him, and if it guessed their secrets, it kept silent.

He drove off to work and she made canapes, and if at times during the long, dark, dreary Saturday the house groaned and creaked and whispered, that was only to be expected.

THE house was quiet enough by the time he came home again, and somehow, that was worse. It was as though something were waiting for night to fall. That’s why she dressed early, humming all the while she powdered and primped, swirling around in front of the mirror (you couldn’t see too clearly if you swirled). That’s why he mixed drinks before their hasty meal and saw to it that they both had several stiff ones (you couldn’t see too clearly if you drank).

And then the guests tumbled in. The Teters, complaining about the winding back road through the hills. The Valliants, exclaiming over the antique panelling and the high ceilings. The Ehrs, whooping and laughing, with Vic remarking that the place looked like something designed by Charles Ad dams. That was a signal for a drink, and by the time Hacker and his wife arrived the blaring radio found ample competition from the voices of the guests.

He drank, and she drank, but they couldn’t shut it out altogether. That remark about Charles Addams was bad, and there were other things. Little things. The Talmadges had brought flowers, and she went out to the kitchen to arrange them in a cut-glass vase. There were facets in the glass, and as she stood in the kitchen, momentarily alone, and filled the vase with water from the tap, the crystal darkened beneath her fingers, and something peered, reflected from the facets. She turned quickly, and she was all alone. All alone, holding a hundred naked eyes in her hands.

So she dropped the vase, and the Ehrs and Talmadges and Hackers and Valliants trooped out to the kitchen, and he came too. Talmadge accused her of drinking and that was reason enough for another round. He said nothing, but got another vase for the flowers. And yet he must have known, because when somebody suggested a tour of the house, he put them off:

"We haven't straightened things out upstairs yet," he said. "It's a mess, and you'd be knocking into crates and stuff."

"Who's up there now?" asked Mrs. Teters, coming into the kitchen with her husband. "We just heard an awful crash."

"Something must have fallen over," the host suggested. But he didn't look at his wife as he spoke, and she didn't look at him.

"How about another drink?" she asked. She mixed and poured hurriedly, and before the glasses were half empty, he took over and fixed another round. Liquor helped to keep people talking and if they talked it would drown out other sounds.

The strategem worked. Gradually the group trickled back into the living room in twos and threes, and the radio blared and the laughter rose and the voices babbled to blot out the noises of the night.

He poured and she served, and both of them drank, but the alcohol had no effect. They moved carefully, as though their bodies were brittle glasses —glasses without bottom—waiting to be shattered by some sudden strident sound. Glasses hold liquor, but they never get drunk.

Their guests were not glasses, they drank and feared nothing, and the drinks took hold. People moved about, and in and out, and pretty soon Mr. Valliant and Mrs. Talmadge embarked on their own private tour of the house upstairs. It was irregular and unescorted, but fortunately nobody noticed either their departure or their absence. At least, not until Mrs. Talmadge came running downstairs and locked herself in the bathroom.

HER hostess saw her pass the doorway and followed her. She rapped on the bathroom door, gained admittance, and prepared to make discreet inquiries. None was necessary. Mrs. Talmadge, weeping and wringing her hands, fell upon her.

“That was a filthy trick!” she sobbed. “Coming up and sneaking in on us. The dirty louse—I admit we were doing a little smooching, but that’s all there was to it. And it isn’t as though he didn’t make enough passes at Gwen Hacker himself. What I want to know is, where did he get the beard? It frightened me out of my wits.”

“What’s all this?” she asked—knowing all the while what it was, and dreading the words to come.

“Jeff and I were in the bedroom, just standing there in the dark, I swear it, and all at once I looked up over my shoulder at the mirror because light began streaming in from the hall. Somebody had opened the door, and I could see the glass and this face. Oh, it was my husband all right, but he had a beard on and the way he came slinking in, glaring at us—”

Sobs choked off the rest. Mrs. Talmadge trembled so that she wasn’t aware of the tremors which racked the frame of her hostess. She, for her part, strained to hear the rest. “—sneaked right out again before we could do anything, but wait till I get him home—scaring the life out of me and all because he’s so crazy jealous—the look on his face in the mirror—” She soothed Mrs. Talmadge. She comforted Mrs. Talmadge. She placated Mrs. Talmadge. And all the while there was nothing to soothe or calm or placate her own agitation.

Still, both of them had restored a semblance of sanity by the time they ventured out into the hall to join the party—just in time to hear Mr. Talmadge’s agitated voice booming out over the excited responses of the rest.

“So I’m standing there in the bathroom and this old witch comes up and starts making faces over my shoulder in the mirror. What gives here, anyway? What kind of a house you running here?”

He thought it was funny. So did the others. Most of the others. The host and hostess stood there, not daring to look at each other. Their smiles were cracking. Glass is brittle.

“I don’t believe you,” Gwen Hacker’s voice. She’d had one, or perhaps three, too many. “I’m going up right now and see for myself.” She winked at her host and moved towards the stairs.

“Hey, hold on!” He was too late. She swept, or wobbled, past him.

“Halloween pranks,” said Talmadge, nudging him. “Old babe in a fancy hairdo. Saw her plain as day. What you cook up for us here, anyhow?”

He began to stammer something, anything, to halt the flood of foolish babbling. She moved close to him, wanting to listen, wanting to believe, wanting to do anything but think of Gwen Hacker upstairs, all alone upstairs looking into a mirror and waiting to see—

THE screams came then. Not sobs, not laughter, but screams. He took the stairs two at a time. Fat Mr. Hacker was right behind him, and the others straggled along, suddenly silent. There was the sound of feet clubbing the staircase, the sound of heavy breathing, and over everything the continuing high-pitched shriek of a woman confronted with terror too great to contain.

It oozed out of Gwen Hacker’s voice, oozed out of her body as she staggered and half-fell into her husband’s arms in the hall. The light was streaming out of the bathroom, and it fell upon the mirror that was empty of all reflection, fell upon her face that was empty of all expression.

They crowded around the Hackers—he and she were on either side and the others clustered in front—and they moved along the hall to her bedroom and. helped Mr. Hacker stretch his wife out on the bed. She had passed out, and somebody mumbled something about a doctor. and somebody else said no. never mind, she'll be all right in a minute, and somebody else said well. I think we'd better be getting along.

For the first time everybody seemed to be aware of the old house and the darkness, and the way the floors creaked and the windows rattled and the shutters banged. Everyone was suddenly sober, solicitous, and extremely anxious to leave.

Hacker bent over his wife, chafing her wrists, forcing her to swallow water, watching her whimper her way out of emptiness. The host and hostess silently procured hats and coats and listened to expressions of polite regret, hasty farewells, and poorly formulated pretenses of, "Had a marvelous time, darling."

Teters, Valliants, Talmadges were swallowed up in the night. He and she went back upstairs, back to the bedroom and the Hackers. It was too dark in the hall, and too light in the bedroom. But there they were, waiting. And they didn't wait long.

Mrs. Hacker sat up suddenly and began to talk. To her husband, to them.

"I saw her," she said. "Don't tell me I'm crazy, I saw her! Standing on tiptoe behind me, looking right into the mirror. With the same blue ribbon in her hair, the one she wore the day she—"

"Please, dear," said Mr. Hacker.

She didn't please. "But I saw her. Mary Lou! She made a face at me in the mirror, and she's dead, you know she's dead, she disappeared three years ago and they never did find the body—"

"Mary Lou Dempster." Hacker was a fat man. He had two chins. Both of them wobbled.

"She played around here, you know she did, and Wilma Dempster told her to stay away, she knew all about this house, but she wouldn't and now—oh, her face!"

MORE sobs. Hacker patted her on the shoulder. He looked as though he could stand a little shoulder-patting himself. But nobody obliged. He stood there, she stood there, still waiting. Waiting for the rest.

“Tell them,” said Mrs. Hacker. “Tell them the truth.”

“All right, but I’d better get you home.”

“I’ll wait. I want you to tell them. You must, now.”

Hacker sat down heavily. His wife leaned against his shoulder. The two waited another moment. Then it came.

“I don’t know how to begin, how to explain,” said fat Mr. Hacker. “It’s probably my fault, of course, but I didn’t know. All this foolishness about haunted houses—nobody believes that stuff any more, and all it does is push property values down, so I didn’t say anything. Can you blame me?”

“I saw her face,” whispered Mrs. Hacker.

“I know. And I should have told you. About the house, I mean. Why it hasn’t rented for twenty years. Old story in the neighborhood, and you’d have heard it sooner or later anyway, I guess.”

“Get on with it,” said Mrs. Hacker. She was suddenly strong again and he, with his wobbling chins, was weak.

Host and hostess stood before them, brittle as glass, as the words poured out; poured out and filled them to overflowing. He and she, watching and listening, filling up with the realization, with the knowledge, with that for which they had waited.

It was the Bellman house they were living in, the house Job Bellman built for his bride back in the sixties; the house where his bride had given birth to Laura and taken death in exchange. And Job Bellman had toiled through the seventies as his daughter grew to girlhood, rested in complacent retirement during the eighties as Laura Bellman blossomed into the reigning beauty of the county—some said the state, but then flattery came quickly to men’s lips in those days.

There were men aplenty, coming and going through that decade; passing through the hall in polished boots, bowing and stroking brilliantined mustachios, smirking at old Job, grinning at the servants, and gazing in moonstruck adoration at Laura.

Laura took it all as her rightful due, but land's sakes. she'd never think of it, no. not while Papa was still alive, and no, she couldn't, she was much too young to marry, and why, she'd never heard of such a thing, she'd always thought it was so much nicer just being friends—

Moonlight, dances, parties, hay-rides, sleighrides, candy, flowers, gifts, tokens, cotillion balls, punch, fans, beauty spots, dressmakers, curlers, mandolins, cycling, and the years that whirled away. And then, one day, old Job dead in the four-poster bed upstairs, and the Doctor came and the Minister, and then the Lawyer, hack-hack-hacking away with his dry, precise little cough, and his talk of inheritance and estate and annual income.

THEN she was all alone, just she and the servants and the mirrors. Laura and her mirrors. Mirrors in the morning, and the careful inspection, the scrutiny that began the day. Mirrors at night before the caller arrived, before the carriage came, before she whirled away to another triumphal entry, another fan-fluttering, pirouetting descent of the staircase. Mirrors at dawn, absorbing the smiles, listening to the secrets, the tale of the evening's triumph.

"Minor, mirror on the wall, who is the fairest of them all?"

Mirrors told her the truth, mirrors did not lie, mirrors did not paw or clutch or whisper or demand in return for acknowledgement of beauty.

Years passed, but mirrors did not age, did not change. And Laura did not age. The callers were fewer and some of them were oddly altered. They seemed older, somehow. And yet how could that be? For Laura Bellman was still young. The mirrors said so, and they always told the truth. Laura spent more and more time with the mirrors. Powdering, searching for wrinkles, tinting and curling her long hair. Smiling, fluttering eyelashes, making deliciously delicate little moues. Swirling daintily, posturing before her own perfection.

Sometimes, when the callers came, she sent word that she was not at home. It seemed silly, somehow, to leave the mirrors. And after a while, there weren't many callers to worry about. Servants came and went, some of them died, but there were always new ones. Laura and the mirrors remained. The nineties were truly gay, but in a way other people wouldn't understand. How Laura laughed, rocking back and forth on the bed, sharing her giddy secrets with the glass!

The years fairly flew by, but Laura merely laughed. She giggled and tittered when the servants spoke to her, and it was easier now to take her meals on a tray in her room. Because there was something wrong with the servants, and with Doctor Turner who came to visit her and who was always being tiresome about going away for a rest to a lovely home.

They thought she was getting old, but she wasn't—the mirrors didn't lie. She wore the false teeth and the wig to please the others, the outsiders, but she didn't really need them. The mirrors told her she was unchanged. They talked to her now, the mirrors did, and she never said a word. Just sat nodding and swaying before them in the room reeking of powder and patchouli, stroking her throat and listening to the mirrors telling her how beautiful she was and what a belle she would be if she would only waste. her beauty on the world. But she'd never leave here, never; she and the mirrors would always be together.

AND then came the day they tried to take her away, and they actually laid hands upon her—upon her, Laura Bellman, the most exquisitely beautiful woman in the world! Was it any wonder that she fought, clawed and kicked and whined, and struck out so that one of the servants crashed headlong into the beautiful glass and struck his foolish head and died, his nasty blood staining the image of her perfection?

Of course it was all a stupid mistake and it wasn't her fault, and Doctor Turner told the magistrate so when he came to call. Laura didn't have to see him, and she didn’t have to leave the house. But they always locked the door to her room now, and they took away all her mirrors.

They took away all her mirrors!

They left her alone, caged up, a scrawny, wizened, wrinkled old woman with no reflection. They took the mirrors away and made her old; old, and ugly, and afraid.

The night they did it, she cried.

She cried and hobbled around the room, stumbling blindly in a tear-some tour of nothingness.

That’s when she realized she was old, and nothing could save her. Because she came up against the window and leaned her wrinkled forehead against the cold, cold glass. The light came from behind her and as she drew away she could see her reflection in the window.

The window—it was a mirror, too! She gazed into it, gazed long and lovingly at the tear-streaked face of the fantastically rouged and painted old harridan, gazed at the corpse-countenance readied for the grave by a mad embalmer.

Everything whirled. It was her house, she knew every inch of it, from the day of her birth onwards the house was a part of her. It was her room, she had lived here for ever and ever. But this—this obscenity—was not her face. Only a mirror could show her that, and there would never be a mirror for her again. For an instant she gazed at the truth and then, mercifully, the gleaming glass of the window-pane altered and once again she gazed at Laura Bellman, the proudest beauty of them all. She drew herself erect, stepped back, and whirled into a dance. She danced forward, a prim self-conscious smile on her lips. Danced into the window-pane, half-through it, until razored splinters of glass tore her scrawny throat.

That’s how she died and that’s how they found her. The Doctor came, and the servants and the lawyer did what must be done. The house was sold, then sold again. It fell into the hands of a rental agency. There were tenants, but not for long. They had trouble with mirrors.

A man died—of a heart attack, they said—while adjusting his necktie before the bureau one evening. Grotesque enough, but he had complained to people in the town about strange happenings, and his wife babbled to everyone.

A school-teacher who rented the place in the twenties "passed away" in circumstances which Doctor Turner had never seen fit to relate. He had gone to the rental agency and begged them to take the place off the market; that was almost unnecessary, for the Bellman home had its reputation firmly established by now.

Whether or not Mary Lou Dempster had disappeared here would never be known. But the little girl had last been seen a year ago on the road leading to the house and although a search had been made and nothing discovered, there was talk aplenty.

Then the new heirs had stepped in, briskly, with their pooh-poohs and their harsh dismissals of advice, and the house had been cleaned and put up for rental.

So he and she had come to live here—with it. And that was the story, all of the story.

MR. Hacker put his arm around Gwen, harrumphed, and helped her rise. He was apologetic, he was shame-faced, he was deferential. His eyes never met those of his tenant.

He barred the doorway. "We're getting out of here, right now," he said. "Lease or no lease."

"That can be arranged. But—I can't find you another place tonight, and tomorrow's Sunday—"

"We'll pack and get out of here tomorrow," she spoke up. "Go to a hotel, anywhere. But we're leaving."

"I'll call you tomorrow," said Hacker. "I'm sure everything will be all right. After all, you've stayed here through the week and nothing, I mean nobody has—"

His words trailed off. There was no point in saying any more. The Hackers left and they were all alone. Just the two of them. Just the three of them, that is. But now they—he and she—were I too tired to care. The inevitable letdown, product of overindulgence and over-excitement was at hand.

They said nothing, for there was nothing to say. They heard nothing, for the house—and it—maintained a sombre silence.

She went to her room and undressed. He began to walk around the house. First he went to the kitchen and opened a drawer next to the sink. He took a hammer and smashed the kitchen mirror.

Tinkle-tinkle! And then a crash!

That was the mirror in the hall. Then upstairs, to the bathroom. Crash and clink of broken glass in the medicine cabinet. Then a smash as he shattered the panel in his room. And now he came to her bedroom and swung the hammer against the huge oval of the vanity, shattering it to bits.

He wasn't cut, wasn't excited, wasn't upset. And the mirrors were gone. Every last one of them was gone.

They looked at each other for a moment. Then he switched off the lights, tumbled into bed beside her, and sought sleep.

The night wore on.

IT was all a little silly in the day-light. But she looked at him again in the morning, and he went into his room and hauled out the suitcases. By the time she had breakfast ready he was already laying his clothes out on the bed. She got up after eating and took her own clothing from the drawers and hangers and racks and hooks. Soon he'd go up to the attic and get the garment bags. The movers could be called tomorrow, or as soon as they had a destination in mind.

The house was quiet. If it knew their plans, it wasn't acting. The day was gloomy and they kept the lights off without speaking—although both of them knew it was because of the window-panes and the story of the reflection. He could have smashed the window glass of course, but it was all a little silly. And they'd be out of here shortly.

Then they heard the noise. Trickling, burbling. A splashing sound. It came from beneath their feet. She gasped.

"Water-pipe—in the basement," he said, smiling and taking her by the shoulders.

"Better take a look." She moved towards the stairs.

"Why should you go down there? I'll tend to it."

But she shook her head and pulled away. It was her penance for gasping. She had to show she wasn't afraid. She had to show him—and it, too.

"Wait a minute," he said. "I'll get the pipe-wrench. It's in the trunk in the car." He went out the back door. She stood irresolute, then headed for the cellar stairs. The splashing was getting louder. The burst pipe was flooding the basement. It made a funny noise, like laughter.

He could hear it even when he walked up the driveway and opened the trunk of the car. These old houses always had something wrong with them; he might have known it. Burst pipes and—

Yes. He found the wrench. He walked back to the door, listening to the water gurgle, listening to his wife scream.

She was screaming! Screaming down in the basement, screaming down in the dark.

He ran, swinging the heavy wrench. He clumped down the stairs, down into the darkness, the screams tearing up at him. She was caught, it had her, she was struggling with it but it was strong, too strong, and the light came streaming in on the pool of water beside the shattered pipe and in the reflection he saw her face and the blackness of other faces swirling around her and holding her.

He brought the wrench up, brought it down on the black blur, hammering and hammering and hammering until the screaming died away. And then he stopped and looked down at her. The dark blur had faded away into the reflection of the water—the reflection that had evoked it. But she was still there, and she was still, and she would be still forever now. Only the water was getting red, where her head rested in it. And the end of the wrench was red, too.

For a moment he started to tell her about it, and then he realized she was gone. Now there were only the two of them left. He and it.

And he was going upstairs. He was walking upstairs, still carrying the bloody wrench, and he was going over to the phone to call the police and explain.

HE sat down in a chair before the phone, thinking about what he'd tell them, how he'd explain. It wouldn't be easy. There was this madwoman, see, and she looked into mirrors until there was more of her alive in her reflection than there was in her own body. So when she committed suicide she lived on, somehow, and came alive in mirrors or glass or anything that reflected. And she killed others or drove them to death and their reflections were somehow joined with hers so that this thing kept getting stronger and stronger, sucking away at life with that awful core of pride that could live beyond death. Woman, thy name is vanity! And that, gentlemen, is why I killed my wife . . .

Yes, it was a fine explanation, but it wouldn't hold water. Water—the pool in the basement had evoked it. He might have known it if only he'd stopped to think, to reflect. Reflect. That was the wrong word, now. Reflect. The way the window pane before him was reflecting.

He stared into the glass now, saw it behind him, surging up from the shadows. He saw the bearded man's face, the peering, pathetic, empty eyes of a little girl, the goggling grimacing stare of an old woman. It wasn't there, behind him, but it was alive in the reflection, and as he rose he gripped the wrench tightly. It wasn't there, but he'd strike at it, fight at it, come to grips with it somehow.

He turned, moving back, the ring of shadow-faces pressing. He swung the wrench. Then he saw her face coming up through all the rest. Her face, with shining splinters where the eyes should be. He couldn't smash it down, he couldn't hit her again.

It moved forward. He moved back. His arm went out to one side. He heard the tinkle of window-glass behind him and vaguely remembered that this was how the old woman had died. The way he was dying now—falling through the window, and cutting his throat, and the pain lanced up and in, tearing at his brain as he hung there on the jagged spikes of glass, bleeding his life away.

Then he was gone.

His body hung there, but he was gone.

There was a little puddle on the floor, moving and growing. The light from outside shone on it, and there was a reflection.

Something emerged fully from the shadows now, emerged and capered demurely in the darkness.

It had the face of an old woman and the face of a child, the face of a bearded man, and his face, and her face, changing and blending.

It capered and postured, and then it squatted, dabbling. Finally, all alone in the empty house, it just sat there and waited. There was nothing to do now but wait for the next to come. And meanwhile, it could always admire itself in that growing, growing red reflection on the floor . . .

THE END

Notebook Found In a Deserted House

FIRST off, I want to write that I never did anything wrong. Not to nobody. They got no call to shut me up here, whoever they are. They got no reason to do what I'm afraid they're going to do, either.

I think they're coming pretty soon, because they've been gone outside a long time. Digging, I guess, in that old well. Looking for a gate, I heard. Not a regular gate, of course, but something else.

Got a notion what they mean, and I'm scared.

I'd look out the windows but of course they are boarded up so I can't see.

But I turned on the lamp, and I found this here notebook so I want to put it all down. Then if I get a chance maybe I can send it to somebody who can help me. Or maybe somebody will find it. Anyway, it's better to write it out as best I can instead of just sitting here and waiting. Waiting for them to come and get me.

I better start by telling my name, which is Willie Osborne, and that I am 12 years old last July. I don't know where I was born.

First thing I can remember is living out Roodsford way, out in what folks call the back kill country. It's real lonesome out there, with deep woods all around and lots of mountains and hills that nobody ever climbs.

Grandma use to tell me about it when I was just a little shaver. That's who I lived with, just Grandma on account of my real folks being dead. Grandma was the one who taught me how to read and write. I never been to a regular school.

Grandma knew all kinds of things about the hills and the woods and she told me some mighty queer stories. That's what I thought they was, anyway, when I was little and living all alone with her. Just stories, like the ones in books.

Like stories about them ones hiding in the swamps, that was here before the settlers and the Indians both and how there was circles in the swamps and big stones called alters where them ones use to make sacrefices to what they worshiped.

Grandma got some of the stories from her Grandma she said—about how them ones hid in the woods and swamps because they couldn't stand sunshine, and how the Indians kept out of their way. She said sometimes the Indians would leave some of their young people tied to trees in the forest as a sacrefice, so as to keep them contented and peacefull.

Indians knew all about them and they tried to keep white folks from noticing too much or settling too close to the hills. Them ones didn't cause much trouble, but they might if they was crowded. So the Indians give excuses for not settling, saying there weren't enough hunting and no trails and it was too far off from the coast.

Grandma told me that was why not many places was settled even today. Nothing but a few farmhouses here and there. She told me them ones was still alive and sometimes on certain nights in the Spring and Fall you could see lights and hear noises far off on the tops of the hills.

Grandma said I had an Aunt Lucy and a Uncle Fred who lived out there right smack in the middle of the hills. Said my Pa used to visit them before he got married and once he heard them beating on a tree drum one night along about Halloween time. That was before he met Ma and they got married and she died when I come and he went away.

I HEARD all kinds of stories. About witches and devils and bat men that sucked your blood and haunts. About Salem and Arkham becauses I never been to a city and I wanted to hear tell how they were. About a place called Innsmouth with old rotten houses where people hid awful things away in the cellars and the attics. She told me bout the way graves was dug deep under Arkham. Made it sound like the whole country was full of haunts.

She use to scare me, telling about how some of these things looked and all but she never would tell me how them ones looked no matter how much I asked. Said she didn't want me to have any truck with such things—bad enough she and her kin knew as much as they did—allmost too much for decent God fearing people. It was lucky for me I didn't have to bother with such ideas, like my own ansestor on my father's side, Mehitabel Osborne, who got hanged for a witch back in the Salem days.

So they was just stories to me until last year when Grandma died and Judge Crubbinthorp put me on the train and I went out to live with Aunt Lucy and Uncle Fred in the very same hills that Grandma use to tell about so often.

You can bet I was pretty excited, and the conductor let me ride with him all the way and told me about the towns and everything.

Uncle Fred met me at the station. He was a tall thin man with a long beard. We drove off in a buggy from the little deepo—no houses around there or nothing—right into the woods.

Funny thing about those woods. They was so still and quiet. Gave me the creeps they was so dark and lonesome. Seemed like nobody had ever shouted or laughed or even smiled in them. Could'nt imagine anyone saying anything there excep in whispers.

Trees and all was so old, too. No animals around or birds. Path kind of overgrown like nobody used it much ever. Uncle Fred drove along right fast, he didn't hardly talk to me at all but just made that old horse hump it.

Pretty soon we struck into some hills, they was awfully high ones. They was woods on them, too, and sometimes a brook come running down, but I didn't see no houses and it was always dark like at twilight, wherever you looked.

Lastly we got to the farmhouse—a little place, old frame house and barn in a clear space with trees all around kind of gloomy-like. Aunt Lucy come out to meet us, she was a nice sort of little middle-aged lady who hugged me and took my stuff in back.

But all this don’t hold with what I’m supposed to write down here. It don’t matter that all this last year I was living in the house here with them, eating off the stuff Uncle Fred farmed without ever going into town. No other farms around here for almost four mile and no school—so evenings Aunt Lucy would help me with my reading. I never played much.

At first I was scared of going into the woods on account of what Grandma had told me. Besides, I could tell as Aunt Lucy and Uncle Fred was scared of something from the way they locked the doors at night and never went into the woods after dark, even in summer.

But after a while, I got used to the idea of living in the woods and they didn’t seem so scarey. I did chores for Uncle Fred, of course, but sometimes in afternoons when he was busy I’d go off by myself. Particular by the time it was fall.

And that’s how I heard one of the things.

It was early October, I was in the glen right by the big boulder. Then the noise started. I got behind that rock fast.

You see, like I say, there isn’t any animals in the woods. Nor people. Excep perhaps old Cap Pritchett the mailman who only comes through on Thursday afternoons.

So when I heard a sound that wasn’t Uncle Fred or Aunt Lucy calling to me, I knew I better hide.

About that sound. It was far-away at first, kind of a dropping noise. Sounded like the blood falling in little spurts on the bottom of the bucket when Uncle Fred hung up a butchered hog.

I looked around but I couldn’t make out nothing, and I couldn’t figure out the direction the noise was from either. The noise sort of stopped for a minute and they was only twilight and trees, still as death. Then the nose started again, nearer and louder.

Sounded like a lot of people running or walking all at once, moving this way. Twigs busting under feet and scrabbling in the bushes all mixed up in the noise. I scrunched down behind that boulder and kep real quiet.

I can tell that whatever makes the noise, it's real close now, right in the glen. I want to look up but dassn't because the sound is so loud and mean. And also there is an awful smell like something that was dead and buried being uncovered again in the sun.

All at once the noise stops again and I can tell that whatever makes it is real close by. For a minute the woods are creepy-still. Then comes the sound.

It's a voice and it's not a voice. That is, it doesn't sound like a voice but more like a buzzing or croaking, deep and droning. But it has to be a voice because it is saying words.

Not words I could understand, but words. Words that made me keep my head down, half afraid I might be seen and half afraid I might see something. I stayed there sweating and shaking. The smell was making me pretty sick, but that awful, deep droning voice was worse. Saying over and over something like "E uh shub nigger ath ngaa ryla neb shoggoth".

I can't hope to spell it out the way it sounded, but I heard it enough times to remember. I was still listening when the smell got awful thick and I guess I must have fainted because when I woke up the voice was gone and it was getting quite dark.

I ran all the way home that night, but not before I saw where the thing had stood when it talked—and it was a thing.

No human being can leave tracks in the mud like goat's hoofs all green with slime that smell awful—not four or eight, but a couple hundred!

I DIDN'T tell Aunt Lucy or Uncle Fred. But that night when I went to bed I had terrible dreams. I thought I was back in the glen, only this time I could see the thing. It was real tall and all inky-black, without any particular shape except a lot of black ropes with ends like hoofs on it. I mean, it had a shape but it kep changing—all bulgy and squirming into different sizes. They was a lot of mouths all over the thing like puckered up leaves on branches.

That’s as close as I can come. The mouths was like leaves and the whole thing was like a tree in the wind, a black tree with lots of branches trailing the ground, and a whole lot of roots ending in hoofs. And that green slime dribbling out of the mouths and down the legs was like sap!

Next day I remembered to look in a book Aunt Lucy had downstairs. It was called a mythology. This book told about some people who lived over in England and France in the old days and was called Druids. They worshiped trees and thought they was alive. Maybe this thing was like what they worshiped—called a nature-spirit.

But these Druids lived across the ocean, so how could it be? I did a lot of thinking about it the next couple days, and you can bet I didn’t go out to play in those woods again.

At last I figgered it out something like this.

Maybe those Druids got chased out of the forests over in England and France and some of them was smart enough to build boats and come across the ocean like old Leaf Erikson is supposed to have. Then they could maybe settle in the woods back here and frighten away the Indians with their magic spells.

They would know how to hide themselves away in the swamps and go right on with their heathen worshiping and call up these spirits out of the ground or wherever they come from.

Indians use to Believe that white gods come from out of the sea a long time ago. What if that was just another way of telling how the Druids got here? Some real civilized Indians down in Mexico or South America—Aztecs or Inkas, I guess—said a white god come over in a boat and taught them all kinds of magic. Couldn’t he of been a Druid?

That would explain Grandma’s stories about them ones, too.

Those Druids hiding in the swamps would be the ones who did the drumming and pounding and lit the fires on the hills. And they would be calling up them ones, the tree spirits or whatever, out of the earth. Then they would make sacrefices. Those Druids always made sacrefices with blood, just like the old witches. And didn't Grandma tell about people who lived too near the hills disappearing and never being found again?

We lived in a spot just exactly like that.

And it was getting close to Halloween. That was the big time, Grandma always said.

I began to wonder—how soon now?

Got so scared I didn't go out of the house. Aunt Lucy made me take a tonic, said I looked peaked. Guess I did. All I know is one afternoon when I heard a buggy coming through the woods I ran and hid under the bed.

But it was only Cap Pritchett with the mail. Uncle Fred got it and come in all excited with a letter.

Cousin Osborne was coming to stay with us. He was kin to Aunt Lucy and he had a vacation and he wanted to stay a week. He'd get here on the same train I did—the only train they was passing through these parts—on noon, October 25th.

For the next few days we was all so excited that I forgot all my crazy notions for a spell. Uncle Fred fixed up the back room for Cousin Osborne to sleep in and I helped him with the carpenter parts of the job.

DAYS got shorter right along, and the nights was all cold with big winds. It was pretty brisk the morning of the 25th and Uncle Fred bundled up warm to drive through the woods. He meant to fetch Cousin Osborne at noon, and it was seven mile to the station. He wouldn't take me, and I didn't beg. Them woods Was too full of creaking and rustling sounds from the wind—sounds that might be something else, too.

Well, he left, and Aunt Lucy and I stayed in the house. She was putting up preserves now—plums—for over the winter season. I washed out jars from the well.

Seems like I should have told about them having two wells. A new one with a big shiny pump, close to the house. Then an old stone one out by the barn, with the pump gone. It never had been any good, Uncle Fred said, it was there when they bought the place. Water was all slimy. Something funny about it, because even without a pump, sometimes it seemed to back up. Uncle Fred couldn't figure it out, but some mornings water would be running out over the sides—green, slimy water that smelled terrible.

We kep away from it and I was by the new well, till along about noon when it started in to cloud up. Aunt Lucy fixed lunch, and it started to rain hard with thunder rolling in off the big hills in the west.

Seemed to me Uncle Fred and Cousin Osborne was going to have troubles getting home in the storm, but Aunt Lucy didn't fret about it—just made me help her put up the stock.

Come five o'clock, getting dark, and still no Uncle Fred. Then we begun to worry. Maybe the train was late, or something happened to the horse or buggy.

Six o'clock and still no Uncle Fred. The rain stopped, but you could still hear the thunder sort of growling off in the hills, and the wet branches kep dripping down in the woods, making a sound like women laughing.

Maybe the road was too bad for them to get through. Buggy might bog down in the mud. Perhaps they decided to stay in the deepo over night.

Seven o'clock and it was pitch dark outside. No rain sounds any more. Aunt Lucy was awful worried. She said for us to go out and post a lantern on the fence rail by the road.

WE WENT down the path to the fence. It was dark and the wind had died down. Everything was still, like in the deep part of the woods. I felt kind of scared just walking down the path with Aunt Lucy—like something was out there in the quiet dark, someplace, waiting to grab me.

We lit the lantern and stood there looking down the dark road and, "What's that?" said Aunt Lucy, real sharp. I listened and heard a drumming sound far away.

“Horse and buggy,” I said. Aunt Lucy perked up.

“You’re right,” she says, all at once. And it is, because we see it. The horse is running fast and the buggy lurches behind it, crazylike. It don’t even take a second look to see something has happened, because the buggy don’t stop by the gate but keeps going up to the barn with Aunt Lucy and me running through the mud after the horse. The horse is all full of lather and foam, and when it stops it can’t stand still. Aunt Lucy and I wait for Uncle Fred and Cousin Osborne to step out, but nothing happens. We look inside.

There isn’t anybody in the buggy at all.

Aunt Lucy says, “Oh!” in a real loud voice and then faints. I had to carry her back to the house and get her into bed.

I waited almost all night by the window, but Uncle Fred and Cousin Osborne never showed up. Never.

The next few days was awful. They was nothing in the buggy for a clue like to what happened, and Aunt Lucy wouldn’t let me go along the road into town or even to the station through the woods.

The next morning the horse was dead in the barn, and of course we would of had to walk to the deepo or all those miles to Warren’s farm. Aunt Lucy was scared to go and scared to stay and she allowed as how when Cap Pritchett comes by we had best go with him over to town and make a report and then stay there until we found out what happened.

Me, I had my own ideas what happened. Halloween was only a few days away now, and maybe them ones had snatched Uncle Fred and Cousin Osborne for sacrefice. Them ones or the Druids. The mythology book said Dmids could even raise storms if they wanted to with their spells.

No sense talking to Aunt Lucy, though. She was like out of her head with worry, anyway, just rocking back and forth and mumbling over and over, “They’re gone” and “Fred always warned me” and “No use, no use.” I had to get the meals and tend to stock myself. And nights it was hard to sleep, because I kep listening for drums. I never heard any, though, but still it was better than sleeping and having those dreams.

Dreams about the black tiling like a tree, walking through the woods and sort of rooting itself to one particular spot so it could pray with all those mouths—pray down to that old god in the ground below.

I don't know where I got the idea that was how it prayed—by sort of attaching its mouths to the ground. Maybe it was on account of seeing the green slime. Or had I really seen it? I'd never gone back to look. Maybe it was all in my head—the Druid story and about them ones and the voice that said "shoggoth" and all the rest.

But then, where was Cousin Osborne and Uncle Fred? And what scared the horse so it up and died the next day?

Thoughts kep going round and round in my head, chasing each other, but all I knew was we'd be out of here by Halloween night.

Because Halloween was on a Thursday, and Cap Pritchett would come and we could ride to town with him.

Night before I made Aunt Lucy pack and we got all ready, and then I settled down to sleep. There was no noises, and for the first time I felt a little better.

Only the dreams come again. I dreamed a bunch of men come in the night and crawled through the parlor bedroom window where Aunt Lucy slept and got her. They tied her up and took her away, all quiet, in the dark, because they had cat-eyes and didn't need light to see.

The dream scared me so I woke up while it was just breaking into dawn. I went down the hall to Aunt Lucy right away.

She was gone.

The window was wide open like in my dream, and some of the blankets was torn.

Ground was hard outside the window and I didn't see footprints or anything. But she was gone.

I guess I cried then.

It's hard to remember what I did next. Didn't want breakfast. Went out hollering "Aunt Lucy" and not expecting any answer. I walked to the barn and the door was open and the cows were gone. Saw one or two prints going out the yard and up the road, but I didn't think it was safe to follow them.

Some time later I went over to the well and then I cried again because the water was all slimy green in the new one, just like the old.

When I saw that I knew I was right. Them ones must of come in the night and they wasn't even trying to hide their doings any more. Like they was sure of things.

Tonight was Halloween. I had to get out of here. If them ones was watching and waiting, I couldn't depend on Cap Pritchett showing up this afternoon. I'd have, to chance it down the road and I'd better start walking now, in the morning, while it was still light enough to make town.

So I rummaged around and found a little money in Uncle Fred's drawer of the bureau and Cousin Osborne's letter with the address in Kingsport he wrote it from. That's where I'd have to go after I told folks in town what happened. I'd have some kin there.

I wondered if they'd believe me in town when I told them about the way Uncle Fred had disappeared and Aunt Lucy, and about them stealing the cattle for a sacrefice and about the green slime in the well where something had stopped to drink. I wondered if they would know about the drums and the lights on the hills tonight and if they was going to get up a party and come back this evening to try and catch them ones and what they meant to call up rumbling out of the earth. I wondered if they knew what a "shoggoth" was.

Well, whether they did or not, I couldn't stay and find out for myself. So I packed up my satchel and got ready to leave. Must of been around noon and everything was still.

I went to the door and stepped outside, not bothering to lock it behind me. Why should I with nobody around for miles? Then I heard the noise down the road. Footsteps.

Somebody walking along the road, just around the bend.

I stood still for a minute, waiting to see, waiting to run.

Then he come along.

HE WAS tall and thin, and looked something like Uncle Fred only a lot younger and without a beard, and he was wearing a nice city kind of suit and a crush hat. He smiled when he saw me and come marching up like he knowed who I was. “Hello, Willie,” he said.

I didn’t say nothing, I was so confuzed. “Don’t you know me?” he said. “I’m Cousin Osborne. Your Cousin Frank.” He held out his hand to shake. “But then I guess you wouldn’t remember, would you? Last time I saw you, you were only a baby.”

“But I thought you were suppose to come last week,” I said. “We expected you on the 25th.”

“Didn’t you get my telegram?” he asked. “I had business.”

I shook my head. “We never get nothing here unless the mail delivers it on Thursdays. Maybe it’s at the station.”

Cousin Osborne grinned. “You are pretty well off the beaten track at that. Nobody at the station this noon. I was hoping Fred would come along with the buggy so I wouldn’t have to walk, but no luck.”

“You walked all the way?” I asked. “That’s right.”

“And you come on the train?”

Cousin Osborne nodded.

“Then where’s your suitcase?”

“I left it at the deepo,” he told me. “Too far to fetch it along. I thought Fred would drive me back there in the buggy to pick it up.” He noticed my luggage for the first time. “But wait a minute—where are you going with a suitcase, son?”

Well, there was nothing else for me to do but tell him everything that happened.

So I said for him to come into the house and set down and I’d explain.

We went back, in and he fixed some coffee and I made a couple sanwiches and we ate, and then I told him about Uncle Fred going to the deepo and not coming back, and about the horse and then what happened to Aunt Lucy. I left out the part about me in the woods, of course, and I didn't even hint at them ones. But I told him I was scared and figgered on walking to town today before dark.

Cousin Osborne he listened to me, nodding and not saying much or interrupting.

"Now you can see why we got to go, right away," I said. "Whatever come after them will be coming after us, and I don't want to spend another night here."

Cousin Osborne stood up. "You may be right, Willie," he said. "But dont let your imagination run away with you, son. Try to seperate fact from fancy. Your Aunt and Uncle have disappeared. That's fact. But this other nonsense about things in the woods coming after you—that's fancy. Reminds me of all that silly talk I heard back home, in Arkham. And for some reason there seems to be more of it around this time of year, at Halloween. Why, when I left—"

"Excuse me, Cousin Osborne," I said. "But dont you live in Kingsport?"

"Why to be sure," he told me. "But I did live in Arkham once, and I know the people around here. It's no wonder you were so frightened in the woods and got to imagining things. As it is, I admire your bravery. For a 12 year old, you've acted very sensibly."

"Then lets start walking," I said. "Here it is almost 2 and we better get moving if we want to make town before sundown."

"Not just yet, son," Cousin Osborne said. "I wouldn't feel right about leaving without looking around and seeing what we can discover about this mystery. After all, you must understand that we can't just march into town and tell the sheriff some wild nonsense about strange creatures in the woods making off with your Aunt and Uncle. Sensible folks just won't believe such things. They might think I was lying and laugh at me. Why they might even think you had something to do with your Aunt and Uncle's—well, leaving."

"Please," I said. "We got to go, right now."

He shook his head.

I didn't say any more. I might of told him a lot, about what I dreamed and heard and saw and knew—but I figgered it was no use.

Besides, there was some things I didn't want to say to him now that I had talked to him. I was feeling scared again.

First he said he was from Arkham and then when I asked him he said he was from Kingsport but it sounded like a lie to me.

Then he said something about me being scared in the woods and how could he know that? I never told him that part at all.

If you want to know what I really thought, I thought maybe he wasn't really Cousin Osborne at all.

And if he wasn't, then—who was he?

I stood up and walked back into the hall.

"Where you going, son?" he asked.

"Outside."

"I'll come with you."

Sure enough, he was watching me. He wasn't going to let me out of his sight. He came over and took my arm, real friendly—but I couldn't break loose. No, he hung on to me. He knew I meant to run for it.

What could I do? All alone in the house in the woods with this man, with night coming on, Halloween night, and them ones out there waiting.

WE WENT outside and I noticed it was getting darker already, even in afternoon. Clouds had covered up the sun, and the wind was moving the trees so they stretched out their branches, like they was trying to hold me back. They made a rustling noise, just as if they were whispering things about me, and he sort of looked up at them and listened. Maybe he understood what they were saying. Maybe they were giving him orders.

Then I almost laughed, because he was listening to something and now I heard it too.

It was a drumming sound, on the road.

"Cap Pritchett," I said. "He's the mailman. Now we can ride to town with him in the buggy."

"Let me talk to him," he says. "About your Aunt and Uncle. No sense in alarming him, and we dont want any scandal, do we? You just run along inside."

"But Cousin Osborne," I said. "We got to tell the truth."

"Of course, son. But this is a matter for adults. Now run along. I'll call you."

He was real polite about it and even smiled, but all the same he dragged me back up the porch and into the house and slammed the door. I stood there in the dark hall and I could hear Cap Pritchett slow down and call out to him, and him going up to the buggy and talking, and then all I heard was a lot of mumbling, real low. I peeked out through a crack in the door and saw them. Cap Pritchett was talking to him friendly, all right, and nothing was wrong.

Except that in a minute or so, Cap Pritchett waved and then he grabbed the reins and the buggy started off again!

Then I knew I'd have to do it, no matter what happened. I opened the door and ran out, suitcase and all, down the path and up the road after the buggy. Cousin Osborne he tried to grab me when I went by, but I ducked around him and yelled, "Wait for me, Cap—I'm coming—take me to town!"

Cap slowed down and stared back, real puzzled. "Willie!" he says. "Why I thought you was gone. He said you went away with Fred and Lucy—"

"Pay no attention," I said. "He didn't want me to go. Take me to town. I'll tell you what really happened. Please, Cap, you got to take me."

"Sure I'll take you, Willie. Hop right up here."

I hopped.

Cousin Osborne came right up to the buggy. “Here, now,” he said, real sharp. “You can’t leave like this. I forbid it. You’re in my custody.”

“Don’t listen to him,” I yelled. “Take me, Cap. Please!”

“Very well,” said Cousin Osborne. “If you insist on being unreasonable. We’ll all go. I cannot permit you to leave alone.”

He smiled at Cap. “You can see the boy is unstrung,” he said. “And I trust you will not be disturbed by his imaginings. Living out here like this—well, you understand—he’s not quite himself. I’ll explain everything on the way to town.”

He sort of shrugged at Cap and made signs of tapping his head. Then he smiled again and made to climb up next to us in the buggy seat.

But Cap didn’t smile back. “No, you don’t,” he said. “This boy Willie is a good boy. I know him. I don’t know you. Looks as if you done enough explaining already, Mister, when you said Willie had gone away.”

“But I merely wanted to avoid talk—you see, I’ve been called in to doctor the boy—he’s mentally unstable—”

“Stables be damned!” Cap spit out some tobacco juice right at Cousin Osborne’s feet. “We’re going.”

Cousin Osborne stopped smiling. “Then I insist you take me with you,” he said. And he tried to climb into the buggy.

Cap reached into his jacket and when he pulled his hand out again he had a big pistol in it.

“Git down!” he yelled. “Mister, you’re talking to the United States Mail and you don’t tell the Government nothing, understand? Now git down before I mess your brains all over this road.”

Cousin Osborne scowled, but he got away from the buggy, fast.

He looked at me and shrugged. “You’re making a big mistake, Willie,” he said.

I didn’t even look at him. Cap said, “Gee up,” and we went off down the road. The buggy wheels turned faster and faster and pretty soon the farmhouse was out of sight and Cap put his pistol away, and patted me on the shoulder.

"Stop that trembling, Willie," he said. "You're safe now. Nothing to worry about. Be in town little over an hour or so. Now you just set back and tell old Cap all about it."

SO I TOLD him. It took a long time.

We kep going through the woods, and before I knew it, it was almost dark. The sun sneaked down and hid behind the hills. The dark began to creep out of the woods on each side of the road, and the trees started to rustle, whispering to the big shadows that followed us.

The horse was clipping and clopping along, and pretty soon they were other noises from far away. Might have been thunder and might have been something else. But it was getting night-time for sure, and it was the night of Halloween.

The road cut off through the hills now, and you could hardly see where the next turn would take you. Besides, it was getting dark awful fast.

"Guess we're in for a spell of rain," Cap said, looking up. "That's thunder, I reckon."

"Drums," I said.

"Drums?"

"At night in the hills you can hear them," I told him. "I heard them all this month. It's them ones, getting ready for the Sabbath."

"Sabbath?" Cap looked at me. "Where you hear tell about a Sabbath?"

Then I told him some more about what had happened. I told him all the rest. He didn't say anything, and before long he couldn't of answered me anyway, because the thunder was all around us, and the rain was lashing down on the buggy, on the road, everywhere. It was pitch-blade outside now, and the only time we could see was when lightning flashed. I had to yell to make him hear me—yell about the things that caught Uncle Fred and come for Aunt Lucy, the things that took our cattle and then sent Cousin Osborne back to fetch me. I hollered out about what I heard in the woods, too.

IN THE lightning flashes I could see Cap's face. He wasn't smiling or scowling—he just looked like he believed me. And I noticed he had his pistol out again and was holding the reins with one hand even though we were racing along. The horse was so scared he didn't need the whip to keep him running.

The old buggy was lurching and bouncing, and the rain was whistling down in the wind and it was all like an awful dream but it was real. It was real when I hollered out to Cap Pritchett about that time in the woods.

"Shoggoth," I yelled. "What's a shoggoth?"

Cap grabbed my arm, and then the lightning come and I could see his face, with his mouth open. But he wasn't looking at me. He was looking at the road and what was ahead of us.

The trees sort of come together, hanging over the next turn, and in the black it looked as if they were alive—moving and bending and twisting to block our way. Lightning flickered up again and I could see them plain, and also something else.

Something black in the road, something that wasn't a tree. Something big and black, just squatting there, waiting, with ropy arms squirming and reaching.

"Shoggoth!" Cap yelled. But I could scarcely hear him because the thunder was roaring and now the horse let out a scream and I felt the buggy jerk to one side and the horse reared up and we was almost into the black stuff. I could smell an awful smell, and Cap was pointing his pistol and it went off with a bang that was almost as loud as the thunder and almost as loud as the sound we made when we hit the black thing.

Then everything happened at once. The thunder, the horse falling, the shot, and us hitting as the buggy went over. Cap must of had the reins wrapped around his arm, because when the horse fell and the buggy turned over, he went right over the dashboard head first and down into the squirming mess that was the horse—and the black thing that grabbed it. I felt myself falling in the dark, then landing in the mud and gravel of the road.

There was thunder and screaming and another sound which I had heard once before in the woods—a droning sound like a voice.

That’s why I never looked back. That’s why I didn’t even think about being hurt when I landed—just got up and started to run down the road, fast as I could, run down the road in the storm and the dark with the trees squirming and twisting and shaking their heads while they pointed at me with their branches and laughed.

Over the thunder I heard the horse scream and I heard Cap scream, too, but I still didn’t look back. The lightning winked on and off, and I ran through the trees now because the road was nothing but mud that dragged me down and sucked at my legs. After a while I began to scream, too, but I couldn’t even hear myself for thunder. And more than thunder. I heard drums.

All at once I busted clear of the woods and got to the hills. I ran up, and the drumming got louder, and pretty soon I could see regular, not just when they was lightning. Because they was fires burning on the hill, and the booming of the drums come from there.

I got lost in the noise; the wind shrieking and the trees laughing and the drums pounding. But I stopped in time. I stopped when I saw the fires plain; red and green fires burning in all that rain.

I saw a big white stone in the center of a cleared-off space on top of the hill. The red and green fires was around and behind it, so everything stood out clear against the flames.

They was men around the alter, men with long gray beards and wrinkled-up faces, men throwing awful-smelling stuff on the fires to make them blaze red and green. And they had knives in their hands and I could hear them howling over the storm. In back, squatting on the ground, more men pounded on drums.

PRETTY soon something else come up the hill—two men driving cattle. I could tell it was our cows they drove, drove them right up to the alter and then the men with the knives cut their throats for a sacrefice.

All this I could see in lightning flashes and in the fire lights, and I sort of scooched down so I couldn't get spotted by anyone.

But pretty soon I couldn't see very good any more, on account of the way they threw stuff on the fire. It set up a real thick black smoke. When this smoke come up, the men began to chant and pray louder.

I couldn't hear words, but the sounds was like what I heard back in the woods. I couldn't see too good, but I knew what was going to happen. Two men who had led the cattle went back down the other side of the hill and when they come up again they had new sacrefices. The smoke kep me from seeing plain, but these was two-legged sacrefices, not four. I might of seen better at that, only now I hid my face when they dragged them up to the white alter and used the knives, and the fire and smoke flared up and the drums boomed and they all chanted and called in a loud voice to something waiting over on the other side of the hill.

The ground began to shake.

It was storming, they was thunder and lightning and fire and smoke and chanting and I was scared half out of my wits, but one thing I'll swear to—the ground began to shake. It shook and shivered and they called out to something, and in a minute something came.

It came crawling up the hillside to the alter and the sacrefice, and it was the black thing of my dreams—that black, ropy, slimy jelly tree-thing out of the woods. It crawled up and it flowed up on its hoofs and mouths and snaky arms. And the men bowed and stood back and then it got to the alter where they was something squirming on top, squirming and screaming.

The black thing sort of bent over the alter and then I heard droning sounds over the screaming as it come down. I only watched a minute, but while I watched the black thing began to swell and grow.

That finished me. I didn't care any more. I had to run. I got up and I run and run and run, screaming at the top of my lungs no matter who heard.

I kep running and I kep screaming forever, through the woods and the storm, away from that hill and that alter, and then all at once I knew where I was and I was back here at the farmhouse.

Yes, that’s what I’d done—run in a circle and come back. But I couldn’t go any further, I couldn’t stand the night and the storm. So I run inside here. At first after I locked the door I just lay right down on the floor, all tuckered out from running and crying.

But in a little while I got up and hunted me some nails and a hammer and some of Uncle Fred’s boards that wasn’t split up into kindling.

I nailed up the door first and then boarded up all the windows. Every last one of them. Guess I worked for hours, tired as I was. When it was all done, the storm died down and it got quiet. Quiet enough for me to lie down on the couch and go to sleep.

Woke up a couple hours ago. It was daylight. I could see it shining through the cracks. From the way the sun come in, I knew it was afternoon already. I’d slept through the whole morning, and nothing had come.

I FIGURED now maybe I could let myself out and make town on foot, like I’d planned yesterday.

But I figgered wrong.

Before I got started taking out the nails, I heard him. It was Cousin Osborne, of course. The man who said he was Cousin Osborne, I mean.

Fie come into the yard, calling “Willie!” but I didn’t answer. Then he tried the door and then the windows. I could hear him pounding and cussing. That was bad.

But then he began mumbling, and that was worse. Because it meant he wasn’t out there alone.

I sneaked a-look through the crack, but he already went around to the back of the house so I didn’t see him or who was with him.

Guess that’s just as well, because if I’m right, I wouldn’t want to see.

Hearing’s bad enough.

Hearing that deep croaking, and then him talking, and then that croaking again.

Smelling that awful smell, like the green slime from the woods and around the well.

The well—they went over to the well in back. And I heard Cousin Osborne say something about, “Wait until dark. We can use the well if you find the gate. Look for the gate.”

I know what that means now. The well must be a sort of entrance to the underground place—that’s where those Druid men live. And the black thing.

They’re out in back now, looking.

I been writing for quite a spell and already the afternoon is going. Peeking through the cracks I can see it’s getting dark again.

That’s when they’ll come for me—when it’s dark.

They’ll break down the doors or the windows and come and take me. They’ll take me down into the well, into the black places where the shoggoths are. There must be a whole world down under the hills, a world where they hide and wait to come out for more sacrefices, more blood. They don’t want any humans around, except for sacrefices.

I saw what the black thing did on the alter. I know what’s going to happen to me.

Maybe they’ll miss the real Cousin Osborne back home and send somebody to find out what become of him. Maybe folks in town will miss Cap Pritchett and go on a search. Maybe they’ll come here and find me. But if they don’t come soon it will be too late.

That’s why I wrote this. It’s true, cross my heart, every word of it. And if anyone finds this notebook where I hide it, come and look down the well. The old well, out in back.

Remember what I told about them ones, Block up the well and clean out them swamps. No sense looking for me—if I’m not here.

I wish I wasn’t so scared. I’m not even scared so much for myself, but for other folks. The ones who might come after and live around here and have the same thing happen—or worse.

YOU just got to believe me. Go to the woods if you dont. Go to the hill. The hill where they had the sacrefice. Maybe the stains are gone and the rain washed the footprints away. Maybe they got rid of the traces of the fire. But the alter stone must be there. And if it is, you'll know the truth. There should be some big round spots on that stone. Round spots about two feet wide.

I didn't tell about that. At the last, I did look back. I looked back at the big black thing that was a shoggoth. I looked back as it kep swelling and growing. I guess I told about how it could change shape, and how big it got. But you can't hardly imagine how big or what shape and I still dassn't tell.

All I say is look. Look and you'll see what's hiding under the earth in these hills, waiting to creep out and feast and kill some more.

Wait. They're coming now. Getting twilight and I can hear footsteps. And other sounds. Voices. And other sounds. They're banging on the door. And sure enough—they must have a tree or a plank to use for battering it down. The whole place is shaking. I can hear Cousin Osborne yelling, and that droning. The smell is awful, I'm getting sick, and in a minute—

Look at the alter. Then you'll understand what I'm trying to tell. Look at the big round marks, two feet wide, on each side. That's where the big black thing grabbed hold.

Look for the marks and you'll know what I saw, what I'm afraid of, what's still waiting to grab you unless you shut it up forever under the earth.

Black marks two feet wide, but they aren't just marks.

What they really are is fingerprints!

The door is busting————

Hell's Angels

It was the Mardi Gras, and an angel could walk the streets unnoticed . . . by mortal eyes! . . .

"I'VE always wanted to ask you why it's so hard for a man to get to see you," said Paul Hastings.

The Devil smiled blandly. At least, the smile would have appeared bland enough on any other face. In this case it was slightly disturbing to see.

"My dear fellow," said the Devil, leaning forward in a confidential manner and anchoring his tail to the chair-leg. "My dear fellow, the answer must be obvious to a man of your intelligence. After all, with due modesty, I must admit Pm rather an important personage. You will agree?"

Paul Hastings nodded.

"Naturally, if you understand my position, you can easily see I cannot be bothered with every Tom, Dick and Harry—or Harriet—who gets the notion of communicating with me. If I did there would be no time left to myself. And aside from tempting mortals, you know, I have other souls to fry."

The Devi) shook his head to accentuate his point. "And so you see, my dear sir, I've had to make it difficult to reach me. My chief detractors—members of the clergy and the like—would have it that I am continually in search of souls to snare. Why, badness me, nothing could be further from the truth!"

The Devil laughed heartily until sparks flew out of his mouth. “Matter of fact. I have souls aplenty—souls to burn, you might say. No need to tempt most mortals. They pave their own road to perdition without the need of assistance from me, I assure you.

“The only cases that interest me personally any more are chaps like you —men and women clever enough to dig through tangled and abstruse spells, and wise enough to interpret them. If they are intelligent enough and eager enough to go to all the bother of summoning me, then I am happy to appear. Besides, it is a simple matter to do business in such cases. Obviously such persons are eager to sell their souls to me. I don’t have to haggle and persuade and coax, like a used car salesman.”

“What do you know about used car salesmen?” asked the young man.

“Why, everything,” said the Devil. “You might have guessed that I get them all, sooner or later.”

SATAN sat back and stroked his spade beard, while Paul Hastings marvelled once again at his appearance. For the Devil looked exactly the way the Devil had always looked in pictures. He was the Devil of song and story and laxative bottle labels, to the life. And now he was sitting here in Paul Hastings’ little garret, just as comfortable as you please, purring and beaming and pulling his beard.

“Speaking of selling souls,” the Devil murmured, “we might as well get down to business right away. I presume you had something of the sort in mind when you evoked me?”

Paul Hastings blushed and hung his head. “Well, yes,” he murmured. “You know how it is. Times are tough, a fellow has to get along, and the finance company won’t loan me anything without security. So I was wondering if—”

The Devil raised a delicate hand so that the black claws gleamed in the light of the tallow candles Hastings had set on the floor.

"No need to go into embarrassing details," he said, kindly. "I quite understand. I've been handling cases like yours for years. Once made a deal with a chap by the name of Faust who—but I digress. What I mean to say is, I'm prepared to make a handsome offer for your soul. A clean-cut intelligent chap like you doesn't often come my way. I'd be happy to place my resources at your disposal if only you'd tell me what it is you have in mind."

Paul Hastings shrugged. It wasn't much of a gesture, but somehow it managed to include his shock of unruly, uncut blonde hair, his wrinkled, shabby suit, his frayed shoelaces, his scuffed shoes, and the floor of the Bourbon Street garret in which the shoes and their owner stood.

"I see very well what you have in mind," said the Devil. "It's something like the letter 'S' with two lines drawn through it. Am I correct?"

"Right," answered the young man. "You don't want eternal life, or three wishes, or any of that nonsense?"

"Certainly not. I've figured it all out. I have youth, and good health, and I needn't ask for such things."

"Hmm." The Devil stroked his beard until it almost purred. "Think it over carefully before you make your decision, though. What about power? Lots of men like power, you know. And then some chaps have a fondness for feminine companionship. Without appearing to boast, I think I could arrange anything you might want along those lines—or curves."

"I'm way ahead of you," Hastings answered. "Give me the money and the power and the women will take care of themselves."

"Very true." The Devil nodded and exhaled softly, so that a faint reek of sulphur filled the room. He extended a claw and pulled a parchment out of the air, then extended his tail and proffered the point wrapped around a fountain pen. "Here, we are," he murmured. "Think I remembered to fill this pen before I left—nice, fresh blood, everything legal—so if you'll just sign here, we'll have our contract."

"Uh-uh." Paul Hastings shook his head.

"What's the matter? You aren't—what is the current phrase?—chicken, are you?" The Devil pouted a bit and struck his cloven hoof against the floorboards.

"No. But the point is, I have no intention whatsoever of selling you my soul."

THE cloven hoof stamped sharply, and the ancient boards gave off a shower of dust and sparks. "Then why, might I ask, did you summon me in the first place?"

"Well, it's like this," Hastings explained. "I moved in here about two weeks ago. Came to New Orleans expecting to get a job—I'm a public-relations man, you know—"

"Press agent!" snapped the Devil. "Don't tell me, we get plenty of your kind where I come from."

"All right, press agent," Hastings agreed. "But I'm not the kind you'd get. That's probably my trouble. I was, and am, an honest one. And my job fell through. Moved out of the hotel to this attic in the French Quarter and spent the days pounding the pavements looking for a job."

"Get on with it," urged the Devil. "I want to go out for some fresh air—stuffy as hell in here."

"Well, to make it simple, I couldn't find any job. But I did find something else, right here in this room."

"What?"

"These books, under the bed," Hastings produced a handful of tattered, battered old volumes. "Latin, you can see. Turned out to be textbooks of demonology—old books on sorcery, with spells and incantations. Must have belonged to whoever lived here years ago. I asked the landlady and she didn't know; thinks she remembers an old man who owned the house once in the days before the war—he was interested in Voodoo or some such thing—and when they took him away to the asylum and turned this place into a rooming-house he must have left his books behind."

"I know who you're speaking of," muttered the Devil. "The man's name was Red—lied Grimoire, I think, a Frenchman. He's boarding with me, now."

"So I read the books," Hastings continued, "and decided to try out some of the spells. Naturally, I decided to try and call you up."

"Which you did. And quite a lot of trouble you went to," commented the Devil, glancing around the tiny room. "All this blue chalk, and chicken-blood, and candles in pentagrams, and the rest of the mess—but why did you go to such bother when you had no intention of selling your soul to me?"

"Because I still had hopes we might do business."

"How?"

"Well, don't you buy anything except souls? Services, perhaps?"

"What service could you possibly offer me?" asked the Devil.

"Oh, I don't know. Seems to me as if Hell could use some good public relations. I mean, human beings don't seem to think too kindly of the place, or of yourself either, if you'll pardon my frankness."

"You'd make Hell popular?" jeered the Devil.

"I'm not saying what I'll do. But I still want money without selling my soul for it, and I wondered if there wasn't something a human being might do for you which you couldn't do yourself."

"Something a human being might do——"

THE Devil stared at Hastings until his face burned from the intensity of the gaze. Noting this, the Devil shifted his glance and stared at the wall until two holes began to char and smoke. Then, "I've got it!" he snapped.

"You have?"

"Yes, and so have you—a task, I mean! My dear chap, you were right in calling me. There is something very special you might do, as a straight business deal. Right in your line, too. I've had a pet project in mind for a long time, and I believe you can carry it out. It will mean money galore for you, and help me immeasurably."

"And I won't be selling my soul?"

"Of course not."

"Then I'll do it." Hastings held out his hands. "But cash in advance, please. Not that I don't trust you, but one hears so many rumors——"

"Competitors give me a bad name," sneered Satan. "But you'll have to wait a while. You see, I can't give you the money. I can only give you the chance to earn it."

"But I thought—"

"Don't believe all you hear. I have no power to produce gold out of nowhere, and besides we're off the gold standard. I can't make dollar bills because if I created too many it would disrupt our present economy—and I like our present economy the way it is; took a lot of trouble to build it up. And besides, if I counterfeited the money, it would be dishonest."

"You disappoint me," Hastings sighed. "Here I thought you were capable of just waving your hand or your—your tail, maybe—and there it was."

"Very few people make money waving either object," commented the Devil, dryly. "You see, they tell so many lies about me. For instance, there are stories about me appearing in all kinds of shapes and forms at will, but you see me as I really am. It isn't true that I can change into human appearance, for example. And that's why I need a human being for this job I suggest. The job that will make you fortune."

Hastings stood up. "Just what is it you want me to do?" he asked.

"Very simple," said the Devil. "I want you to kidnap an angel."

"Huh?"

"You heard me," repeated Satan, patiently. "Just kidnap an angel. Steal one from heaven, as it were."

"But—"

"I know what you're going to say, and it's all arranged. I have the means of getting you transported to heaven and back again. I have a plan for capturing an angel. There is nothing for you to worry about. As tie vulgar expression has it, the job is all cased." Satan smiled. "You see, I've had this plan in mind for centuries, but there was nobody to carry it out. Naturally, a fiend can't get into heaven, and most men—in spite of the fact that they're always talking about the joys of heaven—seem strangely reluctant, to go there. But I've wanted an angel for ages, and you're the chap to bring one back for me."

"LET me get this straight," Hastings sighed. "You want me to kidnap an angel and bring it down to Hell?"

"No, not to Hell. To earth. The angel will live on earth. That's the whole point of the scheme."

"What scheme?"

"The one that makes your fortune."

"Aren't you going to let me in on the details?"

The Devil shook his horns. "I shall assuredly do so—the very moment that you and the angel return. It is all arranged and perfectly safe."

"I don'; know."

"It's a billion-dollar proposition," said the Devil. "Guilt-edged." Again the tail waved the fountain-pen. "Here's the contract. Look it over, and sign at the bottom."

Paul Hastings took the contract. Words appeared on the parchment as he read. Yes, it sounded perfectly legal. He was to kidnap the angel and in return was guaranteed a fortune not to exceed one billion dollars, by means to be explained. No soul was to be sold. Whereas, hereinafter, aforesaid, and etcetera.

"Looks OK to me," he commented.

"Then sign. Be careful with that pen, though. It leaks at times. Wouldn't want you to get corpuscles all over the table." The Devil watched considerately as Paul Hastings affixed his name to the document. Then Satan in turn wrote his signature.

“Fine,” he said, folding up the parchment. “I’ll just file this away in Limbo for safekeeping.” A whisk, and the contract disappeared.

“All right, what next?” asked the young man.

“Meet me at midnight tomorrow night at the amusement park out at Lake Pontchartrain,” said the Devil.

“What for?”

“Go to heaven!” said the Devil. “And please don’t ask so many questions. Er—I suggest that you air the room out after I leave. It’s quite stuffy.”

The Devil disappeared in a puff of smoke. Paul Hastings, coughing, ran to the window and opened it wide. He hung his head over the sill and gulped down air. Then he shook his head.

“So I’m going to heaven tomorrow night. Isn’t that a hell of a deal?”

LAKE Pontchartrain glittered beneath a February moon as Paul Hastings—his battered coupe wheezing away its last gallon of gas (regular, of course: he hadn’t been able to afford Ethyl for months) rattled towards the amusement park. The gleaming white skeleton of a huge prehistoric monster loomed ahead—and with a shock, Hastings recognized it as the outline of a roller coaster.

He parked the car almost directly beneath it, and the little auto made a lonely black dot on the empty road. He shivered as he crunched down the gravel pathway, eyes alert for his partner in crime.

“Hello there!” came a voice. “Here I am! No—look up!”

Sure enough, the Devil was sitting on top of the roller coaster, waving his tail in a friendly greeting.

“What are you doing up there?”

Paul called.

“Waiting for you, of course. Climb up—don’t be afraid.”

Now there was certainly no reason for Paul Hastings to be afraid of climbing up the sides of a rickety roller coaster at midnight in order to keep a rendezvous with the Devil. So up he went, clambering shakily but steadily, until he reached the top. From that vantage point he could see the lights of New Orleans, the Navy landing and training field, the airport, and the peculiar incandescent luminence of the Devil's eyes.

The Devil was sitting in the front car of one of the roller-coaster vehicles. He helped Hastings to climb in beside him.

"Hope you like it," he said.

"Like what?"

"This. It's your plane, of course." The Devil indicated the car in which they sat.

"I'm going to heaven in this?"

"Certainly. You expected to fly, didn't you? I mean, it's millions of miles high, you know."

"I know," sighed Paul Hastings. "And I don't like your altitude. However —"

"However, you signed a paper," the Devil continued, for him. "And it's time to go."

"But how can I fly in this flimsy car?"

"It's not a flimsy car. It's a plane besides which your current developments in jet-propulsion appear infantile; its simplicity of design and function are such that you need do nothing but act in the capacity of a passenger."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning it's fueled, there's an automatic pilot to guide you to heaven and back, an automatic timing device to function during your stay; the course is accurately charted and all you reed to do now is wave goodbye."

"I still claim it's a lousy rollercoaster car," said Paul Hastings. "And I wouldn't go over the tracks in it, let alone to heaven and back." His companion stepped out of the car.

"What do you say to this?" asked the Devil. "And this? Also this—and this and, at the risk of becoming boringly repetitious—this?"

HE punctuated his remarks by deft movements of hands and tail; reaching under the car and elongating it abruptly, smoothing it over until the surface assumed a silvery sheen, pulling at the sides until wings were extended, fumbling with the interior and drawing out an instrument panel, waving across the seat and enclosing it in a glass bubble.

Hastings now sat in a streamlined silver cylinder, a winged projectile that looked like something designed by Hannes Bok. The bubble over his head served both to insulate and isolate him; he had to raise his voice to make himself heard.

“Why didn’t you show me this in the first place?” he shouted. The Devil balanced his cloven hoof delicately on the roller-coaster track and shrugged discreetly.

“Somebody might have driven by and seen it,” he said. “As it is, you’re going to leave in a moment—just as soon as you pull the left-hand switch.”

Paul Hastings surveyed the instrument panel. “Looks complicated,” he yelled. “How about some instructions? And what do I do to capture an angel?”

“It’s all planned for you,” the Devil answered. “Now just listen to me and you’re on your way.” The young mar listened. From time to time he nodded—from time to time his head fairly spun—but in a few moments he comprehended the Devil’s plan.

“You’ll find the bottle inside the glove compartment,” Satan concluded. “Now, it’s time to go. Follow instructions and you ought to be back here, safe and sound, within the hour.”

“I still don’t understand why you’re so confident,” Hastings sighed. “That angle on the angel—” For answer, the Devil closed the plastic bubble over the young man’s head and zipped the insulation tight around the interstices. “No more questions,” He said. “Time to go. By the way, don’t worry if there’s a lack of scenery on the trip. You’ll be travelling much faster than the speed of light and you’ll see nothing except yourself and the vehicle.

But there’s not much worth seeing between here and heaven, anyway.”

“Sour grapes,” muttered Hastings, to himself. Actually, he was badly frightened. The prospect of his journey was far from intriguing—he had no intention, originally, of going to heaven in anything except a nice, comfortable coffin; and that would be in the distant future. But now—

“Off you go!” snapped the Devil. “Pull the lever.”

Hastings pulled the lever and closed his eyes. When he opened them again, he was alone.

Alone.

IT’S a funny word, doesn’t mean much to anyone, and didn’t to Hastings. Alone is when there’s nobody home and you turn on the radio. Alone is when you’re sitting at the end of the bar, nursing a drink and wishing you were drinking with a nurse. Alone is looking out of the window on a rainy day and waiting for the telephone to ring, only it’s disconnected. Alone is a lot of things.

At least, Paul Hastings had always believed that. But now he found out that alone is—nothing.

That’s what he saw when he opened his eyes—nothing. He sat inside the plane, looked out through the sides and top of the plastic bubble, and saw—nothing.

No earth. No moon. No sun. No stars. No clouds. No air. No color. It was like gazing into a transparent sheet of glass that was also opaque—an endless sheet, without sides, or top, or bottom; a sheet of glass that caught neither reflection nor absence of light. It was like looking into emptiness; an experience probably known to brain surgeons when they open a politician’s skull.

Hastings didn’t like it. He closed his eyes and waited for it—or the absence of it—to go away. After a moment, he raised his eyelids again.

Nothing, and more of it. Pressing around the bubble, pressing around the walls of the ship as it soared or seared or shredded dimensions in its flight upwards. Only there was no upwards. Paul Hastings was all alone.

He felt too motion, heard no sound. There was only the psychic pressure from outside, the surge of imponderable emptiness.

He felt that unless he thought about something quickly he would go mad; the emptiness would be absorbed into his brain. He tried to think about the Devil and about heaven and about catching an angel, but that seemed madness, too.

So he thought about himself.

Paul Hastings, all alone in outer space, thinking about himself. About the foolish, honest kid who got out of service and decided to use his college training and natural savvy to get into public relations work. About the two years and more of fruitless effort, culminating in this trip to New Orleans and ending up in the garret.

TWO years ago—two months ago—perhaps even two weeks ago—he would never have thought of calling up the Devil. He had been so honest, so naive. He'd tried so hard to get a job, any job. But the South was a funny place. Everything was "family" and "connections" and "contacts." You had to know somebody who knew somebody who knew somebody who knew Jefferson Davis.

Oh, once in a while, there had been minor assignments; temporary jobs working for some established publicity man during the peak of a campaign. But it had never lasted. And inevitably a crisis would come up when it was necessary to soft-pedal a story, or misrepresent certain facts, or tone down an angle for a client. And Paul Hastings of two years, two months, two weeks ago—fool that he was—would never tell a lie. Not even for a client, not even for business, not even for a buck, no: even for a very fast buck.

That, Hastings now realized, is why he had ended up in that garret on Bourbon Street. Fourth floor rear, high above the nightly noises from LaFitte's, Dan's International, Prima's and the other pleasure-palaces. Ten dollars a week in advance to Madam Adam, who ran the place, for the privilege of sitting there and rotting in his honest way.

And that, Hastings also realized, is why he called up the Devil. Perhaps the Mardi Gras was the last straw. The gay carnival had just begun, and four flights down Paul could see the revellers, night after night, laughing and dancing and drinking and spending money; a myriad masked figures. Masked, mysterious, but merry. Nobody could tell rich from poor, honest from dishonest. They all wore masks.

Nobody could tell the true from the false, and nobody cared. So Paul had made up his mind, cast up his spoils, called up his Devil, signed up his bargain.

Isolated, eyes elated, Paul thought it all through. Truth and falsehood were relative after all. Two days ago he hadn't believed in the Devil, but now he'd met him. Two days ago he hadn't even been too sure about the existence of heaven as a geographical location—but he was going there.

Come to think of it, according to infernal calculations, he should be arriving shortly. Hastings decided to take a chance and open his eyes once more.

He remembered that his speed exceeded the velocity of light—and it was this factor which would enable his craft to soar over the gates of heaven without being detected. The Devil had told him of the automatic slow-down which would occur once the vessel came into contact with the atmosphere and the cloudbanks of the celestial realm. The Devil had sneered about that in a fine fashion.

"Heaven is vastly overrated," he had said. "Clouds everywhere. More smog than Los Angeles. As a matter of fact, heaven isn't very much better than Los Angeles—and some Los Angeles folks have told me it's worse. All they have is a strong Chamber of Commerce up there. So don't be disappointed when you arrive. Look for the clouds."

PAUL Hastings looked for the clouds. And suddenly, he saw them. Simultaneously he became aware of motion. "It's because the plane is slowing down," he told himself. His voice sounded hollow as it reverberated against the sides of the bubble. But most of his attention was focussed through his eyes rather than his ears.

He gazed out at endless acres of clouds; white, fleecy clouds made out of lamb’s wool, baby bunting, Christmas tree cotton. They were plump bulgy clouds, cuddling up against a blue sky in the best tradition of greeting card artists’ handiwork; in a word, heavenly clouds. As a matter of fact, Hastings almost caught a glinting glimpse of golden walls in the distance—almost, but not quite. The clouds intervened, sailing serenely by through celestial space.

Hastings felt the plane easing in, floating down. It was heading, almost as if by volition, towards a small fragment of cloud that had just become detached from a larger mass; a little isolated island.

The logic of a heavy plane landing on a cloud didn’t bother Paul Hastings very much. There was nothing at all logical about the plane itself, or his mission. He knew the plane would land and that was enough.

Now he had to think about the immediate future. How do you catch an angel?—that was the major problem.

How do you catch an angel? Sprinkle salt on its tail? Use a butterfly net? Lasso it by the halo? Take a saxophone under one arm and pretend you’re Gabriel?

Hastings didn’t know.

“Open the glove compartment,” the Devil had said. “And take out the bottle.”

As the plane settled down on the cloud-bank, the young man opened the glove compartment and took out the bottle. It was a small bottle bearing a plain label.

“Then press the third button on the panel.” The Devil’s instructions, again. Hastings decided to obey. He pressed the button.

There was a crackling and a sputtering and a thin, eery whine as of women bawling out their husbands for coming into the house without wiping their feet.

“Hastings!”

The voice cut through the whining with a sudden clarity, and Hastings jumped.

“Don’t be frightened, my dear chap,” the voice reassured him. “This is just the Devil. Sorry I’ve only one-way deception set up, so you can’t talk back to me. But listen now for the rest of your orders.”

Hastings nodded to nobody in particular and bent an ear over the instrument panel.

“Press the fifth button to open the side of the plane,” the Devil instructed him. “Step out on the cloud. It’s a little damp, but you won’t catch cold. They tell me the air of heaven is filled with antihistamine.

“Walk across the cloud until you come to an angel. Then go into your story. If you’re as persuasive and convincing as I have reason to believe, you can lure it back to the plane. Then use the bottle and you’ll be ready to take off on the up-lever. Better get started now—you have, according to my chronology, seven minutes.”

THE voice blended into the crackling and the crackling blended into silence. Paul Hastings blinked, shook his head, squared his shoulders, took a deep breath, and—unable to think of any other way of stalling—pressed the fifth button.

The side of the plane opened. A step automatically dropped from the base of the door to the topmost layer of cloud Paul stepped out and landed up to his ankles in slush.

So this was heaven!

Slush. Nothing but slush. Hastings moved his feet, lifting them up and down. It was hard going. If you’ve ever walked on a cloud, you’ll understand.

Hastings never had, and he didn’t particularly like it. The precious seconds were fleeting by and still he was slogging along. Snowbanks of cloud loomed all around him; it seemed funny that he couldn’t see his breath. Icebergs and glaciers floated off in the blue distance, and his little island of cloud drifted away from them. Everything was steeped in snowy silence, everything—

Then he heard it and his feet found wings.

It was music, heavenly music. How often he'd heard the phrase, heard it applied to everything from brassy dance-bands to broken-down accordion players. But this was the first time he'd ever heard the reality, and it was heavenly.

Little ripples of pure sound that entered the ears, caressed them, and then slid slowly down the spine, melted against his heart. A tune that was soft as a mother's tears, carefree as a child's laugh, buoyant as the breeze on which it was borne.

Hearing it, he could walk in ease and grace. Hearing it, he could no more restrain his pace than his very pulse-beat. Paul Hastings rounded the corner of the cloud and came upon the angel.

The angel, of course, was playing a harp; a small, simple instrument in the Grecian tradition. And the music, close at hand, was even more exquisite.

But somehow, Hastings lost all interest in the music when he beheld the musician.

For the angel was a girl.

To say that she was a blonde is an understatement. To say that her eyes were blue is an insult. To say that her skin was cream-white is absurd. Hastings could see all that for himself, and his own eyes told him that her hair was more golden than the halo above it, her eyes bluer than the sky of heaven, her skin whiter than the angel-wings which sprouted from her back. She was, in a word, a series of cliches incarnate; the most beautiful cliche ever known.

HE surveyed her carefully, and despite her overpowering beauty he was able to make a critical observation. He noted the sleeveless, almost diaphanous gown she wore, with its television neckline; it seemed finer than silk, more shimmering than nylon. He observed with interest the rakish tilt of the small halo which gave off a concentrated glow similar to that of a strong neon tube. He took cognizance of her large and powerful wings; silver-feathered pinions which sprouted from the shoulder-blades. These were surely not the token wings usually seen on the angels in the story books—one look convinced him that they were meant for flying and were capable of carrying her weight for great distances.

And yet halo and wings did not detract from her beauty, did not even seem incongruous. They belonged, they were a part of her angelic being, and therefore natural.

But there were one or two features which shocked him. To begin with, the angel's feet were bare—and her nails were not painted! Her fingernails weren't painted, either, and—horror of horrors—the wave in her golden hair seemed natural, as did the coloring! Strangest of all, she wore neither rouge nor lipstick, and there wasn't a trace of eye-shadow or eyebrow pencil!

In all his life Paul Hastings, like millions of other men, had never once seen a beautiful girl who wore no makeup. That was the clincher. Wings may be faked, haloes might be contrived, but beauty without make-up was surely impossible to feign. Without doubt, here was proof positive that this girl was a real angel.

He stood there, staring at her silently, and she sat there strumming the harp. Gradually the music increased its potency and appeal; hearing it, Hastings almost forgot his mission. The soaring sweetness invaded his being, absorbed it, so that he seemed to become a part of a vast serenity, a pulsating peace.

Paul Hastings shook his head, shook off the spell. He stepped forward, uttering one of those polite little coughs.

The hands stopped moving, the harp tilted back into the silken folds of the lap, and the music ceased. The angel looked up at him with wide eyes, and then opened her mouth.

Her voice was fresh music, a fresh spell.

"Oh! I didn't know anyone was here. I'm sorry if my music disturbed you."

"It didn't," Hastings said. "I liked it."

"I was just practicing," the angel explained. "I really can't play very well yet—you see, I'm new here. So I like to fly over to one of these outlying clouds, where I can be alone, and rehearse a bit."

She glanced at Hastings curiously. "But you must be new here, too. Why, you don't even have your wings yet!"

"I'm not an Engel," Hastings told her.

"You're not? Then what are you doing up here?"

"I get around. As a matter of fact, my dear Miss—"

THE angel roted his hesitation and giggled. "Miss? We have no titles here, you know. You may call me Angela."

"All right, Angela. My name's Paul Hastings, and I happen to be a traveling salesman."

"A traveling salesman in heaven? My, you fellows certainly seem to get around."

"That's progress." Hastings stepped closer, marvelling at her credulity. But, he remembered, all angels are innocent.

"Came in a plane," he explained. "We've got a lot of new developments since you left. Radar, jet-propulsion, atomic bombs. We're really civilized."

"I've often wondered what the world was like these days," the angel sighed. "You see, I left in such a hurry—"

"When was this?"

"We don't talk about such things up here," reproved the angel, gently. "We put aside all worldly memories. And I still don't quite understand why a human being, even a traveling salesman, would venture here."

"Business," Hastings assured her. "Always opening up new territories. And I felt that heaven would be just the place for me. Because of what I'm selling."

He reached over and picked up the harp from her lap. “Take this article, for instance,” he said. “Mighty pretty little thing. Brand new, you said?”

“Almost,” said the angel.

“Sparkles beautifully.” Hastings held it up and inspected it. “But wait a while. Wait until the damp air gets in its world. Pretty soon the finish will begin to tarnish. And that’s where I come in.”

“What are you selling?” asked the angel.

“Metal polish!” Hastings proclaimed. “The finest metal polish in the world—in the universe, for that matter. Guaranteed to preserve the sheen and lustre of gold, silver, any precious metal. Ideal for harps, perfect for haloes. Cherubim cry for it!”

“But nothing ever changes here,” protested Angela. “I’ve seen the heavenly choir, and their instruments are always bright.”

Hastings considered the statement for a moment. Then he shrugged. “I can see you’re new here,” he told her. “Otherwise you’d realize that I’m not the first traveling salesman to reach heaven. Why, I’ll bet that my company has sold more metal polish up here than anywhere else. No wonder the older angels keep everything bright and shiny! They all use my polish.”

“I don’t know. It sounds all right, but—”

“Why not take advantage of my free demonstration? Here, step right over to my plane and let me show you a bottle. No charge or obligation.”

“Well—”

“Come on!” Paul Hastings reached down and took the angel’s hand. An electric tingling ran up his arm and rang a buzzer in his heart.

SHE rose to her dainty feet, then continued to rise. The great wings spread automatically, and she flapped them slowly, floating forward through the cloud mass. Hastings stumbled along behind her.

In a moment they reached the plane. And here, for one moment, Paul Hastings faced disaster.

It had been the Devil's plan, of course, to have Hastings pose as a salesman of metal polish. He was to lure an angel to the plane, show it the bottle, and entice it inside the bubble. Then Hastings was to slam the door, press the lever, and whizz away. A simple plan—diabolically simple, in fact—and it looked as though it might work. Except for one simple little error.

The angel's wings would never fit inside the bubble!

Hastings surveyed the cramped, transparent compartment, then noted that majestic span of angelic pinfeathers.

"Two minutes left," he reminded himself. But what to do?

"Come over and take a look at the plane," he invited. "I'll get the bottle—it's right inside."

Trustingly, the angel permitted him to take her hand and lead her over to the silver cylinder. She gazed at it in pleased wonder.

"Beautiful!" she said. "And to think you could fly all the way up here in this machine."

Paul Hastings walked towards the door and entered the cabin, sliding into position under the domed roof. "Notice how it shines," he told her. "That's our polish, of course." Angela ran her hand appreciatively along the silver sides.

"My, it's so light," she marvelled. "I can't see how such a delicate machine could come so far."

"Not delicate at all," Hastings assured. "Here, you can prove it. Just hop up and sit on it. You'll see how easily it bears your weight."

Obediently, without question, Angela flapped her wings and rose in midair. She landed delicately on the top of the plane, right behind the bubble, and settled herself in place with a pleased smile.

Hastings glanced at her through the transparent dome. She was sitting on the plane, all right. And now, he had only to close the door, adjust the automatic insulation, and use the up-lever. Travelling at far greater than the speed of light, the angel would never be able to leave her perch until they reached earth. And it couldn't harm her—you can't, as the Devil had reminded him, kill an angel!

He glanced back at Angela, and for a momemt his heart failed him. She was beautiful, innocent, trusting. The thought of her shining radiance disturbed him.

He closed his eyes and another vision of shining radiance came to him—the shining radiance of gold, of silver coins heaped up in stacks and rows. It was a hellish vision, and it drove ill thoughts of heaven from his mind.

Still—this was wrong, he mustn't do it—he mustn't.

AT that moment a crackling emerged from the instrument panel and a voice emerged from the crackling.

"What are you waiting for?" grated the voice. "Pull the switch!"

Paul Hastings pulled the switch.

There was a drone, a blur, a moan, a whirr, and then he was back in nothingness. But this time he was not alone.

Glancing back, he saw Angela, still visibly perched on the plane; hair flying, wings flapping, harp dangling wildly from a golden cord looped around her neck. Angela, teetering madly on infinity's brink, her halo askew, her mouth agape. Angela, her fane transfixed not by fear but by complete incomprehension.

She couldn't fall, and she didn't. She couldn't speak, and if she could, Hastings would not have been able to hear her. As a part of the moving mechanism that droned through the dimensions and sundered space, she was still visible. But that was all. And the vision of her helplessness again tore at Hastings' heartstrings, until he turned away and examined the instrument panel.

Kidnapping an angel, eh? Well, he was doing it. And he'd get his reward. But why must he feel so guilty?

After all, he wasn't really harming Angela. Matter of fact, this little trip would probably do her some good. Get her out of a rut. Otherwise she'd be sitting around in heaven for an eternity, with nothing to do but strum her harp.

She was much too pretty to spend the rest of her afterlife as a nonunion musician. A girl her age needed a little fun, a little excitement. Once on earth, Angela could get rid of her white nightgown and step into some modern clothes. And she'd never run the risk of catching cold by sitting on a damp cloud all day.

Yes, Hastings was doing her a favor. He closed his eyes and waited for the vessel to hit the gaseous orbit of exhaust fumes, cigarette smoke, factory smog, sewer gas, profanity and atomic radiation which made up the aura surrounding earth.

SLOWLY the space-ship settled down over the world, over the continent, over the country, over the state of Louisiana, over New Orleans parish, over the amusement park, over the topmost track of the roller coaster.

It landed with scarcely a jar.

Hastings pressed the proper button and the side door opened. He stepped out on the track, gazing up at the sky. The moon had moved perhaps an hour's distance across the cloud-gaps, and the entire area around the park was quite deserted. This was a good thing, because there was no one to see him approach the winged figure which huddled up in the rear of the curious contraption.

"Where are we?" asked the angel, in a small voice. "What happened?"

"On earth," he answered. "Just outside New Orleans, to be exact. That's Lake Pontchartrain over there. And as to what happened—" He hesitated, and a lie formed in his mind. It was a small lie, and if not altogether white, it seemed to be only slightly gray.

"As to what happened," he repeated, "I guess I just pressed the wrong lever by accident. And we came back to earth."

"But this will never do!" wailed the angel. "I've got to return to heaven at once. They'll miss me, and there'll be the very devil to pay."

"The devil to pay," Hastings murmured. "That reminds me—" He glanced around, expecting to catch sight of the friendly fiend. But there was no one in sight. He turned back and regarded Angela.

She was a forlorn little figure, despite her imposing wings, and he felt curiously ashamed of himself. He couldn’t bear to tell her the real reason for her presence here—and now, as a matter of fact, he could scarcely bear the knowledge himself. If only he might take her back to heaven and forget about the whole thing—but he couldn’t.

“I’m sorry,” he murmured. “I can’t take you back. Not just yet, anyway. You see, there’s not enough fuel.”

“Oh.” She sighed. “But I shouldn’t burden you with my troubles. After all, it was an accident, as you say. It’s not your fault.”

Her smile was sweet, and it stabbed Paul Hastings to the quick—wherever that was Now, he knew, he could never tell her.

“But what are we doing up here?” asked Angela. “Isn’t this an amusement park?”

“Er—yes. Guess I made a slight miscalculation when we landed.”

“But why don’t we get down? I mean, you weren’t intending to spend the rest of the night here, were you?”

“Hardly.” Again Hastings glanced around, expecting to see the Devil materialize. But there was only the night and the silence, and the beautiful girl with the wings and the halo.

“Guess we might as well try climbing down,” he sighed—and wondered, as he said it, what would happen next. Here he was, just back from heaven and as far as he knew, the first mortal ever to make a two-way trip. The least he might expect was some kind of welcoming committee; if not a brass band, then a chorus of imps and demons. Instead, no Devil, nonothing. And what weald he do now with an angel on his hands?

COME to think of it, he had other problems to confront.

The simple one of climbing down from the roller coaster was enough to baffle him momentarily. But Angela solved that. Noting his indecision she rose and extended her hands.

"Grab hold," she invited. "We'll fly down."

And that is exactly what they did, coming in on her wing and his prayer, as he felt himself swoop down through empty air. But in a moment they landed on the ground and Hastings escorted her in the direction of his parked car.

"Climb in and sit down," he suggested. "I want to have a look at that rear left tire of mine. Got a hunch it's flat."

He breathed a sigh of relief as Angela disappeared inside the car. There was no one around but still, a chance night driver might happen by, and the sight of an angel would cause comment. Angels were scarce in this neck of the woods.

Hastings walked around behind the car lo take a look at the tire. Yes, it was a bit flat; no puncture, but it probably needed a good ten pounds more of pressure. He regarded it. thoughtfully for a moment.

"Wonder if we could make it into town all right?" he mused.

"Sure you can."

He whirled at the sound of the unexpected voice. There was no one behind him.

"Climb in," the voice continued, in a sort of rasping whine. "Let's get moving, brother."

Paul Hastings shook his head violently from side to side, then up and down. As his head went down he noticed the black, furry object crouching at his feet. It was a cat.

"It isn't polite to stare, brother," purred the cat.

"But you spoke to me!"

"There's maybe a law against speaking to you?" the cat asked, twirling its whiskers sarcastically. "No—I mean—it's just that—"

"Oh, I get it; your mother taught you not to speak to strangers. Well, let me introduce myself, brother. The name is Brimstone. And you're Paul Hastings."

"How on earth do you know that?"

"Not 'on earth'," the cat corrected. "In hell would be more accurate. Because I'm your familiar. The name is Brimstone."

"A talking cat, eh?"

"Not a talking cat. Your familiar. His Nibs sent me."

"I suspected as much. What happened to him? Why didn't he meet me here as agreed?"

"The Devil was called away unexpectedly," the black blasphemy explained. "It seems he had an urgent meeting with Joe Stalin."

"So?"

"So he sent me to keep you company, brother."

"Why must you call me 'brother' ?" demanded Hastings.

"Because that's what you are.

I'm your familiar, your brother in damnation."

"But I'm not damned. I didn't sell my soul!"

PAUL Hastings had never heard a cat laugh before. He heard it now, and didn't like it.

"Of course you didn't sell it," the cat chuckled. "But you damned yourself without knowing it by agreeing to steal an angel. Don't you know that's a terrible offense?"

"Never thought of it," Hastings answered.

"Well, you'll have a lot of time to think about it in the future. All eternity, in fact. How His Nibs roared when he told me about the fast deal he'd pulled! You, thinking you were so smart, taking such pains not to sell your soul—and then practically giving it away by agreeing to commit an unpardonable sin! Don't you know that you can't get the best of the Devil in a bargain?"

"Then I'm finished," Paul Hastings sighed, bitterly. "I'm cheated."

"Not at all," Brimstone said, flicking his long black tail in a gesture of deprecation. "You'll still get your money; a bargain's a bargain. And all you have to do is hang on to the angel here until the Big Boy returns tomorrow."

Hastings shivered, and it wasn't because of the night air.

"Come on," coaxed the cat. "Introduce me to the angel. I've never seen one, you know."

"And you're not going to, either!" the young man declared. "Why don't you go away?"

"Because I'm your brother, that's why—and I have orders to go wherever you go. As a matter of fact, the Big Wheel told me to watch you very carefully, just in case you changed your mind about delivering the angel."

"So you're a spy, eh?"

"Right," answered the cat. Hastings shivered again. The Devil had thought of everything; there would be no turning back for him now. Still, the thought of revealing his treachery to Angela was the worst part of it. He looked for some way out. He turned to the cat with a gesture of appeal and appeasement.

"All right. You have your orders, I suppose. But just do me one favor and we'll get along without any trouble."

"What's the deal?"

"When you're around the angel, pretend that you're just an ordinary cat. Don't talk."

"Suits me, brother." The cat waved its tail in assent. Then it squinted up at the roller coaster in the background. "Which reminds me," purred Brimstone. "I've got a little job to do, first."

"What's that?"

"Can't leave your plane sitting up on top there in sight of everyone, can we? The Big Noise gave me strict orders."

PAUL Hastings sighed. Somewhere in the back of his brain, a plot had been hatching—but now he knew he had merely laid another egg. He'd entertained a wild notion of escaping from the familiar demon, taking

Angela to the plane, and somehow discovering how it operated so that he could pilot her back :o heaven. But now, with the plane gone—

And it was gone.

Even as he watched, Brimstone turned and meowed up at the moon, then waved his tail in mystic cadence as he whis-purred.

“Retsaoc rellor otni nrut, enalp!” The plane became a roller coaster car once more. Arching his back significantly, Brimstone minced forward towards the door of the car.

Paul Hastings followed. He found Angela sitting patiently in the front seat, her wings folded.

“Sorry to be so long,” he apologized. “I had that tire to look at. And besides, I found a stray cat—”

“You did!” The angel smiled, glancing down at Brimstone. “Oh, isn’t it pretty—so black and soft—come on, kitty, jump up on my lap. Come on, there we are!”

As Hastings closed the door and started the car, Angela scooped Brimstone into her arms and snuggled him into her lap, petting and stroking the inkblot body. The young man looked, shuddered, but said nothing.

And thus it was that Paul Hastings returned to New Orleans, sitting next to a real live angel holding a real live demon on its lap.

TWO o’clock in the morning, on Bourbon Street, is the time when the amateurs leave and the regulars take over. The marks have goggled at their last floor show; the savages have departed in the taxicabs for attractions in other fields; the tourists have left the bars and hit the mattresses of the Roosevelt, the Jung, the St. Charles or the Monteleone.

And that’s when the fun begins. That’s when the boys in the band drift across the street and sit in with the rival combo to really beat it out until dawn. That’s when the spielers leave the doorways of the night spots and go inside to have a drink with the strippers at the bar. That’s when the artists and the Vieux Carre regulars drift into their private patios or the little isolated night spots deep in the heart of the Quarter where aching tourist feet seldom dare to tread. That's when the drinks and the talk gets bigger at LaFitte's.

Tonight, with the Mardi Gras in full swing, it was the same only more so. The Crewes were out in strength, and paraders and spectators alike now met and mingled in masked mirth. Everyone was drunk—drunk on liquor, drunk on dollars, drunk on excitement, drunk on the sheer drama of the carnival.

Canal Street, on the west border of the Vieux Carre, was deserted as Paul Hastings steered his way through the tangle of confetti, empty pint bottles and full owners of same who still wandered forlornly through the ruins.

Angela peered out of the window. "What's been happening here?" she gasped. "War?"

"Carnival," Hastings explained, shortly. "It's like this every year, they tell me. I wouldn't know. Oh, now what's happened?"

The last remark was addressed not to the angel but to the engine of the car. It wheezed, sputtered, and then seemed to obey some mysterious cease and desist order.

The car swayed to a halt at the entrance to Bourbon Street.

"Out of gas!" the young man sighed. "Come on, we'll have to walk. It's only about six blocks down, more or less."

He opened the car door, then hesitated. For the first time he realized what he was doing. He was coming into one of America's largest cities with a live angel in tow—a live angel, with big wings.

"Wait a minute," he called to Angela. "I—I just want to check that rear tire again." He shot a significant glance at the cat, and Brimstone caught it. Tipping him a wink, the fiendish feline bounded from Angela's lap and sauntered around in back of the car with him.

"A fine mess!" Hastings commented. "Now what do I do? I can't walk an angel down Bourbon Street."

"Why not?" whispered Brimstone. "There's maybe a law against angels?"

“It isn’t that,” Hastings sighed. “It’s just—oh, how can I explain it? If it happened to be the Devil, now, I wouldn’t hesitate for a moment. He’d feel right at home on dear old Bourbon. All I’d have to worry about is that somebody wouldn’t take advantage of his innocence.”

“What are you worrying about?” sniffed the cat. “Take a look at what gives.” He pointed his tail in the direction of the narrow entrance to Bourbon Street.

WHAT gave was simple. Teetering along the edge of the sidewalk and emerging upon the broad expanse of Canal Street was an African Zulu in full war dress, ostrich-plumes waving. The Zulu brandished a knobkerry in one hand and an assegai in the other. Supporting him on either side in his drunken progress was, reading from left to right, a ghost and a crocodile.

“Mardi Gras, stupid!” purred Brimstone. “Everybody’s in costume. They’ll think she’s wearing a costume, too.

Hastings smiled and nodded. “Come on, then. Once we get to my room, our troubles are over.”

He walked around the car and helped Angela out and across the curb. The cat trailed primly behind.

“Hope you aren’t freezing,” Hastings remarked. “It’s pretty chilly tonight.”

“I’m warm enough, thank you,” said Angela. Then, “Who are those strange-looking people?”

“Mardi Gras masqueraders. Remember, you’re supposed to be one, too. It wouldn’t do for them to know that you’re a real angel.”

“I understand.” Angela squeezed his arm. “You’re so clever, Paul—the way you think of everything.” Paul Hastings smiled, and the cat gave him an unlaundered look.

The crocodile, the ghost and the Zulu gave them scarcely a glance as they passed by and started to walk down Bouroon on the north side of the street. The first block, flanked by the sides of Canal Street stores, was deserted—but up ahead the neon lights blazed fiercely and the mingled shrieking of voices and clarinets rose of what Bourbon Street uses instead of the air.

Angela stared straight ahead and took in a deep breath, compounded equally of bar whiskey fumes, odeur de oyster-shell, perfume, perspiration, and fresh garbage—which gives the French Quarter what the Chamber of Commerce likes to describe as a "quaint old world atmosphere."

"Oh!" she sighed. "I'm so excited! You know, it may be sinful of me to even think of such things, but I'm really almost glad you made a mistake and brought me back to earth again. I've missed so much—for instance, I've never been in a place like this before. As a matter of fact, I've never even stayed up so late! I don't know what's going to happen because I've come down here, but even if I'm punished, it's worth it. Thank you, Paul, for taking care of me like this."

AGAIN the young man smiled and the cat returned a soiled grimace—but this time there was pain beneath Hastings' grin. To think that she trusted him; thanked him for taking her to a Bourbon Street garret in the company of a fiend, in order that he could sell her out to the Devil!

"But what else can you do?" he asked himself, despairingly. "You can't get her back to heaven. You can't run away with her on earth because Brimstone will follow you. And you can't go away yourself and leave her at the mercy of the Devil—or the local citizens here, who might be worse. No, you'll just have to go through with it. And as long as she's having a good time, you might as well see that she enjoys herself for as long as possible. Eat, drink and be merry, for tomorrow—"

"Nobody dies," whispered the cat, finishing the thought for him. "Not if they obey orders."

"Who said that?" asked Angela.

"I didn't hear anything," Hastings lied. He quaked inwardly, and his heart made seismographic vibrations, as he suddenly realized that the infernal cat could, and did, read his mind. From now on even his thoughts were known to the Devil. So how could he possibly escape?

They crossed the street, jaywalking over to the southeast corner and continued on down. Now they were passing the garish doorways of bars and dives, dens and dumps, eateries and cheateries. A milling throng was milling and thronging, moving in a frantic orbit between to and fro. A clown rushed hither, two laughing, bottle-spinning senoritas ran thither, and a party of men and women in formal evening attire were going yon. There was screaming and shouting, and much tossing of confetti and lunch. Serpentine streamers rained down from the second-story balcony of a private residence, and from either side, bands blared through saloon doorways.

Nobody paid any attention to the young man, the black cat, and the girl in the realistic angel costume.

“She’d be safe here if we could only escape,” Hastings told himself. Then, “Damn! I must be careful what I think or Brimstone will be angry.”

He glanced down at the cat, but the familiar padded along serenely as though it hadn’t caught his thought.

Then Hastings realized a curious phenomenon—the cat couldn’t read his mind as long as there were noises around to distract his attention!

“That’s something to remember,” he told himself. “If the chance ever comes—”

They kept walking, jostling their way through the crowds, exchanging grins and winks at masked revellers, listening to snatches of music and song, shouts and laughter. People were blowing horns, beating on drums, reeling along and singing their praise of Momus, Comus and the other ancient lords of Saturnalia.

Hastings was alarmed, but Angela seemed enchanted. She drank in the raucous shouts as if they formed a melody; she beamed on the inebriate horde as though they were her dearest and oldest friends. Moochers, panhandlers, grifters, steerers, and just plain bums and crooks got the same admiring stare as did the swanky celebrants from uptown. She loved every bit of it because it was life and she was now a part of it. From time to time her wings fluttered in appreciation.

They called to her in passing. “Hi, beautiful!” and “Hello, angel!” and “When did you leave heaven?” They blew horns in her ear and poked, at her with canes, and tossed confetti.

But no one questioned her person or her presence here, and Hastings heaved a sigh of relief as they approached the doorway of Madam Adam’s establishment, the Blue Pig.

“Thank goodness our troubles are over!” he exulted. But the black cat merely smiled.

THINGS were warming up inside the Blue Pig. They always did around this time of night, and on this particular evening the atmosphere was. particularly torrid. The various permanent guests who occupied apartments, suites, rooms, cubicles or just plain holes in the wall upstairs lad all drifted down into the enclosed patio on the first floor, with its small bar presided over by the genial landlady, Madam Adam herself, in the flesh.

Madam Adam certainly had an abundance of flesh to be in. A short crop of dyed red hair surmounted a long, genuinely red face. The face, in turn, rested on two hundred and fifty pounds of foundation, enclosed in a foundation garment. To say that the little Frenchwoman was fat is superfluous—and superfluous fat is hardly a proper description of her imposing bulk.

Madam Adair was more than two hundred and fifty pounds of flesh; she was two hundred and fifty pounds of movement, of quivering, of mirth, of agitation, of excitement. She bounced through life like a big red rubber ball.

Right now she was laughing and beaming fondly on her “guests”. All of the regulars were present, and some of them had been present for six or seven hours; many of them glued to the bar stools and many of them just plastered.

Most of them were in costume, and they hardly bothered to look up as Paul Hastings entered the little patio bar flanked by an angel and a black cat.

Only Madam Adam took note of the new arrivals. She hadn't paid much attention to her latest boarder, principally because he, in turn, hadn't paid much rent—but tonight, what with the Mardi Gras spirit and the brandy, she felt cordial in every sense of the word.

"Alors!" she greeted the young man. "Is the habitant of the garret, I comprehend? And with such charming companionship! Permit me to perform the honors of the house. Come, have to partake of a drink upon me."

Hastings, who was doing his best to head for the back stairs without attracting attention, tried to pull Angela along. But Madam Adam waddled out from behind the bar and wagged her finger at him—together with other portions of her anatomy.

"Please! I insist! Mount upon a stool and construct yourself at home. I am about to confuse up a drink."

"Stuck!" Hastings groaned, under his breath. He smiled at his landlady and beckoned Angela to a bar stool. She sat down willingly enough, and the cat jumped up into her lap. Madam Adam, true to her word, took an enormous shaker and poured the contents of several half-empty bottles into its capacious maw. Then she shook it violently. Grabbing three glasses at random she filled them from the shaker and then beamed on her young friends.

"Here is dirt in your eye!" she cried. "A bas le hatch!" Seeing Angela's puzzled look she added, "Make your bottom up!"

HASTINGS took a swig, and a mixture of brandy, cognac and vodka exploded Bikini-fashion in his stomach. Angela sipped her drink sedately.

"My, it's strong, isn't it?" she said. "I'm so used to drinking nothing but ambrosia or nectar."

"Who necked her?" demanded a raucous voice. A fat little figure in a pirate's costume came up to the bar, followed by a masked clown and a lady who wore a kimono which may or may not have been a costume.

"My dear sir—" Hastings began, but the fat man wasn't having any of that.

"Don't be so formal," he boomed. "It's Mardi Gras, we're all friends here, right? I got that jewelry store over on Royal—seen you pass the place a dozen times. The name is Onyx John."

His friend, the masked clown, put his hand on Angela's arm.

"This heah's a rare pleasuh," he said. "Ah do declah, such a ohahmin' lil ole gal! Permit me to intraduce mah self. Dixon's the name—Mason Dixon."

"I know your line," observed Hastings, bitterly. "But please don't rush the young lady—she's a stranger in town."

"That calls for a drink," Mason Dixon told tnem. "Madam Adam, mix up ancthah round of mint juleps or whatevah mah lil ole friends been havin' here."

"I'm not your lil ole friend," Hastings said. "And I wish you'd go away."

Instead, Mason Dixon and the fat jeweler, Onyx John, sat down on bar stools and regarded Angela with the rapt fascination of wolves running after a Siberian sleigh.

"This drink is making me woozy," Angela giggled. To his horror, Hastings noted that it was doing just that. Even as he watched, Angela's halo tilted forward about an inch and wobbled tipsily over her head. It was beginning to give off a noticeable glow.

"What's that lil ole thingamajig?" demanded Mason Dixon. "Look, it's shining."

"She's just lit up," Hastings explained. But the two drunken men wouldn't accept his answer. Onyx John noticed the halo for the first time and reached out a pudgy finger to examine it.

"Quite a costume," he said. "Mighty fine! That looks like real gold to me." His finger probed. "By Arthur Godfrey, it is real gold. Twenty-four carat or I miss my guess."

"Of course it's gold," Angela told him. "I'm a real angel, too." Paul Hastings stared at her in horror. But the drunks weren't taking her seriously.

"Have another drink," Onyx John chuckled. "Then we'll see."

HE stared at her owlishly. "Funny, I can't see where it's attached to your head."

"You can't see any lil ole thing," Mason Dixon chuckled. "You got a load on, man!" He inspected Angela blearily. "I can't see nothin', eithah. Htah, have a drink."

They drank. The cat shifted uneasily in Angela's lap. Paul Hastings nudged the angel girl. "Take it easy," he said. "This stuff is deadly."

"But I like it," Angela protested. "And I'm having so much fun."

"We've got to get out of here," Hastings resisted.

"But no!" Madam Adam bustled up and caught his remark. "It is that you are my guests. I cannot permit of your leaving. The evening, she is still juvenile. Observe, we are about to make of the music." Sure enough, Hastings turned and beheld an accordionist entering the Blue Pig, followed by a seedy-looking man who planted himself before the battered piano and proceeded to grow a melody on the keys, watering them from time to time with the sloshed contents of a beer glass.

The accordionist shifted his stomach Steinway into high and they began to play together.

Onyx John and Mason Dixon banged their glasses on the bar, keeping time. Angela, swept up by the rhythm, fluttered her wings.

"Wow, what a breeze!" Onyx John declared. "Somebody left the door open." Then he noticed Angela. "Hey—are you doing that?" He stared at her closely. "How's it work? You got some wires under your nightie?"

"Of course not," Angela told him, with a seraphic smile. "I just wiggle my shoulder blades. Anybody can do it."

"Real feathers!" Onyx John felt one pinion with a clumsy paw. "Say, I'm beginning to believe you really are an angel."

"Of course I am," Angela beamed. She turned and waved a finger under the jeweler's nose. "Want to see me fly?"

Both she and Hastings were now so preoccupied that they failed to notice the behavior of Brimstone. The cat had crept up on the bar and was lapping up the rest of Angela's drink.

Madam Adam saw the feline for the first time.

"Ek bien, observe the pussy!" she cooed. "It believes it is drinking of milk, no?"

BRIMSTONE gave her a look of woozy malice. "No!" said the cat. "I believe I am drinking of rotgut. This stuff'd kill a real cat, and fast!"

"Helas!" Madam Adam began to quiver rapidly in all directions. Eyes rolling, she gripped Hastings by the shoulder. "The puss—do you not hear of it speaking to me?"

"No," Hastings lied. "I don't hear anything."

"You must be drunk," the cat told her. "You know darn well I can't talk."

"Oh," said Madam Adam, reassured.

"But I heard!" Onyx John wheeled suddenly. "Say, just what's coming off here? A talking cat, and a gal with wings like an angel—what gives?"

"Yes," added Mason Dixon. "And bless mah lil ole soul, if she isn't carryin' a hahp."

"A what?"

"A hahp."

"He means 'harp', stupid!" the inebriated cat explained.

"You play the harp?" asked Onyx John. "Where?"

"Why up in—"

"—up in Shreveport," Hastings finished, quickly. "And that reminds me, we've got ten minutes to make a train. Come on, Angela, let's go!" He tugged her from the bar-stool, but the slightly flushed angel was too excited to pay attention. She took the harp from around her neck and, after noting the beat of the pianist and accordionist, began to accompany them in a perfect rendition of their current selection—which happened to be "Basin Street Blues."

"Good Lord!" gasped Onyx John. "I never heard anything like that before!"

"She is an angel!" agreed his companion.

"C'est incroyable," wheezed Madam Adam.

"Not bad at all," hiccuped the cat.

And their comments were justified. Because when Angela let loose with her harp, boogie beat or no, things happened. The celestial tones filled the ears of the listeners and came out of their eyes in the form of moisture.

Within half a minute the women, the regular patrons in the background, the accordionist, the pianist, and the group at the jar were all contributing to a puddle of tears.

Crying with delight, they harkened to the harpist. Paul Hastings sniffled, then realized this was his one chance of escape. Noting the rapt absorption of all present, he seized the opportunity to take Angela by the arm. "Come on," he whispered. "Now let's make a break for it out of here."

"Where are we going?" whispered the girl, without missing a note.

"To my room, of course."

"And where's that?"

"Four flights up," Hastings told her. "It's a long climb, but I can't help it."

"I can," said Angela. Still strumming the harp, still smiling serenely, Angela fluttered her wings. "Grab hold," she commanded.

HASTINGS, having no other choice, grabbed hold. Brimstone leaped from the bar and landed on Angela's shoulder. Still playing, still entrancing the drunken audience with a magic born of immortal melody, the angel flapped her wings and rose from the ground.

Straight up in the air she went, carrying Paul Hastings and the cat with her. Up above the palms of the patio, past the second and third story windows—Angela reached the fourth floor, swooped lightly over to the glass pane high in Hastings' garret, and pushed it open.

Madam Adam, mouth agape in astonishment, eyes blurred by a combination of tears, brandy, cognac and vodka, watched the flying trio disappear into Hastings' tiny room. The music faded and died.

"Maybe she is an angel!" whispered Onyx John.

"Maybe we're goin' crazy!" gurgled Mason Dixon.

"Maybe we should imbibe of another drink," sighed Madam Adam.

And that's just what they, and the rest of the patrons of the Blue Pig, proceeded to do. In fact, fortunately for Paul Hastings and his little bundle from heaven, the patrons proceeded to drink so quickly and so much that within an hour they had managed to completely forget the whole incident. No one was certain of just what had been seen and heard, and memory of the episode was submerged in alcohol.

By the time the sun rose over Bourbon Street and cast a disapproving eye on the Blue Pig, its occupants had drifted away to dreamland. Which is as good a place to leave them as any . . .

AS for Paul Hastings, he would just as soon have stayed in dreamland forever. But when he opened his eyes the following afternoon and rose from the armchair in which he had slept, he realized that things were not solved that simply.

Angela lay on the bed, wings folded sedately over the side. Brimstone nestled alongside her—and it was obvious that she hadn't heard the cat conversing last night, because she still cuddled the tiny fiend closely to her bosom.

There they were, the angel and the demon, ready to face the coming day—or the coming night. For twilight was slipping and getting ready to fall.

Hastings tiptoed down the hall to the community washroom and shaved. He hated to look at himself in the mirror—hated to see the face of the man who was going to betray an angel to the Devil.

But nothing had altered overnight. Sleep had not knit the ravelled sleeve of his care. His care didn't have any sleeve; it was like a straight jacket that bound him in its grip no matter how he struggled and raved.

He couldn't face his face, and he couldn't face his problem. He still had to go through with it, like it or no. The angel was on earth with no way of returning, and he was scheduled to play a long future engagement in Hell. Meanwhile, eat, drink and—

"Be wary," purred a familiar voice from behind him. Brimstone had tiptoed through the door. "Good afternoon, brother. Getting yourself slicked up for Old Nick?"

"What do you mean?"

"I mean that come sundown, we're off to see the Big Dealer. Just got a telepathic communication a moment or so ago—woke me up. We're going out to keep a date with him over in Jefferson Parish. If you listen, I'll tell you how to get there."

Hastings listened—what else could he, do?—and the cat gave him the route to follow.

"No tricks, now," warned Brimstone. "This is a very important matter to the Big Casino. I'll be watching every move you make and one slip—" The cat drew its tail across the black throat and made a snicking noise.

Hastings cut himself on the lip with the razor and nodded soberly. "All right," he said. "I'll go through with it. But in return, remember—no more of that talking. I can't bear to have Angela find out what you are."

"Or what you are," purred the cat. "I understand. Come on, let's wake her."

They returned to the garret, but Angela was already sitting up and stretching her wings.

"How do you feel?" asked Hastings, solicitously.

"Just heavenly," the angel told him. "My but we had fun last night, didn't we, Paul?"

"Oh—sure. You have no hangover or anything?"

"Certainly not. Look at the way my halo is shining."

PAUL looked and a glow brighter than that of the halo suffused his being. She looked very young and very lovely there, and he opened his mouth to tell her the truth—but Brimstone arched his back and hissed, and his tail formed a big black question mark.

"Come on," Hastings said. "Let's go."

"Where?"

"For a ride." He felt like cutting his tongue out, but there was no escape. "Thought maybe we could see the sights."

"Fine." Paul opened the door. "Is the cat coming too?" she asked.

"I'm afraid so." The cat ran past him and led the way to the back stairs.

"Good idea," Hastings noted. "We'll take this route and avoid being seen."

They tiptoed down the stairs and into the twilight. Hastings stationed Angela and the cat in the doorway. "I forgot!" he exclaimed. "The car is somewhere on Canal. Now what?"

"Taxi, Mister?"

The harsh voice came out of nowhere. Paul Hastings blinked as a redfaced man suddenly bobbed up in the doorway.

"Well—I don't know—we'd planned on going for a ride, but—"

"I know just where to take you," leered the cabby. He tilted his cap slightly and Hastings caught a glimpse of two little black horns growing out of his forehead. "I've come to get you specially," the cabby continued. "Understand?"

"Yes." Hastings beckoned to the girl. "We might as well go."

The redfaced cabby led them to a red cab—certainly unlike any other cab Hastings had ever seen in town—and the trio of animal, human and angelic beings settled themselves on the back seat.

The cab bounced down Bourbon, out Esplanade, and away. Soon the city stretched behind them in the dusk, and the silver sweep of the Huey Long Bridge shimmered in the distance to their left.

"Lovely," Angela exclaimed. "I'm so glad I came. You know, I scarcely remembered how wonderful it was to be alive—and what I missed when I left earth."

"Look, honey," Paul began. "I may be out of line, asking this, but I'm still interested. What were you, I mean when you were alive, and what happened to you when—" He stopped, embarrassed.

ANGELA drew in her lower lip and the hint of a furrow ploughed its way across her brow. "It isn't considered right to talk about the past up there, you know. But I've been back on earth for almost a day now, and nobody seems to have noticed anything, yet."

"I wondered about that," Hastings admitted. "Here you are, AWOL, and I should think somebody would be worried about you."

"Well, I'm not worried. Maybe it's wrong for me to say it, but I'm glad you brought me back. I like it here. Why, I've had more fun in the last day than I had in the whole twenty years that I was—"

She paused and looked away into the darkness rushing past outside the cab.

"Go on," whispered the young man.

"There's really nothing to tell. I was just a girl, an ordinary girl living in an ordinary small town. I went to high school, lived with my folks, and when school ended I got a job. It was the last year of the war, and the government had a big chemical factory outside of town. So I worked there, and one day was like another.

"I never went out on dates, because all the young fellows were in service. I used to wish I'd meet somebody some day—somebody to talk to, to have fun with. Somebody," and here her voice dropped, "like you, Paul."

Hastings shifted uneasily in his seat, but the angel came closer.

"As a matter of fact, that's what I was wishing when it happened."

"What happened?"

"The explosion. At least, I guess that's what it must have been. Because when I woke up again—" She made a little gesture that managed to include the robe, the harp and the halo.

"That's all," she said. "Maybe I shouldn't have told you, but I feel better now, whatever happens."

"Whatever happens." Hastings stuck out his jaw. He glanced down at Brimstone, but his jawline remained firm. "All right. I've got something to tell you, too—whatever happens. It's about me, and the reason you're here. Angela, here's the truth. You're not back on earth by any accident. Right now we're on our way to—"

"Quiet, brother!"

Brimstone rose from the angel's lap and glared.

She stared at the cat and her mouth formed a little red hole filled with astonishment.

"You're talking!"

"Of course I'm talking. And you listen to me, not to my servant."

"Your servant?" Paul cried. "But you're supposed to be my servant!"

THE cat chuckled, and each note tingled against Hastings' spine. "Do you think for one moment that the Big Gun would trust you that far? He planned all this, and he knew something would happen with a weakling like you. That's why we're taking no chances."

"Bettcha!" The cab-driver turned around and thrust his red mask over the seat. His hat had slipped off, and the two knobby black horns rose in menacing spires from his rounded forehead. “We’ve got you right where we want you, and you’d better keep your mouth shut!”

“Paul! What’s happening? What kind of a creature is this?” gasped the angelic girl.

“I’m not a creature,” snarled the cab driver. “I’m a hard-working, respectable demon.”

“And I’m a hard-working, respectable fiend,” the cat told her. “The only phoney in the crowd is this weak-kneed mortal, whose soul belongs to Satan.”

“But I don’t understand—”

“You will, soon enough. And if you don’t believe that he’s sold you out lock stock and halo to the Devil, you can ask His Unholiness himself in about five minutes, when you see him!”

Angela turned to Hastings. “No!” she whispered. “Say it isn’t true—it can’t be true.” Hastings averted his eyes as she continued. “What does the Devil want of me?”

“I don’t know,” he answered. “That’s the truth, Angela. I really don’t know. And I’m trying to explain to you how it all happened, but—”

“Not another word,” rasped Brimstone. “Or I’ll claw your eyes out.”

Hastings ignored the cat. He gripped the angel by the shoulders. “Haven’t you some power to overcome evil?” he muttered. “Isn’t there something about this you can do?”

She shook her head, halo and all. “Not. on earth. I have no power here. You’re the only one who can save me.”

“Then I’ll save you!” Hastings threw himself back and opened the door of the moving cab. “Quick—jump for it! Spread your wings and fly!”

“No you don’t!” Tae cat barred the way, back arched, claws extended, eyes twin fountains of flame.

Paul Hastings faced the cat, ready to do battle, but Angela grabbed his arms.

“Don’t, Paul. I know you didn’t mean to get me into this fix, but we’re in it together, and I won’t leave you now. Whatever happens, we’ll both stay together and see it through."

"That's the spirit," approved the cat. "Close the door, brother—we're almost there."

THE cabby drove like a demon (and who had a better right?) and they whirled along a side-road, over a slight rise, and descended to a private driveway. At the end stood a vast, deserted barn-like structure; its unligbted windows staring like blind eyes into the night.

They passed under an arch that had once borne an incandescent sign. Paul Hastings could just make out the lettering.

"DEAL ME INN," he read, aloud. Then, "I know where we are! This used to be a gambling casino, but it's closed now."

"Not to the Devil," the cat explained. "He's a good friend of the owner. Borrowed it for the meeting."

The cab stopped on a hypothetical dime before the unlit entrance to the DEAL ME INN and the cabby ran around to the side and opened the door. Brimstone and Angela stepped out, then Hastings. The cabby grabbed his arm.

"Not so fast," he said. "That'll be three bucks, even."

"You mean on top of everything I have to pay for the ride?" Hastings complained.

"Why not? Even a demon's got to eat," the cabby explained. He opened his mouth and for the first time displayed the long ivory razors of his teeth. "Unless, of course, you'd like to see me scrounge around for my own food."

Paul Hastings paid him quickly, without a word.

"All right, let's get going." The cabby stepped to the darkened doorway, followed by Brimstone, who kept his slitted eyes upon the mortal and the immortal alike.

"Got a key?" the cat demanded.

For answer the cabby bent his head forward and slipped one knobby horn into the door lock. There was a grating click and the door swung open upon a black abyss.

They moved forward slowly into the barn-like building. The DEAL ME INN had been a typical gambling casino in its gaudy day; half a block long and almost again as wide—an expanse built on the general dimensions of a roller rink.

In the darkness, Hastings' eyes gradually discerned the dim outlines of the covered green tables, the roulette wheels shrouded by dust-cloths, the octagonal poker and black-jack layouts, the empty chuck-a-luck cages. He could almost imagine the casino as it had used to be; alight and alive with hundreds of gambolling gamblers, dozens of dealers, spotters, steerers; he could hear the shouts, the murmurs, the invocations and imprecations directed to Fortune, mingled with the clink of silver and the rich rustle of greenbacks.

But now it was quiet, quiet and dark. They stumbled along through the sable silence, with the cat's eyes to guide them in the gloom. The cat's eyes —and the cabby's, which were worse. They glowed redly as Hastings and Angela tiptoed along up to a platform at the end of the room. They mounted it and stood staring out at the empty expanse of the casino. It held nothing but darkness.

THEN, suddenly, the darkness was dispelled by a glow, a gleam, a glare from the eyes of a thousand cats, a thousand cabbies. As if on signal, the entire casino was filled with rubies, living jewels that floated in pairs six feet or more from the floor.

There came a murmur and a whisper, a grumble and a growl, and beneath it the sulphurous sussuration of baleful breathing.

"The boys have arrived," grunted Brimstone. Hastings strained his eyes to see that which he did not desire to behold; but it was no use. All he saw was the eyes—hundreds and hundreds of red eyes ravening in darkless.

They stood on the platform and Angela shivered close to him. The cat hissed and the cabby had disappeared now, disappeared to join the black brotherhood on the floor below.

“This is it,” Brimstone purred.

This was indeed it, or rather, him.

He came out of darkness, out of nothingness, out of the everywhere into the here. One minute the platform beside them was empty and the next it was filled; filled with a red and raging fire that shimmered and sealed, then coalesced into a cohesive flame. The flame sent out six shoots—two arms, two legs, a head and a tail.

Glowing, literally glowing, with pleasure, the Devil stepped forward on the stage.

“Meeting will please come to order,” he mumbled. “And all that sort of rot.”

A cheer arose from the darkness, but the Devil raised his tail for silence.

“No time for nonsense,” he drawled. “Right down to business here. We’ve work to do.” For the first time he turned to Paul Hastings and a smile lit up his fiery countenance. “I see you’ve brought our angel,” he said. “Good!”

“Not so good.” Each word was a dead weight forced up from deep down inside him, but Hastings managed. “I’m not going to let you harm her.”

“Harm her? But my dear chap, I have no intention of harming her—none whatsoever! I merely want to sketch her!”

“Sketch her?”

“Precisely,” answered the Devil. He extended his tail in Angela’s direction. Flame shot from the tip, a circle of flame that limned her beauty and made it visible to all the hungry eyes down in the darkness. He traced the angel’s outline in fire.

“That’s a hot sketch!” wheezed Brimstone, from somewhere down around Paul Hastings’ feet.

HASTINGS stared at the girl angel as she stood within the circle of fire, noted that her halo still glowed with a luminance of its own. That alone gave him a faint irrational vestige of hope.

A chorus of hoots and howls greeted the glowing apparition of the angel on the platform.

Satan stepped forward again and signalled for silence with his allpurpose caudal appendage.

“I told you chaps I had a surprise,” he began. “And here it is! Yes, I assure you it’s quite real. A real angel.”

Again the yammering from the infernal legions. Again the signal for silence.

“At this time,” said the Devil, “I should like to express my personal appreciation to Mr. Paul Hastings, who has gone to great lengths—literally moved heaven and earth, as it were—to supply us with an angel. I am sure we all tender Mr. Hastings our very warmest regards.”

“But I don’t want your warm regards,” Hastings protested.

“You’d better get used to the heat, brother,” observed Brimstone. “When you’re one of us, you’ll get a lot of it.”

Angela was staring at the young man from within the circle of fire. He couldn’t meet her eyes. Better to face the Devil himself than that. So he faced the Devil.

“You can’t harm her,” he gasped. “You can’t!”

“I could,” Satan answered. “But I won’t. As I said, I merely want to sketch her. But you’ll understand everything, if only you’ll cease this—pardon the expression—infernal racket, and listen to what I am about to tell the audience.”

The Devil stepped forward and stood poised on the cloven hoof. The omnipresent tail flicked forward and pointed at Angela.

“Why is the angel here?” he asked. “And why the mortal man? The answer is also the answer to one of my most cherished dreams. For I must confess it, I too have my dreams. How often have I twisted and turned on my bed of coals o'nights, envisioning this moment—the moment when I could exchange my dominion over demons for sovereignty o'er angels!"

"Did I get your double-talk right?" spluttered Brimstone, indignantly. "Did you say you were going to chuck us fiends and get angels instead?"

"Exactly!" Satan smiled.

A low groan rose from the darkness, gathering into a rumbling roar of protest. Once more the Devil stilled it with the talisman of his tail.

"But wait! You're not abandoned. My dream runs thusly; to procure an angel, inspect it at firsthand, study its celestial metabolism, analyze, and reproduce its veritable aspect by means at my command. Then I shall reproduce it, reproduce it a thousand-fold, by creating in essence an authentic disguise. A disguise all of you present will wear. You, all of you, shall become my angels!"

Laughter screeched upwards, slashing the darkness into shrieking ribbons.

" 'Tis not a jest. Angels you'll become, at of you, properly attired in robes, of whitest damask. Wings will sprout from your backs, haloes glitter above your heads. And thus accoutred, you'll have all earth to walk—all earth to rule."

THERE was a certain majesty in Satan's utterance that Hastings could not help but acknowledge; the grotesqueness of the entire nightmare became real when embodied in that ancient evil voice. He puzzled over it as the Devil continued.

"Aye, that's the dream, and this is the realization of it! To own an angel, copy it, superimpose its shape on fiends, and then loose them upon earth!

"And that's where mortal help is needed. For we live, as you know, in a decadent age. No longer do most miserable humans seek me out for black boons or sell their souls for favors. We, all of us—the legion of the damned —are passe, if you please: 'old hat' and 'figments of the imagination' to the vulgar. But there are many mortals who likewise scoff at heaven and its works, who have discarded seraphim and cherubim from their new theology.

"So I have contrived a way of snaring these skeptical souls. A modern, mortal way, with modern, mortal help. You fiends disguised as angels will not walk the earth as such: no, one step further is contemplated. You will appear as robots in the shape of angels, and you'll not be given to the mortals—you'll be sold!"

The Devil paused to allow the meaning of his words to sink in. But even Hastings was puzzled, until Satan continued.

"Yes, sold! By the modern magic of advertising. By the modern deviltry of a human invention called 'public relations' which is far fouler than anything I could devise.

"This young man here," and the Devil indicated Hastings, "is an expert in this evil art. With certain monies I have obtained from the former owner of the gambling—you'll pardon the expression—hell, he will proclaim to the world that he has launched a new business. Using the powers of air and darkness united in mortal sins called radio, television, and newspapers, he will let it be known that he has invented and is manufacturing a new kind of robot—a mechanical servant.

"It is a robot, he will tell the world, that is attuned by electronic impulse to the brainwaves of the individual. It is a robot that acts as a part of the brain itself, independent of the body, and serves as a mechanical monitor. In other words, a friendly advisor, wiser than the mind itself, who will direct the efforts of the individual to praiseworthy and profitable ends. A mechanical conscience. Truly, a Guardian Angel!"

AGAIN the Devil paused and waited for his meaning to permeate the darkness behind the red and winking eyes.

"Yes, a Guardian Angel! What man would not welcome the latest scientific miracle—a second brain attuned to his own, a brain that is guaranteed to keep him from harm, keep him from evil action, direct him to pleasure, peace, security, and (since we are dealing, remember, with human beings) profit?

“Not every man, of course, will be able to afford the luxury of a Guardian Angel. A thousand, perhaps, will be in a position to buy. From the flood of requests which I anticipate, we shall select that thousand. A thousand of the highest-minded, noblest men and women of the world; a thousand we could never hope to reach by any other enticement. They will come to us willingly, pay this young man handsomely, for the privilege of undergoing an electronic-psychoanalysis and having a personal Guardian Angel constructed to guide them! Savor the delicious humor of it all—they’ll heap a fortune on this young man to obtain a Guardian Angel, and the Guardian Angel will be one of you in disguise!

“Can you imagine how you will guard your human charges? How you will direct their destinies? How you will act as a Conscience and rule their actions?

“Within a year, those thousand mortals who possess you will have the world turned topsy-turvy. Their damnation will in turn damn millions of others, in a widening circle of corruption. War, pestilence, red ruin—and all of us in power!”

They understood, now, and the screams rising from the darkness clawed along Hastings’ spine and burrowed into his brain. For he understood now, too; knew how he would get rich on the Devil’s dream, and at what cost to himself and the world.

“Begone!” Satan continued. “Avant! And—for the benefit of you newcomers who have never sat at the feet of Avon’s Bard, scram out of here! When next I call you, it will be to don the angelic robes. But now, farewell, fare ill!”

The eyes winked out like fireflies dying in the darkness, and Satan turned to Angela and Hastings on the platform.

“There you have it,” he said. “My dream, your riches. It is a simple scheme, but sound. We live in an age where the wildest fantasy of yesterday is but today’s commonplace. Now, I shall instruct you fully in your duties.”

"Don't bother," Hastings murmured.

"What's this? Do I detect a note of insubordination in your voice?"

"In plain English," Hastings said, "I advise you to go to hell."

"Home?"

"Call it that if you like. But I won't cooperate. Take me with you if you wish—I understand from Brimstone that you've tricked me into losing my soul anyway, so I might as well go. But I'm not going lo stay here and act as front man for your dirty schemes!"

HASTINGS faced Angela. "Now you know what I did," he said. "I'm to blame for everything, and there's nothing I can say to help you now. Except that I'd count myself well damned if only all this had never happened to you."

Angela mustered a smile. "I know," she answered. "And it's not your fault, really. You did try to protect me, once you realized the truth. And you're sorry, now. I—I still have faith in you, Paul." The Devil tugged at his spade beard, and a sardonic grin flared forth and glowed.

"Very touching," he commented. "So you'd refuse to help me, now that plans are all arranged?"

"Why not?" Hastings retorted. "I've found out one thing—there are limits to what I'll do for money. Besides, why should I help you? I'm damned if I do and damned if I don't."

"Shall I tell you why you should help me?" asked Satan, gently. "Shall I tell you why you are going to help me, willingly, as much as I wish?"

"Why?" asked Hastings, in spite of himself.

For answer, the tail reared itself towards Angela "That's the reason," the Devil said. "I told you to harm would befall her, and I meant it. All I need do is use her as a blueprint on which to pattern my angelic disguises; study her, copy her, and release her. So go my plans.

"However, if you prove stubborn and refuse to cooperate—I'll not stop there. I'll not release her. I'll drag her down beyond your reach, beyond the each of heaven itself, to mine own kingdom!"

There was a moment of pregnant silence which soon gave birth to horrified realization of his words.

"Now," snapped Satan. "What say you? Will you cooperate? Or—"

Hastings glanced at Angela. "No," whispered (Lie angel. "You can't consent! I'll be all right, I'd gladly go with him rather than let him do this to the world. Don't do it, Paul."

"I must," Hastings sighed, "I owe it to you."

The Devil smiled. "Then we're agreed! We start tomorrow to make plans. Money shall be provided. This place will be transformed, outwardly, into a factory. I, unfortunately, cannot attend you in this matter—there are wars to be waged elsewhere, requiring my presence. But Brimstone wit remain with you as my own personal representative. He shall give counsel, lend his aid.

One month is all I require; at the end of that time, Angela is free and you will be rich. It can all be arranged very quickly if you follow the plan, and Brimstone.

"Within a month, then—GUARDIAN ANGELS, INCORPORATED will be launched upon the world!"

THE month passed swiftly; too swiftly. It passed in a blur, passed in a kaleidoscope, passed in a whirlwind of activity, unreality, and pure nightmare. It was all a dream—indeed, a diabolical dream come true.

The money was on the table in the garret when they returned; thousands of dollars in nice, crisp bills. Hastings never saw the gambler who provided it; he saw nothing but Angela's predicament and his own, talked to no one about it but Brimstone.

For Brimstone was always present, always on hand to break up any opportunity to discuss an escape or a solution. At first Hastings entertained a wild hope that heavenly powers might somehow take note of this blasphemous scheme and intervene; as the days passed without a sign, his hopes faded.

And then the mad whirl took over. The gambling casino, made over in Hastings' name now, became a factory to all outward appearances. GUARDIAN ANGELS, INCORPORATED was really incorporated. Hastings moved to a suite of offices uptown, and he and Angela shared a suite in a hotel; Brimstone chaperoning, of course.

The presence of an angel caused comment, naturally, and Hastings capitalized on that. He swung into action as a public relations man.

No, Angela was not an angel. She was a robot, a mechanical creation. Yes, he was the inventor. No, there was nothing at all supernatural about this electronic development. Plastic body, synthetic flesh, a mechanism intricately contrived. Secret formula? Well, he couldn't say just yet. But manufacturing had started and within a month he would be ready for an important announcement.

Thus for the Times-Picayune and the New Orleans Item and the AP and the UP and the INS, and for the eager beavers from Time and Life and Newsweek who tried without success to get past the barbed wire and into the factory, who tried to ferret out the details of Hastings' singularly anonymous past, who tried to interview Angela alone, who speculated and puzzled and scoffed and predicted and hinted until the entire nation, the entire world had heard about this mysterious GUARDIAN ANGELS, INCORPORATED that was about to revolutionize human life.

The pastors denounced and the scientists screamed and the commentators yelled. Within two weeks the airwaves were polluted with angel jokes, twelve songwriters had turned out numbers with the word "angel" in the title, three movie studios were working on quickies embodying the angel theme, and the firms that specialized in making toys with Hopalong Cassidy tie-ups were bidding for rights on angel dolls, angel dresses, angel wings, and angel sub machine guns.

AT first it was all a gag, something to talk about, something to feed the readers and the listening audience; a new distraction from war and worry. At first it was a wild rumor, a bad joke, a crazy notion. Then, as pictures of Angela appeared, complete with wings and halo—as the newsreels and the television screens showed carefully-staged interviews which ended with Angela actually flying through the air—‘then and only then did people begin to wonder. And wondering, believe.

Yes, people believed. They believed because they wanted to believe.

Paul Hastings, working as he had never worked before, working as no publicity or advertising man had ever worked—with a genuine product to sell—began to find out things about his fellow-man.

Of course ho was still cynical about motives. Folks, he realized, were out after the dollar. They were gullible, easily deceived.

But that had nothing to do with their belief in GUARDIAN ANGELS, INCORPORATED. They had faith in the notion because they wanted to have faith. The whole world, he discovered, was searching for security. Security against others, and security against themselves.

For as the campaign moved into high, Hastings dispelled the element of mystery. Working with Brimstone’s coaching, he gradually “planted” stories and interviews in the proper places.

He began to “explain” the theory behind GUARDIAN ANGELS; gave out releases dealing with the idea of a mechanical brain acting as a conscience which could do no wrong.

Using scientific gobbley-gook coated with metaphysical jargon, he let it be known to all the world that there was a solution to mankind’s problems after all—a solution far beyond orthodox religion, orthodox science, beyond the psychiatric approach. A thousand GUARDIAN ANGELS would soon be available for use: a thousand people would be initially selected as a mass experiment to undergo conditioning which would make them eligible to employ a personal Conscience.

Statesmen, scientists, military and religious leaders, business men, creative artists were invited—if they could pay the fee, of course—to participate in this earth-shattering new development which might logically result in a new and better world.

The response convinced Hastings beyond all doubt that the world was basically a far better place than he had dreamed; that people were far better than he'd ever imagined.

For the letters and requests poured in. Letters from the great, letters from the rich, letters from the high and mighty of the world. They came in a steady stream, the stream became a torrent, but the torrent was merged in the oceans of mail and communications from ordinary men and women.

THE poor wrote. The sick wrote.

The broken in spirit and the despairing, the lost and lonely ones. "I haven't got much money, but if there's only a chance, you see my father is a good man but he's got an awful temper and he beats up on my mother and us kids all the time and if he had one of those angels now, well—"

"I never knew it," Hastings told Angela, over and over again. "I never realized it. People really want to be good, they'll do anything to be good. It's only that they don't know how. They're weak, bewildered, afraid of themselves. All they want is peace and security—these letters show that.

"I don't have to sell this idea to the world. The world wants to buy it. People know what's wrong with each other, and with themselves. If only it were true!"

This last thought always brought Hastings up short. Again and again, during the last few days, he told Angela, "We must think of some way out. We must! We can't let this thing go through!"

And Angela only smiled. "I have faith, Paul," she said. "You must have faith, too."

Which was poor consolation, whenever Hastings got through with yet another session of lies to the press, or returned from another conference with Brimstone.

The fiendish cat was exultant. “Wonderful!” he purred. “Everything going according to schedule. They think we’re turning out angels at the factory, and when the time comes we’ll produce ’em right as promised. We’ll select our thousand suckers, run them through that silly test with the machines I’m rigging up; give them three days of buzzing noises and electric arcs straight out of those old mad-scientist movies. And then we tell them they’ve passed, the adjustments are made synchronizing them with the robots, and they’ll get their angels. Oh, will they get theirs!”

The cat chuckled, and Hastings shuddered. He shuddered still more during the last two days.

For it was then that anticipation mounted to almost unprecedented heights; the papers abandoned their panic over wars and rumors of wars and concentrated on Hastings, the miracle-man, the man who was going to solve the problems of the world.

April 1st was the deadline; and it almost became, in the popular mind, “National Angel Day.”

ON March 31st came the crowning event—the personal phone call from the White House, asking for a private conference, followed quickly by a secret invitation from the UN to address the delegates at Lake Success. The highest powers, aroused at las., were in one accord—if the world could beg, borrow or buy a Conscience for its leaders, then government would pay the price.

FBI was moving in. A special plane landed at Maisant International Airport, ready to transport Hastings, Angela, and Brimstone—“My mascot,” as Hastings always told the press—to the capitol. Before the historic meeting, still other initial-studded authorities made their request. NBC, CBS, ABC wanted a combination radio and television broadcast to the world from the airport.

Oh, it was a crazy month, and no mistake. An gel-food cake became a popular article of diet. The Wall Street Journal hinted at a communist plot, and the Daily Worker muttered about capitalist conspiracy. The Kiplinger letter dealt with a rumored "mass production of angels in the low-price field by GM, with models scheduled to go on sale in chain stores throughout the country." Bookstores sold Modern Library editions of Look Homeward, Angel to the profit of Thomas Wolfe's estate; little theatre groups were playing Angel Street in revival, and the usual idiocies of popular taste were again demonstrated.

But over and above it was the White House request, the UN meeting, the radio broadcast, and the unleashing of the Devil's dream upon the world.

A haggard Hastings, eight pounds lighter than the month before, rode in an unlicensed automobile to the airport. Brimstone sat snugly, smugly, on his lap—Brimstone wasn't taking any chances, with the FBI man driving and the two network vice-presidents in the back seat. Angela sat between them, peering forward at Hastings, and trying to act like an angelic robot for the benefit of the other passengers.

"Mind if we touch it?" asked the first v. p., nervously, as he poked Angela with a stubby finger.

"My, feels just like flesh!" commented his companion. "And those wings —it really flies, doesn't it?"

"Careful," cautioned the driver, an FBI man who had seen too many Lloyd Nolan movies. "I've got my orders, remember—no tampering with the angel. Security measure."

"This all seems incredible to me, Mr. Hastings," worried the second v. p. "Now about that broadcast. It's scheduled for 2 PM, right before your take-off, and if you'd only consent to use our script, we'd be okay. I mean, we've had the very best staff men in to do the writing, and it's timed down to the split second."

"No script," Hastings muttered, grimly. "As a matter of fact, I have no idea what I'm going to say."

BRIMSTONE'S claws dug into his ribs in silent, painful reminder that he'd better say the right thing, and Hastings subsided in his seat.

"Beats me how you do it," marvelled the first v.p. "I hope you'll explain everything over the air. I mean, how you get this halo effect, and the reason for the harp and stuff like that."

"I get it," mused the second v.p. "Actually, he could of made any kind of robot he wanted; man, or woman, or one of these metal men. But the angel idea, that ties in with most peoples' notion of what a conscience looks like—get it? The old symbolism! Mighty clever! You're going to make a fortune with this idea, Mr. Hastings."

"You're going to make History!" breathed his companion.

Hastings nodded.

Yes, he was going to make History, all right. Had there ever been a more fantastic situation in all the world, in all the age-old war between heaven and Satan? He, one man, held the balance now—and he'd be holding it, in just a few moments, before the eyes of all the world, the ears of all the world.

Eyes, ears. Red eyes of fiends. Ears of Brimstone the cat, perked to catch the wrong word, even the wrong inflection. Eyes of Angela, blue and trusting, angelic. Ears off his own, his real private and personal conscience.

They were all riding with him now, riding in the big black limousine, riding with him to his doom. There was the airport, there was the field, there was the plane—a real plane, this time, not the Devil's dream-ship. The plane that took him to Washington, to New York, to the high places of the world which he would drag down to Hell.

Yes, and there were the microphones and the booms and the TV cameras and the trucks. And pop! went the flashbulbs, and the cops held the crowds back, and now he was getting out of the car with Angela and the cat minced on behind. . . . and the FBI man was moving him forward and the network directors were ushering him to the mike and the cameramen were sighting. . . . and somebody was introducing him, saying something about "Hastings" and “GUARDIAN ANGELS,” and now, this was it, he was on the air, on camera, he was facing the world.

He stared straight ahead and he opened his mouth and he said:

“This is Paul Hastings. I’ve come here today to tell the world that it’s all a fake.”

THERE were noises now, noises all around, and from the crowd murmurs he picked out an angry hissing from between his feet which meant Brimstone was there, spitting in protest.

But Angela was also there, holding his hand, and Hastings continued.

“Yes, let me say it again. I’ve deceived you. It’s a fraud, a hoax. There are no mechanical Consciences to guide you. GUARDIAN ANGELS, INCORPORATED is a myth.

“But you mustn’t be disappointed. If I cannot give you what I promised, I can give you something better, something greater. The knowledge that you don’t need me!

“No, you don’t need an artificial conscience. Nobody does. For each of you has something much more important—a real conscience. You cannot buy it, and I implore you not to sell it. Just listen to it, use it, act according to its dictates. If each of you does that, then the world will be the kind of a place you want it to be. A good place, a place in which to live rather than a place in which to fight and kill and be killed.

“You’re puzzled now, and confused. You’re wondering, for one thing, what this means.” Hastings indicated Angela for the benefit of the television cameras. “Well, she’s no fake. She is an angel. A real angel. You’ve seen her fly, and I’ve men here who have touched her, known her reality. She’s as real as the angel that dwells inside all of you, and you must believe in her just as you must believe in yourself!”

“Liar!” It sounded human, but it was—Hastings realized—Brimstone’s voice.

“It’s true!” Angela stepped forward now. “Every word of it is true. If I could only make you understand somehow, make you believe—” She hesitated, and her fluttering hands fell to the harp-strings about her neck. Suddenly she smiled and took the harp in her hands. Her fingers moved across the strings.

Angela played.

There are no words to describe her playing. It was April Fool’s Day, and the crowd at the airport, the millions huddled around their radios and television sets had just been dealt the cruellest April Fool joke of all. But Angela played, and they listened. Angela played and they cried. Angela played—and as heaven’s own harmony soared forth, they believed.

The world could doubt Hastings, doubt Angela’s appearance, doubt the halo and the wings. But the world could not doubt the ear-borne evidence of the heavenly music.

Angela played, and Hastings knew that somehow, he had won. His hand patted his coat-pocket, feeling the straight razor he’d concealed there, concealed against failure. He wouldn’t use it now. He’d live. The world would live. That was the promise of the celestial music, soaring in triumph against all evil.

Then the music was blotted out in a black blur of nightmare. Something leaped, something hissed, something clawed, tearing the harpstrings to shreds.

It was Brimstone, ripping at the harp with frantic, frenzied hate. Angela gasped, but her cry was drowned in the squalling rage of the cat-fiend.

HASTINGS pulled the little black monster away, but it was too late. The strings were gone, the music lost forever. And (then Hastings was pulled away himself, pulled away by the FBI agents. Before he quite realized it, he and Angela and the spitting cat were being hustled aboard the waiting plane.

He caught a last glimpse of the confusion and consternation seething through the crowd at the airport—a last glimpse of the bewildered network officials—a last glimpse of the earth and sky—and then the motors were roaring, the door of the little private plane was sealed—and he felt the shaking and shuddering taxi down the long runway.

Hastings looked around. He and Angela were sitting in the rear seat of the small cabin; the two black-hatted FBI men occupied the front seat with Brimstone. The pilot ahead was invisible. The young man glanced through the small cabin window and saw the ground move away, saw New Orleans fade behind the clouds.

"I don't get it," he muttered, to Angela. "We told them it was a fake. Why are we going to Washington, then?"

"Washington?" It was the cat who spoke. "Who said anything about Washington?"

Hastings goggled. "You're talking!" he warned. "And in front of those FBI men—"

For answer, the two men turned and removed their black hats. Hastings saw twin sets of horns rising from bald brows. They grinned at him, exposing serrated fangs.

"We have our own version of the FBI," Brimstone purred, complacently. "Just a precaution. The Big Guy had a hunch you might somehow try to double-cross him."

"I'm not afraid," said Angela. She patted Hastings' arm. "I'm proud of you, Paul."

"But where are we going?" Hastings murmured.

His voice was scarcely audible above the roar of the engine. The plane dipped alarmingly, and the engine-roar became a tortured scream. Air whined past them. The plane began to spiral, and to nose down, down—

"We're crashing!"

Paul Hastings held the angel in his arms. Somewhere Brimstone was laughing like the fiend he was, somewhere the air and earth were torn with the impact of explosion, somewhere flames rose to receive them in a fiery embrace—then all of it ended in blackness.

BLACKNESS. Blackness and flames. That's all Hastings saw when, after a long moment, he opened his eyes. Gradually he managed to differentiate between the two. The blackness was omnipresent, eternal. The flames rose out of it, cleaving the darkness again and again without dispelling it. They came from the bottom of the blackness, from lakes and pools and oceans of fire.

Hastings felt searing heat. He breathed it, inhaled the acrid odor. And then his hearing returned, but it was scarcely a welcome addition to his senses. Because he heard the screams. The ageless, endless screams.

Quickly he sat up, realizing automatically that he was unhurt, but not caring—for his first thought was of Angela.

Angela wasn't screaming. She sat beside him on the rocky ledge. Beyond her stood the two pseudo-FBI men, and Brimstone. There was no plane, nor any wreckage of a plane in sight. Only the blackness beyond, with the flames rising up in rhythm with the screams.

Hastings didn't say, "Where are we?" He knew. He knew, long before the cat minced forward over the glowing ashes and purred.

"Welcome home, brother!"

The young man rose, helping Angela to her feet. "So it was a fake crash, too," he commented. "Just staged to fool the world and account for our disappearance."

"Right," acknowledged the cat. "You aren't really dead, and of course, she can't be killed. But I have a feeling you'll soon wish you were dead. I've never seen the Big Dealer quite so hot—if you know what I mean."

"All right, let's git going," said one of the members of the Fiendish Bureau of Investigation.

There was no question of refusing. Hastings and Angela picked their way over the rocks, hand in hand. The nearness of Angela gave him a comforting feeling. With his free hand he patted the razor, but its presence brought no relief. What good is a razor in Hell?

"You won't need a shave here, brother," remarked the cat. With a start, Hastings realized that Brimstone could still read his mind whenever there were no outward noises to interfere.

Shortly, however, the noises began. They constituted a racket; literally an infernal racket.

Dante Alighieri, who claimed to have paid a visit tc Hell during the early years of the fourteenth century, left a very definitive account of the shrieks of the damned, the moans and outcries of lost souls, the cacaphony of fiends. John Milton, a later commentator who whitewashed Satan under the guise of Lucifer, paid his respects to the pitfalls of the Pit. Jonathan Edwards made his additions to the edition of perdition, and a host of lesser luminaries cad their best—or worst—to describe the infamy of the Inferno.

BUT there are no words to describe the utter reality, or the uttered reality of the shrieks; no words to describe the intensity of fear and fright which rose from the darkness in a form as tangible as the odor of sulphur and brimstone.

It was, Hastings decided quite simply, a Hell of a place.

Not that he had much time for either observation or decision. The fiends were leading him a far from merry chase—stumbling over rocks, leaping over fissures filled with live steam, bypassing streams of molten lava, circling around miniature volcanoes.

Angela clung to him, wings throbbing with alarm; yet her smile and her halo glowed as brightly as ever. For some reason she still retained the battered, stringless harp—but whether it gave her any more comfort than the razor did Hastings he could not say.

Brimstone frisked along happily, obviously pleased at his homecoming. The way became torturous and they threaded through murky tunnels, passing through larger chasms and caverns where even the voices of the damned and the doomed were drowned out by the roar of flames.

“Don’t hesitate,” Brimstone smirked. “The flames can’t hurt you as long as you’re alive.” The cat began to sing Chloe in an offkey wail. Then it switched to Smoke Gets in Your Eyes with equally dismal results.

They entered a long slanting tunnel that suddenly spiralled and wound down interminably. Hastings and Angela slipped and floundered until the two fiends were forced to half-support them in their progress. Finally, they emerged.

Finally, they emerged into the great vaulted cavern circled by a rim of fire. The two fiends melted unobtrusively into the shadows, leaving them in the dubious custody of Brimstone. They stood there, dwarfed under the domed igneous arena, and stared at the whirling ball of flame in the center of the cavern. The whirling ceased and disappeared.

The Devil stood before them.

“So,” he observed, calmly. “Where angels fear to tread, eh?”

“H’m not afraid!” Surprisingly enough, it was Angela who spoke.

“Then you’re a fool, like the young man,” answered Satan. “And the time has come to pay for your folly.”

“It was worth it, to stop your scheme,” Angela retorted.

“Was it? I wonder if you’ll still (believe that after you pay the price.”

“What are you going to do to us?” demanded Hastings.

“A fair question. Which demands a properly foul answer.” The Devil tugged at his beard in a gesture Hastings had learned to dread. “I must confess that I haven’t given the matter sufficient thought, as yet. You see there are a number of delicate legal and theological questions to iron out. By rights, I am not supposed to have jurisdiction over an angel—even a fallen angel.” A reminiscent look crept into the flaming eyes. “A fallen angel,” he mused. “I’d almost forgotten the heights from which I myself descended. So much has happened since. So many things. I remember Prosperine, and Orpheus—”

HE shook his head. The beard shed a shower of sparks. “But I digress. We were speaking of punishment; a subject which I may lay claim to handle with some authority.

“Hastings, you are my property to deal with as I see fit. I’m in no hurry; eternity is my kingdom and your prison. As for the angel, she’s beyond the reach of any aid, mortal or immortal.”

Brimstone purred his way into the presence, arching his back and rubbing his tail against the cloven hoof of his master.

“Let me have them,” he mewed. “I’ve put up with a lot from these two, and I deserve a chance.”

“Perhaps. At least, until I devise a device, I can remand them to your custody.” Satan smiled. “Good enough. Take charge of them as you wish.”

Hastings and Angela stood irresolute as the cat moved forward, blackly, bale fully.

“You’d best obey Brimstone,” the Devil advised. “There is no possibility of resistance and no escape. A thousand fiends will rise as quickly as the flames.”

Again, Satan smiled. “Oh, I admit it’s all a little old-fashioned,” he said. “There are times when I too get sick of fire and brimstone, horns and tails and cloven hooves. But we have our traditions to maintain—and you will find that fear and agony are oldfashioned, too.” He turned tail abruptly with a gesture of dismissal. “We shall meet again,” said Satan. “Now, go and be damned.”

“This way, please.” Brimstone mocked and beckoned to a dark corridor. Without a word, the angel and the mortal followed.

“No sense running away.” Brimstone read their thoughts with savage accuracy. “The fiends will find you, soon enough.” He purred complacently. “Nothing can stop them, you understand. In all the ages, I know of only one man who stopped them, even for a time.”

Hastings stumbled on. He tried not to think of what he was wanting to think. Something the Devil had mentioned, something Brimstone had mentioned now—but the cat would read his mind.

Then Hell itself came to his rescue. The tunnel widened for a moment and turned off so that once again they walked through a large cavern filled with flames—and from the flames rose the deafening cries of the damned.

Brimstone couldn't read minds when there were noises!

"Lag behind," Hastings whispered to Angela. "Lag behind until I call you." Angela shot him a mystified glance, but obeyed. As the cat led Hastings into still another maze of subterranea, Angela imperceptibly lingered at the entrance. Hastings went on ahead, into the darkness, into the howling and shrieking Inferno.

WHAT thoughts went through her angelic head will never be known. The moments were eternities of exquisite agony; the waiting was an eon of painful, anguished anticipation.

And then Hastings emerged, running, from the tunnel ahead. Without a word he grasped the harp from about her neck, and ran back to the tunnel. The ravaged instrument with its shredded strings disappeared into the blackness.

Again Angela waited. Again the agonized ages passed. The flames shot higher, the howling rose to crescendo, and Hell's own fury rose in infernal majesty to dwarf and mock the white-robed figure of the winged girl.

There was a muted murmuring that grew to a raging roar. Suddenly, from the darkness beyond the flames, Angela saw the rising ring of red eyes, rimming her in on all sides. They were the eyes of fiends, the eyes that brooded in the blackness. Now they crept forward, and from behind them came the evil echo of a titanic tittering. They were crouching, slinking, closer and closer and closer—something had alarmed them, something had alerted them, something had summoned them. Black paws padding, curved claws raking, the dark demons closed in upon their chosen prey.

"Paul!"

Suddenly he was there. Suddenly he emerged from the tunnel and raced to her side. He thrust the harp into her hands. "Play!" he shouted. "Play—

it’s our only chance! Never mind them, they can’t touch us if you play!”

Angela looked down at the restrung harp, then up into the darkness. Automatically her hands moved over the strings. And the angel played.

The music rose, rose above the rustling, rose above the panting, rose above the roaring of flames and the crying out of the damned.

The music rose and the voices fell, the flames subsided. A new sound took their place—an accompaniment to the celestial music. It was the sound of weeping.

“Come on,” Hastings said, leading Angela into a fissured cavity in the rock. “We’ll find our way out of here. There is a way, you know. If you have faith.”

Angela had faith. There was faith in her fingers, faith in the melody they produced, faith in the strength of the soaring strains.

Paul Hastings led her, but he himself was lost—lost in the music. Tears blinded him until he saw clearly, but what he saw he could never recall.

THEY walked unharmed through the halls of Hell, down corridors of dark despair, through pits of utter degradation, and still Angela played.

Wherever they passed, flames fell back, fiends fawned, and the cries of the doomed became a paen of remembered beauty.

Of Satan, of Brimstone, there were no signs. There was only the walking and the music, the endless wandering through corridor after corridor.

Ages afterwards the way led upward. Through cooler caverns they climbed, and still Angela’s harp made melody. The fires faded so that they toiled through darkness, and time itself was melted in the molten music.

And thus it was that they came at last—the man and the angel—to the cavern with the cool stalactites; the cavern that was somehow familiar to Hastings; the cavern where for the first time his skin tingled with recognition of the familiar air of earth.

“Don’t look back, Angela,” he shouted, above the sound of the strings. “But I think we’re safe, now. Out of it!”

But Angela did look back. She looked back, and she screamed. “Look out! The roof is falling in!”

Music—vibration—tremor—whatever it was, the result was the same.

A portion of the pointed rocks over the cavern plunged to earth, to block the entrance of the tunnel from which they had emerged.

Hastings noted it, and at the same time noted their own peril. He threw himself forward, hurling Angela aside. But the rocks came down, and once again Hastings sank into blackness.

“PAUL! Paul!” It was Angela’s voice, and somehow it carried a sweetness greater than the music to his ears.

He opened his eyes. She was shaking him, dragging him from the debris “that littered the floor of the cavern.

“Are you all right?”

“I think so.” He stood up, shakily. “Yes, I’m all right. But—what happened to you?”

He stared at Angela. Something had happened, but at first he could not comprehend the nature of the change. Then he realized it. The white-robed girl who stood before him, clung to him, and then kissed him was just that and nothing more. A white-robed girl, minus halo, harp and wings. And there was nothing angelic about her kiss, however heavenly it might seem.

“They’re gone!” he whispered. “Yes—did you sea them?”

“Who?”

“My visitors. You were knocked out. They came at last to tell me that I was not forgotten, you were not forgotten.”

Paul Hastings nodded, numbly. His head still whirled, whether from the shock of the blow or the shock of Angela’s transformation, or the added shock of her words.

“I’ve got good news, Paul. At least, I think it’s good news,” the girl told him. “Your soul is saved. What you did, speaking the truth and defying the Devil, atoned for the evil. But there was a price to be paid.”

"What price?"

"I forfeited my right to return to heaven. In order to return, I must stay on earth and live through another life, virtuously."

She gazed up at Hastings. "So now I'm just a girl," she concluded. "And you'll have to act as my guardian angel."

Hastings managed a rock-scarred grin. "I'll keep you virtuous," he promised. "But not too virtuous." It seemed like a nice tag-line for a clinch, but before they could manage it, a sallow, sour-faced man clambered down through the cavern and approached them.

"Hey, what's the big idea?" he demanded. "Smooching around hyar in a nightie—reckon you'uns'll catch your death of cold."

"Just where are we, anyway?" Hastings demanded.

The sour-faced man squirted tobacco-juice at the rocks. "This here's Mammoth Cave," he said.

Hastings shrugged. He and Angela followed their self-appointed guide up towards the entrance, up towards the world of what passes these days for reality.

"So we start a new life," he observed. "No wings, no halo, no harp."

"About that harp," Angela said. "That was a pretty wild inspiration—having me play music to keep off the damned."

"Not my idea at all," Hastings confessed. "Fellow name of Orpheus thought of it ages ago. Lucky thing the Devil mentioned it and Brimstone reminded me of it again as we passed through. I got to thinking, if I could distract his attention long enough we might have a chance to re-string the harp and escape. And that's just what we did."

"One thing more," Angela ventured.

"Yes?"

"About Brimstone—whatever happened to him;"

Hastings grinned. From his pocket he produced the straight razor.

"I took care of him when we got into the noisy darkness of that tunnel, where he couldn't read my thoughts. That was the end of the cat—and the beginning of your music. After all, where do you think I got the new harpstrings? You may not know it, my dear, but you were playing on poor old Brimstone!”

They emerged from the cave. It was evening. Hell was below, heaven was above. Except, of course, for the little portions of both which they would carry forever in their hearts.

THE END

The TIn You Love to Touch

"BANISH HOUSEWORK CARES FOREVER" the ad promised and lo Roscoe it was like the promise of Paradise. But when he answered the ad he didn't expect to receive a robot by return mail—he knew Agatha wouldn't stand for such a thing.

"GOOD morning, Madam," It said the travelling salesman. "Are you the lady of the house?"

The slight figure in the apron and gingham dustcap moved forward in the doorway. "Kindly scram out of here," growled the voice from under the dustcap.

"But lady—"

"Don't you 'lady' me!" snarled the voice. "Now get out before I kick your sample-case for you!"

The salesman turned hastily away and the door slammed behind him.

Inside the bungalow, the figure in cap and apron sat down wearily on the chair nearest the door of the hallway.

"Oh for heaven's sake!" growled Roscoe Droop. "What in blazes can I do?"

Neither Heaven nor Hell gave Mm a reply as Mr. Droop flung his apron in the corner and tore the cap from his head. Without his domestic disguise, Roscoe Droop was revealed as a small, sallow-faced man with a slight body and gentle blue eyes.

Right now his eyes were clouded with rage and baffled indignation.

"What can I do?" he sighed, wearily. "That makes the third time this week some jerk salesman has mistaken me for a woman. What a spot to be in!"

He blushed and reached for a cigar. But he didn't light the stogie. Just in time he remembered—Agatha hated cigar smoke.

Agatha!

She was to blame for all his troubles. Agatha Droop. Sometimes Mr. Droop wondered why he had ever married her. Then the realized that he hadn't, really. She had married him.

Agatha was like that. Domineering. Six feet of solid muscle. Arms like steel cables. Just what they wanted down at the Hercules Steel Mill.

No wonder she'd found it easy to get a job as a welder! That had started all the trouble—Agatha's welding job. Mr. Droop recalled the announcement perfectly.

"I'm going to be a welder," she had told him, one evening. "I'll make about seventy bucks a week, plus overtime."

"But honey," he protested.

These were the last words Mr. Droop ever uttered on the subject. Because Agatha started in.

"You'll have to quit your job, of course," she said. "Quit it at once. I can earn more money than you, so it's only common sense. You're too frail for factory work, and nobody wants a runt like you around anyway. So you can stay home and take it easy from now on.

"All you need to take care of is the housework, the gardening, firing the furnace, mowing the lawn, marketing, washing, cleaning, scrubbing, mopping, dusting and getting my meals."

Mr. Droop started to open his mouth again to say, "But honey" and then he stopped. Because Agatha hit him over the head with a teapot.

And so Agatha went to work and Mr. Droop stayed home and took care of the house.

It was humiliating. It was infuriating. It couldn't go on. Mr. Droop would have gone mad if it weren't for his hobby.

His hobby had always managed to save him, somehow. When he got married, Roscoe Droop was an enthusiastic putterer. He loved to mess around with tools and woodcarving jobs, and he had a home workshop in his basement. That is, he had it for about a month—and then Agatha made him give it up.

Now, in moments of strain, Mr. Droop had nothing to turn to but his hobby magazine.

Like many an enthusiastic amateur, Mr. Droop was an avid reader of a magazine called UNPOPULAR SCIENCE. Its pages were crowded with monthly hints on how to build a yacht in your basement, how to run a model pig-pen in our garage, and other such fascinating topics.

Not that it did Mr. Droop any good. Right now he could have used, a washing machine or a vacuum cleaner more than anything else. But he had no money to buy such household aids.

Roscoe Droop simply wasn't the domestic type. He hated his washing and dusting and cooking. And these episodes with salesmen humiliatec him. In times like these he turned tc the consoling pages of UNPOPULAB SCIENCE.

It was with black despair (and hi: hands) that he now picked up the latest issue and riffled through the pages of the magazine.

He read the ads.

"YOU TOO CAN TURN YOUR ATTIC INTO A MODEL AQUARIUM."

"BUILD A SUBWAY IN YOUR BASEMENT."

It was no use. Roscoe Droop would never build an aquarium or a subway. He riffled through the classified advertisements and thought of his housekeeping tasks to come.

Housekeeping.

The little square ad in the fine print fairly leaped out at him.

"BANISH HOUSEWORK CARES FOREVER," the headline proclaimed. "Startling new discovery eliminates all household duties!"

It sounded like a blurb for a new brand of soap chips to Mr. Droop. But he read on.

"Prominent scientist has perfected the ideal women's home companion," the ad stated. "Working models now in experimental stage. A limited number available for immediate trial. These models will not be sold—merely loaned out for six months' free trial to responsible parties. If you desire to take advantage of this offer, kindly submit complete character references in first letter. Write Dr. PEDRO MOKE, B.S.: S. O. L. BOX 13, UNPOPULAR SCIENCE."

Mr. Droop sat up. Maybe this might prove to be a solution to his unpleasant domestic difficulties. This invention, whatever it was, could relieve him of his work.

But Agatha would object, of course—

"Roscoe!"

The soft voice, gentle as the cry of a bull walrus, smote Mr. Droop's ear. A moment later the same ear was smote by a brawny fist.

"What are you loafing around for, you lazy bum?" growled a voice.

Mr. Droop looked up—way up—at Agatha.

Agatha Droop stood six feet tall in her Safety-Toe work shoes. The slacks covering her massive frame would have made an excellent pup-tent for a large troop of Boy Scouts.

She was not exactly a sight for sore eyes, although she was able to hand out sore eyes to those who didn't jump fast enough to suit her.

"What gives?" Agatha bellowed, flinging her lunch pail to the floor. "Isn't my dinner ready yet?"

"Just a minute, darling," sighed Mr. Droop.

"Well, hurry it up," his wife grumbled. "Here I work hard at the shop all day and you sit around the house taking things easy. I'm a working woman and I want my food."

Mr. Droop went into action. He brought Agatha the evening paper and her house slippers, and then finished up preparing the dinner in the kitchen.

Agatha snorted and grumbled her way to the table. She sat down and helped herself to the meat, the potatoes, the asparagus, the peas, the salad, the coffee, the pie.

Mr. Droop waited for comments. He'd worked hard at this meal.

One bite was enough.

"Where'd you get this stuff?" demanded Agatha, chewing her steak.

"Why, at the butcher's, darling."

"At the shoe-maker's, you mean! It's as tough as leather!"

"But—"

Agatha swung and Mr. Droop ducked. Gravy splattered the top of his head as the meat sailed across the room.

"One more mistake like that and I'll fix you," growled Agatha, stalking from the table.

Mr. Droop crept away. In the hall he noticed his discarded copy of UNPOPULAR SCIENCE. His lips tightened in a grim smile.

"All right," he murmured. "We'll see."

It was only a matter of minutes before he had written his letter to Dr. Pedro Moke—Inventor. He mailed it that same evening.

He didn't know what to expect, but he had a naive hope that his troubles would soon be over. That night he slumbered in bed quite peacefully.

On Mr. Droop's face was the gentle, trusting look of a little child—and the black eye that Agatha gave him just before they went to sleep.

IT WAS nearly a week later that the expressman arrived with the package. Mr. Droop had almost forgotten about his letter by this time.

But the doorbell rang and he answered it, and one of the expressmen tipped his cap and said, "Pardon me, Madam—"

Mr. Droop almost slammed the door in his face when he noticed the big package the men had carried up the stairs. It was a heavy wooden crate, and bore his name and address on the side in bold black crayon lettering.

"That's for me!" he exclaimed. "Where do I sign?"

In his excitement he lighted a cigar, and the expressmen scratched their heads as the "housewife" puffed on a fat stogie while signing the receipt.

Then they went down the steps and drove away, and Mr. Droop approached the bulky crate and tried to lift it.

Too heavy. It wouldn't budge.

Mr. Droop bent down to try again, wondering if he ought to answer a truss advertisement in UNPOPULAR SCIENCE. He strained and swore. The crate remained immovable.

"Now what the hell do I do?" be groaned.

"Why not open me up here?" said a voice.

"Fine idea—what's that?" snapped the startled man.

"Unwrap me here, silly," the voice advised.

"Where are you?" asked Mr. Droop, whirling around.

"Inside the crate, of course. Hurry up—it's no picnic being cooped up this way."

"It's no picnic listening to strange voices from packing-crates, either," observed Mr. Droop, a little bitterly. Still, he scurried away for a hammer and chisel.

When he returned, he approached the task of removing nails a little hesitantly. He was somewhat afraid of what might be inside the crate. These screwball inventors, now.

"What are you waiting for?" complained the shrill voice.

"Why—it's just that—who are you, anyway?" he demanded suddenly.

"I don't know."

"You don't know?"

"Of course not, silly."

"Where did you come from, then?"

"From Dr. Moke, naturally. He made me."

"Then who are you?"

"I'm not a who, I'm a what," said the voice.

“Animal, vegetable or mineral?.” inquired Mr. Droop.

“Neither.”

“But—”

“Oh, open the crate, Mister! I won’t bite you.”

This wasn’t much of a promise, but Mr. Droop was beginning to worry lest neighbors observe him carrying on a conversation with a packing-crate. Those old hens were gossipy enough, anyway.

With a deep sigh, Mr. Droop set to work. He pried away the boards and got tangled up in a bale of excelsior beneath. Then he began to remove a number of packages, wrapped in brown paper. Some were big, some small, some were long and some short. He set them down carefully on the porch.

He stooped again and his hands encountered—the bottom of the crate!

Where was the person who had spoken to him?

Outside of the small packages, the crate was empty!

“Hey!” said Mr. Droop. “What’s happened to you?”

“I’m right here,” said the voice, patiently. “Here, at your feet.”

Mr. Droop jumped to one side. A large round brown-paper parcel rested before him.

“Come on, unwrap me,” coaxed the voice.

His trembling fingers had quite a time, but Mr. Droop did the job. Then he stared down at the heavy, shining object in his hands.

It was a head—a metal head!

At least, it resembled a head. There was a sharp steel chin, a jutting aluminum nose, two eyesockets and a mouth set on a hinged jaw. The top of the silver skull was smooth and gleaming, but the base was corrugated, and a pipe extended under the chin.

“Hello,” said the metal face. “Who are you?”

“God only knows,” gasped Mr. Droop wildly. “I’m a guy that never expected to be talking to a steel head.”

“I know,” said the gleaming face. “You’re Mr. Droop, the man I’ve come to work for.”

"I guess so," Mr. Droop sighed. He watched in morbid fascination as the steel hinge slipped up and down on the jaw.

"How do you talk?" he asked.

"Quite well, thank you," answered the head. "But come on, quit stalling. Put me together, will you please?"

"Put you together?"

"Of course. Assemble me. You'll find the rest of my parts in the other packages."

"What kind of crazy talk is this?" he wondered wildly.

"Are you by any chance accusing me of not being all there?" snapped the head, coldly. "If so, you're mistaken. Dr. Moke personally dismembered me and packed me up. He would have sent you complete instructions for putting me together again, but there was no need. I can give you the directions personally. Come on, get busy. It's really very simple, you know. A three-year old child could do it."

Mr. Droop turned hastily away.

"Where are you going?" asked the head.

"To find you a three-year-old child. Let him do it. I don't want to."

The head burst into metallic laughter. "Come on, now. Just put me together. You'll find nuts and bolts in that small parcel, next to my arms and legs. And oh yes—that looks like my torso over there."

Cautiously, Mr. Droop set about his unusual task. Aided by the expert direction of the metal head, he began to assemble what soon proved to be a complete metal body. Two arms and two legs—beautifully hinged and articulated in the smallest detail—were easily attached to a shapely torso. Small openings in the metal sides were provided for the reception of a number of loose wire ends which made automatic connections somewhere inside the steel frame.

Little aluminum pins were set in place, and the head lowered onto an opening at the top of the torso. A telescoping connection evidently served as a neck.

Finally, Mr. Droop affixed wonderfully designed hands and feet to the ends of the metal limbs. The fingers and toes were quite the most remarkable features of the entire body.

"There," said the head, with some satisfaction. "At last! Hope all my wires are in place. You men are so clumsy." A surprising giggle came from the hinged jaws. "You lack the feminine touch."

"Feminine touch? Are you—female?"

"Of course, silly," tittered the head. "Aren't house servants supposed to be female?"

"Then what's your name?"

"I have none. That's up to you, Mr. Droop. Now—would you mind helping me up?"

Mr. Droop gingerly assisted the metal creature to its—or her—feet. Surprisingly enough, the five-foot body stood there in a perfect simulacrum of humanity.

Just like the Tin Woodman of Oz, Mr. Droop thought, wildly. Abruptly, he opened his mouth.

"That's it," he exclaimed. "I'll call you Tinnie."

"Tinnie? That's very nice—if not strictly accurate," said the metal creature. "After all, Dr. Moke might not like it if you inferred his robots were made out of tin."

"You're a robot," said Mr. Droop. "A real, sure-enough robot."

"Of course I am," said Tinnie. "And you can talk and walk and think and —everything?"

"Not quite 'everything,' I'm afraid," Tinnie giggled. "You needn't worry about feeding me or a place to sleep. A little oiling now and then, and a little attention to my wiring is all I need."

Tinnie walked across the porch and Mr. Droop followed her metallic movements with astounded eyes. Aside from a slight clattering and swaying, the robot moved with remarkable precision. Whatever the miracle behind sight, hearing, thought, and mechanical coordination—the robot was real. And definitely a perfect working model.

As he watched, Tinnie bent down and scooped up brown paper and boards.

"Better clear this up right away," said the robot.

"Wait—I'll help you," said Mr. Droop, out of habit.

"Never mind," the robot told him. "This is my job. That's what Dr. Moke told me before I was packed. I came here to do the housework. So if you'll just show me around and tell me what you want done . . ."

Shaking his head in bewilderment, Mr. Droop followed Tinnie into the house.

It all sounded too good to be true. In his elation, he could have hugged the metal mademoiselle, kissed her squarely upon the hinges of her shiny silver jaw. But Mr. Droop was a highly moral man.

He compromised by giving Tinnie the house apron and dust-cap to wear.

The robot stood before the mirror, adjusting the garments.

"How lovely," Tinnie sighed. "You're so thoughtful, Mr. Droop. I know I'll enjoy working here for you. Is there anything you want before I go out and prepare supper?"

Mr. Droop paused, then grinned.

"Why yes," he said. "Yes, there is. Would you mind running into the bedroom and bringing me out a cigar?"

THE next few days were perfect—almost too perfect.

Mr. Droop made up his mind on one point, right away. Agatha must never know. Long before she arrived home that first evening, Mr. Droop had carefully instructed Tinnie on her expected chores and warned her to keep out of sight when Mrs. Droop was around.

He offered no explanation, and was thankful when the robot demanded none.

"Lie down under the bed," he suggested. "Stay there all night. Agatha goes to work at seven. Then you can get up."

Tinnie obeyed. The next day Mr. Droop showed her around and told her what was necessary for her to know about running the house.

It was sheer delight to watch Tinnie work. She never tired, never questioned, never complained. She swept, mopped, dusted. She washed and cleaned. And she cooked beautifully.

Dr. Moke had wrought wonders, all right. Mr. Droop could ask for nothing more. Tinnie stayed out of sight whenever the doorbell rang.

Agatha was more than pleased at the way the household was run. She asked no questions, but she grunted her surprise at Mr. Droop when she inspected the carefully dusted parlor and ate the well-cooked meals.

Mr. Droop had never been so happy before in his life—his married life, that is.

He couldn't help but tell Tinnie as much.

One afternoon, as the robot was sweeping the carpets and Mr. Droop stretched out on the sofa reading UNPOPULAR SCIENCE and puffing on a cigar, he suddenly shook his head.

"Is something wrong?" asked Tinnie, cocking her metallic head.

"Not at all," said Mr. Droop. "Quite the contrary. I was just marvelling at your efficiency. You're really quite wonderful, you know."

"Thank you," said the robot. "Dr. Moke would be pleased to hear that, I'm sure."

"What kind of a man is Dr. Moke?" asked Mr. Droop.

"He's a very famous scientist," Tinnie told him. "He's been working on his robot models for many years."

"He ought to be proud of creating you," Mr. Droop declared. "But I don't quite understand just how he managed to do it."

"Would you like to hear how I was made?" inquired Tinnie.

"Well—" said Mr. Droop. For no reason at all, he blushed a little.

"What's the matter?" Tinnie asked. "Didn't you ever hear about how to make a girl?"

"Uh—not exactly," admitted Mr. Droop, turning redder by the moment.

"It was an awful problem," the robot sighed. "To begin with there were the radio-frequencies to establish. How that man sweated over my wiring! Then he devised the artificial larnyx, the balance and coordination centers, and my chromium receptors. Even designing a steel and aluminum body was a problem. I'll never forget how he hid me in the basement during the scrap drive!"

Tinnie sighed reminiscently, and her toes rattled.

"Well, he did a swell job," Mr. Droop declared. "You look perfect."

"You really think so?" Tinnie giggled coyly. "Sometimes I think so myself." She swayed closer. "Have you noticed my chassis?" she murmured.

"Indeed I have," said Mr. Droop. "You have a lovely chassis, my dear."

Tinnie tittered.

"I mean it," said Mr. Droop. "I like you, Tinnie. I like everything about you. You're quiet and sensible and hardworking. You never nag or bully. I like your shining face and your—

"Awk!" said Tinnie.

"Whassat?" yelped Mr. Droop.

"Awk."

Tinnie suddenly stood rigid. Her metal arms dropped to her side and her head hung forward.

"What's the matter?" Mr. Droop asked, springing to his feet.

"I don't know." Tinnie's jaw moved laboriously on its hinges. "Your flattery got me so upset—I think maybe I've blown a fuse."

"Great heavens!" Droop exclaimed. "Maybe I'd better send for a doctor."

"A garage mechanic would be better," squeaked the robot. "No—don't. I know now. One of the wires in my neck is loose. I can feel it dangling. You'll have to slip it back into my batteries, that's all. Just reach in and set the loose end back where it belongs."

Mr. Droop approached the robot and found the dangling wire. He bent down, put his arms around Tinnie's neck and held her back as his hands fumbled with the loose connection.

"Roscoe!"

Mr. Droop whirled suddenly.

Agatha stood, in the doorway. Her blazing eyes consumed the scene before her.

"Roscoe—what are you up to?" rasped Mrs. Droop. "What is this—this animated garbage can?"

"It's a robot," Mr. Droop whispered. "Her name is Tinnie."

"Her name?" Agatha bristled. "A woman, eh?"

"No, you don't understand," Mr. Droop protested. "She's only a housemaid. She's been helping me out around the house . . ."

"So I see."

Agatha stared bleakly at Mr. Droop's pose. He still held Tinnie in his arms, and his left hand was poised at her neck in what appeared to be an impassioned caress.

"But you don't see!" wailed Mr. Droop. "I wasn't doing anything, Agatha—I swear it! I was merely tinkering with her batteries—"

"Tinkering with her batteries?" Agatha was shocked.

"I mean, she asked me to examine her chassis—"

Mr. Droop waved his arms pitifully. "I can't explain," he sighed. "But it's all right. She's harmless. Not like you and I. No mother or father—"

"Go on," snapped Agatha. "Go on. Tell me how you took advantage of this poor orphan while I was away. I ought to tear you limb from limb."

"Please don't make a mess," piped Tinnie. "I've just cleaned the carpet."

"You see?" exclaimed Mr. Droop, triumphantly. "She's a robot. A scientist sent her here to do the housework. She's a perfect servant."

"Humph!" remarked his wife. Then she shrugged. "We'll look into all this later," she promised. "I'd tend to this little affair now, but there's something more important on my mind."

"What is it?" asked Mr. Droop.

"I'm bringing the boss home for dinner tomorrow night," Agatha announced.

"The boss?"

"Yes sir," Agatha declared, triumphantly. "If I make a real impression I can go places at the Hercules Steel Mill. My dinner guest is none other than George Musclebinder himself."

"The Steel King?" said Mr. Droop, impressed in spite of himself.

"Nobody else but. Tomorrow night you'll prepare dinner for one of the biggest steel men in the country and I want you to remember that. You and your Tin Lizzie kitchen maid had better turn out a good meal, or else."

"We'll do it," Mr. Droop promised.

"Of course we will," said the robot.

Mrs. Droop glared at Tinnie malevolently.

"None of your tricks now," she muttered. "I'm going to let you stay until tomorrow and help out. But after that—"

"You aren't going to send her away, are you?" whispered Mr. Droop.

Agatha nodded.

"Certainly am," she told him. "After tomorrow night, she goes out of here on her tin can!"

MR. Droop had a miserable time of it that night and throughout the following day. He himself tended to the dusting and cleaning while Tinnie busied herself in the kitchen, preparing the meal for Agatha and her special guest.

"You'll have to serve," she told him. "Your wife won't let her boss see me. I don't think Agatha likes me very well."

"She'll get over it," Mr. Droop assured her, none too convincingly. "Agatha is like that. Just fix a good meal, now, and I'm sure she'll forgive you and let you stay."

"You want me to stay?" said Tinnie. A melting gleam appeared in the reflected corners of her eyesockets.

"More than anything in the world," said Mr. Droop. "It's been just heavenly having you here—for the first time I know what peace and comfort means."

Tinnie giggled. Mr. Droop stared at her. For the first time he noticed that her jaw-hinges made dimples in her cheeks. A most becoming phenomenon.

"Well." He cleared his throat. "We'd better hurry. They should be arriving any minute now."

Mr. Droop set the table and Tinnie retreated to the kitchen. He could hear her fussing with pots and pans on the stove.

Then the doorbell rang and Agatha entered.

George Musclebinder followed her into the hallway.

The Steel King was as rugged as his nickname implied. He was as tall and muscular as Agatha herself, and his bulldog features lent him an air of formidable pugnacity. At the moment, however, he was chuckling playfully and slapping Agatha on the back.

Agatha, coy and red-faced, snorted merrily and lighted his cigar for him.

Mr. Droop stood in the doorway amazed. Agatha acting playful! Agatha permitting someone to smoke in her house!

"Hello there," she called to him. "George and I are a little late, I guess. We stopped in for a couple boilermakers on the way home."

"Shot and a beer," Musclebinder explained. "Puts hair on your chest, eh, Aggie?"

Mr. Droop fully expected his wife to strike the Steel King dead. The idea of anyone calling her "Aggie" was unthinkable.

But Agatha did nothing of the sort. Instead she giggled, gave Musclebinder a dig in the ribs, and then sneered at Mr. Droop.

"What are you goggling at?" she demanded. "Take George's hat for him and get ready to serve dinner. We're starving."

Mr. Droop reached for Musclebinder's hat. The big man surveyed him with a chuckle.

"So this is your better half, eh, Aggie?" he said. "Well well well. Pleased to meet you—Droop."

He suddenly seized Mr. Droop's hand and began to grind it to a pulp. Mr. Droop's arm became totally numb up to the shoulder.

Musclebinder, evidently making up his mind whether or not to remove the arm from its socket, suddenly decided against it and dropped Mr. Droop's hand again.

"Let's see what you've cooked up for us working folks," he roared, with hideous heartiness. "Aggie tells me you're quite a good cook. Guess that's why she married you, huh?"

Mr. Droop would gladly have killed the man on the spot. Instead, a withering glance from Agatha sent him off to the closet with Musclebinder's hat. Then he stood aside as his wife and the Steel King made for the dining room.

They sat down. Agatha stared at the neatly-decorated table.

"What's the idea of three places?" she demanded.

"Well, there's Musclebinder, and you, and myself—"

"There's George and I," she corrected. "You can eat in the kitchen after we've finished. Hurry up now, start serving."

She turned to Musclebinder with a cloying smile. "Don't mind him—he's such a dope," she declared.

Mr. Droop stumbled out into the kitchen. He sighed.

"What's the matter?" asked Tinnie, solicitously, as she covered the entree with a silver lid.

"Nothing, nothing at all," lied Mr. Droop desperately. He knew how hard Tinnie had worked preparing this meal and he hadn't the heart to spoil things for her now.

"Everything will be all right," he lied. "I'm going to eat out here with you and keep you company."

The robot flashed him a look of gratitude not unmixed with maternal anxiety.

"I do hope her boss likes what I've prepared for him," she said. "Here's Agatha's plate. But this dish is specially for him."

"Swell," said Mr. Droop.

He took soup into the dining room. Agatha and Musclebinder were laughing uproariously. At the sight of Mr. Droop, his wife's jaw set.

"What's this?" she demanded.

"Why—soup."

"That's not what I mean, stupid! What's the idea of serving food without being properly dressed? Go back in the kitchen and put on your apron."

"Haw haw!" laughed Musclebinder. "That's a hot one! Got him trained, haven't you?"

"You can bet who wears the slacks around this family!" Agatha boasted. "He toes the line, just like the men do down at the shop."

"That's right," Musclebinder declared. "In all my years as a steel man I've never seen anyone who could handle men the way you could. That's what I wanted to talk to you about, Aggie. How'd you like to be promoted to foreman?"

Mr. Droop didn't hear her answer. He humbly cleared away the soup plates, and returned from the kitchen with the main dishes.

Agatha's plate contained meat and potatoes.

Musclebinder received a bare platter and the silver-lidded entree dish.

"Something special for you," Mr. Droop told him.

"Swell! Say, I'll bet you're the sweetest little housekeeper," snickered Musclebinder, roguishly pinching. Mr. Droop's cheek.

He swept the lid off the platter and helped himself liberally to the gravy-covered contents.

"Gawd, I'm starved," he bellowed. "I'm gonna eat and eat and—"

He speared a forkful from the mass on his plate and gulped eagerly.

Suddenly his eyes goggled.

"Gazawp!" he spluttered. "Oookle. Mfffuggg! Ulp!"

"What's the matter?" Agatha murmured.

"Urgle! Pluppff! Aaaargh!" groaned Musclebinder. His face turned a deep purple and he began to choke and cough.

"George—what in the name of—"

"Yeeeeoooowww!!!"

With a gasping shriek, Musclebinder managed to expectorate the obstruction in his throat.

Objects fell with a hideous clank on his plate.

Wide-eyed, Mr. Droop stared at what lay there. A gravy-covered collection of nuts, bolts, and pieces of sheet metal!

“What the hell?” croaked Musclebinder.

“Come here—you!” yapped Agatha.

Mr. Droop made a dash for the kitchen door. Agatha pounded at his heels.

“Who did it?” she screamed, bursting into the kitchen to confront her husband and the robot.

“Did what?” asked Tinnie, calmly.

“Who served my boss that dish of hardware?”

“Why I did, of course,” Tinnie told her. “What’s the matter, did you want some too? I hardly thought I should give nuts to you.”

“Nuts to who?” yelled Agatha. “Quit insulting me! What I want to know is—why serve George Musclebinder a plate of metal?”

“Isn’t that what he likes to eat?” asked Tinnie. “I thought you said he was a big steel man.”

“Steel man?”

Agatha went berserk.

She made a dive for the robot across the room. Half-way in her charge she scooped up the can-opener from the kitchen table. Brandishing the deadly weapon, she bore down on Tinnie with murderous intent.

“You metal-brained moron,” screamed Agatha. “I’ll chop you up into tin cans!”

She slashed out with the can-opener as Tinnie retreated around the kitchen table.

Mr. Droop stood paralyzed for an instant. But only for an instant. Then something snapped inside him. He growled.

“Let her alone!” yelled Mr. Droop.

Agatha turned. “How dare you interfere, you worm?” she demanded.

“Let her alone!” commanded Mr. Droop. “Don’t you dare harm the woman I love.”

"Love?" Agatha gasped.

So did Mr. Droop. The words came unbidden to his lips—but when he spoke them, he realized he was telling the truth.

"You love this walking junk-heap?" rasped Agatha.

"Yes," said Mr. Droop, desperately. "And if you harm her, I'll—no you don't!"

Agatha turned and struck out at Tinnie.

As she did so, Mr. Droop went into action. Grabbing up a rolling pin, he brought it down firmly on Agatha's head. The rolling pin broke, but Agatha stopped.

At that moment, George Musclebinder lurched into the kitchen.

"What's all this?" roared the Steel King.

His eyes goggled as he saw Tinnie. The robot, seeking to escape, tottered toward him. Musclebinder saw the gleaming steel-body, the metallic face, the outstretched clawing arms advancing.

"A monster!" he gurgled. "Help—it's witchcraft—take it away!"

Shaking with sudden fright, Musclebinder dashed from the kitchen.

Agatha followed.

"Wait for me, George," she wailed. "I'm coming with you."

She paused in the doorway and sniffed at Mr. Droop.

"I suppose you know this is the end," she told him. "I'm leaving you for good. You've made a wreck out of poor George. And if you prefer the company of a walking garbage-can to me—well, it's your funeral!"

Mr. Droop made a gesture with his rolling-pin and Agatha closed the door hastily.

He stood there, listening to the sound of retreating footsteps.

Tinnie was at his side, her jaw-hinges moving in a slow smile.

"Thank you," she said. "Thank you for saving me."

"Nothing at all," muttered Mr. Droop, in an embarrassed voice. "Forget it."

"I can't forget it," said Tinnie. The robot moved closer. Her voice was soft. "Did you mean what you told Agatha?" she asked.

“What?” gulped Mr. Droop.

“About—about the woman you love.” Tinnie turned her face away shyly as she spoke.

“I—I guess I did,” admitted Mr. Droop, slowly.

“Then I can stay here,” said Tinnie. “And cook for you and keep house and everything.”

Mr. Droop turned with new resolution. He held the robot close. “I’ll say you can,” he muttered. “I’ll go out and get a job and feel like a man again. And you can run the household. Tinnie, I’ve always wanted a girl just like you.”

And so it was arranged. Mr. Droop wrote to Dr. Moke and got permission. The two of them have settled down quite happily.

As to whether a union between a man and a robot can work out, only time can tell.

But at the moment both Tinnie and Mr. Droop are looking forward to the day they can celebrate their tin wedding anniversary.

THE END

The Dead Don't Die!

Just because that lovely girl smiled at you, does that mean she's alive? Better take another look—she may be a walking corpse named Vera LaValle . . .

THIS IS a story that never ends. This is a story that never ends, but I know when it started. Thursday, May 24th, was the date. That night was the beginning of everything for me.

For Cono Colluri it was the end.

Cono and I were sitting there, playing two-handed stud poker. It was quiet in his cell, and we played slowly, meditatively. Everything would have been all right except for one thing. We had a kibitzer.

No matter how calmly we played, no matter how unemotional we appeared to be, we both were aware of another presence. The other, the kibitzer, stayed with us all night long.

His name was Death.

He grinned over Cono's shoulder, tapped him on the arm with a bony finger, selected the cards for every shuffle. He tugged at my hands, poked me in the back when I dealt.

We couldn't see him, of course. But we knew he was there, all right. Watching, watching and waiting; those big blind holes in the skull sneaking a look at the clock and counting the minutes, those skeleton fingers tapping away the seconds until dawn.

Because in the morning, no matter what cards turned up and no matter how much money changed hands, Death would win the game. The game, and Cono Colluri.

It's funny, looking back on it now, to figure out how the three of us happened to get together that particular evening—Cono, myself, and Death.

My story's straight enough. About six months beforehand I'd taken a Civil Service exam and ended up for a probationary period as a guard at State Pen. I wasn't too excited about the job when I got it, but I felt it might give me routine, a small but steady income, and a chance to turn out a book on the side. By the time a few months had passed, I knew I was wrong. The idea of turning out a novel in a background of security sounded fine when I started, but there was no security in a guard's life. I found I couldn't write. The bars and the concrete penned me in just as much as any of my charges. And I began to develop my own sense of guilt.

I guess my trouble was too much empathy. That's a big word—meaning the ability to put yourself in the other fellow's place. "There but for the grace of God go!"—you know that feeling. I had it, but double. Instead of writing at night, I tossed around on my bunk and suffered the torments of the thousand men under my charge.

That's how I got friendly with Cono, I guess—through empathy.

Cono came to the death cell in an awful hurry. His had been a short trial and a merry one—the kind of thing the newspapers like to play up as an example of "quick justice". He'd been a professional strong man with a carnival—the James T. Armstrong Shows. The story was that he got too jealous of his wife and one of the other performers. At any rate, one morning they found Cono lying dead drunk in his trailer. His wife was with him, but she wasn't drunk—merely dead. Somebody had pressed two thumbs against the base of her neck, and something had snapped.

It was an ideal setup for "quick justice" and that's just what Cono Colluri got. Within three weeks he was on his way to the death-house, and for the past two weeks he'd been a guest of the state. A temporary guest. And he was moving out tomorrow morning—for good.

THAT, OF course, explains why Death showed up at our little card party. He belonged there.

Oh, perhaps not for the entire night. He undoubtedly had rattled down the short—oh so terribly short!—corridor to the little room with the big chair. He'd probably peered and eavesdropped on the electricians who tested the switches. He'd certainly have stopped in at the warden's office to make sure that the mythical pardon from the Governor wasn't on its way.

Yes, Death must have checked all those things to make certain that this was really a farewell card party. And now the uninvited guest was kibitzing as Cono and I dealt our hands.

I knew he was there, and Cono knew it too, but I have to hand it to the big man. He was cool. He'd always been cool; on the stand, swearing his innocence, he'd never lost his temper. Here in the cell, talking to the warden, to the other guards, to me, he'd never broken down. Just told his story over and over again. Somebody had slipped a Mickey in his drink and when he woke up, Flo was dead. He'd never harmed her.

Of course, nobody believed him at the trial. Nobody believed him in the prison, either; the warden, the guards, even the other convicts knew that he was guilty and ready to fry.

That's why I had the honor of spending the last night with him—he'd made a special request for my presence. Because, believe it or not, I believed him.

Blame it on empathy again, or on the very fact that I noticed he never lost his temper. The way he talked about the case, the way he talked about his wife, the way he talked about the execution—everything was out of character for a "crime of passion" murderer. Oh, he was a big brute, and a rough-looking one, but he never acted on impulse.

I guess he took to me right away. We used to talk, nights, after I drew guard assignment on his bloc. He was the only prisoner awaiting execution, and it was natural that we'd get to talking.

"You know I didn't do it, Bob," he'd tell me—over and over again, but there was nothing else to talk about, for him—"It must have been Louie. He lied at the trial, you know. He had been drinking with me, no matter what he says, and he offered me a slug out of the bottle behind the cookhouse, after the last show'. That's the last thing I remember. So I figure he must have done it. He was always hanging around Flo anyway, the little crumb. The Great Ahmed warned me, said he saw it in the crystal. But of course, he came into court with this alibi and—oh what's the use?"

There was no use at all, and he knew it. But he told me over and over again. And I believed him.

NOW THIS last night, he wasn't talking. Maybe it was because Death was there, listening to every word. Maybe it was because they'd shaved his head and slit his trouser legs and left him to wait out these last few hours.

Cono wasn't talking, but he could still grin. He could and he did—smiling at me and looking like a great big overgrown college boy with a crew haircut. Come to think of it, he wasn't much more than just that; only Cono had never gone to college. He went with his first carney at fifteen, married Flo when he was twenty-three, and now he was going to the chair two days before his twenty-fifth birthday. But he smiled. Smiled, and played poker.

"My king is high," he said. "Bet a quarter."

"See you," I answered. "Let's have another card."

"King still high. Check. Funny thing, aces aren't coming up much tonight."

I didn't answer him. I didn't-have the heart to tell him that I was cheating. I'd taken the Ace of Spades out of the pack and put it in my pocket before the game started. I didn't want him to get that particular card on the table tonight of all nights.

"Fifty cents on the king," said Cono.

"See you," I said. "I've got a pair of nines."

"Pair of kings." He turned up his cards. "I win."

"You're just naturally lucky," I told him—and wished I hadn't.

But he smiled. I couldn't face that smile, so I looked at my watch. That was another mistake, and I realized it as soon as I made the gesture.

His smile didn't alter. "Not much time left, is there?" he said. "Seems to be getting light."

"Another hand?" I suggested.

"No." Cono stood up. Shaved head, slit trousers and all, he was still an impressive sight. Six feet four, two hundred and ten pounds, in the prime of life. And in just an hour or so they would strap him into the chair, turn on the juice, twist that smile into a grimace of agony. I couldn't look at him, thinking those thoughts. But I could feel Death looking; gazing and gloating.

"Bob, I want to talk to you."

"Shall we order breakfast? You know what the warden said—anything you want, the works."

"No breakfast." Cono put his hand on my shoulder. The fingers that were supposed to have broken a woman's neck barely pressed my skin. "Let's fool 'em all and skip the meal. That'll give the nosey reporters something to talk about."

"What's up?"

"Nothing much. But I got things to tell you."

"Why me in particular?"

"Who else is there left? I got no friends. Got no family I know of. And Flo's gone. . . ."

FOR THE first time I saw a look of anger flicker across the big man's face. I knew then that whoever had killed Flo was lucky when Cono got the chair.

"So it has to be you. Besides, you believe me."

"Go on," I said.

“It’s about the dough, see? Flo and me, we were saving for a house. Got better’n eight grand stashed away. Somebody’s gonna get it, so why not you? I wrote this here letter, and I want you to have it.”

He pulled the envelope out from under his bunk. It was sealed, and scrawled across its face in the sprawling handwriting of a schoolboy was the name, “The Great Ahmed”.

“Who’s he?”

“I told you, he’s the mitt reader with the carney. A nice guy, Bob. You’ll like him. He stuck up for me at the trial, remember? Told about Louie hanging around Flo. Didn’t do any good because he couldn’t prove nothing, but he was—what did the lawyer say?—a character witness. Yeah. Anyhow, he banks for all us carneys with the show.

“Take the letter. It says to give you the money. He’ll do it, too. All you got to do is look him up.”

I hesitated. “Wait a minute, Cono. You’d better think this over. Eight thousand dollars is a lot of money to pass out to a virtual stranger—”

“Take it, pal.” Again he smiled. “There’s a string tied to the bundle, of course.”

“What do you want?”

“I want you to use some of that dough to try and clear me. Oh, I know you haven’t got much of a chance, and nothing to work on. But maybe, with the dough, you’ll get an angle, turn something up. You’re leaving this joint anyway.”

I jerked my head at that. “How did you know?” I asked. “Why, I only told the warden yesterday afternoon—”

“Word goes around,” Cono smiled. “They give me the office that you’re springing yourself out of here this Saturday. That you aren’t satisfied to be a screw the rest of your life. So I says to myself, why not give him the eight grand as a kind of going-away present? Seeing as how we’re both going away.”

I BALANCED the envelope on my palm. “The Great Ahmed, eh? And you say he’s with the show?”

“Sure. You’ll find their route in Billboard.” Cono smiled. “They must be somewhere around Louisville right now. Heading north as it gets warmer. I’d sort of like to see the old outfit again, but . . .”

The smile faded. “One more favor, Bob.”

“Name it.”

“Scram out of here.”

“But—”

“You heard me. Scram. I expect visitors pretty soon, and I don’t want you to stick around.”

I nodded, nodded gratefully. Cono was sparing me that final ordeal—the warden, the priest, the mumbling farewell, the shuffling down the corridor.

“Goodbye, Bob. Remember, I’m depending on you.”

“I’ll do what I can. Goodbye, Cono.”

The big hand enveloped mine. “I’ll be seeing you around,” he said. “Sure.”

“I mean it, Bob. You don’t believe this is the end, do you?”

“Maybe you’re right. I hope so.” I had no intention of getting into a discussion about the after-life with Cono, in his situation. Personally, I had a pretty good idea that once the juice was turned on, Cono would be turned off—forever. But I couldn’t tell him that. So I just shook hands, put the letter in my pocket, unlocked the cell, and walked out.

At the end of the corridor I turned around and looked back. Cono stood against the bars, his body outlined against the yellow light but blending into the shadows that come with dawn. There was another shadow behind him—a big, black shadow outlining a ghost of a figure.

I recognized the shadow. Old Man Death.

That was the last I saw—just the two of them, waiting together. Cono and Old Man Death.

I went downstairs, then, to my bunk. The night shift came off and the day shift went on. They were all talking about the execution. They tried to pump me, but I didn’t say anything. I sat there on the edge of the bunk, looking at my watch and waiting.

UPSTAIRS they must have gone through the whole routine, just the way you always see it in the B movies. Opening the door. Handcuffing him to a guard on either side. Marching down the corridor. Yes, just about now it would be happening. The night shift went outside to get the news, leaving me alone on my bunk. I looked at my watch again. Now was the time.

They’d be strapping him down now, putting that damned black cloth over his eyes. I could see him sitting there; a big, gentle hulk of a man with a tired smile on his face.

Maybe he was guilty, maybe he was innocent—I didn’t know. But the whole stupid business of execution, of “justice” and “punishment” and “the full penalty of the law” hit me in the pit of the stomach. It was cruel, it was senseless, it was wrong.

The seconds ticked away. I watched the little hand crawl around the face of the watch and tried to figure it out. One minute Cono would be alive. A jolt of electric current and he’d be dead. Trite idea. But it’s the eternal mystery all of us live with. And die with.

What was the answer? I didn’t know. Nobody knew. Nobody except the kibitzer. Old Man Death knew the answer. I wondered if he had a watch. No, why should he? What’s Time to Death?

Thirty seconds.

Sure, I’d quit my job. I’d try to clear Cono. But what good would it do him? He’d never know. He’d be dead.

Twenty seconds.

The hand crawled around, and the thoughts crawled around. What’s it like to be dead? Is it a sleep? Is it a sleep with dreams? Is it just dreams but no rest, no peace?

Ten seconds.

One moment you're alive, you can feel and hear and smell and see and move. And the next—nothing. Or—something. What's the change like? Like suddenly turning out the lights?

Now.

The lights went out.

First they dimmed, then they flickered, then they went out. Only for a second, mind you. But that was long enough.

Long enough for Cono to die.

Long enough for me to shudder.

Long enough for Death to reach out, grinning, and claim his prey in the dark . . .

I WAS STILL in a daze when I hit the railroad station on Saturday morning. So much had happened in the last two days I still couldn't figgure it out.

First of all, there was that business about Cono's body. I'd gone to the warden, of course, with the story about the money, and I more or less expected to handle funeral expenses from Cono's funds when I got them.

"His cousin will bury him," the warden told me. "Got a call this morning."

"But I thought he had no relatives."

"Turns out he has, all right. Fellow named Varek. Oh, it's legitimate, we always check. The Doc insists—makes him mad every time somebody shows up and cheats him out of an autopsy."

The warden had chuckled, but I didn't laugh.

And the warden hadn't chuckled long. Because the next day, Louie had confessed.

Louie the contortionist, that is—the man Cono claimed had given him the knockout drops in his drink. The warden got a wire, of course, but the whole story hit the papers that afternoon. It seems he'd just walked into the station-house in Louisville and confessed. Came out with the entire statement without a sign of emotion. Said he just wanted to clear his conscience once he knew Cono was dead. He'd hated Cono, wanted Flo, and when she repulsed him he rigged up the murder to get revenge on both of them.

The story was lurid enough, but it had gaps in it. The report I read claimed Louie was a hophead. He was too calm, too unemotional. "Glassy-eyed" was the way they put it. They were going to give him a psychiatric test.

Well, I wished them luck, the whole lot of them—psychiatrists and district attorneys and smart coppers and penologists. All I knew was that Cono was innocent. And he was dead.

By this time I'd already checked on the Armstrong Shows through Billboard. They were playing Louisville this week, all right. I sent through my wire Friday afternoon. Saturday morning I got a telegram signed by the advance agent in Paducah.

> "GREAT AHMED LEFT SHOW THREE WEEKS AGO STOP OPENING OWN MITT CAMP IN CHICAGO STOP WILL CHECK FORWARDING ADDRESS AND NOTIFY LATER"

So I was on my way to Chicago and eight thousand dollars. I'd hole up in some hotel and wait for news on the Great Ahmed. And after that—well, with the money, my writing problems would be solved.

ACTUALLY, I should have been happy enough at the way it had all turned out. Cono's name was cleared, I was out of the whole sordid grind forever, and I had eight grand coming, in cash.

But something bothered me. It wasn't just the irony of Cono Colluri's innocence. It was the inexplicable feeling that things weren't settled, that they were only beginning. That I had somehow been caught up in something that would sweep me along to—

"Chicago!" bawled the conductor.

And there I was, in the Windy City at 5 PM on Saturday, May 25th. It wasn't windy today. As I lugged my grip out of the LaSalle Street Station I walked straight into a pouring rain.

There's something about a storm in Chicago. It seems to melt all the taxicabs away. I stood there, contemplating the downpour, watching the cars inch along under the El tracks. The sky was dark and dirty. The water dribbled inkstains along the sides of the buildings. I couldn't stand watching it in my present mood.

So I walked. I turned corners several times. Pretty soon there was a hotel. It wasn't a good hotel. It was located too far south to be even a decent hotel. But that didn't matter. I needed a place to stay in for a couple of days until the money was located. And right now, I had to get out of the rain. My suit was soaked, and the cardboard in the luggage had taken a beating.

I went in, registered. A bellboy took me up to my room on the third floor.

Apparently he hadn't expected me. At least, he didn't know about my coming in time to shave. But he opened my door, deposited my luggage and asked if there'd be anything else now. Then he held out his hand. It would have taken me all day to give him a decent manicure, so I put a quarter in his palm instead. He was just as happy with that.

Then he left, I opened my grip, changed clothes, and went out to eat. The rain had moderated to a drizzle. I stopped in the lobby long enough to get eyed by the night clerk, the house dick, and a woman with improbable red hair.

During the pause I managed to send off a telegram to the advance man of the carney, giving him my new address and requesting action on locating the Great Ahmed. That concluded my business for the day.

At least, I thought it did at the time.

Nothing happened to change my mind during supper. I ate at a fish joint and contemplated the delightful prospect of returning to my crummy room and holing up for the weekend.

I DON’T know if you’ve ever spent a Sunday alone in downtown Chicago, but if you haven’t, I offer you one word of advice.

Don’t.

There’s something about the deserted canyons on a Sunday that tears the heart out of a man. Something about the gray sunlight reflected from grimy roofs. Something about the crumpled bits of soiled paper flopping listlessly along empty streets. Something about the mournful rattle of the half-empty elevated trains. Something about the barred shop-windows and chained doors. It gets to you, does things to your insides. You start wondering whether or not, in the midst of all this death and decay, you’re really alive.

The prospect didn’t please me at all. I finished my meal, put another quarter in another palm, and wandered out down the street.

After all, it was still Saturday night. And Saturday night was different. The rain had definitely stopped now, and the street was black and gleaming. Neon light reflections wriggled like crimson and gold serpents across my path.

You know what serpents do, of course. They tempt you. These particular neon serpents were saying, “Come in. Have a drink. You’ve got nothing to do tonight anyway, and nobody to do it with. Sit down. Place your order. Relax. You’re due for a little relaxation after six months in prison. It’s a long sentence. You know what a con does after he’s sprung. You’re entitled to a little fun.”

There were serpents all around me. Serpents spelling out the names of taverns, night-clubs, come-on joints, clips, dives. All I had to do was take my choice.

Instead, I walked back to the hotel, went in the lobby, and checked with the night clerk to make sure my telegram was really on the way to the carney. Then I went up to my room and rid myself of all money except for a ten-dollar bill. I wasn’t taking any chances on getting rolled.

The night was still young. I’d probably feel young myself with a few drinks in me. I went back down to the lobby and toyed with the notion of the hotel bar.

The improbable redhead had disappeared, and so had the house dick. The place was almost deserted now. Almost, but not quite. There was a blonde sitting in a chair near the elevator. I'd looked at her once when I'd come downstairs and now I looked at her again.

She was worth a second look.

Genuine. That's the only word to describe her. Genuine. To begin with, she was a real blonde. No peroxide glint, no unnatural accent in makeup. The fur she wore was real, and so were the diamonds.

Those diamonds really stopped me. The ring was too big to be phoney. Even if the stone were flawed, it must have set her (or somebody) back a pretty penny. And the same went for the big choker that clung to her neck in a glittering caress.

Her smile seemed genuine, too.

And that was the phoney part.

Why should she smile at me? Me, with my forty-dollar suit and my ten-dollar bill tucked away in its watch pocket?

I didn't get it. And I didn't want it. I walked towards the lobby entrance to the hotel bar. She stood up and followed.

I walked into the dimly-lit bar, around it, and out the front door to the street. I'd do my drinking somewhere else, thank you.

THERE WAS a little place across the street down the block. I ran into it, crossing in mid-traffic. Before I opened the door I glanced back to make sure that she wasn't following. Then I went in.

The joint was small—an oval bar and five or six booths grouped on either side of a juke-box. The bartender on duty was lonesome.

"What'll it be, Mac?"

"Rye. Top shelf."

He poured. I drank. Just like that. Fast. The stuff was bonded, like a bank messenger.

"Refill, please."

He poured. I watched his black bowtie. It was beginning to wobble in anticipation of the conversation forming in his larynx. Abruptly it stopped wobbling.

Because the door opened and she came in. Big as life, and even blonder. The neon on the juke-box did things to her diamond choker.

There was no place to hide. No real reason for me to hide, for that matter. She came right over, sat down, motioned to the bartender-. “The same,” she said. Nice, rich, husky-voice.

She watched the man pour, then transferred her gaze to me. Her eyes matched the diamonds she was wearing.

“Let’s sit in a booth,” she suggested.

“Why?”

“We can talk there.”

“What’s wrong with right here?”

“If you prefer.”

“What’s the proposition?”

“I want you to come with me, to meet somebody.”

“You’ll have to talk plainer than that, lady.”

“I said we should take a booth.”

“Nothing wrong with mentioning names right here in the open.”

“No.” She shook her head. Those diamonds shed enough light to blind a pedestrian walking across the street. “I am not permitted to mention names yet. But it will be to your advantage to come with me.”

“Sorry, lady. I’d have to know more about it.” I looked down at my glass. “For example, who sent you to me. Flow you found me. Little details like that. Maybe they’re nothing to you. Me, I find them fascinating.”

“This is no time to make jokes.”

“I’m serious. And I say I’m not playing unless you tell me the name of the team.”

“All right, Bob. But—”

That did it. The name. Of course, she could have picked it up off the hotel register easily enough. But it jarred me more than anything else up to that point. It jarred me right on down to my feet.

"Good-night," I said.

She didn't answer. As I walked out, she was still staring at me. Blue diamond eyes winked me out of the tavern.

I walked out. I didn't go back to my room and I didn't go to another tavern. I headed north, crossed under the El tracks into the Loop. There was a burlesque show. I bought a ticket and sat through a dreary performance of which I remember nothing except the old blackout skit about the photographer in the park who complained that the squirrels were nibbling his equipment.

I spent my time trying to fit the pieces together. Who was this girl? A friend of Cono's? A friend of Flo's? A friend of the Great Ahmed's? A friend of the carney advance man? Or just a friend?

Cono was dead and Flo was dead. They couldn't tell her where to find me. Ahmed didn't know I existed, let alone where I was. The carney advance man wouldn't know my address until the telegram arrived.

Could it be that she had a line into the prison and had learned I was about to receive eight thousand dollars?

Was she simply working the hotel, picking my name from the register at random?

But if so, what was this story about a proposition, and meeting somebody?

It didn't make sense. I sat there a while and tried to figure the deal out, then I left.

ELEVEN O'CLOCK. I headed back to the hotel. This time I peeked into the lobby before entering. She wasn't around. I slid unobtrusively past the entrance so the night clerk wouldn't pay attention. He was reading a science-fiction magazine and didn't look up.

The elevator operator took me to the fifth floor without removing his eyes from the Racing Form. Quite a bunch of students in this hotel.

Probably working their way through mortician's school.

I walked down to the door of my room very quietly. I listened at the keyhole before I unlocked the door. Then I opened it fast and switched on the light.

No blonde.

I examined the closet, the washroom. Still no blonde. Then and only then I went to the phone, called room service, and ordered a pint of rye and some ice.

It was still Saturday night and I was still entitled to a drink, without strange blondes butting in.

But when the drinks came, I found the blonde was still with me. Prancing around inside my skull, making propositions, winking her diamonds at me.

It didn't take me long to finish the bottle and it didn't take the bottle long to finish me.

Somewhere along the line I managed to undress, don pajamas, and slump across the bed. Somewhere along the line I drifted off to sleep.

And that's when it started.

I was back in the burlesque house, sitting in the crummy seat, watching the stage. This time the performance was more interesting. There was a new comic in the cast—a tall fellow with a shaved head. He looked something like Cono. In fact, he was Cono. Big as life. A chorus line danced out behind him; eight, count 'em, eight nifty little numbers. They danced, kicked, whirled. Cono noticed them. He did a little shuffling dance of his own, gyrating to the end of the line. Then he reached out—in the old familiar gesture used by the late Ted Healy in chastising his stooges—and flicked them across the neck. One by one. As his fingers touched each girl in turn, she changed.

Heads dangled limply from broken necks. The eight dancing girls became eight dancing cadavers. Eight, count 'em, eight. The dancing dead. The dancing dead, with skulls for heads. Skulls with diamond eyes.

Dead arms reached out and scrabbled in dead skull-sockets. They picked out the diamonds and threw them at me. I twisted and turned, sweated and squirmed, but I couldn't dodge. The diamonds hit me, seared me with icy fire.

Cono laughed. The girls danced off stage and he was all alone. All alone except for the chair. It stood there in the center of the stage and the lights went down. As the spotlight narrowed, Cono moved towards its center, closer to the chair. He had to stay within the circle of light or die.

THEN THE circle narrowed still further and he was sitting in the chair. As if by magic, squirrels danced out on the stage. They each carried a tiny thong, and each bound the thong around Cono's arm or leg, or neck until he sat there crisscrossed with thongs that lashed him to the chair.

I don't have to tell you what kind of a chair it was. What else would it be?

And I don't have to tell you what was going to happen next. Even in my dream I knew it, and I struggled frantically to wake up.

But I couldn't. I couldn't even leave my seat in the theatre. Because while I had been watching Cono getting bound into the chair, somebody had bound me!

Now I was sitting in an electric chair, hands tied, feet tied, electrodes clamped and ready. I tugged and tore, but I couldn't move. They had me, all right. It had all been a trick, a dirty trick to get my attention away from myself.

I knew that now. Because suddenly Cono burst his bonds with a flick of his fingers, the same fingers that had killed the dancing girls. He stood up and laughed because it was a joke. A joke on me.

He wasn't going to die. I was. He'd live. He'd get the eight thousand dollars and the blonde, and I'd fry. Just as soon as they turned on the juice. The bonded juice. The neon lights were winking now and the bartender was ready to pull the switch as soon as the conductor called out "Chicago!" and now they were getting ready to give the signal. While waiting, Cono stood on the stage and amused me with card tricks. He pulled the Ace of Spades out of his mouth and held it up for me to see.

Then it was time. Somebody came onstage and handed him a telegram from the carney and that was the signal for them to yell "Chicago!"

The switch was ready. I felt the cold sweat running down my spine, felt the electrodes bite into the side of my leg, the side of my head. And then, they pulled the switch—

I woke up.

I woke up, sat up in bed and stared out the window.

Through the windowpane, the blonde stared back at me.

I could only see her face, and that was funny, because it was a full window. Then I realized it was because she wasn't vertical, but horizontal. And only her face was pointed towards me.

Shall I make it plainer?

I mean she was floating in empty air outside my window.

Floating in empty air and smiling at me with her icy eyes aglitter.

Then I really woke up.

The second dream, or the second part of the dream, was so real I had to stagger over to the window and convince myself that there was no one outside. It took me a minute before my trembling legs would support me and carry me that distance, so if she really had been at the window there'd have been enough time for her to get back down the fire-escape and disappear.

Of course she wasn't there.

And she couldn't have been, because there was no fire-escape. I gazed down at a sheer drop of five floors to the closed and empty courtyard below. It was black down there, black as the Ace of Spades.

I don't know what I should have done under the circumstances; all I know is what I did do.

I shoved my head under the cold water faucet, towelled my face dry, dressed, and rushed out of my room in search of a drink.

And that's when the next nightmare started.

THERE WAS this little joint three blocks south of the hotel. I ran all the way, couldn't stop running until I'd covered that much distance. The street was deserted and it was dark, and only this little joint had a rose light burning in the window. It was the light that drew me, because I was afraid of the dark.

I opened the door and a blast of smoke and sound hit me in the face but I ploughed through it blindly to the bar.

"Shot of whiskey!" I said, and meant it.

The bartender was a tall, thin man and he had a glass eye that almost fell out as he bent his head while pouring my drink. I didn't pay very much attention to it at the time; I was too busy getting the drink down.

Then it fascinated me. I didn't want to stare at it, so I looked away—looked down the bar, into the seething center of smoke and sound.

That was a mistake.

Sitting on the stool next to me was a little man who was sipping a glass of beer. He had to sip, because he had no arms. He lapped at the glass the way a cat laps at a saucer of cream. Watching him was a blind man. Don't ask me how I knew he could see, but I got the impression of watching from the tilt of the head, the focus of the dark glasses.

I whirled around and nearly collided with the man on crutches. He was standing there arguing with the man on the floor—the one without legs. Down the bar a way, somebody was banging with a steel hook affixed to his elbow. I could scarcely hear the thumping because the juke box was playing so loudly. Sure enough, there were dancers present; the inevitable two women, both of them engrossed in their movements. They had to watch carefully, because both of them were on crutches.

There were others present, too—others in the booths. The man with the bandaged head. The man with the hole where his nose should be. The man with the great purple growth bulging over his collar. The lame, the halt, the blind.

They didn't pay any attention to me. They were having fun. And in a moment I realized what I'd stumbled into. It was a street beggar's tavern. I saw the tin cup set alongside the shotglass, the placard resting against the beer bottle. What was the name of that dump in Victor Hugo's Notre Dame de Paris? "The Court of Miracles" he called it. And this was it.

They were happy enough, drinking. They forgot their physical ills. Maybe liquor would cure me of my mental ills. It was worth a try. So I had another drink.

Along about the third drink somebody must have slipped out. Along about the fourth drink somebody must have come back. And in a minute or two, she walked in.

I DIDN'T SEE her, at first. The reason I sensed her presence was because the noise cut down. The juke box stopped and didn't start again. The conversation dropped to a hush.

That's when I looked around and noticed her. She was sitting in a booth, all alone, just watching me.

She made a little gesture of invitation and I shook my head. That was all. Then she raised her glass and offered me a silent toast.

I turned, noted my re-filled glass, and toasted her. Then I downed my drink. The bartender with the glass eye had another waiting for me.

"On the lady," he said.

"No thanks, chum."

He looked at me. "Whatsa matter? She's a nice lady."

"Sure she is. Nobody's questioning that."

"So whyn'cha drink it?"

"I've had enough, that's why." I had, enough and to spare, I suddenly realized. The room was beginning to spin a little.

"Come on, drink up. We're all friends here."

The bartender didn't look friendly. Neither did anyone else. For the first time I grew aware of the fact that everyone was looking at me. Not at her—at me. The legless, the armless, the blind. In fact, the blind man took off his dark glasses in order to see me better, and one of the cripples leaned his crutch on the bar and walked a little closer.

The Court of Miracles! Where the blind see and the lame walk! Of course it was; and half of these beggars were fakes. They were as sound as I was—sounder, perhaps.

And there was a whole roomful of them, all looking at me. None of them seemed happy any longer. They were quiet; so quiet I could hear the click of the key in the lock as the armless man locked the door.

Oh, he had arms now; they'd emerged from beneath a bulky vest. But I wasn't interested in that. I was interested in the fact that the door was locked. And I was here, inside.

She stared and they stared.

The bartender said, "How about it, chum?"

"Not today." I stood up. That is, I tried to stand up. My legs were wobbly. Something was wrong with them. Something was wrong with my eyes, too.

"What's the trouble?" drawled the bartender. "Afraid of being slipped a Mickey?"

"No!" It was hard to talk. Only gasps came out. "You already slipped me one the drink before this. When she came in, and gave you the signal."

"Wise guy, huh?"

"Yes!" I managed to spin around, fast. Fast enough to grab the whiskey-bottle off the bar and hold it cocked. My other hand supported me.

"Now—open that door or I'll let you have it," I panted. "Come on, move fast."

The bartender shrugged. There was neither fear nor malice in his glass eye.

My own eyes were turning to glass. I tried to focus them on the bartender, tried not to look at the creeping, crawling cripples that slithered closer all around me, brandishing canes and crutches and uttering little grunts and whimpers and moans.

“Open that door!” I wheezed, while they crept closer and closer, stretching out their arms and tensing to spring.

“All right, chum!”

That was the signal for them to rush me. Somebody swung a crutch, somebody clawed at my legs. I began to spin and go down.

I swung the bottle, clearing an arc, and they fell back, but only for a moment. The bartender aimed a punch, so I swung the bottle again.

Then they came back. It was like fighting underwater, like fighting in a dream. And this was a dream, a nightmare of crawlers, of slithering shapes tearing at me, dragging me down.

The bartender hit me again, so I raised the bottle and brought it down. It landed on his head with a dull crunch.

For a moment he stood there, and the glass eye popped out of its socket and rolled along the bar. It stared up at him and watched as he sagged slowly and fell.

Then it stared at me as the man with the artificial arm hit me across the neck with the hook.

I felt the blow land and melt my spine.

The glass eye watched as I collapsed into roaring darkness and when I went down, it winked.

WHEN I woke up, she was stroking my forehead.

Not bad. Lots of men would have traded places with me at the moment—lying there in the cool dusk, on a comfortable bed, with a beautiful blonde stroking my forehead.

Too bad some other guy didn’t show up, because I would have traded him in a flash.

I’d have thrown in a splitting headache, free of charge, and a taste in the mouth like the bottom of the Chicago Drainage Canal.

But nobody showed up to take my place, so I just stayed there. When she said, “Drink this,” I drank. When she said, “Close your eyes and wait for the pain to go away,” I closed my eyes and waited.

Miraculously, the pain went away.

The headache and the taste vanished. I opened my eyes again, wiggled my fingers and toes.

I was lying on this bed in a darkened room. The shades were drawn, but enough light filtered through to bring life to the diamond choker and the diamond ring and the diamond eyes. The diamond eyes regarded me candidly.

“Feel better now?”

“Yes.”

“That’s good. Then there’s nothing to worry about.”

How right she was. Nothing to worry about except where I was, and why. I suppose a little of my bitterness crept over into my reply.

“Thanks,” I said. “Thanks for everything you’ve done for me. Including getting me knocked out.”

“That’s no way to look at it,” answered the blonde. “After all, I saved your life.”

“You mean those beggars would have killed me?”

“No. But the police might.”

“Police?”

“Yes.” She drew a long breath. “After all, you did murder that bartender.”

“What?”

“You hit him with the bottle. He’s dead.”

I sat up, faster than I would have believed possible. “Come on, let me out of here,” I snapped.

“They’ll be on the lookout for you,” she told me. “It’s not safe for you to go just now. You’re among friends here.”

“Friends!”

“Don’t misunderstand. If you’d only listened to me in the first place and come along sensibly, all this would never have happened.”

I HAD NO answer for that one. All I knew was that if she spoke the truth. I was a murderer. And I knew what they did to murderers. They sat them down in a chair and turned on the juice and fried them. A faint odor of singed flesh tainted my nostrils.

“How do I know you’re not lying?” I asked.

“I can furnish proof if you like, later. Right now, I want you to meet a friend.” She put her hand on my shoulder and even through the shirt I could feel the icy coldness of her flesh. She was cold and hard, like a diamond.

“As long as I’m meeting friends, we might as well establish a few facts,” I suggested. “You know my name. Now, what’s yours? And where am I?”

She smiled and stood up. “My name is Vera. Vera LaValle. We are in a home on the South Side. And, although you didn’t think to ask me, it’s Monday evening. You’ve been unconscious for almost forty-eight hours.”

I stood up, then. It wasn’t a spectacular performance. I glanced down at myself in the dim light and what I saw wasn’t pretty.

“Why don’t you go in and bathe, clean up a bit?” Vera suggested. “I’ll go out and bring back some food. You can eat it before our meeting.”

Without waiting for my reply, she went out. Went out and locked the door.

It was getting to be a habit. Everybody that I met locked me in. Of course, that’s what you do with murderers. Dangerous people to have around. Always killing bartenders, for instance. And if I was a murderer . . .

I doubted it. The whole thing was phoney from start to finish. Things like that just didn’t happen to me. I was the original timid soul. Couldn’t lick my weight in wild flowers.

Then, again . . .

There was blood on my suit. Blood on my shirt. Blood on the back of my neck, crusted blood from where the steel hook had landed.

I went into the bathroom, filled the tub, undressed, bathed. There was a nice array of soap and towels, all laid out and waiting for me. I even found an electric shaver to plug in. I felt a lot better once I was cleaned up.

When I dressed, I was surprised to discover a fresh white shirt conveniently placed on top of a clothes hamper. My genial host or hostess thought of everything.

By the time I stepped out of the bathroom she had returned. She had four sandwiches wrapped in cellophane, a double cardboard cup of coffee, and a wedge of pie. She didn't say anything while I ate. It only took me about six minutes to dispose of the meal and latch onto a cigarette from my pocket. I offered her one. "No, thanks. I do not smoke."

"Funny. I thought all women did nowadays."

"I tried it once. Many years ago. Of course, it wasn't a cigarette."

This didn't seem to be getting me anywhere. "About that friend I was going to meet. Where is he?"

"Waiting outside the door," she said. "Shall I ask him in?"

"By all means. Don't keep the gentleman waiting." My tone was facetious, but I didn't feel very gay. I don't know what I really expected. Years of reading—and writing—horror fiction had conditioned me to almost everything. A Mad Doctor, perhaps, coming to recommend a certain brand of cigarettes. A Mad Scientist with a beaker-full of monkey glands. A Mad Professor with a driver's license for a flying saucer.

THE LAST person I expected to see when the door opened was a friend. But it was a friend who walked in.

It was Cono.

Cono Colluri. The man who died in the electric chair.

He stood there in the twilight and looked at me. He wore a battered trench-coat with the collar turned up, and he had a hat pulled down over his eyes like a movie gangster, but I recognized him. It wasn't a double, or a stooge, or somebody made up to resemble him. It was Cono. Cono in the flesh. The dead flesh—reanimate and alive!

Changed? Of course he had changed. There was a dreadful facial tic, where the muscles had been pulled and torn by the convulsive spasm of the shock. And he was pale. Pale as death. But he lived. He walked. He talked. . . .

"Hello, Bob. I've been waiting for you."

"She—she told me."

"Too bad you wouldn't come at once. I should have used more sense, let her tell you who wanted to see you. But I figgered you wouldn't of believed her."

"Yes. I guess that's right." I fumbled for words while he stood there, stood there looking at me. "How—how are you?"

That was a fine thing to ask. But he didn't seem to mind.

In fact, he smiled. The smile creased the side of his face and got tangled up in the tic, but he made it. "Oh, I'll live," he said. "I'll live forever."

"What?"

"That's the pitch, Bob. That's why I had to see you. I'm going to live forever. Varek fixed that."

Varek? Where had I heard that name before?

"He's the one who claimed my body. You remember."

Yes, I remembered. The mysterious cousin. "But how did he know you weren't dead, and how did he revive you?"

"I was dead, Bob. Deader'n a doornail. And he fixed me up. He can fix anybody up, Bob. Bring them back. Make it so's they never die. And that's where you come in."

"Me?"

"I been telling him about you. About how smart you are, all that stuff you write. He needs somebody like you for the outside—to front. Somebody with brains. Young. And alive."

ALIVE. I was alive, all right, but I wondered if I was awake and sane. Talking to a dead man . . .

"Come here, Bob. I can see you don't believe me."

I moved closer to Cono.

"Feel my skin. Go ahead."

I put my hand on his wrist. It was cold. Cold, but solid. Up close I could see the waxen pallor of Cono's face. Cono's death-mask. The tic rippled across it and he smiled again.

"Don't be scared. I'm real. It's real. He can do it. He can bring back the dead. Don't you see what it means? What a big thing it is, if it's handled right?"

"I see. But I still can't understand where I fit in."

"Varek will tell you all about it. Come on, I want you to talk to him." I followed Cono Colluri out of the room. Vera smiled and nodded as we left, but she didn't accompany us as we walked down the long corridor to a stairway. Descending the stairs into the soft, subdued light of the parlors below, I became conscious of a peculiar odor. It smelled like stale air, steam heat and the scent of mingled flowers.

"Say, just where are we, anyway?" I asked.

"Funeral home," Cono answered. "Didn't you know?"

I hadn't known. But I might have guessed. Living quarters upstairs and down here the parlors. The parlors, the soft lights and the scent of flowers.

We walked across a carpeted hallway, and I glanced around me. It was the way Cono had said; this was a funeral home, and a rather shabby one. Perhaps that's why there were no bodies lying in state, no mourners. Varek had set this up for a front, and I rather suspected that if I made a dash for it and tried the front door I would find it locked.

But I didn't make a dash for it. I followed Cono into the darkened parlor to the left, to meet Mr. Varek.

I walked in and Cono lumbered over to the corner. He walked stiffly, awkwardly. The muscles in his body were taut with shock. But he did pretty well for a dead man.

He was turning on a lamp in the corner, he was closing the door behind us. I paid no attention. I was staring down at the coffin on the trestle. Staring down at the body in the coffin. The body of the man with the glass eye.

It was the bartender I'd killed.

HE LAY there on the cheap satin, dressed in a worn black suit. Somebody had put the glass eye back in place and it stared up at me sardonically. The other eye was closed, and the general effect was that of a wink.

There we were—me and the man I'd killed. I looked at him, and he looked at me.

He looked at me!

Yes. It happened. The eyelid rolled back. The eye opened. It focussed on me. And the mouth, the bound mouth, relaxed its smirk. The lips parted.

And from the corpse came the voice: "Hello, Bob. I'm Nicolo Varek."

"You—"

"Oh, I'm not the bartender you killed. He's dead enough, as you can set for yourself. His body isn't breathing."

It wasn't, either. The corpse was still a corpse, but something was alive, something lived inside it. Lived and looked and talked.

"I'm just taking temporary residence. So that I can talk to you, without having to travel a great distance. You can appreciate the convenience."

I couldn't, at that moment. I could only stand and gape and feel the sweat trickling down under my arm-pits.

"You've been a long time coming, Bob. But it was inevitable that we should meet. Cono has told me all about you, and of course I have other ways of gaining information. Many ways."

"I'm sure." It came out before I could stop it, but the corpse chuckled. The sound was a death-rattle.

"How typical of you to say that. How characteristic! Ah, yes, I've studied your background, your work. You interest me greatly. That is why I have gone to all this trouble to arrange our meeting."

I nodded, but said nothing. I was waiting.

"I'm inclined to give Cono credit for finding you. It's quite true, I can use you."

"Dead or alive?" That remark came out before I could stop it, too.

"Alive, of course. But don't think I'm not appreciative of the distinction. You're a man of keen wit, sir. And I admire you for it. One seldom finds acerbity in these decadent days."

"Look," I said, beginning to recover a little composure. "I'm not used to indulging in character analysis with a corpse. Just what do you want of me?"

"Your services, sir. Your professional services. For which, needless to say, you will be generously rewarded. In perpetuity, I might add."

"Cut the double-talk. I've had enough from Vera, and from poor Cono —"

"Poor Cono? I would hardly endorse the adjective. Were it not for me, my dear sir, Cono would be languishing in an unmarked grave. Whereas, thanks to my efforts, he is among the quick rather than the dead. And if you wish plain talk, sir, you shall have it.

"I am Nicolo Varek, man of science. I have perfected a means, a methodology, a therapy if you like, which defeats what men call death. Defeats death? It goes beyond that, far beyond. For those whom I revive also possess the boon of eternal life. Eternal life!"

CRAZY TALK. But it was coming from the mouth of a corpse, and I believed it. There was no hint of fakery or collusion—no ventriloquist could open that cadaver's eye, manipulate his dead lips. I saw, and I heard. And I believed.

"Yes, I can give life to the dead. As to the how and the why of it, well, that's my secret. My priceless, precious, perfect secret.

"And what do you think the use of that secret is worth, sir? What is the proper fee for the boon of eternal life? A million dollars, perhaps?

"There are many men with a million dollars in this world, my friend. Do you think any of them would hesitate to part with that sum if I could assure them of continued existence?

"But there's the rub. They must be assured. And at the same time the secret must remain a secret. For this reason I must continue to operate anonymously. There is nothing men would stop at in order to extract my secret from me—if I were known to them as its possessor. How often I've faced torture and death myself at the hands of those who suspected I might save them!

"You say I have helpers aplenty? That I can summon up an army of the dead, if need be, to assist me in my aims? That is true—but only within certain limits. The dead must be controlled. And I cannot carry out my plans completely without the aid of living humanity. I need a man of prescience, a man of integrity. Such as yourself, sir."

"I don't see what you're driving at."

"A business arrangement. You might even go so far as to call it a partnership. With myself as the silent partner, you as the go-between. Our product: Eternal life. Our goal: Unlimited wealth, unlimited power."

"Sounds a bit too easy."

"Do not mistake it, my friend. There are innumerable obstacles to overcome, many problems to face and to solve. I can provide for them all, however. This has been a cherished dream of mine for centuries. Yes, centuries."

"Who are you, anyway?"

THE CORPSE chuckled. "So many men have asked that question of me, so many times! Yet I find it best not to answer. My handiwork is proof that I speak truth, and that is all you need. Trust me, and we shall rule.

“Yes, rule! Surely you can see what power lies in my secret. The hold it will give us both over the great ones of this world, now and forever! We’ll seek our fortunes first, and the rest shall come.

“I have the plans well laid. You will be able to go forth and proclaim the gift of eternal life to the world. Nor shall you lack for assistance. I can summon a host to your command, to do your bidding and mine. We shall broadcast the tidings: There is no more death, for those who can pay the price! Eternal life, and more; special powers, new powers.

“But you’ll learn all this and more in time to come. You’ll learn the methods I’ve devised for bringing the news to the world. Of course, it would never do to make a really public announcement or statement; it must all be cloaked in mysticism and the proper formulae. We’ll start a cult, attract the wealthy, and reveal the truth only to the select few.

“Now, sir, how does my proposal strike you? Eternal life, eternal riches, eternal power?”

I didn’t say anything for a long moment. I stared at the corpse that told me men could live forever.

“Silence means consent,” said the voice.

“Not necessarily. I was just wondering—what if I refuse?”

“I’m sorry you even mention the possibility. For it forces me to remind you that you really have no choice in the matter.”

“You mean you’ll kill me if I don’t? Kill me and animate my corpse, I suppose?”

“Come now, surely you give me credit for more subtlety than that? I’ve already gone to a great deal of trouble and risk to bring you here, as you know. I cannot jeopardize my plans to any further extent. And you would be of no use to me as a corpse. Besides, there is no need for me to kill you. If you walk out of here, you’re as good as dead anyway.”

“Meaning?”

“Meaning that you are wanted for murder. For killing this poor one-eyed citizen of a free republic. The bartender.”

"But he's. alive, you've revived him—"

"Not like the others! It's purely temporary, you understand. I can keep him animated as long as I choose, and I will do so if you consent. I'll even put him back to work in the bar." Again the chuckle. "It won't be the first time a dead man has walked abroad with none the wiser. If only you knew or even suspected how many of the dead presently mingle with the living, thanks to the Varek method!"

I SHUDDERED. The single eye of the corpse was omniscient. The voice purred on: "If you refuse, he becomes a corpse again. With a dozen witnesses to swear you killed him. I'll not wreak vengeance—the full majesty of the law will attend to that. And your story of mysterious women and corpses that talk and a walking dead man will not help you or save you. I believe you realize that.

"But you won't refuse. Because you can see what I'm offering you. Wealth and power. The goals, the dreams of every man. A chance for eternal life yourself, such as I enjoy. Think it over, sir, think well upon it. Life or death?"

I thought. I thought well upon it. And everything within me clamored for assent. Oh, it's easy enough to be a hero when there's no temptation. But the cynic who said every man has his price knew human nature. There aren't many who wouldn't settle for eternal life, eternal wealth and eternal power even at the price of their souls—and the souls of everyone else, for that matter.

The souls of everyone else . . .

I looked at Cono. My friend, Cono Colluri. The late Cono Colluri who went to his death looking like an overgrown college boy. Cono, who left me eight thousand bucks and a promise to clear his name.

Where was Cono now?

He wasn't here in this room. His body was here, and it moved and it talked, but the soul . . .

There was a tic, there was torment, there was twisting torture. Not real life. This was a stranger, a hulking walking corpse. No emotion, no warmth, no humanity.

Sure, I could sell myself out. But I couldn't sell out the world.

So I stared down at the corpse and I said, "No. I'm sorry, Varek. I've got to refuse, and take my chances."

"The decision is final?"

"Final."

"Very well. You've had your chance."

The mouth shut. The eye closed. The dead bartender was truly dead again. I saw the light fade away from the countenance, then I moved back. Back, into Cono Colluri's arms.

I might have known Varek would lie. That he'd never let me out of that room alive. If I hadn't realized it before, I knew it now. Because the cold arms wrapped around me. And the great thumbs rose up to my neck, ready to press and squeeze.

"Cono!" I gasped. "It's me—your friend—don't—"

You can't argue with a corpse.

You can only fight. Fight and pant, and try to keep the strangling hands away from your throat. I hit him with everything I had. Nothing happened. Nothing happened, except that he bent me back, back. . . .

I sagged then. Sagged so suddenly that he went-down with me. As I fell, I twisted. His grip broke. I rolled under the trestle. He groped after me. I dumped coffin and all on his head. He went down. Blind corpse-eyes sought me. I ran. I made it down the hall with no one to stop me. He lumbered to his feet, came groping after me.

I knew the front door would be locked. But there was a glass panel, and next to it in the hall somebody had placed a large urn.

I grabbed it up, smashed the glass, and stepped through.

Then I was out on the street, running. It was night. The air was cool.

It was good to be free.

Free, and wanted for murder.

HAVE YOU ever wondered what it feels like to be a murderer?

I can tell you.

It feels like rabbits who hear the baying of a hunting dog. It feels like lying in bed with the covers pulled over your head and Pa coming up the stairs to give you a spanking. It feels like waiting for the Doctor to sterilize the instruments.

You don’t walk down the street when you’re a murderer. You skulk through the alleys. You don’t take the streetcar and you don’t pass any cops. And when you finally get downtown to your hotel, you wait a long time before you go inside the lobby. You look around very carefully to make sure it’s deserted.

And when you do go in, you don’t ask for the key to your room. The police might be waiting up there. Or somebody else. Somebody that’s dead, but alive. Waiting to grab you and—

I had the feeling, but I kept it out of my face and voice long enough to ask the clerk at the desk whether or not there had been any message for me.

You see, I had to play one hunch; that the hotel hadn’t been tipped off. Varek wouldn’t, as long as he thought I was coming in with him. And now, there was still that chance. If I could only get the message. . . .

It was waiting for me, the precious little yellow envelope stuck in the pigeonhole. The telegram from the carney. I ripped it open and read: “GREAT AHMED AT FORTY THREE EAST BRENT STREET UNDER NAME RICHARDS.”

That was all, and it was enough. Brent was a street on the near North side. Walking distance. I could take an El and bypass the Loop, if I was willing to risk it.

I was. Ahmed, or Richards, had the money.

I had to. Ahmed, or Richards, could save me.

I did. Ahmed, or Richards, was the answer.

Brent Street was about a mile across the bridge after I left the El. It was a long, hard mile. I kept to the shadows, kept my face averted from passersby. But nothing happened. I stopped in front of the dingy old brownstone front that was graced with the numerals 43, lit my last cigarette, and went up the steps to press the buzzer.

Then I waited.

It was a good two minutes before the door opened. During that time I speculated quite a bit about the man I was going to meet.

WOULD IT be the Great Ahmed in a turban? A swarthy man with a pointed beard, deepset burning eyes and a singsong voice?

Would it be the suave, cultivated, cosmopolitan Mr. Richards, a con man from the carney, dressed a little too garishly, with a voice too soft and smooth?

It was important for me to know. Because I'd have to throw myself on the man's mercy.

The door opened to answer my question.

"The Great Ahmed?" I asked.

"Yes. Please come in."

I came in. Into the light of the hallway, where I could see my host.

He wasn't Ahmed and he wasn't Richards, either.

He was nobody.

A small man of about fifty, with thin, graying hair. Wrinkled face, watery blue eyes, almost gray. Come to think about it, his skin was gray, too. And he wore a gray suit. Quiet and inconspicuous. About as far away from a carney type as I could have possibly imagined.

How to describe him? In Hollywood, he'd be what they'd call a Barry Fitzgerald type without the smile and the brogue. Somebody's uncle. The kindly bachelor uncle.

I hoped he'd be mine.

"You are the Great Ahmed?" I asked, still not sure, still not sold.

"Yes. You want a reading?"

"Uh . . . yes."

I might as well stall for a while until I was sure. The way things had been happening, I wouldn't have trusted my own brother.

It was a big house, an old house, one of those places built for people to live in at a time when most families had eight or nine children instead of a television set.

The Great Ahmed led me down a long hallway, past two or three doors leading, inevitably, to a sunporch, a parlor, a library. The room he ushered me into was a sort of secondary parlor, towards the rear of the house. It had plenty of solid mahogany in it; old pieces, but durable. There was a massive center table and the inevitable grouping of chairs as if for a seance. But there was nothing of the medium's workshop or the clair-voy-ant's clip-joint about this place.

I TOOK advantage of the light in the room to study my host a little more closely, but I can't say I learned much. He was just a tired, middle-aged man, and I wondered how he managed the grift with a tough carney outfit. He didn't look the part of an Oriental mystic at all.

Even when he told me to sit down and produced a crystal ball from a cupboard, I wasn't impressed. The ball itself was small, and a trifle dusty. As a matter of fact, he brushed it off with his sleeve, smiling sheepishly as he did so.

Then he sat down, stared into the ball, and smiled again.

"The reading is three dollars," he said. "An offering, you understand, not a fee. Fee's against the law here."

"Shoot the three bucks," I said.

"Very well." His eyes left my face. They focussed on the ball. Gray eyes, a trifle bloodshot.

I sat very quietly while he stared. He cleared his throat. He fidgeted. Then he spoke.

He told me my name.

He told me where I'd been working.

“You are a friend of the late Cono Colluri,” he said, his eyes downcast. “And you are here to collect his money. A sum amounting to eight thousand, two hundred and thirty-one dollars.”

He paused. I felt the perspiration running along the collar of my nice white shirt—the one from the funeral parlor, probably stolen off a stiff.

He paused, and I stared at him. Nice little man in gray, but he knew too much. I’d never believed in “occult powers”, and yet here he was, telling me these things.

After what I’d gone through in the past three days, I felt that I couldn’t take much more. My whole concept of the universe was shattering, and along with it, my sanity. Dead men walking, me a murderer, and now a man who actually reads minds. It was too much. . . .

“Take it easy, friend.” The Great Ahmed stood up, slowly. “I didn’t mean to upset you so. It was a cheap trick, I guess.”

His hands moved upwards from under the table. They held an envelope and a sheet of paper.

With a start, I recognized Cono’s letter.

“Picked it out of your pocket when I brushed against you in the hall,” smiled the little man. “Then held it under the table and read it while you thought I was reading the crystal. Old bit of business, but effective.”

I nodded, and tried to smile in a way that conveyed my relief.

“So you’re Cono’s friend,” said the Great Ahmed. “He wrote me about you, you know. A couple of weeks ago. Didn’t mention the money, though. It was a tragedy, wasn’t it?”

“Then you know about the confession?”

“Yes. Louie was a rat.” The smile left his face. “Too bad, a messy business. I’m glad I left the show.”

He walked around to the cabinet, stooped, and opened the lower drawer with a small key. He took out a big black tin box. Another key opened it. He began to pile bills on the table—big bills, hundreds and thousands.

“Here’s your money,” he said, sorting a pile and pushing it across to me.

“But . . . don’t you want some kind of paper, some kind of identification or signature?”

“You’re Cono’s friend. I trust you.” He smiled shyly, and his hands made a gesture of dismissal.

“You trust me, eh?”

“Why not?”

I TOOK a deep breath and came out with it. I had to come out with it to somebody, or go crazy. “Because I’m wanted for murder, that’s why!” The Great Ahmed sat down again, still smiling. “And you want to tell me all about it, is that it? Well, go ahead. I’m listening.”

I went ahead, and he listened. It took up a long time, but I told him the whole story—from the time I hit town until the time Cono hit me.

He sat there, a little gray idol, quietly gazing off into the gloom.

“And so now you want to clear your name, eh? And rescue Cono, I suppose? And put the finger on this man Varek, whoever he may be?”

I nodded.

“That’s a big order. A mighty big order, friend. You know, of course, that your whole story sounds a bit implausible?”

“It sounds screwier than blazes,” I told him. “But it’s true. Every word of it.”

“Granted. So the problem arises, where do we go from here?”

I glanced at the eight grand plus, lying before me on the table. Suddenly I shoved it back across to him.

“Will this help you to figure things out for me?” I asked. “Because if it will, take it. Part of it or all of it. Whatever it may cost to clear me, to save Cono. To pin a rap on that rat, Varek.”

“You trust me to come in with you?” he asked.

“I’ve trusted you with my story. With my life. The money isn’t important. If you’re Cono’s friend, you’ll help.”

"Good enough." The Great Ahmed sorted the bills and stacked them up next to the tin box. "From now on, I'm your man. Full time. Now to our problem." He pushed the crystal ball aside. "This won't help us any, I'm afraid. We have to face facts."

"Fact number one," I said, "is that the heat is on me."

"Which means you'll have to lay low. That makes me the outside man," he said.

"Correct. So it's your move."

"My move is to the hotel," Ahmed answered. "To your room. Sooner or later somebody is going to show up there, looking for you. The law will be around. But so will your blonde charmer, and some of the rest of Varek's friends. Perhaps even Cono himself. At any rate, chances are I'll find someone to tail; someone who will lead me to the funeral home or wherever else Varek hides out. He probably has a dozen or more places to hang his hat. If he wears a hat."

"I keep wondering," I mused.

"What kind of a creature is this man? And his secret of eternal life—"

"He may have it," Ahmed retorted, "but you don't. And from the looks of you, a little sleep is in order. I'll take you upstairs to a bedroom. You might as well get a good night's rest while I go to work."

I DIDN'T argue with him. The weariness pulled at my knees as I followed him up the stairs.

"You'll have to trust to me and to luck," said the little gray man. "Right now all I can tell you is I'm playing a hunch. That I can go back to the hotel, pick up the trail, and somehow have it lead me to Cono. He's the weak spot in the whole setup, for us. If I can handle him, he'll tell me what we have to know about Varek. Then we'll figure out how to deal with him."

"Sounds logical," I said, as we entered a small bedroom at the end of the corridor.

“Sounds mighty weak and flimsy, to tell the truth,” replied my host. “But it’s all we have to work on right now. I hope that by the time I return there’ll be a little more to work on. Now—here we are. You don’t fit into my pajamas, but I think you’ll find the bed is comfortable enough. I’ll be on my way. Go to sleep, and pleasant dreams to you.”

He waved and went out. I sank back on the bed, scarcely mindful of the click of the key in the lock. Then I sat up. “Here we go again!” I muttered.

My voice must have carried, because he called from beyond the door. “Locking you in. Got a cleaning woman who gets here in about an hour, and I don’t want to take any chances. If your description has been broadcast, that is.”

“Good enough,” I answered. “But you’d better come back.”

“I’ll be back. And with good news. Don’t you worry about a thing. When the Great Ahmed takes over, he takes over.”

I lay back, kicked off my shoes, loosened my tie and belt, and then crawled under the covers. His footsteps receded into silence.

Here I was, in a strange house, in a strange bed, my future dependent on the integrity and the ability of a man I hadn’t known a half hour.

Somehow, though, I trusted him. I had to trust him. of course, because there was nobody else. I wondered about the Great Ahmed, or Richards—that was his real name. What he’d been doing hanging around a carney. Why he’d set up a three-dollar-a-throw crystal reading parlor here. Little colorless middle-aged nobody, without even a good line of patter to hand out. But the son-of-a-gun knew how to pick pockets!

That reassured me. He wasn’t the schmoe he appeared to be. But was he good enough to handle a man who raised the dead?

I couldn’t answer that one now. There was nothing to do but wait. Wait and rest. Rest and sleep.

The room was dark. The night came in at me through the window. I got up and pulled the shade. I didn’t want the night. It contained too much that could hurt me. Police, detectives, Varek and the walking dead. Better the special darkness of the room, the special darkness behind my closed eyes. The darkness of sleep.

The darkness of dreams. . . .

FUNNY, the people you run into when you're asleep. Like this negro, for instance. He was just a common citizen, like hundreds of thousands of others on Chicago's South Side. He was riding on the El and I was riding on the El, hanging on to the strap next to him.

I wouldn't have even given him a second glance, except for one little thing.

He was dead.

Yes, he was dead. When the El lurched, and he toppled against me, and I saw the rolling whites of his empty eyes, felt the cold, the ebon coldness of his black skin, I knew he was dead. A black corpse, hanging to a strap in the El.

I knew he was dead, and he knew I knew it. Because he smiled. And the deep bass voice rumbled up from the depths—from the depths of his empty grave, his plundered and cheated grave—and he said, "Don't look at me. 'Cause I ain't the only one. They's a lot of 'em dead around heah. A lot of 'em. Look!"

I looked. I gazed down the aisle of the lurching El and I saw them, recognized them. Some of the passengers were alive, of course, and I could tell that at a glance. But there were others. Many others. The quiet ones. The ones with the fixed, cold stares. The ones who didn't talk. Who sat alone. Who carefully avoided touching other bodies. They were pale, they were stiff, they were dead.

Most of the men wore their good suits, because that's the way they were dressed in the undertaking parlors. Most of the women wore too much powder and rouge, because the morticians fixed them that way. Oh, I recognized them. And the Negro nudged me with his icy finger and grinned a grin that held neither mirth nor malice nor any human emotion.

"Zombies," he said. "Tha's what they calls us. Zombies. Walkin' dead. Walkin', talkin' dead. Walkin' and talkin' because the Man say so. The Man. The Big Voodoo Man."

"Varek!" I said.

The El lurched again. The lights went out. Something was happening to the power. Maybe because I'd spoken the name.

The black corpse thought so. In the darkness all I saw was eye-white and tooth-white, flashing at me. "You went and done it," the voice rumbled. "Sayin' the name!"

And all the corpses in all the cars groaned and murmured, "He said the name!"

SUDDENLY THE car gave a sickening lurch and I knew we were going off the track, going over. The corpses rolled against me in waves, and we were twisting and turning, falling, falling . . .

I landed. You're supposed to wake up before you land, but I didn't. Because I went too deep. The car crashed down into the sewers. I wasn't hurt. I was flung free. And I crawled along in the darkness, without eye-white and tooth-white flashing. Just red, this time. Little red lights.

"Rats," I told myself. "Rat eyes."

"We take the form of rats, yes. And of bats. And of other things. But we are not animals. We are not men either." The voice at my ear was soft but imperative. "They call us—vampires!"

I couldn't see him, or the others, but I heard the chittering laughter rise all around me, rise and turn to metallic mockery as it boomed off the sewer walls.

"Vampires. He raised us from the dead, he made us. In the big church up on Division Street, Father Stanislaus makes the Holy Sign against us. But we do not care. He is fat and old, that priest, and he will die. We can never die. We walk the night, we feast, and we own the world below."

Another voice droned in: “It’s like this under the whole city, did you know that? And under every city. There’s always places to hide, if you’re clever. You can tunnel from place to place, come and go as you please, and nobody knows. Nobody sees. Nobody hears. And you can lift the manhole covers, drag down what you want, and dispose of what’s left, without leaving any evidence. Oh, it’s clever and no mistake, and we can thank the Master for it all.”

I nodded. “You mean Varek,” I said.

They howled at that, and the sound nearly tore my head in two as the echo hammered from the metal walls. They howled, and then they scrabbled towards me in the darkness, but I ran. I ran and waded and crawled and swam through muck and filth, seeking an opening, seeking a light, seeking an escape from the world of death and darkness here below.

I found it, found it at last. The round metal lid above my head which led to safety. Safety and the cool darkness of a cellar. A chink of light guided me to a stairway and the door above. I came out into a kitchen, moved past to the bedroom, and peered through the door.

Edgar Allan Poe sat by the bedside and made strange motions with his slim white hands. Two doctors were in attendance, and all focussed their gaze on the apparition lying on the bed; the gaunt, skeletal countenance peered up from the pillows with glazed and glassy eyes.

The patient had white whiskers and incongruously black hair; outside of the animation in his eyes he might have passed for dead, and none would be the wiser.

But Poe’s hands moved, commanding the sleeper to awake, and as I watched, he awakened.

Ejaculations of “Dead! dead!” absolutely burst from the tongue and not the lips of the sufferer, and his whole frame at once—within the space of a single minute or even less, shrunk—crumbled—absolutely rotted away. Upon the bed, before that whole company, there lay a nearly liquid mass of loathsome, of detestable putridity.

THEN I fled, screaming, from the house of M. Valdemar.

But wherever I went, there were the dead.

Poe couldn't raise Valdemar. But Varek could. And he had. In my dream, I saw the proof. I tramped the streets of Chicago and recognized the faces. That stiff-lipped, unsmiling doorman in front of the ritzy Gold Coast hotel—he was dead. The blackhaired girl on the end of the switchboard at the Merchandise Mart, the one who said, "Number please?" in such a mechanical fashion—she was Varek's puppet, too. There was an elevator operator at Field's and three men who worked the night shift at a big steel plant out near Gary. An old precinct sergeant over in Garfield Park was a walking corpse and even his wife didn't suspect. But what the precinct sergeant didn't know was that his captain was also a cadaver, and neither of them knew the secret of one of the Cook County judges.

The dead—there were hundreds of them. Maybe thousands. Because Chicago isn't the only city in the world, and Varek had been everywhere.

I walked along, and then I ran. Because I couldn't stand it any longer, couldn't stand to see the faces, the empty eyes. I couldn't stand being jostled by a corpse in the crowded Loop. I ran and I ran until I came to the Great Ahmed's house and I came up to the bedroom, battered down the locked door, and crawled in bed here with myself again, knowing that I was safe at last, I was here, I could wake up into a world of reality—where dead men still walked!

"And they have other powers, too."

Who had told me that? Varek himself, in the bartender's body. Other powers. Powers like levitation—like floating through space, through windows high off the ground . . .

It had happened once before in a dream, and now it was happening again.

I could see her face at the bedroom window. Vera's face. The pale blonde hair. The diamond choker. Floating outside the window, bumping against it. Her hands groped out. She was opening the window from outside.

Funny that I should see it that way, because I'd pulled the shade down, and it was up now. So was the window. She was coming into the room, floating in gently, softly, ever so quietly. And now she landed, without a bump or a thump or a shudder, on the tips of her delicate toes. She was dead, too, of course. I knew it now. Her stare was glassy. She moved by automatic compulsion only. It was like a hypnotic trance, with every motion directed by an outside, an alien force.

GLASSY-EYED, like a drugged Assassin. And like an Assassin, she drew the dagger from her waist. It was a long, slim, femininelooking weapon, but it was deadly. The steel was diamond-bright. Why did she remind me of diamonds? Because of the choker. I gazed at the choker now as she tiptoed over to the bed. I wanted to watch it.

Better than watching the dagger. Because the dagger was a menace. It was coming up over my throat. In a moment it would come down, the point would bury itself in my neck, over the jugular.

All I had to do was watch the diamonds in her choker. And in a minute it would be all over. The knife was coming down, the knife that would end my life, the knife that would make me one with Varek's army—the army of the dead.

It came down, fast.

The glitter of that frantically falling blade broke the spell. Instantaneously, I realized that I was seeing it. There was a knife, and it was coming down at my throat.

I jerked my head to one side on the pillow and slammed my body forward, upward. My hands closed around solid flesh. Cold flesh.

Vera LaValle twisted wildly in my arms.

I sat up, hands moving to her wrist. I pressed it back until the knife dropped to the carpet. She fought me silently, her face a Medusa's mask, blonde curls tumbling like serpents over her cold, bare shoulders.

Suddenly her head dropped. I caught a glimpse of strong white teeth grimacing towards my neck. Vampire teeth, seeking my jugular.

I tore at her throat. My hands ripped the choker, dug beneath it. It came free, and fell. My hands closed around her neck, then came away.

I could not touch the thin red line, the scar that encircled her neck completely.

My hands came away, and I slapped her, hard.

Abruptly, she sank to the bed. The glassiness left her eyes and something like recognition flooded her face.

"Where am I?" whispered Vera LaValle.

"In a bedroom on Brent Street," I answered. "The Great Ahmed's place. You floated through the window and tried to kill me."

"He put me under," she murmured. "Then he sent me here and levitated me. I didn't know."

I nodded, but said nothing.

"YOU BELIEVE me, don't you?" she implored. "I didn't know. He promised me that he'd never make me do that again. But he did. He always does. Even now, I can't trust him. He can do anything he likes with me, because I'm—"

She stopped abruptly, and I filled it in for her.

"Because you're dead," I told her. "I know."

Her eyes widened. "How did you find out!"

For answer, I pointed at her throat. She noticed then that the choker had been torn away. Her hands covered the red scar on her neck and she stared at me for a long moment. Then, with a sigh, she swept her hair back into place.

"Tell me about it," I said. "Maybe I can help."

"Nobody can help. Nobody."

"I can try. And the more you tell me, the more I have to work with. That is, if it's safe to talk."

She thought that one over for a moment. "Yes, it will be, for at least a half hour now. He goes into a sort of coma when he levitates one of us; it requires terrific concentration. But if he comes out of it and discovers I've failed, anything can happen."

The fear was coming back into her eyes, and I sought to capture her attention again, quickly.

"Half an hour," I said. "That's time enough. Tell me about it from the beginning. What happened to you?"

Vera LaValle sighed. Her hands stroked the scar, softly. "All right," she said.

I lighted a cigarette and sat up, offering her the pack. She shook her head and I said, "Oh, that's right, I remember now. You don't smoke, do you?"

"I can't," said Vera LaValle. "I haven't been able to smoke, or drink, or eat. Not since I was beheaded—in 1794."

IN 1794, the Terror ruled France.

You could run into almost anything under the Terror. You might encounter a Citizen Robespierre or a man called—ironically enough—St. Just.

If you did so, the chances were that they would introduce you to still another man with a more apt name—Samson, the executioner.

And Samson, in turn, would direct you to La Guillotine.

Everybody in France knew La Guillotine. Despite the feminine appellation, La Guillotine was not a giddy female—although she turned a lot of heads.

La Guillotine was the Terror incarnate. The head-chopping Terror. The beheading blade that waited until you were ripe for it, then chopped and filled the basket beneath it with rich and rotting fruit.

In 1794, the Terror ruled France, and you might run into almost anything. If you were Vera LaValle, age 20, daughter of Lucien LaValle the wealthy merchant, you walked in constant danger of your life.

Wealthy merchants were not popular these days. Wealthy merchants had to twist and turn, fawn and cringe, resort to almost any stratagem in order to try and escape from Paris before the order came—the fatal summons to the Tribunal. Better to ride out of the city in a dung-cart than to the Place de la Concorde in a tumbril.

No wonder Lucien LaValle betook himself of desperate measures and consorted with strange people in an effort to procure a means of deliverance before it was too late. Paris was aswarm with rogues and adventurers, thieves and sharpers who fattened on the misery of the remaining members of the nobility or the well-to-do. Some of them, for a price, could procure passports or arrange an unauthorized passage across the border or the English Channel.

Lucien LaValle, wealthy widower with a handsome, marriageable daughter, thought that he had found a solution.

Somewhere, somehow, in heaven knows what den or dive or stew, he encountered Nicolo Varek. Varek, the friend of the illustrious Comte St. Germain. Varek, the confidante of the mighty Cagliostro. Varek, the alchemist, the mystic, the seeker of the Philosopher's Stone. Varek who boasted of powers greater than those of the two great charlatans he claimed to have known—and taught. Varek, the unsmiling, the cold, the ageless. But —and this was the crux of the matter—Varek the foreigner. Varek, the holder of the priceless possession, the Russian visa. The passport to freedom for himself and family.

VAREK HAD no family, now. But Vera LaValle was young, she was chic, she was eminently well dowered. If she were a wife, and Lucien LaValle an official member of Varek's family—then what would there be to stop the menage from leaving France?

It was a reasonable proposition, and Lucien LaValle presented it to Varek on many occasions.

He shrugged. There was work to be done here in Paris, he said. Great things were afoot. He had never been presented to Mademoiselle LaValle, and no doubt she was all her fond father proclaimed her to be but still . . . A man in Varek’s position is above matrimony and the calls of the flesh. And as to money (and here Varek shrugged again), he fortunately was in a position to command a fortune whenever he wished. No, it would not be advisable to leave the country now. As a matter of fact, everything depended upon remaining.

Lucien LaValle was eloquent. When eloquence fell upon deaf ears, he was insistent. When insistence failed, he resorted to tears. He sank to his knees. He wept and implored. And in the end, Nicolo Varek consented to meet the merchant’s daughter, to talk to her.

That was enough for LaValle. He returned home elated, and put his case to Vera.

“Consider now how much depends upon your conduct,” he told her. “Be charming—sprightly—gay. This Varek, he has a long face. He needs cheering. He needs your youth.”

Vera LaValle nodded dutifully. No need to instruct her in coquetry. Long before he revealed his hopes and plans, she was miles ahead of her father. He had found a man who could save them—at a price. What the price was did not matter. Her father would pay his share and she would gladly pay hers.

She bathed, dressed, perfumed and painted for the interview. The meeting took place in the parlor and it was unchaperoned. A carriage drove up in the dusk, and Vera LaValle met Nicolo Varek under candlelight.

And it was thus that Varek, the friend of the nobility, the mentor of magicians, the peer of alchemists—Varek, the man who was above matrimony or the commonplace emotional reactions of ordinary men—fell in love.

Candlelight and coquetry definitely won the day, and the night. The sauve, cold middle-aged man became a stammering, intense importuner. As to the matter of age, Varek was quite explicit on that point.

“Do not think of me as old, my dear,” he reassured her. “For I am truly ageless. There are secrets I possess, secrets you shall share with me. Oh, we will share a great deal, you and I!”

HE BEGAN to boast then, like any love-sick youth, and to confide.

Varek was Russian by birth, but the date of that birth and the details of his parentage would (he smirked) astound her. Suffice for him to say that he came of noble blood. He had been educated at the leading universities of Europe, but the bulk of his learning came from extended sojourns in Mongolia and Hindustan where he had studied occultism and the forbidden mysteries. Upon his return to Europe, he had visited Italy and imparted some of his wisdom to Cagliostro—wisdom which Cagliostro misused in his unscrupulous career. Varek, still seeking disciples, later gave instruction to the Comte de St. Germain, whose mastery of mass illusion and the principles of levitation enabled him to win fame and fortune.

But he, Varek, was not interested in such trivia. True, as an alchemist he had sought to transmute baser metals to gold. But he soon realized that cultivation of other powers was more important. Once he had developed them, fame and fortune would be his for the asking.

There were two secrets, and two only, which were worth possessing. One of them was the secret of eternal youth, and the other, the secret of eternal life.

To the discovery of these secrets, Varek had dedicated himself for scores of years.

It was a costly study, an expensive search. In order to finance himself he had, at times, resorted to base means. As an alchemist he was acquainted with the group that centered around La Voisin, and he admitted assisting that notorious female in her preparation of poisons. He had also been familiar with the clique surrounding the infamous de Montespan.

“But that was ages ago!” cried Vera, when she heard him. “Over a hundred years!”

Nicolo Varek, the unsmiling one, smiled. “Exactly,” he said. “You see, I succeeded in at least part of my quest. I did discover the secret of eternal youth. Discovered it and possessed myself of it.”

“You are over a hundred?” Vera murmured.

Varek inclined his head. “I assure you, time is a relative concept. You will not find me less ardent a lover due to my age, no less honorable a man because of my past associations. As you realize, we who seek the mysteries have always been on the fringes of society. We skulk in darkness, we consort with the underworld, we compound with the charlatans simply because we have never been accepted by the scholars and the savants. They are jealous of our achievements, these so-called “men of science”—although virtually all they know or hope to know has come from our work.

“Yes, it is we alchemists who have given them their chemistry, we sorcerers who have preserve what little is known of medicine and physiology and biology, we mystics who have the only knowledge which can develop into a science of the mind.”

“I don’t understand,” Vera said. “What are you trying to tell me?”

“I’m telling you not to be afraid of me,” he answered. “It has been said that I am a cheat, a liar, a fraud, a scoundrel, a magician, a murderer. Very well—I am all these things, but to a purpose. That purpose is power, power greater than you can dream!

“I’ve played my part behind the scenes these years past, my dear—and you’ve seen the result! I’ve had my interview with Mademoiselle Charlotte Corday, and Marat died. I’ve talked to Citizen Robespierre’s brother, and Danton is no more. I’ve ways and means to pull the strings and make the puppets dance. And the end will be power. Great power. Once France is properly disrupted, there are other lands ripe for revolution.

“Revolution, my dear, always ends in dictatorship. Dictatorship, my dear, always ends in megalomania on the part of those who rule. And what would a megalomaniac do for the secret of eternal youth or the secret of eternal life—or both?

“Ah, yes, it will end only one way: My way. I shall rule the rulers! Think of that, my dear. Within a few years, Nicolo Varek will be the unseen ruler of the world. And you, his empress, his queen.”

VAREK CAME closer, and Vera could see the paper thinness of his bloodless lips. He might have been forty, he might have been four hundred. “The secret of eternal youth. How does that please you, my little one? To be always young, always as you are today? To live, to rule, to enjoy the senses to the full forever? I have that gift for you, that dowry.

“And soon—sooner than I dare tell you—I shall have the other, too. The Great Secret. Eternal life! I’ve a laboratory here—you must see it—where I experiment. In times like these, there is no shortage of subjects. Samson sells me the unclaimed ones every day.” The bloodless lips formed a bloody smile. “I’m getting closer and closer to the solution,” Varek told her. “And once it’s gained, the world is mine. Ours!”

It was mawkish melodrama, but it was also naked nightmare. For the little lisping, whispering, sniggering creature came closer and closer, and then he was no longer braggart or stammerer but merely a lustful automaton. He pawed at Vera LaValle and she endured his carrion breath upon her neck for a moment. But only for a moment. Then she wrenched free, and Varek, losing his balance, tumbled grotesquely to the floor.

Vera LaValle laughed.

She didn’t refuse his offer of marriage. She didn’t call him an old man, a liar, a murderer, a repulsive fool. She didn’t do anything but laugh.

Her laugh said all those things.

Nicolo Varek rose, tugged at his ruffled clothing, and bowed coldly. “Adieu,” he said. And left.

Vera LaValle waited. She waited for Lucien to scamper in, rubbing his hands briskly in anticipation. She waited for the effect of her story upon him; his crestfallen stare, his agitation, his frantic reiteration of, “Why, why, why? He was our only hope, our only chance! Why?”

She waited, then, for the summons. It came soon enough.

Somebody had denounced Citizen LaValle and his daughter. As usurers, as enemies of the People.

She waited for the trial, and it was short. Lucien sobbed when he heard the verdict, but she shrugged.

She waited, then, for the tumbril.

Waited, those last few days, alone. For Lucien LaValle hung himself one gloomy Sunday morning and she was left alone.

She was alone, and waiting, that last night when Varek came.

Citizens were not allowed to visit with prisoners in their cells on the eve of execution. But Varek was not a citizen. He was not a man at all in the ordinary concept of the word. He was a mocking shadow that glided silently to her cell.

ONE MOMENT nothing, and the next, Varek was there. Whispering in the darkness.

"Vera, Vera LaValle, listen to me! I have news for you. Great news!"

Silence, as he waited for a reply. But she said nothing. After a moment, he continued: "Remember what I told you? About the laboratory, the experiments, the secret of eternal life? I have it at last, Vera—I have it at last! Oh, it's not exactly all I'd hoped, and much remains to be done in refining the method. But it's the goal of sorcery through the ages, the dream of science. And I have it. For you. For us!"

Silence once more. Vera LaValle did not move. He spoke again: "Eternal life, Vera! I swear it's the truth; I can give you eternal life. All you need do is say the word and you're free. I can get you out as easily as I got you in. And now you can be young forever, alive forever! You must believe me, you must!"

Vera turned and faced him through the bars of the cell. She could not see his face in the darkness of the corridor, but he could see her countenance—and the lineaments of loathing.

"I do believe you," she said. "And I tell you that I prefer to die tomorrow morning rather than spend eternity—or a single living moment—with you."

Varek's laugh grated through the gloom. "A plain answer, Mademoiselle LaValle. But I wonder if you have rightly considered what's in store for you. When the tumbril rolls and the sun is gleaming, gleaming on the bright blade of the guillotine. Have you seen the heads in the basket, Mademoiselle? Have you seen Samson lift them by the hair and exhibit them to the crowd?”

“You can’t frighten me,” she whispered.

“Do you know what it’s like to be dead? Dead forever and ever? They’ll put you in the ground, Mademoiselle, in the cold wet ground. You’ll lie there in eternal darkness, lie there and rot and decay into slime and dust. And the lips that you withhold from me will feed kisses to the worms.

“Aren’t you afraid of death, Mademoiselle LaValle?”

She shook her head and smiled into the blackness beyond the bars. “Not as much as I fear life with you,” she said. “Now, go and leave me in peace.”

He broke down, then. The creature cried and begged. “I don’t understand, it’s never happened before—that a woman, a girl, a mere child should do this to me! I thought I was immune to folly, but since the moment I laid eyes on you I cannot endure the thought of not possessing you. You are a burning in my “blood, you must know that, and you cannot refuse—you cannot! But you must be mine of your own free will, not by force. I want you willingly, and I must have you.” Varek sobbed, and it was the dry and dusty sobbing of a reanimated mummy, rustling in the darkness.

Once again, Vera LaValle shook her head. “No,” she said.

VAREK’S SOB held not grief but rage. “Good enough,” he cried. “If I’m not fit for you, I commend you to a new lover. To Death! Death shall embrace you, twine his bony fingers in your curls, take your head as a souvenir of his conquest. Adieu—I leave you to hold tryst with your beloved. He’ll not be long now!”

And he left her.

Then and only then did Vera break down. For she had lied. She did fear death. The thought of dying terrified her past all comprehension, and now in the darkness she could almost see the grinning presence of Death incarnate; the skeleton in the black cloak, the grinning skull covered with a cowl.

He was still with her the next morning, when the guards came. He walked with her to the tumbril, and as she and five other weeping and bedraggled women took their places, Death climbed in beside them.

Death grinned at Vera LaValle as she rode through the streets of Paris to the site of execution. Death pointed his finger at the roaring crowd, the prancing Citizen Samson and his grimacing assistants. Death showed her the shrieking silhouette of the knife against the dawn-drenched sky.

Death was with her as she walked to the platform. Death helped her up the stairs, and it seemed to Vera in the delirium of the last few moments that not Samson but Death himself was the executioner—removing her cloak, binding her arms, forcing her to kneel and gaze down at the bottom of the basket when all the time she wanted to gaze up; gaze up at the knife, the bright blade of the knife which was the only real thing left in the world.

Then, as the roar of the crowd came up, the blade of the guillotine came down.

Death took Vera LaValle in his arms.

And—released her!

"You want to know what it's like, of course," she told me, sitting there on the bed, thousands of miles and lifetimes later. "But I don't remember. There was no pain, no sensation, and yet I felt, I was conscious in a new way. There was no sense of duration, either.

"Then the pain came back, and I was alive.

"I had this pain in the throat, and in the head.

"I opened my eyes. I saw the bandage on my neck. I saw the silver tube coiling to the top of my spine. And I saw Varek.

"You know what happened, of course. Samson had sold me. to Varek after the execution. He took me to his laboratory and brought me back to life.

"I realized it, naturally, at once. But I can never convey to you the horror of that moment—when I discovered that he had sewed my head back on my body!

“It was grotesque, it was ludicrous, and it was somehow blasphemous. But despite it all, in the weeks to come, I learned to respect the power, the wisdom, the genius of Nicolo Varek.

“My convalescence, if you can call it that, was slow. It was not easy, with the crude techniques he had painfully evolved, for Varek to keep me alive and nurse me back to a semblance of health and sanity. But he did it. Since that time I’ve learned a great deal about what he does to reanimate the dead, and still I haven’t grasped the true secret.”

SHE PAUSED, and I cut in: “You say he sewed your head back on? But that’s . . . incredible.”

Vera pointed at the scar and smiled wanly. “Would you find it equally incredible if I told you that there’s a metal plate covering half of my skull—that there is metal, some sort of machinery, extending down the neck and into the upper spine? That Varek, in 1794, was using electrical voltage and a sort of miniature dynamo for metabolic regulation? That the control he exercised and still exercises is a combination of hypnotism and an extension of brainwaves transformed into electric current? Yet it’s true, all of it. I am an automaton—operating on the power generated from within plus the current fed me by Varek, at a distance. I’m alive yet not alive. I do not age or change, I do not eat or sleep. But there’s something worse than sleep.

Something much worse.” She shuddered. “That’s when he turns me off.”

Either she was crazy or I was. Or both of us. This I knew. But I believed her. I believed the cold-eyed, cold-skinned creature with the livid scar who talked to me across the centuries.

“He’s done it to me, many times, temporarily and to suit his convenience Or his needs. But I’ve seen him do it to others—permanently. It’s horrible. They die, then; die a second death. A hideous death, forever.

“That’s the hold he has over me, over all of us. The ability to turn us off. Because there’s something inside that wants to live, fights to live. Oh, how can I tell you the story of what took a hundred and sixty years to live?” Vera glanced around the room, and for a moment her agitation seemed completely human. “There’s not time; he’ll come out of it now, hear us.”

I pressed her. I had to know the rest. “Quickly, then,” I urged. “What happened after you recovered?”

“He was still experimenting. I was his first complete success. There were other . . . corpses . . . that he revived temporarily. But they were damaged, warped. Completely insane. At the time, he hadn’t perfected his methodology of control. Several escaped. There was an ugly scandal. And Robespierre’s dictatorship fell. He went to the guillotine himself. Varek no longer had protection in Paris. So we fled.

“The Embargo was on, and the only ship we could find was bound for the colonies. We ended up in Haiti, just the two of us.

“It was a strange relationship. He no longer desired me, of course—and I think he almost regretted his monstrous act of revival. Gradually he set about to make me his servant. And of course, he succeeded. I was alone, helpless, literally dependent on him for my existence.

“I offer no apologies for serving Varek. I had no choice. And he was master.

“It didn’t take long for him to establish himself in Haiti and in San Domingo. He had brought money and jewels. We took a mansion; he posed as a planter. And immediately set about fomenting an insurrection. You know what happened to Haiti a few years later, when Touissant L’Ouverture, Dessalines and Christophe revolted against the French. Varek played his part. Blood flowed, and there were bodies for Varek’s new laboratories. Black bodies to experiment upon. Black bodies to toil on the plantations.

“It was at this time that a new superstition arose. The one about zombies. The walking dead. Can you understand now just why and how this belief was born?”

NODDED, thinking of my dreams.

I There was a horrid logic and conviction behind her words. Varek had created the concept of the zombie. His creatures walking the world.

“The blacks were primitive, simple. Varek bungled often. He was still groping, evolving methods and techniques. The botched jobs were the zombies.

“And the vampires—that was Hungary, of course.”

I raised an eyebrow. “But Varek isn’t responsible for the belief in vampires. That’s an ancient superstition.”

“Correct,” answered Vera. “But we went to Hungary from Haiti because of the belief. Because, there, tales of the walking dead would be ascribed to superstition and no one would investigate too closely if some of Varek’s experiments moved freely over the countryside. Also, Varek wished to follow the latest developments in European scientific research. Even before the Revolution, he had worked briefly with Anton Mesmer in the development of hypnotism. Now he was interested in the new psychology.

“You see, attaining the power he dreams of is a long and a complicated process. It involves much more than merely the ability to control the reanimated bodies of the dead. At first, Varek could not keep a corpse alive except by constant hypnotic control. He had to focus his own energies every moment. Then he reached a stage where he could fix a behavior pattern for hours, or days, and turn to other matters. But that is not enough.

“Each reanimated corpse must be provided for—given a new identity, a new life, a new role to play. Varek moulds the puppets, breathes life into them, and then he must manipulate the strings. Dozens, scores of puppets, on dozens of separate stages; all play their part in one involved drama.

“He had to enter into scientific fields, enter into politics. How much of the intrigue behind the Third Empire in France was due to his work, I’ll never know. For in 1847 I rebelled; I tried to get away. And as punishment he turned me off for seventy years!”

Vera’s white death-mask contorted in remembered agony. “For seventy years I followed Varek across the world as baggage—in an ice-packed coffin. And meanwhile he meddled with science, he pulled strings, and he waited. What’s time to Varek?

“I awoke in Russia, during the Revolution. By this time he’d come to realize that he needed living allies; men to work in front of the public. Dupes and spies. He’d made some connection with a monk, Rasputin. There was a plan to kill the young Tsarevitch and then bring him back to life again; the Czar and Czarina would be at his mercy, from that point on. But somebody murdered Rasputin, and we fled Russia for a spell. That’s when I was reanimated again.

“Varek believes in Revolution, you know. A time of turmoil and disruption is what he needs; it gives him an opportunity to profit by confusion. New and untried leaders arise, and he comes to them with hints of what he can do. He presents plans and attempts to gain control of those who form governments.

“We returned to Russia, and I aided him. I had no choice. It was that or lying in darkness—refrigerated darkness, now, thanks to modern conveniences.” She smiled wryly. “You can guess what he’s been up to since then. You can guess who was behind the scenes in some of Pavlov’s experiments. Varek reached members of that group. You can guess that sooner or later the Comintern got wind of it. But what you do not know—and what history does not show—is just how perilously close Russia came to developing a truly mechanized army in the 1930’s. An army of the dead!”

I LIT A cigarette and tried not to look at the clock on the bureau; the clock that was ticking the minutes away.

“We were in Germany, then, and Varek attempted to sell his notion to the New Order. But his spokesmen fell out of power, and in 1939 we fled again. We were in Canada for a few years, in Manitoba and further north. Varek waited out the war. But he has infinite patience, infinite cunning.

“He can afford to wait—wait for centuries, if necessary. He’s a strange man, Varek. He has possessed vast wealth, and lost it time and time again fleeing from country to country. He has a chameleon-like ability to alter his personality his appearance. He is—But what's the use of telling you? You're doomed."

I crushed out the cigarette.

"Now let's get down to cases," I suggested. "He sent you to kill me. Why?"

"Because you know about Cono. His offer was genuine, at first. He is still looking for a man, for many men, who will serve him as living allies. But you refused, and because you understand his power, you must die."

"Yet, Cono is such an insignificant cog in his machine," I persisted. "A dumb strong-man from a carnival. I can't see why a man with Varek's gigantic plans would bother with such a trivial matter."

"Then you don't know Varek. He has plans within plans. He's not lived quietly for the past few years for nothing. He's been waiting—waiting for the next war. The big one. The one his plans have indirectly fomented.

"There's a great laboratory set up already, somewhere in Sonora. It is capable of . . . processing . . . the dead almost on a factory assembly line. Its services will be offered to the highest bidder when the time comes. Whichever side runs out of manpower and needs a new army of workers, a new army of fighters. Don't you understand? That's where it all leads to, Varek's dream; to create a world run by slaves—by the dead!"

"He'll never get away with it."

"I'm not so sure. The past few years have brought the scientific developments he needs. There are new methods of controlling bodies en masse. Radio, electronics, blood plasma all play a part in his schemes.

"For years now he's been in the background, waiting for the right time. When war comes he will have emissaries ready to approach the new leaders. He knows how to get to the wealthy, the powerful, and intrigue them. That has been my job in the past. He intended to have your help, too—and probably the help of a hundred men like you."

"That's the one point that isn't clear to me yet," I told her. "Just exactly how does he manage to insinuate himself into the confidence of the men on top?”

VERA SMILED. The ghost of a smile, the smile of a ghost. “Simple. Have you ever heard of the Fox sisters? Or D.D. Home or Angel Annie or Madame Blavatsky?”

I nodded. “Spiritualist mediums or mystics, weren’t they?”

“Yes. During my., sleep . . . Varek was able to hit on that gambit. The same one used earlier by St. Germain and Cagliostro. Through the ages the wealthy, the powerful have always had one weakness. A belief in superstition. A longing to pierce the veil of the Mysteries. They’ve always followed the seers, flocked to the occultists, confided in them. No need to explain the phenomenon. It exists.”

“True enough,” I said. “So Varek allies himself with the mediums. They act as his front men. They attract the rich. And Varek watches, waits, chooses those he wants or can use, and then steps into the picture and reveals his plans.”

“Exactly.” Vera sighed. “It was that way with Rasputin, if you remember. He was the key to the Czar’s influence. And he’s ready to start again.”

“But the mediums aren’t trustworthy, many are frauds,” I argued.

“And many are not. Take D.D. Home, for example! No less a scientist than Crookes verified the fact that Home levitated himself out of a third storey window and floated back in through another. It actually happened, time and time again. But what Crookes didn’t know is that little, tubercular, wan Mr. Home had been dead for a year—and Varek animated him, hypnotized him, and then levitated him by concentration. Just as he levitated me tonight and sent me to kill you.”

Vera paused. I stared at her white face in the gloom. And as I stared, something happened. A spasm contorted her countenance, the same dreadful tic that had afflicted Cono. I watched her as her mouth opened and a voice came out. But it was not Vera LaValle’s voice. It was the voice of the dead bartender, the voice of Varek.

"Yes," it told her, as much as it told me. "I sent you to kill him. And you failed. Failed and then talked. I cannot afford to have you talk any more, Vera. I'm going to turn you off. Forever."

The voice shut off abruptly. It had to shut off, for there was no longer a means of utterance. The spasm in Vera's face swept down over her body in a single hideous horripilation. For a moment she swayed there, shuddering convulsively. Then—she melted.

There was a change, and it wasn't a collapse. It was a running together, as though flesh were falling in on splintering bone. She shrank, dwindled before my eyes—and then she crumbled.

Somebody had taken the wax doll that was Vera LaValle, and held it over a roaring flame. In an instant she ran together, fused.

I stared at the floor, stared at the heap of fine white ash surrounding a charred and twisted cluster of wires linked to a metal plate.

Vera LaValle was gone.

VERA WAS gone and I was alone in the bedroom. Or was I?

If I'd had any doubts about Varek's power, they were gone now. They'd vanished with Vera, and taken a part of my sanity with them.

Let's face it; I was panicked. Varek knew where I was, and that meant I would no longer be safe here. Not safe from him, not safe from the police. I wondered what had happened to Ahmed. For all I knew, Varek had attended to him, too. And I couldn't stick around and wait.

I went over to the door. It was locked, of course, and I'd have to force it. I gave it the old college try. You see them do it every day in the movies and on television. Brawny, broad-chested hero puts his shoulder to the locked door. The door gives way. Simple.

Try it sometime. Desperate as I was, all I managed to gain was a bruised shoulder. Then I picked up a chair. That was a better deal. The panel splintered. I broke the lock.

Then I was running down the hall in darkness, groping at the head of the stairs, clumping down them, racing through the hall to the front door. If a cleaning-woman had showed up, she didn't show.

I made the door, opened it. The night air hit me. So did a hand.

"What's the rush, friend?"

I gasped with panic, then with relief.

Ahmed bustled in, rubbing his hands. "Hold it," he said. "I've got news for you."

I shook my head. "I've got news for you, too," I said.

"What do you mean?"

I decided to risk it. He had to be shown. I took him by the arm and steered him back up the stairs. If you think it wasn't hard for me to force myself into that room again, you've got another guess. But it had to be done that way.

"Take a look," I said.

His little gray eyes examined the charred ashes on the floor. He stooped and picked up the metal plate, contemplated the dangling wires protruding from it.

"What's this?"

"All that remains of Vera LaValle. She visited me with a knife. I got her to talk and then she was . . . shut off."

"I don't follow you."

"Sit down," I sighed. "I'll have to explain, but I want to make it fast."

I DID. The Great Ahmed nodded.

He wasn't upset, he wasn't alarmed, he wasn't horrified. Somehow, his very calmness managed to reassure me.

"It ties together," he said, as I concluded. "It fits. Every bit of it."

"How do you know?"

"Because I've seen Cono. You were right about the hotel, friend. He came back. And when he found me hiding in the closet he tried to kill me."

Ahmed smiled and held up a skeleton key. "I needn't tell you how I got in the room," he grinned. "But to make a long story short, the same thing happened as must have happened to you and Vera here. I managed to calm him down—he recognized me, of course. To be brutally frank, I resorted to an old Varek trick; a little hypnosis of my own. Varek must have been directing his own energies elsewhere, possibly to levitate Vera LaValle.

"At any rate, Cono talked. Of course, he's newly reborn, as it were, and he doesn't have too many details. Also, he's not the best example of a scientific mind." Ahmed smiled, briefly. "Still, he told more than he thought he was telling.

"Did you know that Varek has hideouts established in almost every principal city in the world? And that each of them contains anywhere from a dozen to several hundred bodies under refrigeration, ready for reanimation at any time? A sort of dead storage.

"Also, there are the walkers. More of them than you'd suspect. Although it's really quite easy to detect them because they all have one thing in common—the red scar on the neck."

I started at that. "You mean, he cuts off their heads before he revives them?"

Ahmed shrugged. "Not completely, now. But an operation is performed. A deep incision is made at the base of the brain. The metal plate is grafted into place and the wires"—here he picked up the charred mass from the floor and waved it—"are put into place. Meanwhile, the hypnotic control is being established."

"It's a form of hypnotism, then? But I don't get it."

The Great Ahmed shook his head. "It isn't easy. But then, what do any of us understand about the life process? We don't know what governs our physiological continuity; makes our hearts beat and our lungs take in and expel air without conscious control. You might say we operate our own bodies through autohypnosis and that keeps us alive.

"And what's death? Various organs 'die' at different times after the heart stops. We can understand the process of decay, but we can't define or truly measure death. Why, I defy anyone to tell me exactly what sleep is, let alone death!

"Sleep—that's a form of hypnosis, too.

"And, somehow, Varek has harnessed that portion of the mind which functions automatically in life, in sleep; kept it going in the state we describe as death. The common denominator is electrical energy; brainwaves, which can be measured electrically, you know. Varek has managed to apply hypnotic principles to the electric current of the body; magnetism controlling magnetism. That's why he performs the operation, inserts the metal plates in the brain and the spine. To alter the 'hookup', you might say."

THE LITTLE man spoke earnestly, as though he were lecturing a backward pupil. I listened with equal earnestness now as he waved his finger at me.

"Let me put it simply. You might compare the human body to a radio set, and Varek to a radio station. His operation consists of putting in the proper tubes and condensers to make the set forever receptive to his hypnotic wave-length. It's all electrical. Once control is established, he can broadcast impulses forever. That's a vast oversimplification, but you get the idea."

"Not completely," I said. "What about the bartender?"

"Oh, there are exceptions. The bartender was one. There Varek resorted to a temporary hookup. Probably gave his entire concentration to animating him temporarily, just to talk to you. As he concentrated entirely to levitate Vera. Those special things require special efforts. But with the vast army of dead, Varek—to return to our little analogy of a radio station—merely sends out a host of previously prepared '-transcriptions' in the shape of hypnotic suggestions. The dead then 'play' the hypnotic suggestions through for hours. And Varek need pay no more attention to them than an engineer who puts on long-playing records for broadcasting. They operate automatically.

"And that, of course, is the weakness. Sometimes Varek doesn't pay attention; or he watches the wrong body. Then it's possible for someone else with a stronger hypnotic wave length to 'jam' reception in a corpse—capture its attention, divert its purpose. As I did with Cono tonight at the hotel. And as you did with Vera."

"Lucky for both of us we did," I said. "But what else happened? What else did you find out? Why is Varek operating in Chicago now? And—this is the jackpot question—what's the secret of his own eternal life?"

The Great Ahmed smiled. "You want a lot for a few hours' work, friend," he answered gently. "Some of those questions you'll have to find out about for yourself. All I can do is give you that opportunity."

"Meaning?"

"Meaning I made a deal with Cono. And I think he can be trusted—as long as Varek doesn't get to him. Cono has promised to lead you direct to Varek himself tonight."

"Now?" I was genuinely startled. Ahmed glanced at his wristwatch. "In about three quarters of an hour. You're to meet him in the lobby of the Wrigley Building at eleven-thirty. Alone."

I didn't like that at all, and he could see it even before I spoke. "What's the big idea?" I asked. "Why aren't you coming along?"

The little man returned my gaze with unmoved composure. "For a very obvious reason; it might be a trap. Then Varek'd have both of us. As it is, you'll have to take your chances. And if anything does go wrong, I'll still be able to carry on, to follow through. After all, that's why you hired me. And I aim to finish the job."

HE WAS silent for a moment.

"Think it over," he said. "You don't have to go, you know. And I don't mind telling you I'd hesitate before taking such a risk."

I nodded. "Somebody's got to do it,——" I said. "So if you'll call a cab for me . . ."

Ahmed smiled and held out his hand. “Good boy,” he said. He turned and led the way downstairs. He phoned for a cab in the hall.

“I don’t know where you’re going or what you’ll get into,” he mused. “And of course, under the circumstances, you can’t have the cops tagging along. You’ll just have to use your head. Try and keep in touch with me, tip me off what’s going on and what to do.”

“Why don’t you follow me in another cab?” I suggested. “Then, no matter where Cono takes me, you’ll at least have the address.”

“Good idea.” Ahmed stepped to the phone and put in another call. Then he nudged me. “And here’s a little idea of my own,” he said.

He held out his hand next to my pocket and dumped something cold and hard. I reached for it. and came up with a .38, fully loaded.

“Just in case,” he told me. “I’ll feel better if you have something along for company.”

I grinned my gratitude as we walked out of the door of 43 East Brent and waited for the cabs to arrive. Mine rolled up first, but his turned the corner a moment later.

“Let’s go,” he said. “Be careful now.”

“Same to you,” I answered. Then, “Wrigley Building,” I told the driver. And we were off.

It was a nice, warm, moonless night. I leaned back in the cab as we jolted downtown and tried to relax. I’ll give you three guesses how well I succeeded.

We kept stopping at corners, corners with cops on them. I hid my face and thanked my lucky stars there was no moon.

WHEN WE hit Chicago Avenue and a red light, I took a long chance. I leaned out of the cab, yelled at a newsboy, and bought a paper. Just idle curiosity. I wanted to see if they had my picture in today. With some of the latest gossip. Such as the offering of a reward, dead or alive.

I riffled through the pages rapidly, but no success greeted my efforts. Maybe they didn't care. Maybe they were used to killing bartenders in Chicago.

Killing—

The little squib caught my eye. With the Louisville dateline. James T. Armstrong Shows . . . Louis Preusser, 43 . . . Confessed murderer of . . . Psychiatrists declared under influence of hypnosis and drugs . . .

It was the follow-up on the story of Louie's confession. He'd walked in, glassy-eyed, and confessed. I wondered what the whole deal was. The Great Ahmed would know. Maybe I'd better ask him before I went on.

I glanced behind to see if his cab was trailing mine. Nothing was in sight. Maybe his driver had taken Clark Street instead. He'd catch up to me. Nobody seemed to have any trouble at all catching up to me whenever they wanted to.

Take Vera LaValle, for instance. She'd found me at the Great Ahmed's after I'd been there for less than an hour. That was one question I needed an answer for. How did she—and Varek—know I was there?

I'd remember to ask Ahmed that.

But—would he tell me?

Maybe you're a scientist, a great scientist. Maybe you're a sorcerer too, a wizard. You can raise the dead, and you stay alive yourself. But it's still quite a trick to pick one person out of four million and send a killer right to his door. Unless somebody tips you off.

The tipoli. That was it.

Ahmed goes out. Ahmed sells out.

Of course! He went to the hotel, just as he said he would, with the eight grand in his pocket. Maybe he saw Cono there, maybe he saw somebody else. Maybe he even saw Varek himself. And he made a deal. He told Varek where I was. Varek sent Vera to kill me.

When enough time had passed, Ahmed came back to see if the job was accomplished. It must have surprised him to find me alive.

So he came up with the story about meeting Cono. Why? It hadn't, come to think of it, sounded too good at the time. This business about winning Cono over with hypnosis. And Cono leading me to Varek.

But seeing me alive, he'd told me the story for a purpose. Ahmed was a great guy for purposes, all right. He must even have given me the gun for a purpose.

I tried to figure it out as we roared down Michigan. I could see the gleaming lighted spire that chewing gum built, right ahead. I'd be there in a minute now.

What had Varek said? Something about not bothering to kill me because the law would do it.

AND HERE I came riding up to the Wrigley building, with a gun in my pocket. An armed murderer.

I knew what to look for now. It wouldn't be Ahmed's cab; he wouldn't show up at all, I was sure. I was looking for a black prowl car.

I wouldn't see Cono standing in the lobby with a white carnation in his buttonhole, ready to guide me on a conducted tour of Varek's snug harbor. I was more likely to see a couple of downtown boys with their hands in their topcoat pockets. The reception committee from the downtown station.

We started to edge towards the curb, and I added up my score. Exactly 100 per cent right. There was the squad car, there were the boys. They stood patiently, just waiting for somebody to show up. If I knew Ahmed, I felt sure he'd furnish them with a very good description.

We nosed in, slowing down. "Here we are—" the driver began.

"No, we're not," I cut in. "Back to 43 East Brent. And fast. I have another appointment."

We kept going, over the bridge. Nobody looked up. Nobody followed. I kept my hand on the butt of the .38 all the way back. I didn't want to lose it, you see.

It was the Great Ahmed's, and I intended to make sure that I gave it to him.

THE HOUSE was dark, but then it was always dark. I had the cab park around the corner because I didn't mind walking. In fact, I preferred it. Preferred it so much I went around to the back of the house—the long way around, mind you. Didn't bother me a bit. Nor did it bother me to climb in through a rear bedroom window on the first floor.

I was quiet. Very quiet. Sort of a slow, seething quiet. Little thoughts kept bubbling up in me about what I'd do to Ahmed when I got my hands on him.

So he wasn't the type for a carney grifter, eh? Well, he'd taken me in soon enough. And sold me out even sooner.

I landed on the bedroom floor and padded out, down the hall. No cleaning-woman was around and I knew now that there never had been. Ahmed had locked me in to keep me on ice for Vera LaValle or whoever Varek might send.

Ahmed and Varek—a good team. Maybe Ahmed was the guy Varek needed for a front man!

Of course, he wouldn't look quite so presentable after I got through with him. . . .

I tiptoed down the hall, peeked into the library. It was dark. The whole house was dark. I stopped, listened. After a long moment, I became convinced of the truth. I was alone. Ahmed had gone out in his cab but he hadn't returned.

I reached a stairway going up—that led to the bedroom and the other rooms on the second floor. But behind it was another set of stairs, going down. I decided to have myself a look. Curiosity killed a cat of course—but this cat carried a .38.

The basement was big and dusty. Old fashioned furnace, the usual stationary washtubs, a coal-bin, a fruit-cellar. I pushed open the door and stared at the usual assortment of dusty, empty jars in the light thrown by a naked bulb dangling from the center of the small room.

Nothing in the cellar to interest me. My hunch was cold.

I was cold!

Standing in the deserted fruit-cellar a little past midnight of a warm May evening, I was cold. Cold as ice! I felt the cold air all around me. But where was it coming from?

A draft blew against my trouser cuffs. I looked down.

There was a round metal lid set in the floor of the fruit-cellar. I stooped, touched it. The iron was icy. I groped for the ring, lifted the lid. I gazed down into darkness.

Then I walked away, making a circuit of the cellar until I found what I needed and expected to find—the inevitable handy flashlight.

I returned to the fruit-cellar and pointed the beam down. It focussed on the iron rungs of a ladder. I took the flashlight in one hand, the gun in the other, and left enough fingers free on both for me to cling to the rungs as I descended.

I lowered myself into icy cold—the coldness of a vast black refrigerator. I went down, down, rung after rung. Finally my feet hit slimy, damp stone. I joggled the flashlight until it bisected a wall with its beams. Eventually I located a light switch.

I flicked it. The light went on, and I saw everything.

I was standing in the center of Varek's laboratory.

Varek—Ahmed. Ahmed—Varek.

It all added up now.

More lights went on.

THEY WENT on in the little room with the big filing cabinets. I pried open a lot of drawers that night; the drawers containing the certificates, the visas, the affidavits, the fake credentials, the diplomas, the letters of identity (hadn't Varek convinced the warden he was Cono's cousin?) and all of the mingled memorabilia of hundreds of years of impersonations, imposture, and disguise. Floods, tons of paper. The dust fairly flew.

And more light was shed. I found the long closet with the wardrobe; the Ahmed wardrobe, the sportsman's garments, the shabby workman's garb complete even to the battered tin initialled lunchbox and the union button. The accoutrements of Varek the wealthy man of the world were there, too—and a box containing diamonds and other gems that reminded me of poor Vera LaValle.

Then there was another room, with more files. Letters and newspaper clippings. Ads from the Personal columns of ten thousand papers, in a score of languages. Help Wanted notices. Lonely Hearts messages. And letters, letters, letters—messages from the millions who later turned up missing. Those who answered Varek's appeal for a wife, a husband, an employee. I got a picture of him sitting there, year after year, sending out his letters, interviewing prospects, recruits for his army of the dead. Recruits who would not be missed, searched for.

There were more lights in other rooms. The big surgery, with the gigantic autoclave; completely modern, completely equipped. I wondered how he'd managed to assemble it here, and then I thought of the dead; the tireless dead who steal, who strain, who slave day and night.

Beyond the modern surgery was medieval horror.

The round, dungeon-like room, dominated by the huge table on which rested the alembics and retorts of an ancient alchemist. The beaker filled with the brownish-red, crusting liquid. The herbs and powders on the shelves; the dried roots in bottles, and the great jars filled with monkeys floating in a nauseous liquid, and other things that looked like monkeys but weren't. The stock of chalk and powders. The great circle drawn upon the floor with the zodiacal signs inscribed in blue before it. The jar of combustible powder—that was used to make the circle of fire inside a pentagon, according to the thaumaturgists. And on the iron table rested the iron book; the Grimoire of the sorcerer.

SORCERY AND science! Surgery and Satanism! That was the link, the combination! Sorcery had led to science, as Varek said. His original alchemic experiments had brought him to actual research and enabled him to perfect his method of reanimating the dead.

But that didn't explain his own continued life, his boasts of eternal youth. That was sorcery. That was selling your soul, after lighting the fires and invoking the Author of All Evil.

The rooms, the lighted rooms, seemed to present a panorama of Varek's entire existence across the centuries. Everything was here—and I wondered, now, if he'd told me the truth. If in every great city, unsuspected, beneath a house or a factory or a tenement there existed a duplicate of this place. What had he said? A sort of "dead storage", that was it.

"Dead storage." But where were the dead?

There was another room, beyond the alchemic chamber. I entered it, and the coldness engulfed me. This was it. The refrigerator storage space. Where you keep the cold meat.

The cold meat . . .

They lay on slabs, but they weren't sheeted. I could see them all, see their staring faces. Men, women, children, young, old, rich, poor—lavish your categories upon them, they were all here. A host, a hundred or more. Silent but not sleeping, inert but not immovable, rigid without rigor. They lay there, waiting, like toys that would soon be wound up by cunning hands and set about to walk in make-belief of life.

It was cold in that room, but cold alone did not make me shiver. I walked through rows of dead, staring into the faces that stared into mine. I don't know what I expected to see. None of them looked familiar—except, perhaps one little blonde who reminded me of someone I'd run into before somewhere.

Then, all at once, I knew what I must do. There was fire outside, and it would serve more purposes than that of conjuring up demons. It could also be used to put them to rest.

I walked back into the other room and picked up the powder box which, when its contents were kindled, traced a pattern of flame on the floor. A circle of fire protected you from demons, it was said, after you evoked them.

I ripped the lid off the box and began to sprinkle the powder about. I worked quickly, but not quickly enough.

Because when I looked up, somebody was standing in the room. He only stood there for a moment, and then he started for me.

It was Cono.

HE DIDN'T say anything and I didn't say anything. He came on and I backed away. The cold arms reached out; I'd felt them before. The tic-like grimace leered, and I knew it would keep on leering no matter how many bullets I might waste.

Because the dead don't die.

Because this was the end.

Because he was coming at me like a demon.

But demons can be warded off with fire.

I pulled out the .38 and pressed the trigger. I didn't aim at Cono; I aimed at the powder on the floor.

A circle of flame shot up, almost in Cono's face. He stopped. Dead or alive, fire destroys flesh. And he couldn't get through. Not as long as the fire flared.

I wondered how long that would be. When would the powder's potency be exhausted? Ten minutes, five, two? Whatever the time, I had that long to live and no longer—unless I could convince him.

I talked then. Told him what I thought he'd understand. About Varek being the Great Ahmed, hiding out with the carney for a while and perfecting plans. About seeing Cono and deciding to make him a recruit, then rigging up the murder charge by hypnotizing Louie, getting him to drug Cono and kill Flo.

I told him something about what Varek was, what he planned, what he'd do to Cono, to me, to the whole world if he wasn't stopped and stopped soon. I told him about the sorcery and the science and the bodies that walked everywhere in every city.

The fire began to flicker, to fade, to die down. I talked louder, faster.

And it didn't do any good.

It was like talking to a stone wall.

It was like talking to a dead man.

With a sickening feeling, I realized I'd been in this spot once before. I'd tried then, tried to tell Cono I was his friend, tried to reach his heart, his soul. But dead men have no hearts. Varek was his heart. And I knew of nothing that could touch his soul. Nothing he cared for, nothing he loved. Except Flo!

Then I remembered, remembered the next room and the blonde on the slab. The little blonde with the familiar face—Flo!

"Cono," I said. "Listen to me. You've got to listen. She's in there, too. You didn't know that, did you? He didn't tell you. But he's greedy, he wants them all. He not only took your body, he took Flo's too. She's in the next room, Cono. He cut off her head, put in his damned wires and plates, and now she'll walk for him forever!

He was blind. Blind and deaf. The flames died, he moved towards me, he caught me up in his arms. I waited for the squeezing strength of his fingers to wrench my life away. But he merely held me, held me and lumbered across the ashes into the next room.

"Show me where," he said, and the tic rippled horribly across his face.

I pointed. Pointed at the face I remembered from a photograph he'd shown me.

Cono saw her. He released me, and his hands went to his head. He kept staring at her, staring and staring, even after Varek came into the room.

THAT'S HOW it happened. One second we were alone and the next moment he was there—little gray shadow, silent and suave.

No emotion, no surprise, no tension.

Just his soft, quiet voice saying, "Kill him, Cono."

He might have been asking the big man for a match.

But as I stared at Varek—stared at the quiet little middle-aged man with the paper-thin lips—I saw many things.

I saw a vulgar charlatan in a carnival who was in turn a gypsy in Spain who was in turn a Polish count who was in turn a Haitian planter who was a London barrister who was a Polynesian trader who was a Tulsa wildcatter who was a physician in Cairo who was a trapper with Jim Bridger who was a diplomat of Austria who was—it went on and on that way, a hundred incarnations and a hundred lives and all of them were evil.

He faced us with all of that evil, the evil of a hundred and a thousand men, concentrated but quietly so, and he said to Cono again in the voice that could not be denied because it was the voice of mastery, the voice of life over death—"Kill him, Cono."

Cono set me down and I felt his arms close about my body, his hands grasp my throat. He was a robot, an automaton, he could not refuse; he was a zombie, vampire, all the evil legends, all the fear of the dead that return, the dead that never die.

Cono bent me back. And Varek, with a look in his eyes that was a gray ecstasy, came closer and waited for Cono to finish.

That's what Cono wanted, too.

For when Varek came close, Cono moved. One instant he held me—the next, I was free and those huge arms had reached out to engulf Varek.

The little gray man rose, shrieking, in the air. Cono squeezed—there was a sound like somebody stepping on a thin board—and the body of Varek writhed and twisted on the floor like a snake with a broken back.

Cono helped me with the powder, then. There were chemicals, too; enough to start a good-sized blaze.

"Come on," I said. "Time to get out of here."

"I'm staying," he said. "I belong here."

I had no answer to that one. I turned away.

"You got to go now," Cono told me. "Leave me the gun to start the fire. I give you five minutes to get out."

THE THING on the floor was mewing. Neither of us looked at it.

"One thing," Cono said. "I want you should know it so you'll maybe feel better. About that bartender. You didn't knock him off. You hit him with a bottle, but that didn't kill him. Varek killed him, later, when they dragged him in back to see how bad he was hurt. But he was going to pin the rap on you. I found out at the funeral home."

"Thanks," I said.

"Now go away," said Cono.

And I went. I walked through the rooms and didn't look back. I climbed the ladder back to the basement. When I reached the top I heard the muffled sound of a shot from below me, far away.

Long before the flames spread, I was out of the house and on my way to the Loop.

Next morning I read about the place burning to the ground, and that was the end.

But this is a story that never ends.

I keep thinking of those "dead storage" places in other cities. I keep wondering if Varek had turned everybody off that night—or if others walked in other places. The way he and Cono and Vera had all told me. "If you only knew how many . . ."

That's what frightens me.

That's why, wherever I go now, I'm afraid of women wearing high collars and chokers. Men in turtleneck sweaters or even a clergyman's collar. I think of the red scar under the scarf. And I wonder.

I wonder when someone or something will float through my window again. I wonder what walks abroad at night and waits to drag me down.

I wonder how I, or you, or anyone can tell, as we go about our daily rounds, which are the living and which are the dead. For all we know, they may be all around us. Because:

The dead don’t die!

My Struggle

By Floyd Scrilch
As told to Robert Bloch

"SRILCHIE," said my wife. "Why aren't you like other men?"

"What do you mean, honey?" I asked, expecting the usual sarcastic answer.

"Well, take like Bill Smith down the block," said my wife. "Two months ago he was just a common clerk like you. Then he started to take a course in DIANETICS, and only yesterday he stepped into a Big Paying Job."

"I know what Bill Smith stepped into," I retorted, bitterly. But she had started me thinking. Here I was, stuck in a rut, no Get Up and Go, no Aggressiveness, no Dynamic Personality. Why couldn't I convince a Big Employer that I was Valuable?

The next day I went out and bought a copy of DIANETICS FOR EVERYBODY AT HOME IN YOUR SPARE TIME, and I began to study. Yessir, if other fellows could become new personalities, if other people could be "cleared" and find new success, so could I. I was serious about it. So serious that I read the book down at the office and the boss heard about it and fired me.

But I didn't care. My wife yelled bloody murder when I told her, but I knew I was going to make the little woman Proud. So I just sat around the house reading the book. I read it in bed and at the table, and by the time she grabbed it away from me and threw it in the garbage, I was ready to go to a Psychiatric Clinic and undergo a DIANETICS treatment. The landlord said he'd throw us out if we didn't pay the rent, but I had to use the money for my treatments. I didn't worry. Pretty soon we were going to be on Easy Street!

After two months I was "cleared". Not only "cleared" but I knew all the proper Psychological Approaches to Handling My Life. I took a lot of notes, but I had to bum them for fuel on account of we didn't have any coal. But my memory was perfect now and I knew everything—the Proper Way to Enter an Office, and the Approach, and How to Appear Successful and How to Interest an Employer and Clinching the Deal. I felt aggressive and self-confident. I determined to see the head of the biggest firm in town.

The Big Day arrived. I awoke, took 50 deep breaths, a cold shower, and I was off. Oh, yeah, I dressed, too.

I entered the office confidently. The girl at the desk quailed before my masterful glance and led me straight to the boss's private office.

The boss was busy, but I swept the papers off his desk, sat down, and fired my proposition at him like a shot. I held his interest from the first; my glance never wavered until he dropped his eyes. I felt a surge of power, dominance, confidence. I couldn't lose with DIANETICS!

"How about that job, now?" I said, laughing boldly. I knew it was the Psychological Moment.

The boss eyed me and I could see him trying to resist, to be firm. I just gave him that old confident, aggressive grin. He stared at my shined shoes, my creased trousers, my natty tie, my clean fingernails, my well-groomed hair, my gleaming smile. For a long moment I held him helpless. Then he rose with a sheepish grin.

And he kicked me out on my face.

THE END

The End of Science-Fiction

Ormsbee got up at the science fiction convention to warn of approaching horror—but the horror itself spoke in a strange way!

I know I shouldn't be telling you this, because we are all pledged to secrecy. I guess the publishers were afraid of what might happen in the news leaked out.

"Let it ride," said one of the editors at the meeting where the decision was made. "Of course, their'll be talk about it at first. But we can fix it with the trade papers and the public press. The only trouble is that the fans will do a Int of complaining and investigating. I hey will wonder why science-fiction magazines aren't going to be published any more.

"Well, let them wonder. We'll just keep quiet. We must. And after a while the readers will forget, they'll find something else to think about. Of course the whole thing is awkward, but we have no choice not after what happened." That's the way it was finally decided. And up to now, nobody has breathed a word. Nothing has leaked out concerning the reasons for discontinuing all science-fiction publications—forever.

I'm breaking the pledge of silence now for the first time.

I'm going to tell you what happened on that last day—the day when science-fiction ended forever.

Naturally, I have my reasons for speaking out. I'll give them to you cold.

First of all, I owe it to Richard Ormsbee to tell the truth. I know he'd want it that way, and as his friend I must do it.

Secondly, I think you should be warned. Yes, I said "warned". Bemuse already I've heard rumors that some fan groups are agitating for the return of science-fiction magazines. Several publishers who never put out a fantasy book are thinking of entering the field. This must not happen.

There's a third reason, too. A most important reason.

This nation, this world, is in a bad enough situation without the addition of further madness and confusion. We are in no shape or condition to beat back new enemies—particularly the enemies I have in mind.

Does that sound peculiar to you? A little whacky, perhaps? I wish it were just that. But there's a grim truth behind my words.

Even now, these same words may be read by others. Others who read not for pleasure but for information. Others who might plagiarize, just as they plagiarized on that final, fatal day when science-fiction died.

When you finish this, you'll understand what I mean. And I want you to understand, for a reason.

I want you to go up into your attic or down into your cellar, whenever you've stacked or saved back issues of science-fiction and fantasy magazines. Go and find them, and destroy them. Destroy them instantly and utterly. Destroy them before they fall into the wrong hands and destroy you.

Remember, now—it's a bargain.

In return, I'm telling you the whole story. Here is the way it happened—the way that science-fiction died . . .

THE Tenth World Science Fiction Convention was scheduled for Labor Day Weekend. As a fantasy reader, you probably know all about the Conventions—organized on an annual basis by fans in various cities, they have become an institution. Each year, several hundred fans, editors and authors meet for three days in the selected city, attending regular sessions of speeches, lectures and discussions at a convention hall. This last year was

New York's turn to play host, and Labor Day Weekend had been eagerly awaited by fandom.

I pulled into Penn Station on Friday afternoon and lugged my grips down the platform. I kept my weather eyed peeled for a glimpse of Richard Ormsbee. He'd promised to meet me at the train, but there wasn't hide, hair nor mustache of Dick as I made my way through the crowd.

Instead, a short, pudgy-faced young man jostled toward me and stared upward. He hesitated for a long moment, then spoke.

"Pardon me, but are you Robert Bloch?"

"What did you expect?" I asked. "A gorilla?"

"No—it's just that you don't look the way I expected you to look—I mean—"

"I understand," I shrugged. "It's true that I used to have two heads, but one of them was amputated last year. I carry it in my suitcase. Want to see it?"

How far I might have succeeded in driving him crazy I'll never know. Larry Fisher came along at that moment and grabbed my arm. He's my agent, and he handled my arm gingerly so as not to injure the muscles I use in typing stories.

"Good to see you, Bob!" he greeted me. "By the way, meet George Selby. He's a fan of yours." Larry gestured toward the moon-faced young man. I started to apologize for my rudeness and attempt to put him at his ease, but Larry took charge of the situation.

"Let's get your things over to the hotel," he suggested. "Then we'll grab something to eat." He waved Selby aside. "See you at the Convention tomorrow," he promised. "You'll have plenty of time to talk to Bloch then."

He hustled me over to the cabstand and we ploughed through traffic toward the hotel.

"Where's Ormsbee?" I inquired, as we shot up Broadway with the speed of a rheumatic snail on crutches.

"Haven't seen him for the last few days," Larry told me. "Of course he's pretty busy—guest of honor at the Convention and all that. He's probably typing the final draft of his speech right now."

"He promised to meet me," I said.

"We'll call him from the hotel," Larry suggested. "I know he's anxious to see you."

I was anxious enough to see him. Richard Ormsbee and I had been friends for a dozen years. When I'd met him through correspondence he'd been a fan. Then he'd turned writer, and within a few years his reputation was established not only in the field of fantasy but beyond. He sold to the slicks, turned out books, did radio and TV work, and at the same time managed to retain his warm and unassuming friendliness. Where I come from in the writing business, that's no mean achievement, and I liked Dick for it. As a matter of fact, it was the news of his selection as guest of honor that drew me to this Convention.

So here I was. But no Ormsbee!

There was no answer when we phoned his house from my hotel room. That puzzled me. We'd made plans to meet by mail. What was wrong?

I didn't have much time to puzzle over the problem. Otto Binder and some of the New York gang arrived about five, and then Ackerman called—just in from the Coast—and Bob Tucker came up looking for a deck of cards.

We had dinner somewhere eventually, and drinks. We kept running into other Conventioneers, and more drinks. Gradually I forgot about Ormsbee.

BY the time I got back to the hotel, there was no room for anything in my head except the trip-hammer that seemed to be operating up there.

Then I went into my suite and found—Richard Ormsbee.

He was sitting on the bed. Or rather, he had been sitting there. But when I opened the door he jumped up.

"Oh—it's you!"

"Expecting a blonde?" I asked.

“No. Not exactly.” He smiled, but as we shook hands I noticed that he seemed tired. What had become of the usual Ormsbee banter that had charmed so many people across (and under) the table in days gone by?

I thought I had an obvious clue. Dick must be suffering from a bad case of stage-fright. The idea of making a speech tomorrow had him stymied.

“Convention got you down?” I asked. “Thinking about your speech?”

He shook his head. “It’s not my speech, Bob,” he said. “I’ve got that part figured out. Would you like to hear it?”

“Sure, Dick. Of course I would. Shoot.”

Ormsbee hunched forward on the bed and began to talk. He never cracked a smile, but what he said was oddly grotesque.

“Mr. Chairman, friends, and science-fiction fans of the world:

“What I have to say to you today is not very pleasant. You will not particularly enjoy listening to it, and I certainly do not enjoy telling it to you.

“But I have no choice, so I’ll try to make it short and to the point. Friends, my message to you is simply this—

“Science-fiction must be destroyed!

“What do I mean by that? I mean that all writers must stop writing science-fiction stories. Stop immediately, and forever.

“I mean that all publishers of fantasy magazines must give up publications—immediately, and forever.

“I mean that all fans must abandon their interest in the field. They must destroy all current and back issues of magazines, and amateur publications. They must burn—yes, burn—all books and pamphlets pertaining to fantasy.

“I mean that this must be the last World Science Fiction Convention. I mean that the name, the very memory of science-fiction must perish from the earth. I mean—“What’s that?”

The last two words were a shout. Ormsbee jerked his head towards the window, his face white with sudden shock.

I headed for the open window and peered out. I saw nothing beyond except the lights of Manhattan.

"I'm pretty shaky," Ormsbee murmured. "For a minute I thought it might be them."

He pulled out a cigarette, stuck it between his lips, but didn't light it. I faced him grimly.

"Listen, Dick, what is all this? What's with this screwball speech of yours? What's all the melodrama about 'them' ? Are you kidding?"

He shook his head. "I could give you the rest of the speech," he sighed. "That would explain it. But I'll boil it down. In the speech I give details, because I must be convincing. I want them to believe me. But I'll just give you bare facts."

He sat down once more and lighted the cigarette. "It started on the day they called me up to tell me about making the speech at this Convention.

"Naturally, I was pleased. I decided to knock off work and take a stroll. I went down to a little bookbinder by the name of Breutsch. He had a copy of H. P. Lovecraft's The Outsider that he was re-binding for me.

"I walked into Breutsch's little basement shop and the old man shuffled out of the back room. When he saw me, his face fell a bit.

" 'Isn't it ready yet?' I asked.

"He shook his head. 'Mr. Ormsbee—I don't know how to explain this to you—but your book has been stolen.'

" 'Stolen?'

" 'Either that, or the rats got it. There's prints like rat's paws in the dust near the window. And the window's broken.'

"He led me into the back room and showed me.

" 'Must have happened last night! he said. 'I had your book in clamps over there on the window-edge, drying. When I opened up shop this morning, here's what I found.'

"I stared at the dusty ledge. There were clamps setting against the wall. They had been pried open. And all around the clamps were prints. Prints in the dust. They looked like the marks of rodent claws, or the lines etched by scraping fingernails. But with one peculiarity. Each disturbance of dust came in a regular pattern of six marks. Not four, like a rat’s claws. Not five, like fingerprints. Six. Six indentations in a pattern, repeated a dozen times.

“Above the ledge was the window. The pane had obviously been shattered, but there was no broken glass. The opening was not jagged, but quite neat. A glass-cutter does that kind of a job. Then an arm might have reached down, a hand pried open the clamps, and taken the book.

“Very simple. Except that the marks were not made by fingers.

“I stared again at the disturbed dust. And then I began to shudder. Don’t ask me why. It wasn’t anything like your yarns, Bob. No feeling of ‘hovering horror’ or ‘evil presences’. But the skin crawled against my neck and my mouth went dry and I thought of my lost Lovecraft anthology and shuddered.

“Who—or what—had stolen this book? Why had this particular volume been chosen? It wasn’t a regular robbery.

“Breutsch said something about insurance and paying me back and notifying the police. I mumbled something about accidents and petty thieves. But we were both lying. As I left the shop I stared into his eyes and saw that he knew.

“Then, when I got home, I found the apartment had been searched.”

ORMSBEE doused the cigarette and continued. “There was no dust in the place, and I saw no unnatural prints. Somehow I was glad of that. But evidences of search were unmistakable. They’d pried a window up—don’t ask me how, since I’m on the fourth floor with a sheer drop to the courtyard below—and they’d gone through the place thoroughly.

“No money or jewelry was missing. That was strange.

“My clothes had been jumbled about a bit in the closet. And there was a gap in my bookshelves. Some back issues of magazines were gone. Also I missed a photograph from the dresser. But that was all.

“I could have called the police, but I didn’t. I merely straightened things out and took a drink. But I couldn’t straighten out my thoughts.

"And when at last I went to bed and tried to sleep off my forebodings, I had this dream."

Ormsbee's voice was low. It deepened as he went on.

"I dreamed that I had fallen asleep and left the radio going. Now, in my sleep, the radio spoke to me. From the blare of late dance-band music, a voice slithered out. It came from far away—and it called to me in accents that weren't formed in a human throat.

"That's what disturbed me, I guess. Because the words, as I half-heard them, were soothing. 'Sleep' said the voice. 'Sleep and rest' Gentle, beguiling words. The words of a hypnotist. And from a throat that wasn't meant to form words. Even in slumber I could tell that about the voice. It wasn't a foreign accent, it was an alien one. 'Sleep and rest' it droned.

"I might have obeyed at that. I might have sunk into a deeper coma. But then everything coalesced. Something about the prints in the dust and my disturbed room and the theft of that particular book seemed to add up at the sound of the alien voice. Something clicked into place. I knew, suddenly, what it was that I suspected and feared. And I woke up with a scream.

" 'The Whisperer!' I shrieked. 'The Whisperer in Darkness!'

"I awoke. There was a glowing in my room, but it didn't come from a light, or anything inside. It came from the open window just beyond. Something was hanging out there, something suspended before the opening. It appeared—in the brief glimpse I got of it—to be a shiny metal cylinder of surprising dimensions. I had the vague impression of sudden, blurred movement. Then the thing faded, or moved away before the echo of my shout had time to reverberate.

"I was out of bed at a bound. The sky beyond the window was clear. But so was the realization that haunted me now as I guessed the truth.

"Since that time, nothing has happened. Nothing definite, that is. I'm taking some sedative the doctor made up, and there are no dreams. It's bad enough to live with my thoughts while I'm awake.

"Not that I'm afraid. They must have what they were after, anyway—the Lovecraft book and the magazines. That should give them all the information they need. Of course, I'm bothered by their taking my photograph. It's utterly fantastic. But so is the whole business.

"So, you see, I must make the speech I gave you. I must make that speech tomorrow and warn them—warn the other writers and the editors. Tell them that they are here and plan on taking over. And we must do our part in preventing it."

Ormsbee's monologue ended, but my bewilderment had just begun.

"I don't see anything," I confessed. "Who are they? What is this warning you want to make? What's the clue of The Whisperer in Darkness?"

"Don't you remember the story?" asked Ormsbee. "Lord knows where Lovecraft got the idea—if it was only an idea, even then. It's about the things that came from beyond; from Pluto, the dark planet. They had a queer, superior intelligence, and planned to rule Earth through renegade humans who acted as their spies.

"They stole human intelligence, too, when they needed it. And gradually, by means of hypnotism, deception and outright violence, they planned to take control of mankind. When a man suspected the secret or knew too much, he was—eliminated."

"Now wait a minute," I said. "Fun's fun, but you aren't trying to tell me that good old HPL's story is fact and the monsters from Pluto are on your trail."

"Of course not. But something is," Ormsbee said, earnestly.

"Huh!" I snorted. "Sounds like something out of Eric Frank Russell or a hundred other science-fiction yarns I've read. Trouble with you is that you've been reading too much science-fiction!"

"That's the point," said Ormsbee. "Now you're getting it. Only, I'm not reading science-fiction. They are!"

"What do you mean?"

"Suppose," said Ormsbee, slowly, "that beings do exist. Beings from another dimension, or another planet. Beings forming part of a life-pattern alien to Earth.

"Suppose, again, that these creatures—whatever their purposes or desires—have suddenly found a way of communicating with Earth. Or even of coming to Earth in what we writers have spoken of so glibly for so many years: a space-ship.

"Suppose, for the sake of argument, that this is the truth behind the so-called flying Saucers, as has often been suggested. Grant that it's true. Outsiders with a superior intelligence arrive on this planet—what will they do?"

"Wreck the Empire State Building," I sneered. "They try it in every story."

"Exactly!" Ormsbee declared. "It's from those stories that they get their information!"

"Now, wait a minute—"

"DON'T you see?" he persisted "Picture these aliens, these outsiders, arriving through a gap in the continuum of space or time. They have no direct kinship with humanity or human thought. The strongest link would naturally be through the minds of those who are at least conditioned—however unwittingly—to the possibility of their existence. To be specific, the writers of fantasy and science fiction, whose brains can conceive of such beings.

"That's how they were drawn to me, I suppose. And through my mind they learned of the books and the magazines.

"Suppose you were a spy in enemy territory. Wouldn't you want to secure plans, maps, theories of strategy? Of course! And the theories of strategy for those outside of earth are—science-fiction stories!

"Where else would you find ideas on how to destroy the earth, or rule the human race? Where else would you find such detailed consideration of just how the world might be successfully invaded from outside?

"They took the Lovecraft book containing that Whisperer story. And then they came to my place for magazines. There's some psychic connection with my unconscious mind, and it guides them. Of course, I can't guess what they want, or what they plan to do. Why they tried to get to me in sleep. What that half-waking vision of a silver cylinder signifies.

"All that I'm sure of is that a menace does exist. And I'm making my speech tomorrow. I'm telling the science-fiction world everything I've told you. We've aided an enemy unconsciously for years, and it must stop.

"For whoever they are, and whatever they plan, we mustn't help them any longer. We must stop writing the stories. We must seal our imaginations to those images of outside that seem to aid them.

"Perhaps they will come out in the open, soon. It may be that we can make plans, anticipate their movements, learn more about them. But come what may—I'm giving my speech."

Ormsbee concluded abruptly, forcing a grin as he rose to his feet.

"Now I must rush," he said. "Maybe you think I'm crazy, and maybe everyone will think I'm crazy, after tomorrow. But please promise me one thing—not a word to anyone until I appear at Convention hall. Good night. See you tomorrow."

I fumbled for words, but there was nothing to say. He left the room, left me standing by the open window.

For a long time I stared down at the lights of the city below. Then I stared upward at the distant stars, and at the gulfs of blackness between the stars.

And I wondered—

LONG before the official opening of the Convention at 10 AM, the penthouse hall was crowded. There must have been over four hundred in attendance. Everyone! milled around, and I had a hard time spotting familiar faces. But the whole fantasy field was out in force: editors, authors, and fans.

Then George Selby, perennial fan, grabbed my elbow and steered me into the hall outside. He began to pump my arm and also me, for information. What did I write? How did I write? Why did I write?

The more he talked, the more I wondered. Meanwhile, the speeches of welcome had already started in the hall and the seats were filled. By the time I managed to shake friend Selby and get back into the hall there was nothing left but standing room against the wall, near the door. And Ormsbee's name was being announced as the next speaker.

There was applause as Richard Ormsbee stepped out from the back of the raised platform and approached the lectern and microphone. Knowing what I did, it was easy to detect signs of strain on his rigid features. He looked pale, and his lips were compressed beneath his mustache. He walked slowly, and kept his hands in his pockets. I could imagine how nervous he must be, but his face was stolid, immobile.

The applause subsided. A building attendant peered into the room, glanced around curiously, and withdrew. I hunched against the wall and prepared to listen.

Ormsbee had already begun to talk. His voice sounded dully over the microphone. Hall acoustics were not all they should be. But then, neither was his speech.

For Ormsbee was not delivering the speech he had recited to me the night before!

I listened intently as I heard the unfamiliar sentences pour out.

"The peculiar irony of it," he was saying, "is that you—who are presumedly authorities on the subject—know nothing about it. Absolutely nothing!

"What do you know about space, for example? Not as much as Columbus knew about the western hemisphere before he sailed. Not as much as the ancient Phoenicians, rather. For early sailors at least ventured out to sea.

"But no man has ever risen more than a few dozen miles into what you call the stratosphere. No man-made instrument has ever risen much higher and returned.

“And yet, in your ignorance, you presume to set forth ‘laws’ about space. A stupid Einstein, using the formalized gibberish you call mathematics, tries to compress the entire universe into a concept bounded by three-dimensional figures and equations.

“You and your scientific postulates! They are not based on actual observations of physical reactions, but on hollow philosophic attitudes toward those reactions. You name rather than explain; yours is a system of labelling.

“Exactly what is the ‘cosmic ray’ ? What is ‘corpuscular radiation’ and ‘auroreal streamers’—what is this jargon about ‘E’ layers in electronics? Just words, gibberish of little men who don’t even dream of what electricity really is. Men who claim to chart the universe while squatting on an Earth so faultily weighed and measured that there is ho mathematical certitude anywhere. And if a phenomenon presents itself that is not in line with your hollow theories, you ignore it.

“You pitiful, deluded ones, who don’t even dream of what goes on under your very noses, who-sneer at Fort, scoff at the few thinkers who dared to speculate on the truth—”

Ormsbee’s speech wasn’t exactly making a hit. Even though he delivered it stolidly enough, there were growing murmurs, grumblings and mutterings rising to open complaints.

“Still, you have unwittingly served your purpose. Ignorantly, you have opened the way to the very abysses of which you complacently scribble in your childish fantasies—”

I felt an arm jab into my back, and turned. The building attendant who had peered into the room was staring at me, now. There was no curiosity in his face, only a grimace of horror.

“Let me through,” he whispered. “Got to make an announcement, right away—”

“Wait a minute,” I began. He shook his head. Suddenly he opened his mouth and began to yell, in a voice that drowned out Ormsbee’s words from the platform.

“It was you fellers done it!” he shouted. “You and your crazy tricks!”

HEADS turned, craned. The attendant faced his audience.

“Get it off the roof right away!” he yelled. “Get it off, or I’ll have the whole gang tossed out of the hotel!”

“What’s on the roof?” I snapped.

“That damned silver cylinder—it come down from the sky and it’s humming and purring—”

Silver cylinder? Hadn’t Ormsbee told me?

I took sudden command of the situation.

“Where’s the stairs?” I yelled. I’m afraid my own voice held a note of hysteria. “Come on, let’s see this thing.”

We turned. The speech was forgotten as the crowd poured out at our heels. Half of them must have thought it was a gag—but nobody likes to miss a gag.

The jam on the staircase to the roof was terrific. But I was still right behind the attendant when we reached the top.

I stared at the empty roof.

“It’s gone!” His jaw hung slackly.

“No it isn’t,” I muttered. “There!”’, And I pointed toward the horizon.

Faint and far away the flicker of light shown down. Something spun off into space—spun like a silver top against the sun. Something that might have been a great round metal cylinder. Something that might have been a flying saucer. Something that might have been a space-ship from a story.

I don’t know how many of the others saw it. But I saw it. And then—

“Where’s Ormsbee?”

The familiar voice whispered at my side. It was Larry, my agent. He stared at me as I bent my head. “I called him this morning to pick him up on the way to the Convention. But he wasn’t home. Then I came over here alone. Just got in and saw the crowd up on the roof—”

"It's all right," I said. "Ormsbee's here. Downstairs making a speech when this interruption came." I steered Larry back downstairs, through the throng of excited fans, all babbling at once.

Ormsbee was not a part of the crowd here or on the corridor below, so I assumed he was still on the platform, patiently waiting for his audience to return.

We entered the hall. It was deserted. Only then, as I stared up at the platform did the monstrous conjecture form in my mind.

They—

They had taken the Lovecraft book. That story—The Whisperers in Darkness—would give them an idea. No wonder Ormsbee had feared it. As he said, we writers could tell them what to do.

So they took the book. And they took his magazines. And inspected his clothing. And stole his picture. And when they couldn't get to him in jeep, they waited.

Waited until last night—

Why? Because he was going to make a speech. A speech about destroying science-fiction. A speech warning science-fiction and the world about invaders from outside.

So they had taken steps, moving in their great metal globe, to see that Ormsbee wouldn't make that speech.

But he had just spoken. Or else—

I didn't say anything to Larry. I just thought of the strange mockery of the speech I had heard, and I thought of how curiously immobile Ormsbee's face had been, and how he had held his hands in his pockets, walked woodenly, and talked in a drawling drone.

Then I was running down the aisle, clawing my way up to the lectern. I knew what I was looking for, of course. Anybody who had read Lovecraft's story would guess.

I was looking for a rubber mask—the kind that can be fitted over the head. A rubber mask moulded in the features of Richard Ormsbee.

I didn't find it.

It wasn't until I stumbled backstage that I found something—and promptly passed out.

EVER since that discovery I've been waiting for other things to be found. Waiting for other manifestations of those presences from outside.

I don't, know when they will move again. I don't know exactly what they want. If they plagiarized the ideas in Lovecraft's story they can plagiarize any horror, make it real.

All I can do is plead with you, implore you to abandon science-fiction forever. Don't give them any more help!

All I can do is tell you what I stumbled over when I went backstage.

It was Ormsbee's body. Or certain parts of it.

They had sewed up the head again very cleverly, and it wasn't until the doctors arrived and made their examination that the changes could be detected.

It took a complete autopsy to determine how the brain had been removed and the spinal column altered. Even now they cannot account for the tangle of wires, coils and metal filaments that filled the empty skull and extended through the body.

Some say it was a mechanical brain, substituted to animate a corpse. There have been learned comments about the use of unclassified metals and alloys.

On only one point are they agreed—whatever the mechanism animating the body of Richard Ormsbee on that fatal day when science-fiction died—it wasn't made on earth!

The End

The Man Who Collected Poe

Would, Edgar Allan Poe be able to sell his stories if he were writing today? This is a question which has long intrigued editors, authors, readers and critics of fantasy. It is a question I have sought to answer in the only possible way—by writing a story of Poe in the manner which Poe himself might have written it. I do not claim a tenth of his talent or a tithe of his genius but I have proposed deliberately, in so far as possible to recreate his style. Poe scholars will recognize my deliberate inclusion of sentences and sections from "The Fall of the House of Usher", and the casual reader will quite easily discover them. The result is, I believe, a "Poe story" in a rather unique and special sense and one which it gave me great pleasure to write as a tribute to a figure to whom I, like every other writer of fantasy, must own indebtedness—Robert Bloch.

DURING the whole of a dull, dark and soundless day in the autumn of the year, when the clouds hung oppressively low in the heavens, I had been passing alone, by automobile, through a singularly dreary tract of country, and at length found myself, as the shades of the evening drew on, within view of my destination.

I looked upon the scene before me—upon the mere house, and the simple landscape features of the domain—upon the bleak walls—upon the vacant eye-like windows—upon a few rank sedges—and upon a few white trunks of decayed trees—with a feeling of utter confusion commingled with dismay. For it seemed to me as though I had visited this scene once before, or read of it, perhaps, in some frequently re-scanned tale. And yet assuredly it could not be, for only three days had passed since I had made the acquaintance of Launcelot Canning and received an invitation to visit him at his Maryland residence.

The circumstances under which I met Canning were simple; I happened to attend a bibliophilic meeting in Washington and was introduced to him by a mutual friend. Casual conversation gave place to absorbed and interested discussion when he discovered my preoccupation with works of fantasy. Upon learning that I was traveling upon a vacation with no set itinerary, Canning urged me to become his guest for a day and to examine, at my leisure, his unusual display of memorabilia.

“I feel, from our conversation, that we have much in common.” he told me. “For you see, sir, in my love of fantasy I bow to no man. It is a taste I have perhaps inherited from my father and from his father before him, together with their considerable acquisitions in the genre. No doubt you would be gratified with what I am prepared to show you, for in all due modesty, I beg to style myself the world’s leading collector of the works of Edgar Allen Poe.”

I confess that his invitation as such did not enthrall me, for I hold no brief for the literary hero-worshipper or the scholarly collector as a type. I own to a more than passing-interest in the tales of Poe, but my interest does not extend to the point of ferreting out the exact date upon which Mr. Poe first decided to raise a mustache, nor would I be unduly intrigued by the opportunity to examine several hairs preserved from that hirsute appendage.

So it was rather the person and personality of Launcelot Canning himself which caused me to accept his proferred hospitality. For the man who proposed to become my host might have himself stepped from the pages of a Poe tale. His speech, as I have endeavored to indicate, was characterized by a courtly rodomontade so often exemplified in Poe’s heroes—and beyond certainty, his appearance bore out the resemblance.

Launcelot Canning had the cadaverousness of complexion, the large, liquid, luminous eye, the thin, curved lips, the delicately modelled nose, finely moulded chin, and dark, web-like hair of a typical Poe protagonist.

It was this phenomenon which prompted my acceptance and led me to journey to his Maryland estate which, as I now perceived, in itself manifested a Poe-etic quality of its own, intrinsic in the images of the gray sedge, the ghastly tree-stems, and the vacant and eyelike windows of the mansion of gloom. All that was lacking was a tarn and a moat—and as I prepared to enter the dwelling I half expected to encounter therein the carved ceilings, the sombre tapestries, the ebon floors arid the phantasmagoric armorial trophies so vividly described by the author of Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque.

Nor, upon entering Launcelot Canning's home was I too greatly disappointed in my expectations. True to both the atmopheric quality of the decrepit mansion and to my own fanciful presentiments, the door was opened in response to my knock by a valet who conducted me, in silence,. through dark and intricate passages to the study of his master.

The room in which I found myself was very large and lofty. The windows were long, narrow, and pointed, and at so vast a distance from the black oaken floor as to be altogether inaccessible from within. Feeble gleams of encrimsoned light made their way through the trellised panes, and served to render sufficiently distinct the more prominent objects around; the eye, however, struggled in vain to reach the remoter angles of the chamber or the recesses, of the vaulted and fretted ceiling. Dark draperies hung upon the walls. The general furniture was profuse, comfortless, antique, and tattered. Many books and musical instruments lay scattered about, but failed to give any vitality to the scene.

Instead they rendered more distinct that peculiar quality of quasi-recollection; it was as though I found myself once again, after a protracted absence, in a familiar setting. I had read, I had imagined, I had dreamed, or I had actually beheld this setting before.

Upon my entrance, Launcelot Canning arose from a sofa on which he had been lying at full length, and greeted me with a vivacious warmth which had much in it, I at first thought, of an overdone cordiality.

Yet his tone, as he spoke of the object of my visit, of his earnest desire to see me, and of the solace he expected me to afford him in a mutual discussion of our interests, soon alleviated my initial misapprehension.

Launcelot Canning welcomed me with the rapt enthusiasm of the born collector—and I came to realize that he was indeed just that. For the Poe collection he shortly proposed to unveil before me was actually his birthright.

Initially, he disclosed, the nucleus of the present accumulation had begun with his grandfather, Christopher Canning, a respected merchant of Baltimore. Almost eighty years ago he had been one of the, leading patrons of the arts in his community and as such was partially instrumental in arranging for the removal of Poe's body to the southeastern corner of the Presbyterian Cemetery at Fayette and Green Streets, where a suitable monument might be erected. This event occurred in the year 1875, and it was a few years prior to that time that Canning laid the foundation of the Poe collection.

"Thanks to his zeal," his grandson informed me, "I am today the fortunate possessor of a copy of virtually every existing specimen of Poe's published works. If you will step over here"—and he led me to a remote corner of the vaulted study, past the dark draperies, to a bookshelf which rose remotely to the shadowy ceiling—"I shall be pleased to corroborate that claim. Here is a copy of Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane and other Poems in the eighteen twenty-nine edition, and here is the still earlier Tamerlane and other Poems of eighteen twenty-seven. 'The Boston edition, which, as you doubtless know, is valued today at fifteen thousand dollars.' I can assure you that Grandfather Canning parted with no such sum in order to gain possession of this rarity."

He displayed the volumes with an air of commingled pride and cupidity which is oft-times characteristic of the collector and is by no means to be confused with either literary snobbery or ordinary greed. Realizing this, I remained patient as he exhibited further treasures—copies of the Philadelphia Saturday Courier containing early tales, bound volumes of The Messenger during the period of Poe's editorship, Graham's Magazine, editions of the New York Sun and the New York Mirror boasting, respectively, of The Balloon Hoax and The Raven, and files of The Gentleman's Magazine. Ascending a short library ladder, he handed down to me the Lea and Blanchard edition of Tales of the Grotesque and Arabesque, the Conchologist's First Book, the Putnam Eureka, and, finally, the little paper booklet, published in 1843 and sold [or 12½¢, entitled The Prose Romances of Edgar A. Poe; an insignificant-trifle containing two tales which is valued by present-day collectors at $50,000.

CANNING informed me of this last fact, and, indeed, keep up a running commentary upon each item he presented. There was no doubt but that he was a Poe scholar as well as a Poe collector, and his words informed tattered specimens of the Broadway Journal and Godey's Lady's Book with a singular fascination not necessarily inherent in the flimsy sheets or. their contents.

"I owe a great debt to Grandfather Canning's obsession;" he observed, descending the ladder and joining me before the bookshelves. "It is not altogether a breach of confidence to admit that his interest in Poe did reach the point of an obsession, and perhaps eventually of an absolute mania. The knowledge, alas, is public property, I fear.

"In the early seventies he built this house, and I am quite sure that you have been observant enough to note that it in itself is almost a replica of a typical Poeesque mansion. This was his study, and it was here that he was wont to pore over the books, the letters, and the numerous mementoes of Poe's life.

"What prompted a retired merchant to devote himself so fanatically to the pursuit of a hobby, I cannot say. Let it suffice that he virtually withdrew from the world and from all other normal interests. He conducted a voluminous and lengthy correspondence with aging men and women who had known Poe in their lifetime—made pilgrimages to Fordham, sent his agents to West Point, to England and Scotland, to virtually every locale in which Poe had set foot during his lifetime. He acquired letters and souvenirs as gifts, he bought them, and—I fear—stole them, if no other means of acquisition proved feasible."

Launcelot Canning smiled and nodded. "Does all this sound strange to you? I confess that once I, too, found it almost incredible, a fragment of romance. Now, after years spent here, I have lost my own objectivity."

"Yes, it is strange," I replied. "But are you quite sure that there was not. some obscure personal reason for your grandfather's interest? Had he met Poe as a boy, or been closely associated with one of his friends? Was there, perhaps, a distant, undisclosed relationship?"

At the mention of the last word, Canning started visibly, and a tremor of agitation overspread his countenance.

"Ah!" he exclaimed. "There you voice my own inmost conviction. A relationship—assuredly there must have been one—I am morally, instinctively certain that Grandfather Canning felt or knew himself to be linked to Edgar Poe by ties of blood. Nothing else could account for his strong initial interest, his continuing defense of Poe in the literary controversies of the day, and his final melancholy lapse into a world of delusion and illusion.

"Yet he never voiced a statement or put an allegation upon paper—and I have searched the collection of letters in vain for the slightest clue.

"It is curious that you so promptly divine a suspicion held not only by myself but by my father. He was only a child at the time of my Grandfather Canning's death, but the attendant circumstances left a profound impression upon his sensitive nature. Although he was immediately removed from this house to the home of his mother's people in Baltimore, he lost no time in returning upon assuming his inheritance in early manhood.

"Fortunately being in possession of a considerable income, he was able to devote his entire lifetime to further research. The name of Arthur Canning is still well known in the world of literary criticism, but for some reason he preferred to pursue his scholarly examination of Poe's career in privacy. I believe this preference was dictated by an inner sensibility; that he was endeavoring to unearth some information which would prove his father's, his, and for that matter, my own, kinship to Edgar Poe."

"You say your father was also a collector?" I prompted.

"A statement I am prepared to substantiate," replied my host, as he led me to yet another corner of the shadow-shrouded study. "But first, if you would accept a glass of wine?"

He filled, not glasses, but veritable beakers from a large carafe, and we toasted one another in silent appreciation. It is perhaps unnecessary for me to observe that the wine was a fine old Amontillado.

"Now, then," said Launcelot Canning. "My father's special province in Poe research consisted of the accumulation and study of letters."

Opening a series of large trays or drawers beneath the bookshelves, he drew out file after file of glassined folios, and for the space of the next half hour I examined Edgar Poe's correspondence-letters to Henry Herring, to Doctor Snodgrass, Sarah Shelton, James P. Moss, Elizabeth Poe—missives to Mrs. Rockwood, Helen Whitman, Anne Lynch, John Pendleton Kennedy—notes to Mrs. Richmond, to John Allan, to Annie, to his brother, Henry—a profusion of documents, a veritable epistolary cornucopia.

During the course of my perusal my host took occasion to refill our beakers with wine, and the heady draught began to, take effect—for we had not eaten, and I own I gave no thought to food, so absorbed was I in the yellowed pages illumining Poe's past.

Here was wit, erudition, literary criticism; here were the muddled, maudlin outpourings of a mind gone in drink and despair; here was the draft of a projected story, the fragments of a poem; here was a pitiful cry for deliverance and a paean to living beauty; here was a dignified response to a dunning letter and an editorial pronunciamento to an admirer; here was love, hate, pride, anger, celestial serenity, abject penitence, authority, wonder, resolution, indecision, joy, and soul-sickening melancholia.

Here was the gifted elocutionist, the stammering drunkard, the adoring husband, the frantic lover, the proud editor, the indigent pauper, the grandiose dreamer, the shabby realist, the scientific inquirer, the gullible metaphysician, the dependent stepson, the free and untrammeled spirit, the hack, the poet, the enigma that was Edgar Allan Poe.

Again the beakers were filled and emptied.

I drank deeply with my lips, and with my eyes more deeply still.

For the first time the true enthusiasm of Launcelot Canning was communicated to my own sensibilities—I divined the eternal fascination found in a consideration of Poe the writer and Poe the man; he who wrote Tragedy, lived Tragedy, was Tragedy; he who penned Mystery, lived and died in Mystery, and who today looms on the literary scene as Mystery incarnate.

And Mystery Poe remained, despite Arthur Canning's careful study of the letters. "My father learned nothing." my host confided, "even though he assembled, as you see here, a collection to delight the heart of a Mabbott or a Quinn. So his search ranged further. By this time I was old enough to share both his interest and his inquiries. Come," and he led me to an ornate chest which rested beneath the windows against the west wall of the study.

Kneeling, he unlocked the repository, and then drew forth, in rapid and marvelous succession, a series of objects each of which boasted of intimate connection with Poe's life.

There were souvenirs of his youth and his schooling abroad—a book he had used during his sojourn at West Point—mementoes of his days as a theatrical critic in the form of playbills, a pen used during his editorial period, a fan once owned by his girl-wife, Virginia, a brooch of Mrs. Clemm's; a profusion of objects including such diverse articles as a cravat-stock and—curiously enough—Poe's battered and tarnished flute.

Again we drank, and I own the wine was potent. Canning's countenance remained cadaverously wan—but, moreover, there was a species of mad hilarity in his eye—ail evident restrained hysteria in his whole demeanor. At length, from the scattered heap of curiosa, I happened to draw forth and examine a little box of no remarkable character, whereupon I was constrained to inquire its history and what part it had played in the life of Poe.

“In the life of Poe?” A visible tremor convulsed the features of my host, then rapidly passed in transformation to a grimace, a rictus of amusement. “This little box—and you will note how, by some fateful design or contrived coincidence it bears a resemblance to the box he himself conceived, of and described in his tale, Berenice—this little box is concerned with his death, rather than his life. It is, in fact, the self-same box my grandfather Christopher Canning clutched to his bosom when they found him down there.”

Again the tremor, again the grimace. “But stay, I have not yet told you of the details. Perhaps you would be interested in seeing the spot where Christopher Canning was stricken; I have already told you of his madness, but I did no more than hint at the character of his delusions. You have been patient with me, and more than patient. Your understanding shall be rewarded, for I perceive you can be fully entrusted with the facts.”

What further revelations Canning was prepared to make I could not say, but his manner was such as to inspire a vague disquiet and trepidation in my breast.

Upon perceiving my unease he laughed shortly and laid a hand upon my shoulder. “Come, this should interest you as an aficionado of fantasy,” he said. “But first, another drink to speed our journey.”

He poured, we drank, and then he led the way from that vaulted chamber, down the silent halls, down the staircase, and into the lowest recesses of the building until we reached what resembled a donjon-keep, its floor and the interior of a long archway carefully sheathed in copper. We paused before a door of massive iron. Again I felt in the aspect of this scene an element evocative of recognition or recollection.

Canning’s intoxication was such that he misinterpreted, or chose to misinterpret, my reaction.

“You need not be afraid,” he assured me. “Nothing has happened down here since that day, almost seventy years ago, when his servants discovered him stretched out before this door, the little box clutched to his bosom; collapsed, and in a state of delirium from which he never emerged. For six months he lingered, a hopeless maniac—raving as wildly from the very moment of his discovery as at the moment he died—babbling his visions of the giant horse, the fissured house collapsing into the tarn, the black cat, the pit, the pendulum, the raven on the pallid bust, the beating heart, the pearly teeth, and the nearly liquid mass of loathsome—of detestable putridity from which a voice emanated.

“Nor was that all he babbled,” Canning confided, and here his voice sank to a whisper that reverberated through the copper-sheathed hall and against the iron door. “He hinted other things far worse than fantasy; of a ghastly reality surpassing all of the phantasms of Poe.

“For the first time my father and the servants learned the purpose of the room he had built beyond this iron door, and learned too what Christopher Canning had done to establish his title as the world’s foremost collector of Poe.

“For he babbled again of Poe’s death, thirty years earlier, in eighteen forty-nine—of the burial in the Presbyterian Cemetery—and of the removal of the coffin in eighteen seventy-four to the corner where the monument was raised. As I told you, and as was known then, my grandfather had played a public part in instigating that removal. But now we learned of the private part—learned that there was a monument and a grave, but no coffin in the earth beneath Poe’s alleged resting place. The coffin now rested in the secret room at the end of this passage. That is why the room, the house itself, had been built.

“I tell you, he had stolen the body of Edgar Allan Poe—and as he shrieked aloud in his final madness, did not this indeed make him the greatest collector of Poe?

"His ultimate intent was never divined, but my father made one significant discovery—the little box clutched to Christopher Canning's bosom contained a portion of the crumbled bones, the veritable dust that was all that remained of Poe's corpse."

My host shuddered and turned away. He led me back along that hall of horror, up the stairs, into the study. Silently, he filled our beakers and I drank as hastily, as deeply, as desperately as he.

"What could my father do? To own the truth was to create a public scandal. He chose instead to keep silence; to devote his own life to study in retirement.

"Naturally the shock affected him profoundly; to my knowledge he never entered the room beyond the iron door and, indeed, I did not know of the room or its contents until the hour of his death—and it was not until some years later that I myself found the key among his effects.

"But find the key I did, and the story was immediately and completely corroborated. Today I am the greatest collector of Poe—for he lies in the keep below, my eternal trophy!"

This time I poured the wine. As I did so, I noted for the first time the imminence of a storm; the impetuous fury of its gusts shading the casements, and the echoes of its thunder rolling and rumbling down the time-corroded corridors of the old house.

The wild, overstrained vivacity with which my host hearkened, or apparently hearkened, to these sounds did nothing to reassure me—for his recent revelation led me to suspect his sanity.

That the body of Edgar Allan Poe had been stolen—that this mansion had been built to house it—that it was indeed enshrined in a crypt below—that grandsire, son, and grandson had dwelt here alone, apart, enslaved to a sepulchral secret—was beyond sane belief.

And yet, surrounded now by the night and the storm, in a setting torn from Poe's own frenzied fancies, I could not be sure. Here the past was still alive, the very spirit of Poe's tales breathed forth its corruption upon the scene.

As thunder boomed, Launcelot Canning took up Poe's flute, and, whether in defiance of the storm without or as a mocking accompaniment, he played; blowing upon it with drunken persistence, with eery atonality, with nerve-shattering shrillness. To the shrieking of that infernal instrument the thunder added a braying counterpoint.

UNEASY, uncertain and unnerved, I retreated into the shadows of the bookshelves at the farther end of the room, and idly scanned the titles of a row of ancient tomes. Here was the Chiromancy of Robert Flud, the Directorium Inquisitorum, a rare and curious book in quarto Gothic that was the manual of a forgotten church; and betwixt and between the volumes of pseudo scientific inquiry, theological speculation, and sundry incunabula I found titles that arrested and appalled me. De Vermis Mysteriis and the Liber Eibon, treatises on demonology, on witchcraft, on sorcery mouldered in crumbling binding. The books were old, but the books were not dusty. They had been read—

"Read them?" It was as though Canning, divined my inmost thoughts. He had put aside his flute and now approached me, tittering as though in continued drunken defiance of the storm. Odd echoes and boomings now sounded through the long halls of the house, and curious grating sounds threatened to drown out his words and his laughter.

"Read them?" said Canning. "I study them. Yes, I have gone beyond grandfather and father, too. It was I who procured the books that held the key, and it was I who found the key. A key more difficult to discover, and more important, than the key to the vaults below, I often wonder if Poe himself had access to these selfsame tomes, knew the selfsame secrets. The secrets of the grave and what lies beyond, and what can be summoned forth if one but holds the key."

He stumbled away and returned with wine. "Drink," he said. "Drink to the night and the storm."

I brushed the proferred glass aside. “Enough,” I said. “I must be on my way.”

Was it fancy or did I find fear frozen on his features? Canning clutched my arm and cried, “No, stay with me! This is no night on which to be alone; I swear I cannot abide the thought of being alone, I can bear to be alone no more!”

His incoherent babble mingled with the thunder and the echoes; I drew back and confronted him. “Control yourself,” I counseled. “Confess that this is a hoax, an elaborate imposture arranged to please your fancy.”

“Hoax? Imposture? Stay, and I shall prove to you beyond all doubt”-and so saying, Launcelot Canning stooped and opened a small drawer set in the wall beneath and beside the bookshelves. “This should repay you for your interest in my story, and in Poe,” he murmured. “Know that you are the first, other person than myself, to glimpse these treasures.”

He handed me a sheaf of manuscripts on plain white paper; documents written in ink curiously similar to that I had noted while perusing Poe’s letters. Pages were clipped together in groups, and for a moment I scanned titles alone.

“The Worm of Midnight, by Edgar Poe,” I read, aloud. “The Crypt,” I breathed. And here, “The Further Adventures of Arthur Gordon Pym“—and in my agitation I came close to dropping the precious pages. “Are these what they appear to be—the unpublished tales of Poe?”

My host bowed.

“Unpublished, undiscovered, unknown, save to me—and to you.”

“But this cannot be,” I protested. “Surely there would have been a mention of them somewhere, in Poe’s own letters or those of his contemporaries. There would have been a clue, an indication, somewhere, some place, somehow.”

Thunder mingled with my words, and thunder echoed in Canning’s shouted reply.

“You dare, to presume an imposture? Then compare!” He stooped again and brought out a glassined folio of letters. “Here—is this not the veritable script of Edgar Poe? Look at the calligraphy of the letter, then at the manuscripts. Can you say they are not penned by the selfsame hand?"

I looked at the handwriting; wondered at the possibilities of a monomaniac's forgery. Could Launcelot Canning, a victim of mental disorder, thus painstakingly simulate Poe's hand?

"Read, then!" Canning screamed through the thunder. "Read, and dare to say that these tales were written by any other than Edgar Poe, whose genius defies the corruption of Time and the Conqueror Worm!"

I read but a line or two, holding the topmost manuscript close to eyes that strained beneath wavering candlelight; but even in the flickering illumination I noted that which told me the only, the incontestable truth. For the paper, the curiously unyellowed paper, bore a visible watermark; the name of a firm of well-known modern stationers, and the date-1949.

Putting the sheaf aside, I endeavored to compose myself as I moved away from Launcelot Canning. For now I knew the truth; knew that, one hundred years after Poe's death a semblance of his spirit still lived in the distorted and disordered soul of Canning. Incarnation,. reincarnation, call it what you will; Canning was, in his own irrational mind, Edgar Allan Poe.

Stifled and dull echoes of thunder from a remote portion of the mansion now commingled with the soundless seething of my own inner turmoil, as I turned and rashly addressed my host.

"Confess!" I cried. "Is it not true that you have written these tales, fancying yourself the embodiment of Poe? Is it not true that you suffer from a singular delusion born of solitude and everlasting brooding upon the past; that you have reached a stage characterized by the conviction that Poe still lives on in your own person?"

A strong shudder came over him and a sickly smile quivered about his lips as he replied. "Fool! I say to you that I have spoken the truth. Can you doubt the evidence of your senses? This house is real, the Poe collection exists, and the stories exist—they exist, I swear, as truly as the body lying in the crypt below!"

I took up the little box from the table and removed the lid. “Not so,” I answered. “You said your grandfather was found with this box clutched to his breast, before the door of the vault, and that it contained Poe’s dust. Yet you cannot escape the fact that the box is empty.” I faced him furiously. “Admit it, the story is a fabrication., a romance. Poe’s body does not lie beneath this house, nor are these his unpublished works, written during his lifetime and concealed.”

“True enough.” Canning’s smile was ghastly beyond belief. “The dust is gone because I took it and used it—because in the works of wizardry I found the formulae, the arcana whereby I could raise, the flesh, recreate the body from the essential salts of the grave. Poe does not lie beneath this house—he lives! And the tales are his posthumous works!”

Accented by thunder, his words crashed against my consciousness.

“That was the end-all and the be-all of my planning, of my studies, of my work, of my life! To raise, by sorcery, the veritable spirit of Edgar Poe from the grave—reclothed and animate in flesh—set him to dwell and dream and do his work again in the private chambers I built in the vaults below—and this I have done! To steal a corpse is but a ghoulish prank; mine is the achievement of true genius!”

The distinct, hollow, metallic, and clangorous, yet apparently muffled reverberation accompanying his words caused him to turn in his seat and face the door of the study, so that I could not see the workings of his countenance—nor could he read my own reaction to his ravings.

His words came but faintly to my ears through the thunder that now shook the house in a relentless grip; the wind rattling the casements and flickering the candle-flame from the great silver candlebra sent a soaring sighing in an anguished accompaniment to his speech.

“I would show him to you, but I dare not; for he hates me as he hates life. I have locked him in the vault, alone, for the resurrected have no need of food nor drink. And he sits there, pen moving over paper, endlessly moving, endlessly pouring out the evil essence of all he guessed and hinted at in life and which he learned in death.

“Do you not see the tragic pity of my plight?

I sought to raise his spirit from the dead, to give the world anew of his genius—and yet these tales, these works, are. filled and fraught with a terror not to be endured. They cannot be shown to the world, he cannot be shown to the world; in bringing back the dead I have brought back the fruits of death!”

• • •

Echoes sounded anew as I moved toward the door—moved, I confess, to flee this accursed house and its accursed owner.

Canning clutched my hand, my arm, my shoulder. “You cannot go!” he shouted above the storm. “I spoke of his escaping, but did you not guess? Did you not hear it through the thunder—the grating of the door?”

I pushed him aside and he blundered backward upsetting the candlebra, so that flames licked now across the carpeting.

“Wait!” he cried. “Have you not heard his footstep on the stair? Madman, I tell you that he now stands without the door!”

A rush of wind, a roar of flame, a shroud of smoke rose all about us. Throwing open the huge, antique panels to which Canning pointed, I staggered into the hall.

I speak of wind, of flame, of smoke—enough to obscure all vision. I speak of Canning’s screams, and of thunder loud enough to drown all sound. I speak of terror born of loathing and of desperation enough to shatter all my sanity.

Despite these things, I can never erase from my consciousness that which I beheld as I fled past the doorway and down the hall.

There without the doors there did stand a lofty and enshrouded figure; a figure all too familiar, with pallid features, high, domed forehead, mustache set above a mouth. My glimpse lasted but an instant, an instant during which the man—the corpse—the apparition—the hallucination, call it what you will—moved forward, into the chamber and clasped Canning to his breast in an unbreakable embrace. Together, the two figures tottered toward the flames, which now rose to blot out vision forevermore.

From that chamber, and from that mansion, I fled aghast. The storm was still abroad in all its wrath, and now fire came to claim the house of Canning for its own.

Suddenly there shot along the path before me a wild light, and I turned to see whence a gleam so unusual could have issued—but it was only the flames, rising in supernatural splendor to consume the mansion, and the secrets, of the man who collected Poe.

My Further Struggles by Floyd Scrilch

(as told to Robert Bloch)

Now that was the funny part about it. They laughed at Columbus, and Einstein, and Edison, and Marconi. They even laughed at Milton Berle.

But when I came up with the screwiest idea in the world, they didn't laugh at all.

Nobody tried to put me in the asylum. Nobody tapped his forehead and pointed at me. Nobody stoned me in the streets. I get a patent right away. I didn't have to suffer. Eighteen millionaires offered me contracts. Everybody admitted I was a genius. It was all as easy as pie. The newspapers didn't scoff. They printed big headline articles about me.

"FLOYD SCRILCH INVENTS PERPETUAL MOTION MACHINE"
"INTERNATIONAL COMMITTEE OFFERS SCRILCH BILLIONS FOR RIGHTS TO HIS INVENTION," said the papers.

It was as perfect as that.

So, there I was in my laboratory, with the 97 committee members (it was pretty crowded and they were standing three deep, with the guys from the little countries like Siam and Norway on the bottom) and they were all waiting for me to demonstrate my perpetual motion machine.

I signed the contract, the most tremendous contract in the world, which stated that once I started the machine (it couldn't, of course, ever be turned off) I'd turn it over to all the nations to use in their industries.

Then I stepped over to the gleaming metal platform of my machine and bowed as my voice rand out over 11 networks.

"Gentlemen," I said. "This is the dawn of the Golden Age. I have never tried the machine, because as you know, it can never be stopped; nothing can be changed or removed. But now I've made my deal and I'll pull the switch. Thanks to my years of reading science fiction magazines, I give you —perpetual motion!"

Some of the scientists yelled, "Yaaaaaay Scrilch!"

I went to the machine. "I just hook this band over my shoulder," I said, doing so. "And this band over my leg. Then I press this here switch and—"

The machine started, just as I'd predicted. I stood there as the cogs revolved. My leg shimmied up and down and my shoulder jiggled. The machine was a success. Perpetual motion worked!

The applause was deafening. I stood jiggling in the machinery. Then workmen stepped forward. "Let's take it away now," they said.

"Hey, wait!" I yelled. "What about me? I'm inside here."

The head of the committee smiled. "Yes," he said. "And you can't stop the machine. But the contract sold the machine to us, and I guess you're part of it. Those two bands on you can't be removed, so you'll just have to stay in there and keep it running. Come on boys—take it away!"

And that's what they did. Carted me away inside the machine. I've been here ever since, jiggling up and down, 24 hours a day, working like a dog. And they've got a guard with a bayonet to see that I don't stop or get out.

I've got a hundred billion dollars and I'm stuck in this machine for the rest of my life. I don't even get out to go to the movies. Or anywhere else.

You know, sometimes I wish I was crazy.

The NIght They Crashed the Party

. . . the television screen showed it, but where was the wire connection?

THE whole thing came as a surprise, Nobody expected anything like it—but then, that's the way it was at Rudy's parties. You never could tell what might happen next.

It started just the way those things always did, Rudy called me up and said, "You'd better drop over, Having a gang in, just for laughs."

"For laughs, count me in," I told him, "But remember, I'm on the wagon. Ever since that last brawl of yours, when somebody socked that Senator—"

"Forget it," laughed Rudy, "In our business, you gotta drink. And once in a while you gotta sock a Senator or two, A Navy contract is a Navy contract. Which reminds me, put on a clean shirt when you cameo We're having Admiral Cribber and a lot of brass. Also some models."

"Models? For them I'll find a dean shirt," I promised. "See you later."

I found my clean shirt and got started for Rudy's place along about nine.

Nine o'clock of a summer Saturday night, I'm not likely to forget it. Walking down the street and watching the new cars go by—station wagons, town-and-country models, convertibles from Chevy Chase, Cars threading between tall buildings—neon signs stabbing red fingernails at the sky—and people crowding, jostling, pushing, hustling along. No, I won't forget it.

Most particularly, I remember the people. It seemed to me at the time that they looked different. Changed, somehow, from the way they looked a year or so before.

I kept thinking back to the time when Rudy and I had been broke. I wasn't on my way to any penthouse parties in those days, because Rudy didn't have a penthouse. And I didn't often have a clean shirt wear, either. It hadn't been easy, breaking into this manufacturing agent's racket—we'd hocked everything just to keep going.

Then along came the war scare and Rudy and I nosed into these Navy purchasing deals. All at once we were signing orders, taking on new accounts, playing around with high brass and big shot scientists and people from show business. Rudy did the fronting. I did the estimating, and we both made money. It was all right, of course; it was what we had been looking for, but sometimes I wondered what it all stacked up to in the end.

Because, like I say, people seemed to have changed. A year ago they would have been strolling along this street on a balmy summer night. There would have been a lot of couples, holding hands; a lot of families out with the kids running circles around their legs. There'd have been girls in slacks, giggling along to the movies and young fellows whistling after them. It was always that way on a warm Saturday night.

But not any more. Tonight I could feel it as I moved along. I could feel the difference, see the difference. The change had come, all right. Not only with Rudy and myself, but with everybody. Maybe it was all this war talk, and the stuff about secret weapons—maybe that's what got people down. That's what wiped the smiles off their faces, wound them up and set them off to brush, shove, elbow, bump and march along.

Anyhow, they were rushing and the cars were whizzing and even the neon signs seemed to flicker faster. Everything jerked and speeded up, like an old silent movie film.

Somehow, it got to me, bothered me. I was glad to get off the street, glad to turn into the big apartment hotel, glad to take the elevator up to Rudy's penthouse.

RUDY met me at the door. The party was already going strong. I could see it hear it, smell it.

"Here you are at last!" Rudy said. "Come in and meet the gang." And he winked and whispered, "Cribber's been here for an hour and he's loaded, Tm gonna brace him. for that radar contract later."

He didn't have to tell me. I knew the routine by heart. And I could see for myself what he'd done to the Admiral. The big front room was filled with people and the people were filled with liquor and conversation to the point where both frequently spilled over. Cribber was standing in front of the fireplace with a model named Kitty. He was a handsome, distinguished-looking old gent in a beautifully tailored uniform, and she was a gorgeous brunette. But somehow, together, they didn't make a very pretty picture tonight.

"Don't give me any of that high brass stuff," the Admiral was saying. He poked Kitty right in the V of her dress. "I'm just telling you the straight scoop." His finger left a red mark on her neck, and he tried to focus both eyes on it as he swayed back on his heels. "I'm just telling you they're ready to attack."

"Blah!" That was Chester Garland, the news commentator, horning in. "Can't you guys ever stop talking business? Every time I take a story off the wire, it's one of you monkeys making a statement. I go to the movies to relax with Danny Kaye and I get a newsreel with somebody in uniform making another statement. I come up here to relax and you're on hand, sounding off."

"I'm telling you—"

"Blah! You and the whole gang's been telling me for years now. But nothing ever happens. Nothing's gonna happen. So forget it. Here, have another drink."

Rudy came up and pulled Chester away. "Lay off," he said. "Pass around these Martinis like a little man, will ya?" He handed Chester a tray.

I went up to Kitty. "What's the good word?" I said.

"Don't know any good words." She pouted. "One of those lousy Treasury department snoops showed up today. Hit me with a bill for a G in back taxes. How he ever found out about those stocks I don't know! And with this inflation and all—"

She grabbed a drink, clung to it desperately. I wandered around this gay, pleasure-seeking, carefree crowd of very important persons, celebrities, and leading intellectuals, and drank in their words of wisdom,.

"I tell you we've consistently underestimated the possibilities of chain-reaction." That was old Professor McKittridge. To the average citizen knew the potentialities of fissionable materials we wouldn't be so smug."

"I disagree," Doctor Sanbrenner always disagreed, no matter how drunk he got. In fact, the drunker he was, the more disagreeable he became. "It's biological warfare that will turn the trick. The next war will be won or lost within 24 hours. The proper use of chemical bombs planted over a widespread area in a hundred leading cities could wipe out 25 per cent of our population in a day, and another 25 per cent would probably die as a. result of the universal panic. Now if we can only get to them first and do the same thing—"

"Damned government controls," said another voice at my elbow. "Ruining free enterprise, What's the man in the street need control for? Wait until next election's over—we're introducing some bills that will fix all that."

". . . but the psychiatrist told me to stop using them and switch to nembutal or something milder. I'd give anything for ten hours' sleep, simply anything, my dear!"

I felt the words bounce off my eardrums—all the gay, carefree words of wisdom so typical of the conversation of very important persons, celebrities and leading intellectuals everywhere today. Oh, it was a lovely party, thank you!

So I tried not to hear what they were saying, and gradually I succeeded. The only trouble was, I could still see them, watch what they were doing.

DURING the next half hour or so, I saw Kitty slap Doctor Sanbrenner in the face and break his glasses. I saw old Professor McKittridge shake his fist at Chester Garland. I saw Chesters wife get sick, and I saw the lady who couldn't sleep pass out on the sofa near the fireplace. I saw Rudy steer Admiral Cribber into the back room. I saw everything—including my own puzzled, frightened face in the mirror. I wondered why my face was puzzled, frightened. I also wondered just what it was doing here at all.

The room got hot and stuffy. Reek of smoke, reek of liquor, reek of breath and perspiration and talcum powder and perfume and cologne and depilatory and running mascara.

I passed another tray of drinks for Rudy and then wandered over to the window, staring out at the sky. Somewhere off in the distance, over the Potomac, a storm was gathering,. I tried to imagine what it was like up there, in the coolness of the clouds. There'd be wind, and rain, and the eternal movement of the night. Yes, night after night everything was the same up there. And night after night, everything was the same down here. Down here, where I was. Where—

"The taxes keep going up year after year."

"Honestly, there's no place for children to play any more, if you insist on having the little beasts."

"But what will it matter, if only we can drop the bombs first?"

Yes, night after night, that's the way it went down here. And—

"Let's all have another drink."

It was Rudy, the life of the party. Pumping alcohol into the veins of the corpse, Trying to make it get up and dance.

Tonight, it wasn't working so well. Too many quarrels, too many complaints, too many drinks. Rudy must have sensed that, and he was anxious to make the evening a success. He had to, if he wanted that Navy contract.

I was still watching the stormclouds gather when I heard Chester Garland talking to Kitty.

“What say we all go down there? Wed still be in time for the main event.”

“Go where? Nobody’s going anywhere.” Rudy’s voice, genial but with an undercurrent Of dismay.

“Sure. Let’s get up a gang and go,” Chester, again.

“Where?”

“To the wrestling matches, that’s where. I’m tired of all this fighting—le’s go watch somebody else fight for a change.”

Kitty chimed in. “Sure, why not? Come on, everybody—let’s see the wrestling.”

There was a general babble and flurry. I could see the idea was catching on, Rudy saw it too. Because he stepped in front, of the fireplace and raised his hands and voice.

“I have a better plan,” he shouted. “Well bring the wrestlers here!”

“Here? You mean real live wrestlers in oar very own front room? Hooray!” It was Chester’s wife. She’d come to at the mention of strange men. “Ooh, those big hairy brutes—”

“Shut up!” Rudy suggested, with the savoir faire of a true host. “I mean we can bring them here with television.”

“That’s right,” Chester agreed. “The bouts ate being televised tonight. But I didn’t know you had a set, Rudy.”

“I haven’t,” Rudy improvised. “But we can get a TV set up here in twenty minutes. There’s an ad in tonight’s paper. They’ll deliver and install a TV set, no aerial needed the minute you call the store.”

“Call ’em!” That was Admiral Cribber, “Your wish is my command,” said Rudy. “It shall be done.”

And it was done. We all settled back, most everybody had a drink, and Rudy made his phone arrangements in the other room. In order to pass the time of waiting, Kitty took off her shoes and did a dance, although it wasn’t the sort of a dance where taking off her shoes made any difference. Professor McKittridge shook his fist at Admiral Cribber. The lady who had passed out on the sofa sat up and slapped Doctor Sanbrenner, breaking his extra pair of glasses. Rudy steered Chester Garland into the back room. Chester's wife, quite recovered, had two more Martinis and then got sick again. Oh, they managed to pass the time, all right.

I watched the freak storm. More clouds had gathered and there were a number of isolated lightning flashes, still off in the distance. Once or twice I could even hear thunder above the braying of the crowd, but there was no sign of rain in Washington proper—or improper, as the case might be.

Nobody else paid any attention to what was going on outside. The men with the television set must have knocked about five minutes before Rudy went to the door. Finally, he let them in.

The crowd let up a yelp of simulated delight as the two came in, carrying a heavy 16-inch console model.

"Right in here," Rudy said, indicating the dining room. "It'll be easier to set up chairs. How about the corner?" He went in there with the men and dosed the door. The rest of the crowd got busy on a fresh tray of drinks.

"He'd better hurry." Chester Garland glanced at his watch. "It's almost eleven. We'll miss the main bout."

"I just love wrestling," said the woman who slapped faces. "Last time George and I went, there was one of them, some Indian I think it was, named Chief Thundercloud or something, and he had one of those brown torsos that was out of this world, I mean, well anyway, he broke this man's arm and you could just hear the bone go crunch, I thought I'd pass out it was so exciting, really it was."

"Did you ever see the lions at work on a bunch of Christians?" I murmured, but she didn't seem to hear me. Maybe it was just as well.

By this time everybody was herding towards the dining room. The two workmen seemed to have slipped away, and Rudy was stooping and fiddling with the controls as we came in. The lights snapped out, and in the darkness I could hear the thunder of the distant storm.

"Nice looking set—what'd they charge you?"

"What make is it?"

“Didn’t they tell you how to work it? Having trouble getting the channel?”

“Here—let me show you.”

Rudy ignored the queries. He stooped and fiddled, grinned drunkenly, stooped and fiddled some more. Then there came an incandescent glare from the screen and a blast of sound from the speaker.

Everybody scrambled for seats facing the screen. “Here we go,” whispered Kitty.

A face filled the screen, a voice filled the room. For some reason, we all seemed to hear the voice before we saw the face. I was a sing-song voice, droning but penetrating.

“. . . landing at eleven p.m. earth time . . .”

“Blah! Missed the wrestling!” That was Chester, interrupting. Somebody said, “Quiet, there,” and the voice came through again.

“. . . over what is regarded as the western hemisphere of the planet.”

I guess that’s what the voice said. I can’t be sure, for most of the words were drowned out by shouts and conversation from Rudy’s guests.

They were seeing the face for the first time.

The face on the screen was like a metal mask. It showed up as gray, and might have been almost any color which would reproduce that way on television. It was an oval and contained the usual features, although the nose seemed flat. There was nothing too grotesque about it except its absolute hairlessness; the head was round and bald, and the face itself lacked eyebrows, eyelashes or hint of beard. The result was a gray, metallic sexless countenance that might have been utterly unremarkable as a mask, except for the fact that the lips moved.

And the lips of Rudy’s guests moved, now—shouting in incomprehension.

Suddenly something blocked the screen. It was Admiral Cribber, getting to his feet. “Where’s the phone?” he bellowed. “Were being attacked!”

“Nonsense,” Rudy shouted. “It’s a program. Siddown.”

“But they’re attacking us—”

“Wait a minute.”

He waited. The face flickered out. Now the screen showed the sky. It was pinpointed, but not with stars. Moving patterns of light skyrocketed across the horizon.

The voice singsonged through. “Landings will be made shortly. There is no organized opposition. Complete control will be established immediately upon landing.”

“Look!” Kitty was squealing and pointing at the screen. “Flying saucers.”

“The sky gives it away,” Chester Garland told her. No clouds moving, it’s a studio backdrop.”

“But what’s it all about?” his wife wailed.

“just one of those invasion shows. Remember Orson Welles on the radio?”

The screen showed a metropolitan skyline, pinpoints of light flickering like glowworms over the enormous concrete stalks of skyscrapers. Lightning crackled and part of the skyline disappeared.

“. . . proceeding according to plan. Landings will be effected immediately. . . .”

“That’s no play!” Kitty exclaimed, “Listen, you can hear the explosions.”

“Thunder,” Rudy howled, “Can’t you see there’s a storm coming up? Reception is bad.”

Reception was bad. The screen flickered again, and we caught a glimpse of the metallic mask, then of another. Thunder boomed louder, and Admiral Cribber lurched to his feet once more.

“Gotta put through a call,” he said. “I still think they’re attacking.” He stumbled out of the room.

There was another flurry of conversation, all jumbled together, and I caught only fragments. “Norman Corwin . . . documentary . . . lot of science-fiction . . . another station . . . need a drink. . . .”

Then the roaring from the television set drowned out all other sound, and the images came up. In one monstrous visual upheaval they spewed forth.

The thunder rose.

We saw a horde of metal faces moving down an enclosed ramp that led to a city street. We saw something flicker and explode in midair.

We saw a shot of what was obviously a table-top miniature of the city of Washington, dominated by the monument. Lights played upon it momentarily and it broke in half like a stick of candy.

We saw—

“Turn it off!” snorted Chester Garland. “We need a drink!”

A half-dozen voices seconded his proposal. I added my own plea, I admit. The room was hot, steamy; thunder and darkness enveloped us, and the incessant nightmare of the television poured forth. For a moment I reflected upon its meaning. I couldn’t exactly put my finger on the point, but my thoughts ran something like this:

All over the country, millions of people were sitting at their television sets, watching some paid technicians stage a lurid melodrama about the destruction of a civilization which had degenerated to the point where millions of people just sat at their television sets, watching some paid technicians stage a lurid melodrama about the destruction of a civilization which had degenerated—

And so on, over and over again. There was a hideous kind of truth buried somewhere in all this, and I tried hard to think about it coherently.

BUT it only took a moment. They were still yelling for another drink, the set was still blaring forth its explosions, a voice was still rasping, “Landings have now been made successfully at all designated points,” and now Rudy was responding to the almost hysterical insistence of his guests.

“Turn the stinking thing off!”

He rose, marched up to the set, stooped and fiddled. The crowd rose and half-turned to re-enter the living room. Rudy was still stooping and fiddling, but the thunder increased in volume and tempo, and now the screen flickered forth in a scene of inferno.

A city was disintegrating before our eyes. Beams played from the pinpoints in the sky. People fled between a labyrinth of buildings. People vanished. So did the buildings. The beams played on. And the metal-faced monsters marched on metal legs, unscathed by beams. Screams rose above the thunder.

"What's the idea?" hooted Chester Garland. "Turn it off!"

Rudy stood up.

"I—I can't," he said.

"Can't?"

"No. Look." He raised one hand. It held a wire ending in a wall-plug. "I can't because it isn't turned on. It was never turned on in the first place."

"Never turned on?"

"Then what's all this we saw?"

"Is it some kind of gag?"

Abruptly, there was a crescendo of thunder and the screen went dead. Somebody snickered.

"What you trying to do, Rudy—throw a scare into us?"

"I swear the set wasn't connected."

"Blah!" Chester Garland and his wife pushed towards the door to the living room. Kitty and the others crowded after them.

"Fooled me for a minute," said Doctor Sanbrenner.

"But—" Rudy's reply was drowned by another burst of thunder. It came not from the set but from outside. The walls began to vibrate.

"There is a storm," said Kitty. As everyone crowded up to the bar, she walked across the room to the window. I watched her as Rudy took down a couple of fresh bottles.

"Well, soaks," he chuckled, "What'll it be? Might as well get on with the party." I watched Kitty peer out of the window, saw her eyes widen, saw her hands grip the sill.

"The party's over," I murmured.

But nobody heard me. For suddenly, above the thunder that resounded from the streets below, Kitty began to scream.

She was still screaming as we all rushed to the window and gazed down at what was happening in the world outside.

The Tchen-Lam's Vengeance

There in the Gobi the miracle of transference of bodies took place; but the real horror came when it happened in an American beauty parlor.

NEVER mind how I got to Lhassa. I did a lot more than shaving my head, learning six dialects and studying up on Tantric Buddhism as formulated by Padmasam Ghava. I spent three years in planning, and before I reached the city of pantheons I had passed as a Buriat, a round-hatted Chakhar, a Khalka, and a half-dozen incarnations of disguise. I drank thick tea in a hundred yurts before I got into the particular temple I had my eye on. The lamas are wise and cruel and relentless, and they have spies everywhere.

But finally I succeeded, and then turned my three camels into the desert on the endless trek through the Gobi. The most evil city in the world lay behind me, and the malign sands stretched before me—the desert, staring up like a great yellow face.

But it was worth it.

I had stolen the Lotus of Lhassa. The Supreme Emerald, the sacred stone of Gautama, rested in my belt. It was worth a quarter of a million—and my life.

Now I must pass through the desert and reach the coast if I valued safety. I drove the camels on.

It wasn’t so bad the first week. Exultation buoyed me up, triumph was a cloak to shield me from the scorching sun. But then loneliness came, and thirst, and exhaustion. I wandered through the eternal dust of a demon’s graveyard.

I began imagining things.

The mountains were all around me, and they grinned against the horizon, their jagged edges like the teeth in the mouth of a mad dog. At dusk a wind would bay from the black throat of the night, and I could feel those teeth yawning for me.

But it was worse by day, when I trudged through a sea of ochre flame that was the desert, and the sun blazed down like a finger-ring stone on the hand of an angry god.

Sometimes the rocks were black dwarfs that danced around me; sometimes the dust was a yellow dragon that coiled across my path.

I slept under boulders white as the sun-bleached bones of giants, and I huddled in the Cyclopean ruins of cities dead five thousand years.

After a while there were no more cities nor boulders nor mountains, and nothing was left which I could compare to humanity. The buzzards had stopped following me, and the beetles were gone. I walked under a burning sun that filled the sky and hissed down in molten rays upon the empty, endless sand. Then I got that terrible feeling of aloneness. There was nothing in the world but torture of sun and sand, with me between. The sand burned my feet and the sun burned my head, and then little rays of fire lanced through my body, and I walked on and on and on.

My body was covered with horrible sores, and my blood was black as it ran from my nose and mouth. My feet were swollen into shapeless blobs of agony. The skin rolled from my face like mummy-flesh exposed to the outer air. My head was an iron bowl filled with the venomous stewing juice of fever.

But I still had the Lotus . . .

I didn’t rave or curse or mumble or sing. It was worse than that. I didn’t think about water, or food, or sleep. The expression on my face never altered. I just tottered on, like some ghastly marionette. When the camels blackened and died, I left them where they fell, without taking up the knapsack or water-skins. When I thought I was going to die I dropped in my tracks, but I always got up again.

This was it. This was what I had expected. And it was worth the horror. I had the Lotus. I'd make it.

The desert was a vast, lonely room I had to cross—a single great room a million miles long. I was all alone in that room, and I kept plodding.

THEN one day I sensed the presence of another in the room. It was just like that. If somebody comes into a room you know it, even if the room is a million miles long. Another had come in. Perhaps he was a hundred thousand miles away, but I felt him.

And I knew fear. From that moment on I didn't mind sun or fever or the cancer of weariness which gnawed at my heart. I had a greater dread.

The tcken-lam. The tchen-lam are the Guardians of the Lotus. They are the spies of the temples of Lhassa, and they are the most evil men in the world. They are the Hunters, and at the twilight Hour of Mutilation they set forth on missions of vengeance.

All Tibet fears the tchen-lam, the magic ones. They know the Black and the Red and the White Secret, and they control winds and water and desert sand. Offenders against the faith are marked for doom in the secret temples, and then the tchen-lam go forth to bring that doom.

If my theft had been discovered, and they were on my trail, I could never escape. This I knew, and that is why I was afraid.

The tchen-lam are cruel.

Khalka Mongols will hang you up by the nose on iron hooks, and tie weights to your legs. Chakhars are slightly more imaginative. They will stake you out under the desert sun, cut off your eyelids, and set beetles on you. The Torgots flay you alive and thrust you into a sack filled with wild dogs. The subtle Soyots may amputate your arms and legs, and then place you in a pit with the rats.

But the tchen-lam are worse.

I heard of a man who was captured for blasphemous profanation of a temple. There are over a hundred bones in the human body, and the tchen-lam broke every one, slowly, and kept him alive. Then he was skinned, and his bones were removed, one by one. He lived until he had nothing left but two ribs, a pelvis, and a spine. It took months.

This was only one of their punishments.

And the tchen-lam crept behind me as I fled.

At last one day fell, like a molten tear-drop from the eyes of agony. I had crouched in the sand all night, burrowed deep, and when I tried to rise with the coming of the sun I could not stir. I sensed the presence of the other close behind me, but I could not stir. Could not stir, even with the ghastly inspiration of approaching doom.

I lay there shuddering, and the presence stole closer, and then I felt it upon me hours later.

A shadow stained the searing sand. I rolled over and looked up into a yellow face.

I blinked. There was nothing else to do. The fate bent closer. Thin lips nibbled at my ear and a voice rustled.

"You are the American?"

I tried to nod.

"I have been seeking you."

I blinked again.

"I have heard much of you and you are the man I want."

I couldn't move. The face smiled, and then the whispering came again.

"You must not die, you know."

There was enough left in me for irony. "Why not?" I gasped.

"Because you and I are going back to America to start a beauty parlor."

Because you and I are going back to America to start a beauty parlor.

Never in fact, fiction, or fancy were words as mad as these.

I had stolen the Lotus of Lhassa, I was pursued over a desert hell by the crudest beings in the world, I lay dying of exhaustion, in the middle of the Gobi—and a yellow face bends over me and whispers, “You and I are going back to America to start a beauty parlor.”

Of course I must be mad. I had to be. I began to laugh and laugh and laugh.

THE yellow-faced man thrust a jug of water into my mouth and stopped my laughter, and he stroked the papyrus of my forehead and he propped me up in his arms. I became sufficiently revived to gaze up into his skeletal visage. His head was like a rotten, wrinkled apricot, and only his eyes were alive. The man was further gone than myself, and I sensed that indomitable will alone kept him on his feet. Those eyes blazed at me more forcefully than the sun, and they filled me with a peculiar power. I stood up.

“Who are you?” I whispered. “A tchen-lam?”

He shook his head slowly. “No. I am called Dagur. I come from the Deccan, and my mission in Lhassa can be spoken of later. I heard of you there and followed you through the desert.”

“Heard of me?” I gasped. “Then it was known—”

Again he shook his rotten, wrinkled head. “I gain my wisdom in stranger ways,” he said. “But I know you are the man I am seeking—international adventurer, grave-robber, treasure-thief. I want to take you with me when we go to America and start a beauty parlor.”

I was getting used to this by now, and didn’t reel at the weird statement. But I was still afraid.

“The tchen-lam,” I muttered. “Did you see them?”

“One follows us now,” answered Dagur, calmly. “He wants the Lotus of Lhassa, which you stole.”

I sank to the ground again. “What shall we do?” I whispered.

“Wait for him, of course,” answered Dagur. “And when he comes we will give him the Lotus.”

“What?”

“It will be for the best. The tchen-lam cannot be avoided. He will seek you to the ends of the earth. We might as well face him here and strike a bargain.”

“A bargain? But he’ll kill me, I’ll lose the jewel—”

“The Lotus of Lhassa cannot be profaned,” Dagur answered. “It must not be taken by force, the priests believe. Therefore he will not kill you for it. It would be sacrilege. You must give it to him outright.”

“It’s worth a quarter-million,” I protested. “I spent three years planning this, and I’ve gone through hell here on the desert. Why should I give it to him?”

“Because a quarter-million is nothing. Because it is a mite compared to the fortune you and I will make together—if we live. And because you’ll die here on the desert with the jewel unless we bargain.”

“What kind of bargain will you strike?”

“Listen. You are weak, dying. So am I. But the tchen-lam will be a strong man, with a body trained to withstand the rigors of the desert. So I will bargain with him in this wise—I shall take his body in exchange for the jewel and give him my body in return. Then we shall have strength enough, between us, to reach the coast.”

“You’re mad,” I mumbled, but I thought I was. “You cannot exchange bodies with another.”

“I am Dagur. I have studied in the secret places, and I have a magic. By concentration my astral can invade the body of another, and I can place men in new bodies at will, if they be submissive. Extended hypnosis, your science calls it. So if the emissary from Lhassa agrees, so be it.”

“You can change bodies,” I repeated.

“Of course. That is how we will make our fortune,” insisted Dagur.

I lay back for good. I knew I was delirious. There was no Dagur, no mad scheme. I was dying alone. No reality. There couldn’t be anything so fantastic. And yet—

Far down the shimmering way I saw the figure approaching. It plodded leadenly, like a wound-up doll. I recognized the tall yellow hat, the great otter collar, the huge skirt. It was a tchem-lam!

THE figure headed straight for us, unerring and relentless. I made out the features; the ivory mask of cruelty in which emerald eyes were set.

But Dagur did not flinch. The man approached, never hastening. Dagur raised a hand in greeting.

"We will bargain," he said.

The tchen-lam turned his basilisk-gaze toward me and nodded. "It is the one," he said, in clipped English. "And you speak for him?"

"I do," Dagur replied.

"So. Your bargain?"

"He will give you the Lotus of Lhassa in exchange for your body."

I expected the Tibetan to strike Dagur dead. His expression didn't alter, but there was a heightening intensity in his stare.

"Think," argued Dagur. "You could follow him until he dies on the desert, this is true, and then take the jewel. But this way it is easier, simpler. You take the jewel, give your body, and use my weak form to return to Lhassa. Time counts; every moment the Lotus of Lhassa is away from its shrine is an affront in the eyes of the gods. Give your body and take the jewel."

"Thieves must be punished," said the tchen-lam. He said it softly, but I thought of my bones being broken and torn out, and trembled.

"Natural death is no punishment," insisted Dagur. "Perhaps there is another way."

"Yes, another way!" The Tibetan's voice trembled with exultation. "I shall accept, yes, I shall accept your offer. My brothers in Lhassa will think it a capital jest, a capital jest."

Dagur looked puzzled, and so did I. But my new friend persisted. "Very well, then. It is done. You must submit your will to mine. Then our spirits will mingle, and each seek the other's flesh. We will use the veritable Lotus of Lhassa for our focal point. Give it to me."

I gave him the jewel. The sparkling drop of emerald brilliance shone in the sunlight. The grotesque Hindu knelt, and the yellow monk knelt facing him. The jewel lay on the sand between, Roth bowed their heads and stared.

And I lay there, racked with fever, dying in the desert as I watched two magicians, or two madmen, sealing an unholy bargain which was to decide my fate.

"Submit," whispered Dagur. "Your will is strong, friend, and you must submit to aid me." The tchen-lam nodded. Suddenly both men became motionless. Rigid as puppets, eyes closed, they knelt in the sand. The jewel flamed. Then both bodies shuddered.

This was horror from High Asia, I knew. I was either dying or crazy. But I stared as the men fell and writhed on the ground; stared as they opened their eyes and blinked, sat up.

"Done!" The high-pitched voice of the tchen-lam came from Dagur's withered throat.

"Yes, done," whispered Dagur—from the body of the tchen-lam. It was unbelievable, but unmistakable.

I was too weak, too sick, to realize the full import of what I had just seen; the substantiation of the East's oldest myth. Transference of souls, the original and most ancient of all beliefs, just accomplished before my fevered eyes.

"Now I am strong enough to reach the coast with my friend," announced Dagur, rising and shaking himself—for all the world like a poodle emerging from water. "And you, is your withered body capable of dragging itself back to Lhassa?"

The wrinkled face reared up and I got a shock as I saw the tchen-lam's blazing eyes. "It is my will, not my body, which shall take me," he announced. "But now, the bargain. Give me the jewel. No—you hand it to me." And he pointed at me.

I picked up the jewel dumbly and held it out to him. A claw grasped it.

“A bargain is a bargain,” said the tchen-lam, gravely. “But I have also sworn to my brothers that you shall know our vengeance. No one, from the dawn of time, be he beggar or Khan, has ever escaped us once he is marked for doom.”

“You cannot harm him,” Dagur reminded. “Your promise.”

“I know. But my personal vengeance shall overtake him just the same, though I shall never raise a hand to strike him. He shall suffer at my hands nonetheless, as was sworn. That is why I consented to the bargain, because I know I can make him suffer in spite of it. I am a tchen-lam, and the tchen-lam are the greatest wizards in all Asia.” He held up the jewel, and his eyes blazed through its fire, mingled with it in an emerald haze. I stared, and cold crept up my spine. “The greatest wizards in all Asia,” muttered the tchen-lam.

“The greatest fools in all Asia,” hissed Dagur. I never even saw the knife flash down, but suddenly the Tibetan crumpled to the ground and lay still. Dagur rose, wiped the blade, and pocketed the jewel.

“I am the greatest wizard,” he laughed. “I have cheated him, gained life, and the Lotus of Lhassa is still ours.”

“But you told me you couldn’t—” I began.

“I did not dare say otherwise, or when our souls met and mingled he would have known the thought,” Dagur replied. “But now we are free, and you shall have no curse on you. He is dead, though I still have his body. And we go to the coast, to make our fortunes in a beauty parlor.”

AT that moment I myself crumpled. It had all been too much. Desert nightmare, ending in incredible horror. I went out, and stayed out. He must have carried me. I don’t know. How he fed us, kept me alive, went on—these things I cannot say. I awoke weeks later in a Canton hospital. Dagur was beside me, and he thrust a fortune into my hands. He’d sold the jewel, of course.

We were rich, and I was going to get well. It was all over. Dagur was in the yellow body of a Tibetan monk, and I nearly went out again when I saw that horrid reminder of reality I longed to forget. But I was well, and rich.

Dagur smiled.

“Up in a week,” he said. “Then we book passage to America. My entrance is all arranged, thanks to the money. We shall make fortunes.”

“How? What?”

“Why, as I told you. We shall go to America and start a beauty parlor.”

I was sick of mystery.

“Let’s have it straight,” I began, sitting up. “Who are you, and where did you hear of me?”

Dagur smiled. Or rather Dagur smiled with the face of the tchen-lam.

“I am Dagur, as I told you. I was born in India. My father was Rajput, exiled by the British Raj. He studied ceremonial magics in the temples. I grew up with priests. I learned many things—levitation, hypnotism, things Western science still calls magic. Sakhyati, the tree of teachings from which Yogi springs as the merest branch, I have mastered. One of the powers I gained is that of transferring bodies.”

Now I’ve met fakirs before, and fanatics, and charlatans doing rope tricks. But I could not scoff at Dagur, because of what I’d seen in the desert. Because of what I saw now—Dagur’s eyes in the hatefully yellow face of the tchen-lam. He was a wizard.

“I went to Lhassa on your errand,” Dagur continued. “I too meant to have the Lotus for my own. I must have followed your trail, because when I camped I heard stories of a lone Khalka pilgrim, a Buriat wanderer, and a Chakhar. Each place saw only one man, never all three. Therefore I reasoned that someone was travelling in disguise. At first I meant to overtake you and kill you. Then, my friend, as time went on I began to marvel at your cleverness. When my idea came, I saw that you would make a living ally instead of a dead rival. So I allowed you to steal the Lotus and followed you into the desert. The rest you know.”

"You saved my life," I mumbled. "Nothing." Dagur raised a yellow claw of deprecation.

"But this mumbling about a beauty parlor?"

"Simple. In India I am a holy man, yes. I can perform small magics, I can steal. But I want my heritage. My father, the Rajput, once lived in palaces. I want those riches. I can never earn them by petty thievery. I cannot become wealthy exercising my powers for fools. But in America, with your aid—ah!"

"Beauty parlor?" I persisted.

"I have studied your Western culture, as you call it—a culture of decadence, a woman's civilization, founded on outward deception and falsehood. The beauty parlor is a symbol of occidental deceit; a mask of loveliness over rotten decay."

"The devil with your sophomore philosophy," I countered. "Facts."

"Here they are, then. Every year American women spend billions, yes, billions of dollars on beauty culture. They go to be massaged and marcelled and manicured, to be kneaded and sweated and pounded into youthfulness. Thousands of wealthy women spend fortunes endeavoring to recapture their lost charms. Do they succeed?"

"Well—no. I suppose not. But they still go, still pay."

"Exactly. And don't you think more of them would go, and pay greater sums if they did succeed, turning their ugly bodies into young, attractive forms once more?"

"Yes."

"That is where we come in, my friend. Oh, I could start out as a fortune-teller, a swami, a cult-leader. My knowledge would be of service there. But there isn't enough in it. I want riches, quickly. And I shall have them, making old women young again."

"But how? By giving them some of yngi treatment or exercise? Have you got a philtre, or a rejuvenating secret?"

Dagur smiled, and again that yellow face was creased.

“No. Simpler than that. You saw my secret on the desert. If the subjects be willing, I can hypnotize them and change bodies.”

I sat bolt upright in bed.

“Yes, change bodies. Instead of pounding some foolish old woman into a tight corset and charging her exorbitant fees, I shall give her the real boon she craves—a young, fresh body of her own.”

“How? With whom shall these old women exchange their worn-out frames? Where do the young women come from?”

Dagur’s creased smile grew evilly insinuating.

“Come now, my friend; I picked you because you are cleverer than that. You are something of a rogue yourself, I have reason to believe. And surely the answer to the question is easy.”

I almost sickened. “You mean we abduct young girls and force them into such an unholy exchange?” I asked.

“Force? No—I have told you I cannot force anyone into hypnotic surrender without their mental consent. But in beauty salons, there are machines, surely? For fixing the ladies’ hair, perhaps? Metal clamps on the head, I believe.”

“Yes.”

“And in western scientific classrooms there are machines on which a subject gazes at lights or colored objects until his will surrenders.”

“I guess so.”

“We merely combine the two. Adjust the clamps on the two women. The young girl surrenders her will after a time; so does the unbeautiful lady. They fall asleep—quite sound asleep. Then I concentrate. Their astrals are pliant. The exchange is made, and it is done. Simple?”

“Fantastic!” I muttered. “We’ll never get away with it!”

But we did.

THE last week in bed I spent in planning. We figured it all out. We had money enough to splurge at the start. Rent an exclusive salon. Advertise discreetly. Build up an atmosphere of scented refinement like an ordinary beauty and health parlor. Curious women would come. Then, after procuring the girl?, the first experiment. If it succeeded, the news would spread like wildfire. We could charge ten, twenty, fifty thousand dollars for a genuine rejuvenation.

Of course, there would be difficulties. An old friend of mine, never mind his name, would handle the girl angle for me. That was no problem. But the difficulties lay in making the sudden change plausible.

Dagur and I worked out our scheme quite carefully.

Dagur was to be a Hindu. Of course his skin was yellow, but that wouldn't matter. All Orientals with "new" discoveries are Hindus as far as Americans are concerned. Dagur was to be a Hindu with a new "thought rejuvenation" process, supplemented by the use of "secret oils and formulas known to the devi-dasi of Hindu temples." The old come-on stuff. We'd get the women, give them a few preliminary treatments in the old style, make them think that oils and perfumes and exercises were aiding their rejuvenescence. Then we'd work up to the big moment; put them under a machine and go to work.

That's where the subtle part came in. It might be difficult for an old battle-axe to fall asleep under a dryer and wake up an hour later in an entirely new body. If she was a brunette and woke up with blonde hair it might be doubly hard to convince her. I had a secret hunch most of the old girls weren't so confident in their treatments anyway; just wanted to be flattered and pampered. Actual changes in their unlovely figures might shock rather than please them—unless it was worked properly.

Well, I figured out a way to work it properly. To begin with, we wouldn't exchange bodies with just any young and fairly pretty girl we might get hold of. During the preliminary treatments we'd study our case. Try to visualize what the middle-aged dowager looked like twenty years ago. Was her hair brown, or black, or red, or a certain shade of blondness? Was it straight or curly? How tall was she? What was her weight? The color of her eyes? Yes, and what kind of a voice did she have? Get all the actual details.

And then, go out and find the right young woman to fill the bill. Perhaps we couldn't always get an exact duplicate. But we could come close. Then we might do a little adjustment work; plastic surgery on the nose, for example. Removing a mole, or adding one as the case might be. Then our plan might well be foolproof.

"I've got it—the final touch!" I yelled, the last day. "We keep the old dames on the premises during their entire course of treatments and never show them a mirror for a week. Keep at them every day during the fake preliminary treatments, kidding them along that they're getting younger gradually. Psychological suggestion, that they are losing five years a day. Naturally, they can't see themselves. A little dope might do wonders, too. Lead them up to the final phase, effect the transfer, and there they are. Fully convinced. Young, beautiful, and satisfied. Why, it's a humanitarian business, Dagur! We'll really be doing a great good!"

Dagur smiled, and I didn't care for his wolfish leer. I knew that he was thinking of the young girls for whom we would not be doing good; kidnapping them, forcing them into old, withered bodies, and then disposing of them once and for all.

But why quibble? Thousands of girls disappear every year, and suffer worse fates. Perhaps. And at any rate, why bother? There was millions in this idea, millions.

There was. We sailed, made New York, established connections. It was all easy—and I could use ease after my gruelling experience in the land of nightmares.

No more tchen-lam to fear. No more desert. Sitting in a penthouse and calling up this party about the girls; renting an elegant suite of offices, arranging with soft-voiced secretaries about advertising and rates. It was a picnic.

Dagur wore a turban, and a satisfied smile. We were ready to open. I was surprised at the roguery rampant in fine professions; we hired some broken-down quacks who could spout about "hormone injections" and the "rejuvenatory function of glands" who lent excellent pseudoscientific atmosphere.

There was no hitch of any kind. Our first client was quite a wealthy woman—I shall not mention names, for she is still prominent. At this time, she was prominent only about the hips. A distinct matron type, on the verge of matriachry.

FOR the first time we put our scheme into operation. It clicked. We had no trouble getting data on her appearance in 1923. We decided that a reduction to the age of 28 would be spectacular enough without bringing too much suspicion and incredulity into play. We got our data, and I arranged for the right girl.

My party brought the girl over, and we kept her locked up in the special rooms downstairs. We didn't treat her badly; just held her. Meanwhile, the staff went to work on our client, planted the build-up. Finally the afternoon arrived and it was all up to Dagur. Sink or swim, success or failure—Dagur must make good his boast or we were lost.

We brought the bewildered, half-drugged old woman into the room of mirrors we'd chosen. Dagur made a very impressive speech—it was truly a masterpiece. I know, because I wrote it for him. She was credulous. She was more than willing to submit to a trance.

Dagur had her out in the chair in five minutes. Then we brought in the girl. She was hysterical, a little, but Dagur injected morphine and then got her under the dryer. I hadn't inspected the apparatus he used, but it was only a matter of moments after he snapped the switch before her eyes closed.

Dagur turned out the lights and only a flame behind the mirrors blazed up. His yellow eyes closed. He rocked back and forth. I sat quietly. The sleeping old face and the sleeping young face contorted in agony as though both women suffered nightmares.

I felt the silence, felt what stole through the silence. Waves beat down in darkness. I stared at Dagur's face, thought of the tchen-lam, his curse on me which would never be fulfilled. I shuddered. Perhaps we'd fail; that was the curse the monk had meant. I began to. perspire. And still the three silent figures sat in darkness. Then the lights clicked up, Dagur opened his eyes wearily, clapped his hands. The two women stirred. I got the old one out of there, into the locked room adjoining. Then we went back. The young brunette was stretching herself lazily.

This was the moment. Suppose nothing had happened? Suppose it was the same girl, after all?

She spoke.

Then I knew. Even before Dagur handed her the mirror and she gasped in incredulous joy, I knew we had done it.

I went into the room where the trembling, half-crazed old woman lay; the kidnapped young woman who awoke bewildered in a strange body. I felt a certain pity for her, but then she was obviously suffering this way; so I did what had to be done.

Afterward I came out in time to hear our newly rejuvenated patient raving with joy. I saw her hand over the check. Fifteen thousand.

Right there I got clever on my own hook. I told Dagur about the restrictions on banking laws which applied to aliens. I deposited the money under my own name. All money would hereafter be deposited.

There was plenty of money. The woman went out. She told her story to her friends—but her new body fairly shrieked the news for her. We had a flood of clients.

We didn't take them all. It was too great a risk. A few each week, ones we could duplicate easily with young girls. Our fees rose and rose. In six months we cleared three hundred thousand, profit exclusively. There was never a hitch, never a bit of trouble.

So it was. Success at last, success with the maddest scheme of all. I should have been the happiest man in the world—but I wasn't.

No, my conscience didn't bother me. I've never had one, I suppose. I got qualms, occasionally, when I had to dispose of old bodies; but then it came to be a routine thing. Like changing a window display in a department store, and throwing out the old dummies.

I didn't have compunctions about how we got the girls, either. I'm no sentimentalist. But there were other things bothering me—more subtle disturbances.

They say the desert does something to you. Perhaps that was it. I'd been three years in the East on my mission. I'd gone to the most fearful city in the world and bearded the demons in their lair. I'd nearly died in the worst inferno on the face of the globe. It might have done something queer to my mind.

Because in the middle of the night I'd wake up and think about the tchen-lam's curse. Foolish? Of course; the man was dead.

But then again, he wasn't dead. Dagur's body was dead, and the tchen-lam's spirit. Still, the body of the tchen-lam lived, and I saw it every day, with Dagur's eyes peering out at me.

The modern beauty salon, the cooing women attendants, all served as a pitiful mask for secret sorcery; for the mysteries of High Asia. I walked in the Twentieth Century atmosphere of high-geared business, but I looked into the face of a Mongol priest who had cursed me. I beheld the most incredible of all magics—the transference of souls. And it got me.

I'd think more and more about Tibet; dream of the lame, goitred women in their brocaded shirts, of the green-coated Torgots, of the diseased beggars in the streets of Lhassa. That was it, I ran a beauty parlor, but I dreamed of filth, squalor, disease, vermin. The Tibetans are a filthy race, and I'd remember their pitted faces, their scrofulous bald heads. Looking into the yellow face of Dagur I saw horrid markings.

ONE day I read a squib in the paper. About the death of an antique merchant in Canton. I thought of the Lotus of Lhassa, and shuddered. Had the tchen-lam taken it back? If so, why didn't they learn where I had gone? Why hadn't they followed me to exact the vengeance the priest had sworn on me?

Perhaps they had followed me. Perhaps they were coming now. I got to sneaking into my apartment at night, peering behind me on the street, eyeing everyone who came into our reception room at the beauty salon.

But there was no one. There was only Dagur, with his hateful yellow face—the face of the man who cursed me; the man who was a member of the cruelest sect in the world.

When my fears about the tchen-lam coming after me abated, I began to center my hatred on Dagur and his face. I didn't like it, or him. We never quarreled openly; too busy making money, but I fancy he disliked me as much as I did him.

Now we rarely met save at the salon, when there was work to be done or planned. I couldn't stand that yellow face, reminding me of my ancient guilt and my prophesied doom. If it weren't for that I would have been able to forget; to think of myself merely as a successful business man. But the face haunted me.

Maybe I could get rid of it. Dagur was clever, I knew that. He was an evil man, and a wise one. He'd defied the masters of Asia. But in picking me for a partner he'd unwittingly acknowledged that I was his equal if not his peer.

I was his peer. The money was all in my name.

I thought about this a lot lately. I could get the money and get rid of the tchen-lam's face with one quick stroke—a stroke to Dagur's heart. Perhaps my friends who brought the women could arrange it. Perhaps I could do it myself.

No. Dagur was famous now, because of the business. His sudden disappearance would stir up trouble. But—if the business fell . . .

Four hundred thousand dollars was enough for me. Dagur wasn't needed any more.

I could wreck the business, perhaps, and expose Dagur. He'd take the rap. As a mere partner, not implicated in the actual transference, I'd be safe.

And the money was mine.

Then I wouldn't see the tchen-lam's face, or worry about a ridiculous curse. Why did that savage's silly threat haunt me? He couldn't hurt me, dead, even though his body lived. He couldn't . . .

But he made me sweat at night in dreams. And I had to stop that.

Dagur stopped it for me. I guess I under-rated the wisdom of the East, which is indeed the wisdom of ageless serpents. He must have planned, too, and his mind was subtle. I never suspected the trap.

One day he called me into conference.

WE met in the room where the soul-transference was effected. It was private there, and quiet. We sat down. Dagur began to talk to me about quitting the business.

"Oho," I thought. "He wants money."

But Dagur never mentioned money. He just talked on and on about how he was sick of the racket, and now that we were both wealthy we might retire. He talked like a friend, like a brother. He talked until it grew dark and the room became dim.

He snapped on the lights behind the mirrors and I saw his yellow face; the tchen-lam's face that I had grown to hate and fear. It unnerved me, that grim reminder of unbelievable days, but I could not help staring at it. Staring at Dagur's eyes in that yellow face; staring as he talked on and on in a gentle drone and his eyes got bigger, and I saw that face loom up. It came to me across a burning desert, that face stalked me over the Gobi once more. But I didn't resist. I was caught in the mirror light and the voice-drone and the staring eyes. I was lost in Dagur's eyes.

The face was big as the desert now. I was lost in the face. I was lost. The tchen-lam was all about me, and I couldn't resist. I felt myself sinking.

Myself. What was myself? A dark blur, a liquid blur that could flow. Flow out of my body, into that face. Flow out, because all my being was concentrated on that face. Flow out into mirror-gleam and voice-drone and yellow face. I was ooze in darkness, I was flowing, flowing . . .

Then the chuckling laughter woke me, shook me into sanity. I opened my eyes, shocked to realize they had been closed. Dagur was laughing at me. He snapped up the lights and he was laughing. Dagur was laughing.

No—I was laughing!

But how could I be? I was sitting here, and the laughter came from my face across the room.

Then I knew. Dagur had tricked me. Like he tricked the old women. He'd put me into a receptive state, subtly hypnotized me—and changed bodies. Changed bodies. The body he stole from the tchen-lam he now gave to me, and stole my own.

Dagur laughed. I could only tremble as he mocked.

"I know your mind, my friend. I know what you were planning for me. But I beat you to the draw, as you would say. The money is all in your name—well it is in my name, now. I am you. It was written from the first that this must happen, and you didn't know, of course."

I stood up. Or my body did. The tchen-lam's body. I couldn't think, or hear, or feel. I staggered to a mirror. I stared down at the lean, emaciated form. I stared into the hateful yellow face I feared and dreaded—the face that was now my own for all time.

I began to laugh, uncontrollably. Within a week, staring at the face, I should go completely mad. Was this the tchen-lam's vengeance?

"I shall leave you now," Dagur was saying. "Of course, there is nothing you can do. I am glad of your assistance. I thank you for the money, and for ridding me of a body I was beginning to dislike for certain obvious reasons. The Tibetans are so filthy, you know?"

What did he mean?

"Yes." Dagur was opening the door. "It is all in the stars, my friend. In giving you the body I am unwittingly carrying out the curse of the tchen-lam, I suppose. He is dead, but remember what he said about making you suffer by his own hands? It seemed impossible for him to fulfill that threat, but I fancy he has. Yes, you are going to suffer at his hands."

Dagur left. I was standing in the twilight, brain reding. It was too sudden, too mad; the climax of a nightmare.

But the real climax was yet to come. "You will suffer at his hands," Dagur said. Filthy Tibetans? Glad to get rid of the tchen-lam's body? How could that body harm me when I was in it?

Then I glanced down at the strange yellow claws that were now my own and I understood everything, quite completely and quite horribly. I was going to suffer at the tchen-lam's hands, truly so. For I stared at those hands, and knew the truth, knew the dead man's vengeance.

I was in the body of the tchen-lam. And the tchen-lam had leprosy!

Lucy Comes to Stay

. . . the scissors? . . . only to cut the telephone wires, my dear.

“YOU can’t go on this way.”

Lucy kept her voice down low, because she knew the nurse had her room just down the hall from mine, and I wasn’t supposed to see any visitors. “But George is doing everything he can—poor dear, I hate to think of what all those doctors and specialists are costing him, and the sanatorium bill, too. And now that nurse, that Miss Higgins, staying here every day.”

“It won’t do any good. You know it won’t.” Lucy didn’t sound like she was arguing with me. She knew. That’s because Lucy is smarter than I am. Lucy wouldn’t have started the drinking and gotten into such a mess in the first place. So it was about time I listened to what she said.

“Look, Vi,” she murmured. “I hate to tell you this. You aren’t well, you know. But you’re going to find out one of these days anyway, and you might as well hear it from me.”

“What is it, Lucy?”

“About George, and the doctors. They don’t think you’re going to get well.” She paused. “They don’t want you to.”

“Oh, Lucy!”

“Listen to me, you little fool. Why do you suppose they sent you to that sanatorium in the first place? They said it was to take the cure. So you took it. All right, you’re cured, then. But you’ll notice that you still have the doctor coming every day, and George makes you stay here in your room, and that Miss Higgins who's supposed to be a special nurse—you know what she is, don't you? She's a guard."

I couldn't say anything. I just sat there and blinked. I wanted to cry, but I couldn't, because deep down inside I knew that Lucy was right.

"Just try to get out of here," Lucy said. "You'll see how fast she locks the door on you. All that talk about special diets and rest doesn't fool me. Look at yourself—you're as well as I am! You ought to be getting out, seeing people, visiting your friends."

"But I have no friends," I reminded her. "Not after that party, not after what I did—"

"That's a lie." Lucy nodded. "That's what George wants you to think. Why, you have hundreds of friends, Vi. They still love you. They tried to see you at the hospital and George wouldn't let them in. They sent flowers to the sanatorium and George told the nurses to burn them."

"He did? He told the nurses to burn the flowers?"

"Of course. Look, Vi, it's about time you faced the truth. George wants them to think you're sick. George wants you to think you're sick. Why? Because then he can put you away for good. Not in a private sanatorium, but in the—"

"No!" I began to shake. I couldn't stop shaking. It was ghastly. But it proved something. They told me at the sanatorium, the doctors told me, that if I took the cure I wouldn't get the shakes any more. Or the dreams, or any of the other things. Yet here it was—I was shaking again.

"Shall I tell you some more?" Lucy whispered. "Shall I tell you what they're putting in your food? Shall I tell you about George and Miss Higgins?"

"But she's older than he is, and besides he'd never—"

Lucy laughed.

"Stop it!" I yelled.

"All right. But don't yell, you little fool. Do you want Miss Higgins to come in?"

"She thinks I'm taking a nap. She gave me a sedative."

"Lucky I dumped it out." Lucy frowned, "Vi, I've got to get you away from here. And there isn't much time."

She was right. There wasn't much time. Seconds, minutes, hours, days, weeks—how long had it been since I'd had a drink?

"We'll sneak off," Lucy said. "We could take a room together where they wouldn't find us. I'll nurse you until you're well."

"But rooms cost money."

"You have that fifty dollars George gave you for a party dress."

"Why, Lucy," I said. "How did you know that?"

"You told me ages ago, dear. Poor thing, you don't remember things very well, do you? All the more reason for trusting me."

I nodded. I could trust Lucy. Even though she was responsible, in a way, for me starting to drink. She just had thought it would cheer me up when George brought all his high-class friends to the house and we went out to impress his clients. Lucy had tried to help. I could trust her. I must trust her—

"We can leave as soon as Miss Higgins goes tonight," Lucy was saying. "We'll wait until George is asleep, eh? Why not get dressed now, and I'll come back for you."

I got dressed. It isn't easy to dress when you have the shakes, but I did it. I even put on some make-up and trimmed my hair a little with the big scissors. Then I looked at myself in the mirror and said out loud, "Why, you can't tell, can you?"

"Of course not," said Lucy. "You look radiant. Positively radiant."

I stood there smiling, and the sun was going down, just shining through the window on the scissors in a way that hurt my eyes, and all at once I was so sleepy.

"George will be here soon, and Miss Higgins will leave," Lucy said. "I'd better go now. Why don't you rest until I come for you?"

"Yes," I said. "You'll be very careful, won't you?"

"Very careful," Lucy whispered, and tiptoed out quietly.

I lay down on the bed and then I was sleeping, really sleeping for the first time in weeks, sleeping so the scissors wouldn’t hurt my eyes, the way George hurt me inside when he wanted to shut me up in the asylum so he and Miss Higgins could make love on my bed and laugh at me the way they all laughed except Lucy and she would take care of me she knew what to do now I could trust her when George came and I must sleep and sleep and nobody can blame you for what you think in your sleep or do in your sleep.

It was all right until I had the dreams, and even then I didn’t really worry about them because a dream is only a dream, and when I was drunk I had a lot of dreams.

When I woke up I had the shakes again, but it was Lucy shaking me, standing there in the dark shaking me. I looked around and saw that the door to my room was open, but Lucy didn’t bother to whisper.

She stood there with the scissors in her hand and called to me.

“Come on, let’s hurry.”

“What are you doing with the scissors?” I asked.
